proper place, but to contend that the two systems ought not to be combined; that there must be a separate system for individuals, and a separate system for corporations, in order to enable them to work well and in harmony. He believed that such an amendment, if now introduced into this bill, would be fatal to its passage. We knew, from what had already taken place at the other end of the Capitol, that it could not succeed; and he should suspect the motive of its introduction here to be a desire or design to defeat the bill itself. This bill had been well considered and well digested; it had been long under the consideration of the ablest minds of the country. We must (as had been remarked) set the ship afloat; we must launch it in the first place; it was idle to suppose that a measure so comprehensive, and covering so much ground as this, could be made perfect at once. Nothing but experience, nothing but a knowledge of its practical operation, could enable us to make it such as would meet every case; to free it from every difficulty, and to put it in such a shape as to meet every objection that might be raised against it. It would be better to carry the bill through as it came from the Senate, because he believed that, at this late period of the session, if an attempt was made to amend it, when there were so many exciting questions before them, Congress would rise without doing any thing on this subject to answer the expectations of the people of the United States.

This was emphatically a measure of relief; it was for the purposes of relief that this Congress had been convened. They had called themselves the relief Congress. He trusted that no gentleman on either side would deny that the people of this country had long been in a state in which they needed relief of some kind, and relief from legislation. If such was the fact, was it not manifest that no measure of the present session promised such direct and immediate relief as this? The other measures of the session—the Bank bill (which some gentlemen believed to be the sovereign panacea for our ills)—would take time before they could afford relief; but this bill would go into immediate operation.

Mr. F. after glancing briefly at the history of this subject in the United States, proceeded to argue at length the power of Congress over it, contending that the Constitution of the United States had conferred upon them the broadest, the most liberal, and the most comprehensive power in relation to it. From this point Mr. F. passed on to some general remarks on the provisions of the bill; and concluded by urging its passage on the ground of the benefits which it would confer on the creditors as well as on the debtors; as a measure called for alike by the feelings of humanity and by the great interests of the community.

Mr. Linn, of New York, said he did not rise to address the committee at large, or upon the merits of the bill. He left the discussion of the principles involved in the measure to others. He had, for himself, and not without some deliberation and the solution of many doubts, concluded to give the measure his cordial support. He had looked at the question in its relations to the genius of the Government, the character of the people, and the exigencies of the times. He desired, at this time, to call the attention of the committee to some of the details of the bill, intending, at the proper time, to offer some amendments corresponding with the views he entertained. He could not consent to launch the ship, if he might be permitted to use the figure of his colleague, (Mr. BARNARD,) until he was quite sure she was seaworthy, and would not sink on her first voyage. Nor could he adopt the principle in legislation assumed by the gentleman who had just preceded him, (Mr. FRESENDER,) by which he was to follow in the wake of some great mind, no matter where it conducted us. He could not consent thus to stultify himself, or to shut his eyes to defects in the details of the bill. There were defects in the bill, affecting the interests of both debtor and creditor, and some of which, he feared, would render the measure quite obnoxious to the very class of persons for whose benefit it was proposed. Although he would not say that a failure to amend would cause him to vote against the bill, he desired, as a sincere friend of the measure, to perfect it, and would, therefore, call the attention of the committee to such defects as seemed to him worthy of attention.

Mr. PENDLETON rose in reply. He declined going at large into a discussion of the merits of the bill, because all he had intended to say had already been better said by others. The bill was not perfect; nor was it reasonable to expect that, in framing an untried measure of so great difficulty as this, perfection should be attained. The gentleman had compared it to a ship about to be launched. Mr. P. said it was no sufficient objection to committing her to the bosom of the deep, that every spar might not have the requisite degree of taper, or that every rope might not run with perfect freedom through the block: if it was certain that the vessel would float; that she had the requisite amount of ballast; that her cargo would be safe, and the lives of her crew, let her be given to her destined element, and sent upon her voyage. These minor matters might be rectified after she had made a trip and tried her bearings, and been found seaworthy. If gentlemen were to wait till an untried measure was rendered perfect in their imagination before it was subjected to any experiment, an original law never could be enacted. Every gentleman must, to a certain extent, defer to the opinions of other gentlemen around him, else there would be no legislation. Why enter into debate if opinions were not to be compared? and why compare opinions if each man was determined obstinately to adhere to his own?

Mr. TRUMBULL said there were some objection-

August, 1841.]

Bankrupt Law.

[27th Conn.]

able provisions in the bill, to which he should have called the notice of the committee, if this had not already been done by other gentlemen. He thought it ought to contain such a provision as was contained in the act of 1800, giving the creditors of a bankrupt a voice in the appointment of his assignee.

One amendment had been proposed by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. ROOSEVELT,) which he should more particularly notice. It was that which went to include in the scope of the bill State corporations, and especially banks.

To this he objected, first, because it was now too late to urge it, the States had been for half a century in the habit of chartering these corporations. If it were now an original question whether we should have their paper as a currency, there might be more room for doubt; but it was too late in the day. The States surely were most competent to judge whether banks were or were not injurious to their respective communities; and if the States could create banks, they had also the power to supervise and preserve them. But if Congress, through the intervention of a bankrupt law, had it in its power to put an end to banking corporations just as fast as the State could create them, the power to incorporate was nugatory. The power to declare banks bankrupt had never been claimed by the General Government until since the recent suspension of specie payments. To do so by the intervention of Congress would be something entirely novel, although the States had claimed and exercised the power from the very date of the constitution. The indulgence to banks, as to continuing suspensions, which had been so much complained of and denounced, was not so much an indulgence to the banks themselves as to the communities in which they were situated. The banks of Mr. T.'s portion of the country had been able to resume and to continue specie payments; but it was at the solicitation of Government that they remained in a state of suspension. It was within Mr. T.'s personal knowledge that they had said to a committee of the Legislature, "If you advise us to resume, we will do it before night." The indulgence was not to the banks; it was to the community around them. Let the blame, then, if any, fall where it was merited. Many talked of the banks as the authors of all our difficulties and embarrassments; but Mr. T. thought it was an unjust imputation. Were the banks the authors of trade? or was trade the author of the banks? They were the mere instruments of the trade of a business community; to the spirit of trade they owed their creation; and whoever denounced them, virtually attacked the spirit of trade and commerce which so eminently distinguished our countrymen. The banks were controlled by the citizens; their excesses were owing not to the will and choice of the corporations themselves, but to the state of the country, its wide extent, its remote position in relation to the old transatlantic world; the vast multitude and variety of objects of speculation and enterprise with which it everywhere abounded. It was a young country, and as such, faithful to all the stimulants which addressed themselves to youthful feelings. Its free institutions, both civil and religious, were its glory. It abolished all governmental establishment or patronage of any religious sect; no restriction was imposed upon conscience; but all men were left, in matters of faith and of religious observance, free as the air they breathed. Look at our common schools, the great sources of education; look at the fact that all, or nearly all, our population were able to read and write, and to conduct the ordinary transactions of business; look at the consequent prevalence of knowledge; the development of ingenuity which filled our land with labor-saving machinery; look at the abolition of primogeniture and entails; look at the ease with which property might be acquired; sum up all these things, existing simultaneously in one vast, free, wide-spread community, and need any one be astonished that banks should run into extravagance in discounts and circulation? To remedy these excesses, did gentlemen wish to prostrate all the banks in the country?

None but natural persons had ever been contemplated in the provisions of the constitution empowering Congress to pass a general bankrupt law; because at the time there were none other. The bankrupt law of England, so far from including corporations, expressly excluded them; and this was the only law in force at the adoption of the constitution. (Mr. T. here quoted the law.) The including bank corporations in the provisions of a general bankrupt law was a measure now for the first time proposed. There existed at that time many corporations in our country, such as schools, academies, and colleges. Did any man in his senses believe the constitution contemplated that these institutions were to be required to make discovery of their assets and suffer an assignment?

None of the motives which applied to a law for bankrupt individuals, in a trading community, applied to the case of corporations. One great motive in the case of debtors was a feeling of humanity and compassion toward them. But did these feelings respect a mere ideal person, the creature of law? The moment the law seized upon it the corporation itself became extinct. It was no longer in being to receive any benefit from the law, and could not be an object of sympathy as unfortunate men were. From a corporation thus extinct there could be no hope of payment; the corporation was at an end. There was no inducement for a corporation to make an assignment, because it did not survive to receive any benefit. With regard to bankrupts, one great inducement for making a general law was to prevent debtors from evading their debts by removing into another State; but a corporation was fixed, and could not remove. When a man received the benefit of such an act, it was with the hope that, being relieved from embarrassment, he might again become useful and active as a citizen; but a corporation was defunct, and never could act again.

[1st SESS.]

Bankrupt Law.

[August, 1841.]

Mr. T. believed that Congress had no power to include banks in the law; but if they had, all these were so many considerations to show it ought not to be exercised.

Mr. T. objected to that portion of the bill which related to compulsory bankruptcy; if it was intended for the benefit of creditors, it was much more restricted in its provisions than the previous act of 1800. If that was the true end in view, why these alterations? But Mr. T. was convinced that the protection of creditors was not the chief object of this bill; that part of the bill was a ship, to be used merely for the purpose of carrying the other portions which related to voluntary bankruptcy. But for the latter, he rather thought this bill would have but few advocates, there or elsewhere.

Now, as to the term "voluntary bankruptcy," when he first read the words he did not really know what they meant. He could indeed conceive of a man's voluntarily becoming a bankrupt, provided his object was fraudulent; but, otherwise, the phrase was incomprehensible to him. What would some of the venerable sages of 1789 have said to this term? What would Chief Justice Ellsworth have said to a man who talked to him of "voluntary bankruptcy?" Who ever heard of such language before? Heretofore the idea of a bankrupt was that of a man whose property was taken to pay his creditors. If a man had borrowed money, and was seen to be squandering it, the man who loaned it to him might require a surrender of his property to secure payment; and, on condition of such surrender, the debtor might be discharged. The proposition always came from the lender; the object was to get his money back, and to discharge the debtor. But gentlemen said it was a discharge of the debtor, to be sure, but not of the contract. Well, if Mr. T. owed a gentleman $1,000, and had given his note for the money, the gentleman might keep his note in all its virtue, provided Mr. T. got his discharge. It was said that the creditors stood in the nature of an insurer; that he believed the debtor was able to pay, and that, if he was not, he must surrender his property. Mr. T. admitted that such was the contract, as under this law; but it amounted to a discharge to all intents and purposes as soon as the property was surrendered. Nor did Mr. T. object to this. If this law was expedient at all, it ought so to provide. But he insisted that it was an entirely new principle for a bankrupt to be allowed to discharge himself. Under this law, the discharging of the debtor was the principal thing aimed at, and the surrender of his property was merely an incident. In former bankrupt laws, the object was the surrender of the property, and the discharge of the debtor was the incident.

The power of the creditor, under this bill, never would, in practice, be exercised at all. All the cases specified as conditions for its exercise were cases of personal fraud on the part of the debtor. And would the fraudulent debtor, who could choose his own time, and arrange his own plan to suit himself, manage his fraud so clumsily as to put himself within the power of his creditor under this law? Never. Let this bill pass, and one of the most profitable things a man could do would be to break in business. (In fact it was a pretty good branch of business as things stood now.)

The bill extended to all classes of men. It was not merely a provision for mercantile men, but for doctors and lawyers, and all sorts of persons who lived by their heads or by their hands. The capital of such persons was their head: how much of it would they surrender to their creditors? And how much would the creditor make by selling it at auction? The debtor would have precisely the same capital after his surrender as he had before.

There was another objection to the bill. The debtor would be able to control the creditor. The bill reversed the wisdom of Solomon, who had declared that "the borrower is slave to the lender:" but by this bill the lender would be slave to the borrower. How was he to get back his money? Was he to sue? Yes. But the man replies, "I am insolvent, and I demand my discharge." Mr. T. knew what the answer would be; and it was a very proper answer as far as it went. He should be told that we are bound to presume that debtors (American debtors) are all honest. Now, Mr. T. was prepared to admit that they were as honest as their creditors. He did not feel required to admit any thing more. But if men were all honest, where was the need of this law, or for any other law in relation to property? The law, confessedly, was made for men who were not honest. Law was made for the lawless.

Mr. PAYNE, of Alabama, addressed the committee in a few brief remarks, in which he said that he was not opposed to a bankrupt bill, if properly drawn; but he objected strongly to the passage of this on the score of details. Especially, he objected to the 4th section, releasing a principal whilst it held the endorser bound. No people under the canopy of Heaven could stand such a provision, and he gave notice that, unless it were stricken out, he would vote against the bill. He also indicated an amendment which, he said, he would offer to this section at the proper time.

Mr. P. replied to the argument which had been urged, that to include banking corporations in the bill would be to interfere with the sovereignty of the States. He admitted that there was validity in the objection, yet contended that the bill gave to these corporations an indirect blow by releasing all their debtors. For this reason, a provision in relation to these corporations ought to be inserted; and if this,

AUGUST, 1841.]

Land Distribution Bill.

[27TH CONG.]

also, was not done, he should vote against the bill.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 12.

Oregon Convention Notice.

The resolution submitted by Mr. LINN in relation to the possession of Oregon Territory, was then taken up.

Mr. LINN made a few remarks, showing the vast importance to this country of some step being taken in relation to this subject. It had been suggested that the resolution might appear indelicate towards the President. If so, and gentlemen thought it better to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations, he would agree to do so, and he left that matter in the hands of the Senate.

Messrs. BENTON and SEVIER made a few observations in favor of the resolution.

Mr. PRESTON thought the resolution would require more consideration, as it involved matter of national import, when

Mr. LINN agreed to pass it over informally for the present.

Land Distribution Bill.

The land bill was then taken up, the question pending being the amendment offered by Mr. LINN to appropriate the proceeds of the lands to the public defence.

Mr. LINN continued his remarks in support of the proposition made by him to change the destination of the public lands from a distribution among the States, (or rather among the stockjobbers who hold the State bonds, who expect to get from the State taxes all that the distribution enables their treasuries to dispose of,) to the defence of the States. He took a rapid glance at the posture in which this Government stood in relation to the great duty for which it was formed—the common defence. The accumulated causes of quarrel, which Great Britain has been heaping up from year to year, left little doubt on Mr. LINN's mind that they never would be settled without conflict. The tenacity with which she has kept possession of the invaded portion of Maine now supported with troops, marks the design of England to make conquest of it. The conflagration of the Caroline, and the murder of some on board, and the arrogant demand of impunity for the perpetrators of the crime, was alluded to by Mr. L. as another of the indications of that temper which threatened difficulties. The permanent encroachments in progress by the British on the Oregon Territory, which the United States could never acquiesce in, was another dangerous symptom. The tampering with Abolitionists in this country by societies in England, under the countenance of the heads of the Government, and the renewal of the always resisted right of search, under the pretext of detecting slavers on the coast of Africa, were all adverted to as signs, that we could not rely upon the pacific disposition of the jealous rival, whose trade is war, unless we were prepared to encounter it in such a way as to prevent it from gaining greater advantages from aggression than by peace.

Mr. L. then touched upon the exposed condition of the country—recurred to the refusal of those now in power, to devote the surplus to the common defence, preferring to distribute it among the States which it had only tempted into lavish expenditure. The proceeds of the lands it was now proposed should fall into the same hands that made way with the surplus, without benefit to any but the speculating classes. He contrasted the purposes for which distributions were made, with the patriotic design contemplated by the amendment, which would give them to put the nation in a condition to defy its enemies—to maintain its honor and interest with peace—or if war were unavoidable, preserve the lives of thousands who would be sacrificed if the nation were found unprepared for it. Mr. LINN adverted to the grovelling, mercenary, selfish political schemes to which the means of public defence had been sacrificed—the corrupt electioneering of which we had such an example in the last campaign, which he did not hesitate to pronounce to be “infamous.” From such detestable scrambles he would preserve the sacred fund, which was bequeathed by the States of the Confederacy to the Union for the common defence.

Mr. BENTON followed; and, after strongly contrasting the object of the bill and the amendment—the one intended to strip and plunder the country, the other to defend it—after contrasting these two objects, both as to the constitutionality and expediency, he went warmly and vehemently into the necessity of defence now, and took two points in the state of our relations with Great Britain as requiring this immediate preparation. He said he omitted, on purpose, all the well-known points of difference between the two countries, for the purpose of bringing forward two subjects on which the public mind was yet too little informed and too little awakened. One of these subjects was the Columbia River question; the other related to the organized attempts now made in London to excite a negro insurrection in our Southern States. On the first of these heads, he showed that the Oregon Convention of 1818, first made for ten years, and subsequently continued without limitation of time, but subject to be terminated on notice given by either party, was unequal and fallacious. He showed that this convention was illusory and deceptive; that the joint occupation, in fact, only extended to American territory, American rivers, and American harbors; and that from these, Americans were all expelled, with the loss of more than five hundred lives, and an immense waste of property; leaving to the British the exclusive possession, not only of her own, but of all the American territory besides. He said this state of things must be remedied; that his colleague had taken the first and proper step, in moving to give notice for the termination of the convention; and this notice must be attended with the proper preparations to give it emphasis, or the British would treat it with contempt, and hold on to our territory in defiance of us, even after the convention was at an end.

1st Sess.]

Land Distribution Bill.

[August, 1841,

The other cause for immediate preparations, Mr. B. enforced by pointing to the organized Abolition Societies now in London, and the appointment of Lord Mountcashel (who was in favor of exciting both savage and servile war against us) to be Governor General of Canada. On this point Mr. B. brought the warning voice of experience to his aid, and showed, from Edwards' History of the West Indies, that the insurrection of San Domingo was made, first, by the Anti-Slavery Society of London, which held its meetings at the Old Jewry; secondly, by the Society of Les Amis des Noirs in Paris; thirdly, by the letter of the Abbé Gregoire, sent to the people of color in the island of San Domingo. He showed that these, and especially the London Society, were the architects of that insurrection. He read many harrowing passages from the description of the insurrection; and showed that the London Society, now at work to make insurrection here, was doing every thing which their predecessors at the Old Jewry did, and was far more formidable, and infinitely more to be dreaded. He then adverted to the appointment of Lord Mountcashel to be Governor General of Canada—spoke of his horrid declarations in Parliament in favor of savage war and negro insurrection; and said if there was no Earl of Chatham now in the House of Lords to rebuke such inhuman and diabolical sentiments, the American Senate should not be silent. The American Senate, and all America, should rise up to denounce such sentiments—to brand their author—and to consider and prepare for the dire results.

The question was then taken on Mr. LINN's amendment, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Monton, Pierce, Sevier, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—18.

NAYS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Buchanan, Choate, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Rives, Smith of Indiana, Simmons, Southard, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, and White—28.

Mr. STURGEON, of Pennsylvania, after stating that he was instructed by his State Legislature to support a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands on certain conditions, moved an amendment of the bill, in compliance with the instructions. The amendment proposed to strike out the ten per cent. given to the new States.

Mr. WALKER resisted this amendment with much earnestness, and demonstrated that the new States were entitled not only to ten, but to twenty per cent., from the rapid increase of their population.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he should vote for the amendments proposed by his friend and colleague, (Mr. STURGEON;) and if they were adopted, he should then vote for the bill, in obedience to the instructions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania. These instructions were plain and explicit on their face. There could be no doubt about the import of the language which they employed. Mr. B. then read the instructions.

Instructed as he was, and unable to express his own opinions without violating these instructions, he had purposely forbore from entering into the general discussion. He would, however, submit another remark, which might explain his future votes. The Legislature had instructed him to resist all attempts to deprive the people of Pennsylvania of their just proportion of the public lands. Without any instruction he should have acted in this manner: and he must say that, if the bill now before the committee were unequal and unjust, the amendment which the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) had given notice that he would offer, to cede the public lands to the new States, on certain conditions, was still more unequal and unjust towards the old States; and, with or without instructions, it should meet his decided negative.

Had he been at liberty to act upon his own judgment, he should have most cheerfully voted for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. LINN,) pledging the proceeds of these lands as a sacred fund for national defence. There was a peculiar propriety in devoting these lands, which had been purchased by the valor and blood of our ancestors, to the maintenance of the national safety and national glory of their descendants. With this money you might increase your navy, complete your fortifications, and prepare for war; and you would thus distribute its benefits more equally and justly among the people, than you could do in any other manner. He was sorry, therefore, that his instructions had compelled him to vote against this amendment.

Mr. CLAY entreated the Senators from Pennsylvania to reconsider the decision, and see if they would, in reality, comply with the intentions of their Legislature in voting against the bill. Did that Legislature contemplate so impracticable a bill, as these amendments would render it, when they required them to support a distribution bill? He moreover called on them to reconsider their decision, as he was afraid the bill would be lost without their votes; whereas, with them, it might be passed.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had turned to his friend from Missouri (Mr. LINN) just before the Senator from Kentucky had risen, and expressed his astonishment that he (Mr. CLAY) should have permitted any legislative instructions to be presented to the body, which he might suppose to be disagreeable to the Senators instructed, without interposing his opinion and advice. He believed that the Senator had never suffered such an occasion to pass without interfering in this manner between Senators and their constituents. He thanked him for his kind offices, and for the interest which he manifested in his (Mr. B.'s) welfare. He would be pleased to have the Senator as a friend upon terms of perfect equality; but not as a master. We had witnessed enough to convince us that he was a severe master.

August, 1841.]

Bankrupt Law.

[27TH CONG.]

Mr. CLAY. Ask Charley if I am not a kind master.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, Charley had been so often brought before the Senate and the country by the Senator, that he was now almost as notorious as his master. He would reciprocate the kindness of the Senator, and in turn give him a little good advice. He (Mr. CLAY) had already said enough about Charley; and if he wished to spare himself and his political friends from the shafts of ridicule which were aimed at him and them in the public journals all over the country, he would never hereafter, on this floor, mention the name of that well-known individual.

He, Mr. B., intended, in good faith, either to obey instructions or to resign his seat. His constituents must, by this time, have been fully convinced of his fidelity to this doctrine. He had often manifested his faith by his works; and never upon a more trying occasion than when he had voted at the present session in favor of the repeal of the Independent Treasury. Such was the just devotion of the Democracy of Pennsylvania to this wise and salutary measure, that he had subjected himself to some reproach among his own political friends on account of this vote, although none of them could deny that he had acted in obedience to one of the fundamental doctrines of the party to which he and they belonged.

Mr. STURGEON then proposed another amendment in accordance with his instructions, which was also voted down.

Mr. AROHER moved to amend the bill by striking from the 8th section that clause which renders the disposition of funds obligatory for roads, bridges, canals, &c., which when made, were to be made free for the use of the United States in transporting the mail, munitions of war, &c.

This proposition led to a long debate, in which Messrs. WHITE, SMITH of Indiana, CLAY, HUNTINGTON, BENTON, and SEVIER participated, when, without taking any question,

On motion of Mr. MANGUM,
The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 12.

Bankrupt Law.

On motion of Mr. BARNARD, the House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. TILLINGHAST, of Rhode Island, in the chair,) on the bill from the Senate to provide for the establishment of a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. BARNARD offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That on Friday next, the 13th instant, at 12 o'clock meridian, all debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on Senate bill No. 3, to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, shall cease, and the committee shall then proceed to vote on any question then pending, and on any amendment then pending, or that may be offered, and shall then report said bill to the House, with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee: Provided, That nothing in this resolution shall preclude the committee from reporting said bill at an earlier hour.

Mr. WISE moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "Friday next, at 12 o'clock meridian," and inserting "to-day, at 8 o'clock, P. M."

And the question being taken on the amendment, the vote stood—ayes 27, noes 64.

But no quorum voted.

Mr. WELLER moved a call of the House; which was ordered.

And the roll having been called, 123 members answered to their names.

And the names of the absentees having been called, 156 members appeared to be present.

And more than a quorum being now present, all further proceedings on the call were, on motion of Mr. WELLER, suspended.

And the question recurring on the amendment to the resolution—

Mr. BARNARD asked the previous question: and there was a second.

And the main question was ordered to be taken.

And the main question (being first on the amendment of Mr. WISE) was taken, and decided in the negative.

So the amendment was rejected.

And the question recurring on the adoption of the resolution—

Mr. ANDREWS, of Kentucky, moved to lay it on the table; which motion was decided in the negative—ayes 56, noes 99.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

And the question recurring on its adoption—

Mr. JAMES asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 73, nays 89.

So the resolution was not adopted.

Mr. MILTON BROWN rose, and addressed the committee up to the expiration of his hour in support of the bill; advocating both the constitutionality and expediency of the measure.

Mr. B. dwelt upon the policy of granting an insolvent debtor a full discharge, as that which was most likely to secure the interests of the creditor. He adverted to the intuitive love of freedom and the resistance to oppressive force which so strongly marked our countrymen, and to the far stronger influence of feelings of honor and gratitude over those of degradation and fear. It had once been deemed necessary and just to imprison the debtor; this was now abrogated, as a relic of barbarism. To retain an endless lien upon all the future efforts and acquisitions of the debtor was little better: for it reduced him, in effect, to the condition of a slave. If it was said that, when a creditor trusted his property, he looked for his security rather to the honor and integrity of his debtor than to his property, Mr. B. replied, very well; let him him continue so to look; this bill did not interfere with such reliance in the least. Mr. B. had had some experience in the collecting of debts; and he had found that honest debtors were far readier to pay on an appeal to their honor than under coercion of law. The bill was well guarded; yet still it might release some creditors who were dishonest, and whose conduct had been fraudulent; even if this were the case, it would be better that some such characters should escape, than, for the sake of punishing them, multitudes of honest but unfortunate men should be subjected to endless bondage. The rain from Heaven fell on the evil together with the good; and some tares were suffered to grow, rather than the wheat should be rooted up. If a rogue escaped now and then, let him go; there was a tribunal whose judgment he could not evade.

1st SESS.]

Bankrupt Law.

[August, 1841.]

Mr. PORK observed that there seemed a very decided disposition to pass this bill; and he therefore felt bound to state that it contained some principles which, if he rightly understood them, he never could endorse. The voluntary portion of the bill, as it had been called, seemed to be the most popular; but to him it seemed to be in hostility with the constitution, or at least wholly unsupported by that instrument. It went to affect all existing contracts, and to interfere with the relations of debtor and creditor. As to honest debtors, after some observation, he could say that he never had known them to be treated with oppression by creditors. Imprisonment for debt he had always been opposed to; he considered it as utterly opposed to the genius of our Government and the character of our people; nor did he believe that much was ever made out of a compulsory surrender of the debtor's goods, or from the estate of a bankrupt. If he was called on to give a title to this bill, he should call it a bill for the benefit of lawyers, commissioners, assignees, clerks, sheriffs, and their associates and dependents; these, he believed, would be the persons who would make the most out of it, while neither debtors nor creditors would get much of the spoils. Though young at the time, he had witnessed the practical effects of the law of 1800, and had seen large estates eaten up by lawyers and others appointed to take the charge of them, while neither creditor nor debtor in the end got one dollar of the proceeds.

He objected to the bill as bringing creditors within the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, which often sat one or two hundred miles off from their homes; this never had been intended by the constitution. The jurisdiction of these courts ought to be confined to matters of a national character, or to cases between citizens of different States; but never were intended to be resorted to by neighbors, citizens of the same State. A debtor might draw all his immediate neighbors, to whom he was in debt, away to a Federal court two hundred miles distant. Farmers would be slow in tackling up their wagons on such a journey, and would rather risk the loss of their debt, of which they would not be very sanguine, after receiving notice that the man was a bankrupt. It might enrich lawyers, but he did not know anybody else that would be likely to get much good by it. The best way, in general, was to leave a debtor alone; he was likely to make ten times more for his creditors than when hunted by sheriffs and fleeced by lawyers. The fine pictures, taken from novels, of the cruelty of iron-hearted creditors over poor and honest debtors, had mighty little effect, the Governor said, upon him; he did not believe in them.

Mr. WELLER moved that the House adjourn; but withdrew the motion, to enable

Mr. WISE to move that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bankrupt bill; on which motion Mr. W. moved the previous question.

Mr. HOLMES said he opposed this motion, unless gentlemen would pledge themselves not to call for the previous question when the bill should come into the House. He hoped a measure of this importance was not to be forced through without sufficient discussion.

Mr. ADAMS observed that the gentleman need not trouble himself—there was no quorum to vote.

The House then adjourned.

FRIDAY, August 13.

Bankrupt Law.

The House, on motion of Mr. BARNARD, again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. TILLINGHAST, of Rhode Island, in the chair,) on the bill from the Senate to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. GORDON to strike out the enacting clause of the bill,

Mr. BIRDSEYE took the floor, and spoke very earnestly up to the expiration of his hour, in favor of the bill.

Mr. McKAY briefly stated the grounds on which he was opposed to the passage of the bill. He admitted the power to pass a general law to be in the constitution, but reminded Mr. ALLEN (who had expressed surprise that any doubt should be felt about a matter so plain to him) that great differences of opinion had existed, from the beginning, as to the extent of the power. The power was to pass a bankrupt law, but the question arose what a bankrupt law meant. To answer this question, he went to the English laws. The term was taken, like many others in the constitution, "habeas corpus," "piracy," "felony," &c., from the laws of Great Britain. On this point, he quoted Kent's Commentaries in illustration. He contended that the understanding in relation to the law intended by the constitution had, ever since 1789, been a law relating to traders only. That was the character of the law passed in 1800; and, in fact, this very characteristic had caused its repeal in 1808, for it was objected to as being partial, and applying only to one class of society. No attempt was heard of to extend the system to farmers, mechanics, and others, till 1827, when a section had been introduced for that purpose, and then the bill was rejected as being unconstitutional.

Mr. McK. strongly objected to the bill, as assuming jurisdiction over the whole relations of debtor and creditor throughout the country, abolishing the insolvent laws of all the States, &c. He could not vote for it unless the "voluntary" portion of the bill was stricken out. He again quoted Chancellor Kent and Lord Eldon as to the extent of frauds even under the British laws, and also the returns made in 1802-'3, in reference to the same subject, in this country, which went to show how little was obtained by creditors under the effects of that law. He objected very decidedly to that portion of the bill which gave jurisdiction of bankrupt cases to the District Courts of the United States, as subjecting both creditors and debtors to enormous expenses, and also as favorable to the perpetration of frauds. All the cases in a State of the extent of North Carolina must go before a single judge. The bill would never work well, if at all, in practice.

Besides all these objections, Mr. McK. never could vote for the bill unless it was made to cover the case of banking corporations. He insisted that Congress had the power to do this; and that, if they had the power, it was their duty to exercise it.

Mr. Wise said he felt very indifferent as to the fate of the bill, although he felt very sincere sympathy for the debtor class of his fellow-citizens. He was willing that those who wanted the bill should have it; but as it did not suit his constituents, they must get it without his vote. A bankrupt bill was not suited to the business and habits of an agricultural people, and its provisions were incompatible with the interests of the corn planter, the tobacco and cotton planter. He felt a sincere sympathy for the unfortunate debtors of the country, and therefore would throw no obstacles in the way of the bill; but it was because he did feel that sincere sympathy for that class of his fellow-citizens, that he would not keep them upon tender hooks—he would not sport with their feelings for party purposes, nor seek to make political capital out of the hopes, desires, and expectations of the unfortunate poor. What did he mean? I mean to tell them, said he—and if I had a trumpet voice, it should reach every log-house in which a poor debtor lives, though bankrupts do not live in log-houses—but I mean to tell every poor debtor whose eyes, and perhaps tearful eyes, are turned to this House—whose hopes are flattered to be betrayed, that he will get no bankrupt bill this session. I will give him no secret reason for this opinion. I will tell him that those who have all along pretended to be the friends of this bill, and have expressed so much sympathy for the distresses of the poor bankrupts, merely meant to make use of this bill as so much political capital—that is, they will pass it or not in a certain contingency, and the odds are against it. With a large portion of the people of this country this bill would be popular, and he believed that with a much larger portion its repeal would be still more popular.

Gentlemen told him that there were five hundred thousand bankrupts in a land teeming with sources of wealth. But how many creditors had these five hundred thousand bankrupts? The minimum was at least five to each one. Now, said he, if you multiply five hundred thousand by five, you will have two millions five hundred thousand who will be for the repeal. You cannot, therefore, do much mischief with this bill, if there be any mischief in it, for if its passage now would be popular, its repeal would be still more so. It had been calculated that the political influence of the bankrupts in this country would turn the scale in five States which gave eighty-nine electoral votes in the last Presidential election. In these five States the whole number of votes polled was nine hundred thousand. The Whig majority was eighteen thousand—number necessary to change that majority nine thousand, and that number was only one per cent. on the number of votes polled. Mark you, gentlemen, one in one hundred—nine in nine hundred—changes many other questions of policy in this country. New York, Maine, Pennsylvania, and two other States, were embraced in this calculation; and let the weight of the bankrupts now be felt, and in feeling their weight, let gentlemen see how weighty a matter little things may be in all questions, as well as questions of bankruptcy. If you are wise, and you will be cautious and prudent, do not imagine yourselves to be omnipotent. There was some delusion in the triumph which you obtained last fall. Take warning, then, from the fact that the change of one in a hundred can produce such decisive results.

He gave the bankrupts warning that they had been weighed, and with very great nicety, in the scales, not of justice, but of political influence, and he feared it would be found that their scale kicked the beam. They were now like mice in the receiver of an air pump, being experimented upon. While haste and precipitancy had marked the proceedings of the House in reference to every other bill of the session, on this alone gentlemen seemed to think themselves at liberty to trifle.

[See.]Bankrupt Law.

[August, 1841.]

When he should hear a good reason assigned why the bill should not be passed this day, then he had another speech to make. The bill might do very well for merchants and traders, but it never would do for tobacco planters, and corn growers. Yet, though he could not vote for the bankrupts' bill he would not torture them by suspense. Their bill, he would tell them, would fail; and it was time they knew it. It was time their hopes were arrested in their upward flight, so that when they did fall, it might be with a less destructive force.

Mr. BRIGGS entirely dissented from the view just expressed by the gentleman from Virginia. The House had had this bill but four days under its consideration, during which time its merits had been discussed with candor, temper, and fairness. The remarks which had just fallen from the gentleman from Virginia were the only indication which had yet appeared of a desire to connect the bill with party politics. That gentleman had intimated that the friends of the bill were playing a political game with an unfortunate class of their fellow-men.

Mr. WISE. I said no such thing. [Cries of "yes—oh yes—you did."] I said that some who pretended to be the friends of this bill were engaged in such a game. I never said that of the real friends of the measure.

Mr. BRIGGS resumed, and said he was glad to find that the gentleman exempted the friends of the bill from such a charge; and he sincerely hoped, notwithstanding the gentleman's ominous prophesyings, that a majority of the House would be found to be true friends to the bill, and to the bankrupts whom it was intended to relieve.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana, would confine his remarks to the general principles of the bill. He stood in a peculiar attitude in relation to this measure: he was very desirous of expressing here the wishes of his constituents; but they had made no communication to him of their views or wishes on the subject. Thus left to the dictates of his own judgment, was he to fold his hands, and refuse to take any part in a measure of so beneficial a character? No; the patriotism of Indiana was not of such a cast: it was broader in its range than the limits of the State: it was as bold and migratory as the character of the inhabitants themselves.

Mr. W. took the ground that Congress, having clearly received the power to pass a general bankrupt law, were bound to exercise the power whenever the case should arise which called for its exertion: and in proof that it had arisen, he pointed the committee to the general condition of the business community throughout our country, and to the general cry for relief which came up from all parts of the land. True, a partial relief might be obtained by each individual from his own State, but the moment he stepped over the line the protection ceased. The general object never could be effected but by a law of Congress.

Mr. W. continued his remarks in support of the bill with much earnestness up to the expiration of his hour.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maryland, said this bill treats it as fraudulent to show a preference among creditors; yet in flagrant violation of principle, upon which it purports to be founded, it actually enjoins unreasonable preferences in certain cases. Creditors, of a particular class, for a debt not exceeding twenty-five dollars, and not over six months' standing, are to be paid in full; if, however, the creditor, from a humane disposition to indulge his debtor, let a single day pass beyond the six months, he is to come in only for the pittance of a dividend. The creditor for twenty-five dollars may receive his entire debt; but the like small creditor for any sum greater than twenty-five dollars, though the person may in fact be more deserving and most needy, may lose the whole of his debt. The United States are declared to be a preferred creditor in all cases, and their claims may absorb all the assets of the bankrupt. Is this fair? Is it doing justice to the rights of the other creditors?

A bankrupt is proved in all things to have acted in good faith; his honesty and his misfortunes are acknowledged and unquestioned: yet he can never obtain a certificate of discharge from his debts, because he, being a self-made man and a poor scholar, has not kept "proper books of account." In consequence of his honest ignorance of the "proper" system of keeping book accounts, he shall never be discharged! This seems like a revival of the law for allowing the benefit of clergy.

The fourth section says that the bankrupt's certificate of discharge may be pleaded as a bar to all suits against him. Well, he thinks he is safe when he has once obtained that certificate; but not so;—a little further on, the same section says that it shall be conclusive, unless "the same shall be impeached for some fraud, or wilful concealment, &c.;" that is to say, it may, at any and all times thereafter, be impeached and questioned! The unhappy bankrupt, involved by the operation of this bill in interminable litigation, may be persecuted, court after court, and year after year, until death, more merciful than the law, relieves his sufferings forever. The same section further provides that "such bankrupt shall, at all times, be subject to examination orally, or upon written interrogatories, in and before said court, &c." He is or may be doomed to perpetual vexation, and to the tortures of a never-ending inquisition! If you pass this bill, you will place the unfortunate bankrupt within the iron grasp of a Federal court, which may never release its hold. The States are the proper guardians of the life, liberty, and property of the citizen; but you will take from their tribunals all power to afford him relief or protection. Still, it is pretended by some who style themselves friends to the petitioners, that this bill is for the speedy and effectual relief of unfortunate debtors, both now and in time to come. It is a delusion—a mockery of misfortune. It is but the introduction of a complicated, ambiguous, vexatious, and expensive system, which will aggravate, instead of relieving, the sufferings of insolvent debtors. Instead of giving freedom to enterprise, it will rivet more strongly the shackles by which it is confined.

August, 1841.]

Veto on the Fiscal Bank Bill.

[27th Cong.]

The district courts and circuit courts of the United States are both to exercise jurisdiction over the bankrupts, and, in some instances, concurrent jurisdiction. They are to be declared in permanent session, without any recess or vacation! They are held in many cases, at a great distance from the residences of the debtors, and therefore this bill entails not only large fees to officers and attorneys, but heavy and repeated expenses for board and travelling, in far and frequent journeys, occasioned by the inevitable delays of courts and counsels. What means has the honest bankrupt, who has surrendered every thing, wherewith to defray those charges?

The Federal courts are to be made by this bill to resemble, in some degree, those of the Turkish Cadi. They are clothed with extensive powers as to judicial legislation; and their arbitrary will, or caprice, is, in many respects, to be the only rule. At best, years must elapse, in the press of business growing out of the vast number of applications, before thousands of debtors can promise themselves a final hearing. The courts will exhibit a ceaseless throng of suitors, and a scene of unexampled litigation. These tribunals are to conduct their proceedings, also, according to the practice of courts of chancery—and some of the blessings, rather say curses, which many of the petitioners are to derive from this measure, if it be permitted to become a law, are complex and protracted suits in chancery, to consume their time, their health, and all their future earnings! What folly, then, to insert in the bill, "shall be brought to a close" by the court "within two years," after the decree of bankruptcy, "IF PRACTICABLE." Mere inoperative words.

The country must be burdened, too, with a little standing army of judges and officers, the present limited number being totally insufficient for the purposes contemplated.

How, then, can any real friend to the suffering bankrupt, whose spirit is already drooping and desponding, vote for a bill which must make his condition worse—a rash experiment, which is obnoxious to such objections, and to be fraught with such baneful consequences? He who has been unfortunate once, may be visited with misfortune again; and, without being guilty of fraud or imprudence, may become ruined a second time. What is the measure of relief proposed to be extended to him! Read it in these words: "He shall not again be entitled to a discharge under this act, unless his estate shall produce (after all charges) sufficient to pay every creditor SEVENTY-FIVE per cent."

It provides for compulsory as well as voluntary bankruptcy. It is partly taken from the British system. A British bankrupt law may suit the notions and habits of British royalists, but it will not be tolerated by American Republicans.

An honorable member from Kentucky (Mr. POPE) was understood to say that the title should be, "An act for the benefit of lawyers, clerks, &c." It might be further amended by prefixing the word "banks," for MONEYED CORPORATIONS, sometimes consisting of only a few individuals, are exempt from all operation of its provisions to their prejudice, whilst at the same time those institutions will be the chief creditors, to enforce these provisions against debtors who shall dare to question their corporate will, or refuse to obey their dictates.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, August 16.

Veto on the Fiscal Bank.

The Message was read as follows:

Message of the President, returning, with his Objections, the Bill to Incorporate the Fiscal Bank of the United States.

To the Senate of the United States:

The bill entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Fiscal Bank of the United States," which originated in the Senate, has been considered by me, with a sincere desire to conform my action in regard to it, to that of the two Houses of Congress. By the constitution it is made my duty, either to approve the bill by signing it, or to return it with my objections to the House in which it originated. I cannot conscientiously give it my approval, and I proceed to discharge the duty required of me by the constitution—to give my reasons for disapproving.

The power of Congress to create a National Bank to operate per se over the Union, has been a question of dispute from the origin of our Government. Men most justly and deservedly esteemed for their high intellectual endowments, their virtue, and their patriotism, have, in regard to it, entertained different and conflicting opinions. Congresses have differed. The approval of one President has been followed by the disapproval of another. The people at different times have acquiesced in decisions both for and against. The country has been, and still is, deeply agitated by this unsettled question. It will suffice for me to say that my own opinion has been uniformly proclaimed to be against the exercise of any such power by this Government. On all suitable occasions, during a period of twenty-five years, the opinions thus entertained have been unreservedly expressed. I declared it in the Legislature of my native state. In the House of Representatives of the United States it has been openly vindicated by me. In the Senate chamber, in the presence and hearing of many who are at this time members of that body, it has been affirmed and reaffirmed, in speeches and reports there made, and by votes there recorded. In popular assemblies I have unhesitatingly announced it; and the last public declaration which I made, and that but a short time before the late Presidential election, I referred to my previously expressed opinions as being those then entertained by me; with a full knowledge of the opinions thus entertained, and never concealed, I was elected by the people Vice President of the United States. By the occurrence of a contingency provided for by the constitution, and arising under an impressive dispensation of Providence, I succeeded to the Presidential office. Before entering upon the duties of that office, I took an oath that I would "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States." Entertaining the opinions alluded to, and having taken this oath, the Senate and the country will see that I could not give my sanction to a measure of the character described, without surrendering all claim to the respect of honorable men—all confidence on the part of the people—all self-respect—all regard for moral and religious obligations; without an observance of which no Government can be prosperous, and no people can be happy. It would be to commit a crime which I would not wilfully commit to gain any earthly reward, and which would justly subject me to the ridicule and scorn of all virtuous men.

[1st Sess.]

Veto on the Fiscal Bank Bill.

[August, 1841.]

I deem it entirely unnecessary, at this time, to enter upon the reasons which have brought by mind to the convictions I feel and entertain on this subject. They have been over and over again repeated. If some of those who have preceded me in this high office have entertained and avowed different opinions, I yield all confidence that their convictions were sincere. I claim only to have the same measure meted out to myself. Without going further into the argument, I will say that, in looking to the powers of this Government to collect, safely keep, and disburse the public revenue, and incidentally to regulate the commerce and exchanges, I have not been able to satisfy myself that the establishment by this Government of a bank of discount, in the ordinary acceptation of that term, was a necessary means, or one demanded by propriety, to execute those powers. What can the local discounts of the banks have to do with the collecting, safe-keeping, and disbursing of the revenue? So far as the mere discounting of paper is concerned, it is quite immaterial to this question whether the discount be obtained at a State bank or a United States Bank. They are both equally local—both beginning and both ending in a local accommodation. What influence have local discounts granted by any form of bank, in the regulating of the currency and the exchanges? Let the history of the late United States Bank aid us in answering this inquiry.

For several years after the establishment of that institution, it dealt almost exclusively in local discounts; and during that period the country was, for the most part, disappointed in the consequences anticipated from its incorporation. A uniform currency was not provided, exchanges were not regulated, and little or nothing was added to the general circulation; and in 1820 its embarrassments had become so great, that the directors petitioned Congress to repeal that article of the charter which made its notes receivable everywhere in payment of the public dues. It had, up to that period, dealt to but a very small extent in exchanges, either foreign or domestic, and as late as 1823 its operations in that line amounted to a little more than seven millions of dollars per annum. A very rapid augmentation soon after occurred, and in 1833 its dealings in exchanges amounted to upwards of one hundred millions of dollars, including the sales of its own drafts; and all these immense transactions were effected without the employment of extraordinary means. The currency of the country became sound, and the negotiations in the exchanges were carried on at the lowest possible rates. The circulation was increased to more than $22,000,000, and the notes of the Bank were regarded as equal to specie all over the country; thus showing almost conclusively, that it was the capacity to deal in exchanges, and not in local discounts, which furnished these facilities and advantages. It may be remarked, too, that notwithstanding the immense transactions of the Bank in the purchase of exchange, the losses sustained were merely nominal, while in the line of discounts the suspended debt was enormous, and proved most disastrous to the Bank and the country. Its power of local discount has, in fact, proved to be a fruitful source of favoritism and corruption, alike destructive to the public morals and to the general weal.

The capital invested in banks of discount in the United States, created by the States, at this time, exceeds $350,000,000, and if the discounting of local paper could have produced any beneficial effects, the United States ought to possess the soundest currency in the world; but the reverse is lamentably the fact.

Is the measure now under consideration, of the objectionable character to which I have alluded? It is clearly so, unless by the 16th fundamental article of the 11th section it is made otherwise. That article is in the following words:

"The directors of the said corporation shall establish one competent office of discount and deposit in any State in which two thousand shares shall have been subscribed, or may be held, whenever, upon application of the Legislature of such State, Congress may, by law, require the same. And the said directors may also establish one or more competent offices of discount and deposit in any Territory or District of the United States, and in any State, with the assent of such State; and when established, the said office or offices shall be only withdrawn or removed by the said directors prior to the expiration of this charter, with the previous assent of Congress: Provided, In respect to any State which shall not, at the first session of the Legislature thereof held after the passage of this act, by resolution, or other usual legislative proceeding, unconditionally assent or dissent to the establishment of such office or offices within it, such assent of the said State shall be thereafter presumed: And provided, nevertheless, That whenever it shall become necessary and proper for carrying into execution any of the powers granted by the constitution to establish an office or offices in any of the States whatever, and the establishment thereof shall be directed by law, it shall be the duty of the said directors to establish such office or offices accordingly."

It will be seen that by this clause the directors are invested with the fullest power to establish a branch in any State which has yielded its assent; and, having once established such branch, it shall not afterwards be withdrawn except by order of Congress. Such assent is to be implied, and to have the force and sanction of an actually expressed assent, "provided in respect to any State which shall not, at the first session of the Legislature thereof held after the passage of this act, by resolution or other usual legislative proceeding, unconditionally assent or dissent to the establishment of such office or offices within it, such assent of said States shall be thereafter presumed." The assent or dissent is to be expressed unconditionally at the first session of the Legislature, by some formal legislative act; and, if not so expressed, its assent is to be implied, and the directors are thereupon invested with power at such time thereafter as they may please, to establish branches, which cannot afterwards be withdrawn, except by resolve of Congress. No matter what may be the cause which may operate with the Legislature, which either prevents it from speaking, or addresses itself to its wisdom, to induce delay, its assent is to be implied. This iron rule is to give way to no circumstances—it is unbending and inflexible. It is the language of the master to the vassal—an unconditional answer is claimed forthwith; and delay, postponement, or incapacity to answer, produces an implied assent, which is ever after irrevocable. Many of the State elections have already taken place, without any knowledge on the part of the people, that such a question was to come up. The Representatives may desire a submission of the question to their constituents preparatory to final action upon it, but this high privilege is denied; whatever may be the motives and views entertained by the Representatives of the people to induce delay, their assent is to be presumed, and is ever afterwards binding, unless their dissent shall be unconditionally expressed at their first session after the passage of this bill into a law. They may, by formal resolution, declare the question of assent or dissent to be undecided and postponed, and yet, in opposition to their express declaration to the contrary their assent is to be implied. Cases innumerable might be cited to manifest the irrationality of such an inference. Let one or two in addition suffice. The popular branch of the Legislature may express its dissent by a unanimous vote, and its resolution may be defeated by a tie vote of the Senate, and yet the assent is to be implied. Both branches of the Legislature may concur in a resolution of decided dissent, and yet the Governor may exert the veto power conferred on him by the State Constitution, and their legislative action be defeated, and yet the assent of the legislative authority is implied, and the directors of this contemplated institution are authorized to establish a branch or branches in such State whenever they may find it conducive to the interest of the stockholders to do so; and having once established it, they can under no circumstances withdraw it, except by act of Congress. The State may afterwards protest against such unjust inference, but its authority is gone. Its assent is implied by its failure or inability to act at its first session, and its voice can never afterwards be heard. To inferences so violent, and, as they seem to me, irrational, I cannot yield my consent. No court of justice would or could sanction them, without reversing all that is established in judicial proceeding, by introducing presumptions at variance with fact, and inferences at the expense of reason. A State in a condition of duress would be presumed to speak, as an individual, manacled and in prison, might be presumed to be in the enjoyment of freedom. Far better to say to the States boldly and frankly—Congress wills, and submission is demanded.

It may be said that the directors may not establish branches under such circumstances. But this is a question of power, and this bill invests them with full authority to do so. If the Legislature of New York, or Pennsylvania, or any other State, should be found to be in such condition as I have supposed, could there be any security furnished against such a step on the part of the directors? Nay, is it not fairly to be presumed that this proviso was introduced for the sole purpose of meeting the contingency referred to? Why else should it have been introduced? And I submit to the Senate, whether it can be believed that any State would be likely to sit quietly down under such a state of things? In a great measure of public interest, their patriotism may be successfully appealed to; but to infer their assent from circumstances at war with such inference, I cannot but regard as calculated to excite a feeling of fatal enmity with the peace and harmony of the country. I must, therefore, regard this clause as asserting the power to be in Congress to establish offices of discount in a State, not only without its assent, but against its dissent; and so regarding it, I cannot sanction it. On general principles, the right in Congress to prescribe terms to any State, implies a superiority of power and control, deprives the transaction of all pretence to compact between them, and terminates, as we have seen, in the total abrogation of freedom of action on the part of the States. But further, the State may express, after the most solemn form of legislation, its dissent, which may from time to time thereafter be repeated in full view of its own interest, which can never be separated from the wise and beneficent operation of this Government; and yet Congress may, by virtue of the last proviso, overrule its law, and upon grounds which, to such State, will appear to rest on a constructive necessity and propriety, and nothing more. I regard the bill as asserting for Congress the right to incorporate a United States Bank with power and right to establish offices of discount and deposit in the several States of this Union, with or without their consent; a principle to which I have always heretofore been opposed, and which can never obtain my sanction. And waiving all other considerations growing out of its other provisions, I return it to the House in which it originated, with these my objections to its approval.

JOHN TYLER

WASHINGTON, August 16, 1841.

The moment the reading was concluded, the excitement, which was intense, was manifested in the gallery, over the chair of the President of the Senate, by a few indications of applause and dissent, when

Mr. BENTON rose and said: Mr. President, there were hisses here, at the reading of the Presidential Message. I heard them, sir, and I feel indignant that the American President shall be insulted. I have been insulted by the hisses of ruffians in this gallery, when opposing

[1st Sess.]

Veto on the Fiscal Bank Bill.

[August, 1841.]

the old Bank of the United States. While I am here, the President shall never be insulted by hisses in this hall. I ask for no such thing as clearing the galleries, but let those who have made the disturbance be pointed out to the Sergeant-at-Arms, and be turned out from the galleries. Those who have dared to insult our form of Government—for in insulting this Message they have insulted the President and our form of Government—those ruffians who would not have dared to insult the King, surrounded by his guard, have dared to insult the American President in the American Senate; and I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to take them into custody.

Mr. RIVES regretted that any disturbance had taken place. He doubted not but the Senator thought he heard it, but must say, in all sincerity, he did not hear the hiss. At all events, it was so slight and of short duration, that the majority of the Senate scarcely heard it. He hoped that no proceedings of this kind would take place, and that this manifestation of disturbance, when so deep an interest was felt, and which was so immediately quieted, would be passed over. The general opinion of the Senators around him was, that the honorable Senator was mistaken.

Mr. BENTON. I am not mistaken—I am not.

Mr. RIVES. He hoped they would pass it by, as one of those little ebullitions of excitement which were unavoidable, and which was not offered to insult this body, or the President of the United States.

Mr. BENTON heard the hisses, and heard them distinctly; if a doubt was raised on it, he would bring the matter to a question of fact, "true or not true." No man should doubt whether he heard them or not. He came here this day prepared to see the American President insulted by bank bullies; and he told his friends that it had been done, and that they never could proceed in action on a Bank, when the American Senate would not be insulted, either by hissing on one side, or clapping on the other. He told them, if it was done, as sure as the American President should be insulted this day, by bank ruffians, just so sure he should rise in his place and move to have those disturbers of the honor and dignity of the Senate brought to the bar of the Senate. He would not move to clear the galleries, for a thousand orderly people were there, who were not to be turned out for the disturbance of a few ruffians. He would tell the Senator from Virginia that he (the Senator) should hang no doubt on his declaration; and if it were doubted, he would appeal to Senators near him. [Mr. WALKER. I will answer, most directly, that I heard it, and I believe the same bully is going on now.] A National Bank (continued Mr. B.) is not, as yet, our master, and shall not be; and he would undertake to vindicate the honor of the Senate, from the outrages perpetrated on it by the myrmidons of a National Bank. Were the slaves of a National Bank to have the privilege of insulting the Senate, just as often as a vote passed contrary to their wishes? It was an audacity that must be checked—and checked before they went with arms in their hands to fire on those who gave votes contrary to their wishes, or assassinate them on their way home. He put the whole at defiance—the entire Bank, and its myrmidons.

Mr. PRESTON said if any thing had occurred in the gallery out of order, it should be strictly inquired into and punished. He himself did not hear the manifestations of disapprobation alluded to by the Senators on the other side; but it was sufficient for him that the Senators heard it, or supposed that they heard it. [Mr. BENTON. We did not suppose we heard it; we knew it.] In this case, (continued Mr. P.,) a formal investigation should take place. It was a contempt of the Senate, and, as a member of the Senate, he desired to see an investigation—to see the charges fixed on some person, and if properly sustained, to see punishment awarded. Manifestations of praise or censure were eminently wrong, and eminently dangerous; and it was due to every member of the Senate that they should preserve the dignity of the body by checking it. He hoped, therefore, if a formal motion was made, it would be discovered who had caused the disturbance, and that they would be properly punished.

Mr. BUCHANAN said this was a very solemn and momentous occasion, which would form a crisis, perhaps, in the politics of the country; and he should hope, as he believed that every American citizen present in the galleries would feel the importance of this crisis, and feel deeply sensible of the high character to which every man, blessed with birth in this free country, should aim. He heard, distinctly heard, the hiss referred to by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) but he was bound to say it was not loud and prolonged, but was arrested in a moment, he believed partly from the Senator rising, and partly from the good sense and good feeling of the people in the galleries. Under these circumstances, as it only commenced and did not proceed, if he had the power of persuasion, he would ask the Senator from Missouri to withdraw his motion.

[Mr. BENTON. I never will, so help me God!]

He thought it better, far better, that they proceed to the important business before them, under the consideration that they should not be disturbed hereafter; and if they were, he would go as far as the Senator from Missouri in immediately arresting it. He would much rather go on with the business in hand.

Mr. LINN reminded the Senate, that when the Bank bill had passed the Senate, there was a loud manifestation of approbation in the gallery, of which no notice was taken. He believed on the present occasion there was approbation as well as hisses; but both were instantly suppressed. He had distinctly heard both. No doubt it was the promptness with which his colleague had got up to check the disturbance, which had prevented it from going further. He had no doubt some law ought to be passed making it punishable to commit any outrage of this kind on either House of Congress.

Mr. MERRICK thought with the Senator from Pennsylvania, that this was a very solemn occasion. There had been tokens of assent and dissent. The President of the Senate at the moment rapped very hard till order was restored. The disorder was but momentary. He trusted some allowance would be made for the excitement so natural on the occasion.

Mr. KING suggested the difficulty that might arise out of pursuing the matter further. He had witnessed something of the kind once before, and when the offender was brought to the bar, great embarrassment was created by not knowing how to get rid of him. He thought it would be better to pass over the matter, and proceed to the consideration of the Message, or to the appointment of a time for its consideration.

The CHAIR explained that having heard some noise, without considering whether it was approbation or disapprobation, he had called the Senate to order; but could not say that he had or had not heard hisses.

Mr. RIVES explained that he did not mean to say the Senator from Missouri did not hear the hisses, but that he himself did not hear them, and he believed many gentlemen around him did not hear any. But as the Senator from Missouri had avowedly come prepared to hear them, no doubt he did, more sensitively than others. He would ask the Senator to be satisfied with the crush which the mother of monsters had got, and not bear too hard on the solitary bank ruffian, to use his own expression, who had disapproved of the monster's fate. He hoped the Senator would withdraw the motion.

Mr. LINN observed that the Senator from Virginia, by his own remarks, doubting that there were any hisses, had forced the Senator from Missouri to persist in having the proof. However, he now understood that point was settled; and the object being accomplished, he hoped his colleague would withdraw his motion.

Mr. PRESTON again expressed his concurrence in the propriety of the motion, and hoped effectual steps would be taken to prevent the recurrence of such a scene.

Mr. ALLEN made some appropriate remarks, and concluded by stating that he understood the offender was in custody, and expressed his sorrow for having done what he was not at the time aware was an offence; as, therefore, all the ends had been accomplished which his friend had in view when he refused to withdraw his motion, he hoped he would now withdraw it.

Mr. WALKER said, when the Senator from Missouri (Mr. BENTON) pledged himself not to withdraw his motion to arrest the individual who had insulted the Senate and the country by hissing the Message of the President of the United States, that pledge arose from the doubt expressed by the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES,) whether the hissing had taken place. That doubt was now solved. When the Senator from Missouri appealed to his friends as to the truth of the fact stated by him, he (Mr. WALKER) had risen, and pointed to that portion of the gallery from which the hissing proceeded. Our Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms had proceeded to that quarter of the gallery designated by him, (Mr. W.), and this officer had now in his possession one of the offenders, who acknowledged his indecent conduct, and who was prepared to point out many of those who had joined him. The object of the Senator was, therefore, now accomplished; the fact of the indecorum was established, and the offender, as moved by the Senator from Missouri, was now in custody. This, Mr. W. hoped, would be sufficient punishment, especially as Mr. W. understood the offender expressed his penitence for the act, as one of sudden impulse. As, then, the formal trial of this individual would occupy much time, Mr. W. hoped the matter would be dropped here; and let us proceed, as required by the constitution, to consider the Message of the President returning the Bank bill, with his objections. This Message, Mr. W. said, he regarded as the most important which ever emanated from an American President, and under circumstances the most solemn and imposing. The President, in perfect and glorious consistency with a long life of usefulness and honor, has placed his veto upon the charter of a National Bank, and, Mr. W. said, his heart was too full of gratitude to the Giver of all good for this salvation of the country, and rescue of the constitution, to engage in the business of inflicting punishment upon an individual, said to be respectable, and who had in part atoned for his offence by the expression of his repentance. Let him go, then, and sin no more, and let us proceed to the consideration of that Veto Message, which he, Mr. W., had confidently predicted at the very commencement of this session, and recorded that opinion at its date in the journals of the day. Many then doubted the correctness of this prediction, but he, Mr. W., whilst he stated at the time that he was not authorized to speak for the President of the United States, based his conviction upon his knowledge of Mr. TYLER as a man and a Senator, and upon his long and consistent opposition to the creation of any such Bank as was now proposed to be established.

Mr. BENTON said he had been informed by one of the officers of the Senate, (Mr. Beale,) that one of the persons who made the disorder in the gallery had been seized by him, and was now in custody, and in the room of the Sergeant-at-Arms. This the officers had very properly done of their own motion, and without waiting for the Senate's order. They had done their duty, and his motion had thus been executed. His motion was to seize the disorderly, and bring them to the bar of the Senate. One had been seized; he was in custody in an adjoining room; and if he was still acting contemptuously to the Senate, he should move to bring him to the bar; but that was not the case. He was penitent and contrite. He expressed his sorrow for what he had done, and said he had acted without ill design, and from no feelings of contempt to the President or the Senate. Under these circumstances, all was accomplished that his motion intended. The man is in custody and repentant. This is sufficient. Let him be discharged, and there is an end of the affair. His motion now was that the President direct him to be discharged. Mr. B. said he had acted from reflection, and not from impulse, in this whole affair. He expected the President to be insulted: it was incident to the legislation on National Bank charters. When they were on the carpet, the Senate, the President, and the American people must all be insulted if the Bank myrmidons are disappointed. He told his family before he left home, that the Senate and the President would be insulted by hisses in the gallery this day, and that he would not let it pass—that it would be an insult, not merely to the President and Senate, but to the whole American people, and to their form of Government—and that it should not pass. He came here determined to nip this business in the bud—and to prevent an insult to the President in this chamber from being made a precedent for it elsewhere. We all know the insolence of the National Bank party—we know the insolence of their myrmidons—we know that President Tyler, who has signed this veto Message, is subject to their insults—beginning here, and following him wherever he goes. He (Mr. B.) was determined to protect him here, and, in doing so, to set the example which would be elsewhere followed. He repeated: an insult to the President for an official act, was not an insult to the man, but to the whole American people, and to their form of Government. Would these Bank myrmidons insult a king, surrounded by his guards? Not at all. Then they should not insult an American President with impunity wherever he was present. In the Senate or out of it, he would defend the President from personal outrage and indignity. As to the numerous and respectable auditory now present, his motion did not reach them. He had not moved to clear the galleries; for that would send out the respectable audience, who had conducted themselves with propriety. The rule of order was "to clear the galleries;" but he had purposely avoided that motion, because the disorder came from a few, and the respectable part of the audience ought not to suffer for an offence in which they had no share. Mr. B. said the man being in custody, his motion was executed and superseded; its object was accomplished, and, he being contrite, he would move to discharge him.

[1st SESS.]

Veto on the Fiscal Bank Bill.

[AUGUST, 1841.]

The President of the Senate ordered him to be discharged.

Consideration of the Veto Message.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said that, as a Message had been received from the President of the United States, returning to the Senate, in which it had originated, a bill for the charter of a Fiscal Bank; which bill, having been passed by the other House, had received the concurrence of both branches of the Legislature, and been presented to him for his signature, he presumed it was not the intention of the Senate to go into the consideration of that communication at this moment. It would scarcely be treating it with the gravity and respect due to a co-ordinate branch of the Government, to enter upon such discussion before the paper had been printed, and time had been given for that deliberate consideration of its contents which obviously ought to precede such a debate. The Senate had been sufficiently familiar with communications of this kind to know what course it was proper to pursue, even had the constitution left it without any directions. But that instrument had prescribed the course to be pursued. It directed that, when a bill should be returned from the President, with his objections, the objections should first be recorded upon the journal, and then the body should proceed to reconsider the bill; that, if it should receive the assent of two-thirds of the members, it should be sent to the other House of Congress, and if it obtained a like majority there, it should become a law, the President's objections notwithstanding; but if not, the bill was rejected, and there was an end to the measure. He had risen to move that the Senate would, to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, proceed to reconsider the President's objections to the bill; and that, in the mean time, the Executive communication just received be laid upon the table and printed.

Mr. RIVES suggested to the Senator from Kentucky, that eleven o'clock would be a preferable hour to which to postpone the consideration of the bill; as their morning hour expired at that time, and it would be better to proceed immediately to the consideration of the subject, than to spend an hour on the land bill, and then be broken off to take up this bill. Eleven o'clock was the hour appointed in 1832 for taking up Gen. Jackson's veto Message.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, preferred 12 o'clock; whatever business of the orders of the day would be on hand, could be passed over informally when the hour came.

Six thousand copies of the Message were then ordered to be printed.

AUGUST, 1841.]

Veto on the Fiscal Bank Bill.

[27th CONG.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 17.

Bankrupt Law.

On motion of Mr. BARNARD, the House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. TILLINGHAST, of Rhode Island, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. GORDON, of New York, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill,

Mr. BARNARD (chairman of the Judiciary Committee) addressed the committee in reply to some of the arguments which had been urged in opposition to the bill, concluding with a renewed and most urgent appeal to the House no longer to withhold from the country this great measure of relief, emancipation, and justice.

Mr. SALTONSTALL addressed the committee at length in support of the bill, and in reply to the various objections which had been urged against it.

Mr. SPRIGG, of Kentucky, then took the floor, and in the brief space allotted him, opposed the bill with much earnestness. He was called upon, he said, to lay the foundation stone of a system which he knew would not benefit, in any manner, the people he represented. He was called upon to suspend the operation of the laws of his own State, and, indeed, to nullify them, for the benefit of strangers to it in interest and feeling. Kentucky was the first State in the Union, and, indeed, the first community in the world, that abolished imprisonment for debt; and yet, he proclaimed it with pride, that there was no country in the world where the obligation of contracts was so strictly regarded, or where their performance was so easily enforced. His Yankee friends who could live on the ocean—live by getting fish, and live in every sort of way, pretended to tell him that their object was to cast the mantle of charity and humanity over those who were pressed down by misfortune; but he knew their course full well. He wished to God he had time to trace the whole bankrupt system from the time of Henry IV. down to that of Henry VIII., for he had read every statute that had been passed on that subject, and he knew that bankrupt laws were designed, not to give relief to the debtor, but to give a more efficient remedy to the creditor. Did not his old friend, JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, know this? We twice (said Mr. S.) had a bankrupt system in this country—first, when we were colonies dependent on Great Britain, and afterwards when a bankrupt bill was enacted in the time of the first Adams, who was as honest a man as ever lived, and did not put his veto upon it when Congress passed it. This bill, he said, was not wanting in his State, for he repeated that there was not a country in the world where there was a better system for the enforcement of obligations than in Kentucky, and he could not consent to let his Yankee friends make laws for her. He would not consent for New York or Massachusetts, which still tolerated imprisonment for debt, to legislate for Kentucky. He would tell the people of the West, that the object of this bill was to bring them under the surveillance of New York and New England. Pass this bill, (said Mr. S.,) and you will soon have the question raised whether this Government can release men from the obligation of contracts—a principle that he never could give his consent to. By this bill, a contract made in Kentucky in good faith, might be annulled, if the man who made it happened to owe a debt in New York and Boston. And all this (said Mr. S.) comes from the land of steady habits. He thought the Yankees were the last men in the world who would ask the Government for relief. He thought they were prudent, industrious, and thrifty, and that they managed their affairs too well to be in want of the relief afforded by bankrupt laws. Mr. S. here referred to the relief laws passed in Kentucky in times of unparalleled distress—laws, he said, not to violate contracts, or to relieve the debtor from his debts, but merely to suspend compulsory proceedings for two years; and yet the merchants of the Atlantic States endeavored, by the aid of the Federal courts, to set aside these laws, and subject the citizens of Kentucky to imprisonment.

The CHAIR here interrupted Mr. S., and informed him that the hour had arrived when debate must cease.

The hour of twelve having arrived, the committee, in pursuance of the order of the House of this morning, proceeded, without further debate, to vote on the amendments pending, or that might be offered.

The question was taken first on the motion of Mr. GORDON to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, and by ayes 79, noes 90, it was rejected.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 18.

Fiscal Bank—Veto Message.

The hour of twelve having arrived, the President proclaimed the order of the day, which was the consideration of the objections of the President of the United States to the bill chartering a Fiscal Bank.

[The galleries and lobbies were crowded, in expectation of the debate which had been anticipated.]

Mr. BERRIEN rose and said, that under a sense of duty, he was induced to move that the consideration of the Executive Message accompanying the return to the Senate of the bill to establish a Fiscal Bank, be further postponed until to-morrow, 12 o'clock.

Mr. CALHOUN said that, as this was a very extraordinary motion, the votes of Senators

1st Sess.]

Bankrupt Bill.

[August, 1841.]

upon it ought to be recorded, he would, therefore, demand the yeas and nays.

They were ordered accordingly, and stood as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—29.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—21.

So the consideration of the Message was postponed till to-morrow, at twelve o'clock.

Bankrupt Bill.

Mr. WALKER then moved to proceed to the consideration of the amendments of the House to the Bankrupt bill. Which was agreed to.

The amendments were then read, being merely to fix as the time for the bill to take effect, the 1st of February next, instead of 1st of November, and another merely verbal.

Mr. BERRIEN briefly explained the propriety of the amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, from the tone of the letters he had received from politicians differing with him, he should advise his friend from Mississippi (Mr. WALKER) not to be quite so soft as, in his eagerness to pass this bill, to agree to this amendment, postponing the time for it to take effect to February, as it would be repealed before its operation commenced; although it was now made a price of the passage of the distribution bill. He felt not a particle of doubt but there would be a violent attempt to repeal it next session.

[Mr. BENTON. They will attempt to repeal it in ten days after the commencement of next session.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. As a party man, he would not want better capital than this bill to work on. His great objection to the bill was, that it would encourage the wild spirit of speculation to which they were exposed, and which, in this growing country, ought rather to be restrained. It would have the effect of driving speculation to the highest madness, by informing every man, in case he failed to win the golden prize, he might blot out his obligations and commence again. He was opposed to the amendment.

Mr. WALKER said when his friend from Pennsylvania spoke of his being "soft," he did not know whether he referred to his head or heart. But he was not soft enough to run the chance of defeating this bill by sending it back to the House. The Senator's arguments were rather "softer" than usual, for if it were to be repealed, in case the time before its going into operation were extended, it would be an additional reason why the Senator should support the amendment.

Mr. MOREHEAD asked, in case they postponed the operation of the bill, to give an opportunity to carry the measure to the people, and give the Congress a chance to repeal it, if that was "goaded on the Senator to madness?" If it were repealed, it would be because the people willed it, and, if so, he would venture to say that the Whig party would concur in it. He was glad that the amendment was adopted. If the people of the United States did not want a Bankrupt bill, they would, by this amendment, have an opportunity to repeal it; and they would go before the people with it, and they might come here on the 1st Monday in December and have an issue on it, if they wished.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. MOREHEAD) had misunderstood him. He had remarked that the operation of a bankrupt law generally, would have a tendency to goad on the spirit of speculation to madness. He had stated that those who would "log-roll," and vote for the distribution bill to get the bankrupt bill, might be deceived. The distribution bill went into operation, and the bankrupt bill was to be postponed to February and before that time might be repealed.

Mr. CALHOUN did not concur with his friend from Pennsylvania, that there would be any effort to repeal this bill. It would be exceedingly popular at its first "go off;" and if this bill passed, he hoped that none of his friends would attempt to repeal it. It would, if permitted to work, produce its legitimate effects, and was enough to destroy any Administration. He saw that this was a doomed Administration. It would not only destroy them, but blow them "sky high."

Mr. PRESTON said his feelings had been very much against the bill. He had voted against the engrossment, but this amendment was good in itself, and he should support it.

Mr. ALLEN said he did not rise for the purpose of protracting the discussion, but to make a motion. The effect of the amendment to this bill, adopted by the House, was to postpone its operation until the 1st of February next. Now, one of the reasons given by the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. WALKER) for moving to lay the Land bill on the table, and calling up this bill at this particular time, was that the unfortunate persons who expected to find relief in this bill, might have that relief instantly, and not sleep another night without it. The bill was taken up with the view of imparting to these unfortunate beings the certain knowledge that they were to be relieved by this bill. After it was taken up, it was found that the object of the amendment was to postpone the relief for a longer time. And the reason given for the amendment made by the House, was to allow a subsequent Congress the opportunity to amend it, or altogether repeal the bill. The reason, therefore, for the delay in the operation of this bill,

August, 1841.]

Bankrupt Bill.

[27TH CONG.]

going along with the bill itself, so far from carrying a certainty of relief to the sufferers, would carry a mere tantalizing hope, that on the happening of a contingency the relief is to be administered. The object of the amendment itself, as stated, viz: to give a future Congress an opportunity to review this act, was a declaration to these bankrupts that they were not to be relieved till a future Congress should have reviewed the act. He was not prepared to say that this mode of legislation would not, as a general rule, be well, if universally adopted; on the contrary, it would be far better for the country, if all the laws which would deeply and permanently affect the country, were required by the constitution to be passed by two Congresses before they went into operation. He believed it would be a wholesome provision with respect to all laws, except those which might be necessary for the defence of the country; and as the Senator from Kentucky had ascertained this principle to be a Democratic principle—to allow the people time to re-examine our acts, and communicate to a subsequent Congress their decision—he thought he would do justice to himself if he would extend this principle to the Land bill, and vote with him (Mr. ALLEN) to postpone its operation to the first of February next. This would seem to be no more than right, because it was said here that one of these bills was made dependent on the other. It was by log-rolling that these bills were to be passed; and if these contracting parties intended to deal in good faith, they should make both ends of the contract take effect at the same time, and depend on the same contingency, by giving to this Land bill as to the Bankrupt bill, a suspension of its operation till the first of February, so that there should be no opportunity for one party to delude the other; he meant the parties to these two contracts.

It was the object of this bankrupt bill not to relieve immediately the present sufferers, but simply to go before the country with it, and let it be decided on; and as this was the case, he proposed to lay it before them in the form of a "bill," and not a "law." He therefore moved the postponement of this (the bankrupt) bill till the first of February next.

After some conversation as to its being in order at this stage of proceedings, to lay a bill on the table, the question was taken and the motion rejected, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Graham, King, Linn, McRoberts, Nicholson, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—23.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Mouton, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, White, and Woodbridge—26.

The question was then taken, and the amendments of the House of Representatives were concurred in without a division.

On motion by Mr. MANGUM,
The Senate then adjourned at 3 o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 18.

Bankrupt Bill.

Mr. GAMBLE rose, and moved a reconsideration of the vote of yesterday, by which the bill from the Senate to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States had been laid on the table.

Mr. G. proceeded to remark that he was one among the number of those who had no scruples—

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. GAMBLE. I move the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER said there was no necessity so to do, as the motion to reconsider a vote laying a subject on the table (which latter motion admitted of no discussion) was not debatable.

And the question recurring on the motion of Mr. GAMBLE to reconsider the vote by which the bankrupt bill and amendments had been laid on the table—

Mr. PROFFIT asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, being taken, were as follows: yeas 108, nays 98.

So the vote was reconsidered.

Mr. SOLLERS rose and inquired of the Speaker whether, the vote having been reconsidered, the question recurred on the motion to lay the bill and amendments on the table!

The SPEAKER. Yes; unless the gentleman who made that motion withdraws it.

So the motion was not withdrawn.

And the question recurring on that motion, (to wit, to lay the bill and amendments on the table)—

Mr. BARNARD asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered: and being taken, were as follows: yeas 99, nays 112.

So the bill and amendments were not laid on the table.

[Here Mr. KING introduced the honorable JOHN T. STUART, member elect from the State of Illinois, who was qualified, and took his seat.]

And the question recurring on concurring in the amendment (to the 17th section) reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and which amendment postponed the time at which the bill was to go into operation until the first day of February next, (the original day fixed in the bill being the first day of November current.)

The question was taken, and the amendment was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed.

[1st Sess.]

Disturbances in the Galleries and at the President's House.

[August, 1841.]

And the bill (as amended) was ordered to a third reading at this time.

And the bill having been read a third time by its title, and the question being on the final passage thereof,

Mr. BRIGGS moved the previous question.

Mr. WISE moved a call of the House, remarking that he made the motion that it might be seen who dodged this question.

And the main question (being on the passage of the bill) was ordered to be taken.

Mr. CLIFFORD asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

And the main question, "Shall this bill pass?" was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, S. J. Andrews, Arnold, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Black, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, M. Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Thos. J. Campbell, Caruthers, Childs, Chittenden, J. C. Clark, S. N. Clarke, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Cushing, G. Davis, William C. Dawson, John B. Dawson, Deberry, John Edwards, Everett, Feasenden, Fillmore, A. L. Foster, Gamble, Gates, P. G. Goode, Greig, Habersham, Hall, Halsted, W. S. Hastings, Henry, Howard, Hudson, Hunt, Jas. Irvin, William W. Irwin, James, W. C. Johnson, I. D. Jones, J. P. Kennedy, King, Lane, Lawrence, Linn, S. Mason, Mathiot, Maxwell, Maynard, Meriwether, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Nisbet, Osborne, Pearce, Pendleton, Powell, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Ridgway, Rodney, Roosevelt, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Smith, Sollers, Stanly, Stokeley, Stratton, John T. Stuart, Taliaferro, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Warren, E. D. White, J. L. White, T. W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, J. L. Williams, Winthrop, Wood, Yorke, A. Young, and John Young—110.

NAYS.—Messrs. L. W. Andrews, Arrington, Ather-ton, Banks, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Botta, Bowne, Boyd, A. V. Brown, C. Brown, J. Brown, Burke, William Butler, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, W. B. Campbell, Cary, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Cross, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dean, Doan, Doig, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Egbert, Ferris, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, T. F. Foster, Gentry, Gerry, Gilmer, Goggin, W. O. Goode, Gordon, Graham, Gustine, Harris, John Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jack, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, A. Kennedy, Lewis, Littlefield, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Thomas F. Marshall, Mathews, Mattocks, Me-dill, Miller, Newhard, Parmenter, Payne, Pickens, Plumer, Pope, Proffit, Ramsey, Reding, Rencher, Rhett, Riggs, Rogers, Saunders, Shaw, Shepperd, Shields, Snyder, Sprigg, Steenrod, Sweney, J. B. Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Underwood, Van Buren, Ward, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, J. W. Williams, and Wise—108.

So the bill was passed.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 19.

Disturbances in the Galleries and at the President's House.

The following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. WOODBURY, was taken up:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the extent and character of the disturbances in the galleries of the Senate on two occasions at the present extra session—one on the final passage of the bill for a fiscal Bank of the United States, and one on the reading of the veto of said bill; and that they report whether any, and what, further legislation may be necessary to prevent or punish similar interruptions of the public business hereafter.

Also, that the said committee inquire and report in respect to the disturbances at or near the President's House on the night ensuing the said veto; the description and object thereof; the numbers and names of the persons concerned in them, so far as can be ascertained; the punishment, if any, to which they have been subjected by the civil authorities for a breach of the public peace, or for riotous and tumultuous behavior on that occasion; and to recommend any additional measures, of a legislative character or otherwise, which may, in their opinion, be proper for the protection of the different branches of the General Government from violent molestation, disturbance, and interruption, while engaged in the discharge of their public duties in the city of Washington. And said committee is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers.

Mr. WOODBURY observed that, as this was a resolution looking merely to inquiry, he should not detain the Senate by any remarks, unless the passage of the resolution was opposed.

Mr. MERRICK objected to the resolution. He could see no propriety in imposing this duty on the Committee on the District. He denied that the Senate had a right to interfere with the people of the District, whether they choose to bury the Bank bill or to rejoice at the veto.

Mr. WOODBURY said the resolution proposed that the inquiry be made by the Committee on the District of Columbia, for very manifest reasons. The evil complained of was a violent interruption of the quiet of some of the branches of the Government, in the discharge of their public duties in this District, set apart and consecrated to that object.

This committee has the general supervision over all the concerns of this District; and the most material, the most vital of them, to the whole country, as well as to the permanent inhabitants of the ten miles square, reserved for this great object, is the tranquil and undisturbed performance of it.

Otherwise it will be seen that the continuance of our sessions in this city becomes endangered, and the representatives of the people and States, if unable to legislate without violent molestation, being but three or four hundred among thousands, must return to their constituents, or protect themselves by physical force. What would be the injury thus inflicted on private interests here, and the reproach cast on our free institutions? Nor is the passage of this resolution rendered unnecessary, as the Senator from Maryland supposes, because the disturbances in this chamber were at the time passed over without punishment.

That was done because they were not very general, and were in one case apologized for on the spot. But even then some gentlemen acquiesced in overlooking them, only under a determination to pass new laws, if found to be proper, in order more fully either to deter or to punish similar outbreaks hereafter.

So in respect to the violent and disgraceful outrages which since happened—not over various and remote portions of the city, as intimated, but at the Executive residence—before his very door and windows. Nobody has passed it over, and nobody in favor of law, order, or decency, ought to: universal reprobation and scorn are due to it. I understand, however, that the Senator objects more to the inquiry into facts than to the inquiry into the propriety of further legislation.

But it would be very difficult to judge whether additional legislation was necessary or not, till it was first ascertained, on evidence, whether the facts were of a description and character which could not be prosecuted, or, if prosecuted, could not be punished sufficiently under the existing laws. For if they could be, then there had been default and neglect by the civil authorities, in not nipping in the bud, and preventing, the last disturbance of the Executive Department at the Executive Mansion.

Then there would be still more culpability in them, if they did not proceed and make a public example of the real offenders. He trusted, from information before him, and assurances received from several highly respectable inhabitants of the city, that they felt much indignation at these riotous outbreaks, and intended to visit on the culprits who caused them the whole severity authorized by existing laws.

It will not do to overlook, again and again, such reproachful occurrences. This course would be an encouragement, and make even ourselves indirect participators in the offences.

It was due, also, to the individual liberty and private rights of the people at large, that this inquiry should be had; and any legislation could then be adopted which might be proper to protect any supposed offender from unusual or extraordinary trial and punishment incident to the summary, harsh proceedings common on these occasions.

This was, and should continue to be, a land of laws—laws not vague, but clear, well known, and mild as was consistent with the due security of property, character, and life.

We had, already, after the trial of Judge Peck, passed new acts of Congress in relation to the tranquillity of judicial proceedings. We had defined what should constitute contempt, and had limited their punishment. A similar course seemed to be required in relation to the protection of legislative and executive proceedings from violation and interruption, to that which had been adopted in respect to the judiciary. Whenever obstructed, the former annoyed not merely the public agents, but obstructed the execution of the recorded will of the twenty-six States, and the seventeen millions of the population.

But our indignation at any supposed disturbances of the public quiet, of public power, and public rights, in and through the public agents, should not at any time lead us suddenly into the exercise of too great severity or too unlimited a discretion. Hence, for the safety of the citizen, when arraigned, as well as for the preservation of the purity and sacredness of the great representative principle in transacting the most important public business through delegated agents, I trust this resolution will pass.

Mr. MERRICK reiterated his objections to the resolution. They might request the committee to report such amendments to their rules, if it was deemed necessary, as to protect the Senate in the exercise of its legislative functions; but he objected to sending the committee beyond the walls of the capitol. As to the disturbances at the Executive mansion, he had been informed that they originated in a number of persons assembling with music for the purpose of complimenting the President with a serenade for vetoing the Bank bill. While proceeding there, a number of other persons, of contrary sentiments, joined the procession, and their expressions of disapprobation overpowered those of approbation given by the friends of the veto.

Mr. KING spoke in terms of strong reprobation of the insult offered to the Executive for the conscientious performance of official duty. If the authorities of this city have not the power to repress these tumultuary assemblages, it should be given to them when the charter of the city came up for revision, which, he hoped, would not be postponed beyond the next session. If the authorities already had the power over this subject, he was sorry to say there did not appear to have been a proper exercise of it. Had the Mayor power to put down riots, and arrest the rioters, when they were before his face? Has he arrested them? If not, then the blame rests upon his head.

Mr. PRESTON spoke at considerable length, and attributed the disorderly proceedings to the inefficiency of the police of the city.

Mr. KING concurred with the Senator from South Carolina, that the city greatly needed a more efficient police than its impoverished condition would authorize it to maintain, and he was disposed to assist them in this manner. It would be better, however, in his opinion, that this whole subject should be postponed until the next session, and, with the consent of his honorable friend from New Hampshire, he would move to postpone his resolution also to the next session.

[1st Sess.]

Goochland County (Virginia) Petition.

[August, 1841.]

Mr. WOODBURY said this motion to postpone to the next session was founded on the admitted propriety of inquiry and legislation. So far from giving the go-by to the measure, it was decided that further time might be had for consideration before action, and less haste and more coolness prevailed at that time than could now be expected. As action, efficient action, of some kind, was then intended to be had, he should not resist the delay desired, at a time so near, he hoped, to the close of the present session.

Bankrupt Act.

The Bankrupt bill was returned to the Senate with the President's signature.

Fiscal Bank Veto.

The hour of twelve having arrived, the CHAIR announced the special order of the day—the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Fiscal Bank of the United States, with the Message of the President refusing his assent thereto.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, spoke for about an hour and a half, condemning the course of the President, in refusing his sanction to the bill.

Mr. RIVES replied to Mr. CLAY, and vindicated the President's course.

The debate was further participated in by Messrs. ARCHER and BERRIEN.

The question was then (at half-past 5 o'clock) taken anew upon the passage of the Bank bill, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay of Kentucky, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—25.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Rives, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—24.

There not being the constitutional majority of two-thirds in favor of the bill, which would be requisite to entitle it to be sent to the House of Representatives for the like concurrence there, the bill remains finally rejected.

The Senate then, after an exhausting session of seven hours, adjourned.

FRIDAY, August 20.

Goochland County (Virginia) Petition.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he rose to present, by request, the preamble and resolutions of citizens of the county of Goochland, on the important questions which have been agitated in the Senate during the present session. The resolutions condemn, in strong and just terms, Bank, Distribution, Tariff, and the whole of that batch of measures. Among the resolutions, there is one paying a high, and, in his opinion, deserved compliment to the patriotic conduct of Mr. WISE, Mr. HUNTER, Mr. MALLOY, and Mr. GILMER, during the present session, and another, which warmly approves, in advance, the veto on the Bank bill. On the last of these resolutions he hoped he would be permitted to indulge in a few remarks. He concurred heartily with the meeting in the approval of the veto. It would do much good. It has destroyed the Bank bill, and, he trusted, would prevent the creation of any Bank hereafter, which would, indeed, be a great deliverance. He went farther. He not only approved of the veto, but concurred with the President, that in vetoing this bill, with his opinions of the unconstitutionality and inexpediency of the Bank, long entertained, and often and fully expressed, on many and solemn occasions, he but performed a high act of duty, both to the constitution and himself, for which he is entitled to the thanks of the country. As an act of justice to the President, he would go farther—even at the hazard of being rebuked by those who assumed to be his friends, as he was when he interposed in his favor on a late occasion, and say that the case of Mr. Madison, in approving the Bank bill, is not at all similar to his vetoing this, to which the Senator from Kentucky compared it in his remarks yesterday. It is well known that Mr. Madison, late in life, gave in to the most unfortunate and dangerous doctrine that the Supreme Court was the interpreter of the constitution in the last resort. With this opinion, it is not extraordinary that he should feel himself authorized to approve the Bank bill, under the force of precedents and the decisions of that court. The case is different with Mr. Tyler. It is understood that he does not agree with Mr. Madison, as to the authority of the Supreme Court, in deciding on constitutional questions; and with this difference, it is not surprising that the constitutional scruples of the one could be silenced by the decision of the court, backed by precedents, while that of the other could not.

And here he would avail himself of the opportunity to make a few remarks on the veto power. He did not regard that power with the aversion it was viewed on the opposite side of the chamber. On the contrary, according to his opinion, it was a high conservative power, intended not only to guard the rights of the Executive and that reserved by the constitution to the States and the people against the encroachments of Congress, but also the weaker interests of the community against the oppression and plunder of the stronger. It was, in this view, a high and salutary power, which, from its nature as a negative power, was almost incapable of abuse.

August, 1841.]

Land Distribution Bill.

[27th Conv.]

Having now expressed his opinion of the veto, he (Mr. CALHOUN) felt called on, in candor, to say that he was not prepared to give a full approval of the veto message. There was a part which he did not profess to understand; he alluded to that which spoke favorably of the functions of banks as regulating exchanges; but, if the construction which was intimated yesterday in debate, by the Senator from Kentucky, be the one intended by the President, he would not give it his approbation. That Senator intimated that his friends contemplate the introduction of another Bank bill, to deal in exchanges, in conformity with what was supposed to be the views of the President. In his opinion, such a Bank would be every way as objectionable as the one which has been vetoed. He could see no substantial difference between discounting promissory notes and bills of exchange, except that in the former, the banks were restricted by the usury laws of the States where they were situated, while in the latter they were not. But he trusted that the interpretation attempted to be put on this part of the Message was not the one intended by the President; and that if a bill, based on such construction, should be presented to him, that the same high consideration which has controlled him in vetoing the one which he has, will as imperiously control him also in vetoing such a bill. As to himself, he wished to be distinctly understood, he was opposed to the creation of a bank, or corporation of any form, as the fiscal agent of the Government. He believed, however modified, or wherever located, it would be alike unconstitutional and inexpedient. I (said Mr. O.) having now expressed my opinion of the veto, and the message, will go a step farther. The Bank is not the only question at issue before the country at this important juncture. There are others of not much less import, among which the distribution of the revenue from the lands, and the tariff, now pending before the Senate, may be ranked as the most prominent. I trust that the President will find it to be his duty to be found opposed to these, as well as to that which he has vetoed. If such should be the fact, my hearty approbation and support shall not be withheld. It has been my course under every President, while a member of Congress, to oppose measures I disapproved, and support those I approved. This rule I cannot depart from under this Administration; but there has been no President whom I would more cheerfully support than I would the present, if the measures of his Administration should be such as to permit it.

I regard (said Mr. O.) all the measures for which this session has been called, to constitute one system, of which each forms an essential part. They all point to one common object, whether intended or not—to build up a great overruling moneyed power, and to reduce the rest of the community to servitude; yes, to the very condition the great producing classes are reduced in Europe. Thus regarding it, I shall wage interminable war against the whole, and shall oppose all who support it. I shall agree to no compromise, while liberty is at stake. If we shall be able to defeat the system at this session, with the aid of the Executive, it would be a great and glorious deliverance. I am not certain but that the next best result for the country would be for our opponents to carry through all the measures which we have been called here this extra session to pass. The earlier the issue is presented to the people the better, if the system is to be adopted. It would give more time for action, and make a more powerful appeal to the people, and tend more powerfully to rouse them up to effectual resistance. Go on, then, gentlemen, (addressing the opposite side,) consummate all your schemes. Force them through, as short as is the time, by your gags and despotic rules. Let them go to the people. There is no gag on the ballot box. If the people shall decide that Taxes, Tariff, Debt, Distribution, and an all-powerful Central Bank, are blessings, be it so. If they are prepared to take chains, it is not in the power of mortal man to prevent it; but I shall not—cannot—believe that this free, gallant, and enlightened people, are prepared to sink down into base servitude to an odious moneyed power, till I have witnessed the reality of the sad spectacle.

After some remarks by Mr. ABRONER in reply to Messrs. CALHOUN and BENTON, the question was taken on the printing of the proceedings, and agreed to.

Land Distribution Bill.

Mr. WRIGHT observed, that the question, stripped of all delusion, was, whether money raised by taxes, for the economical administration of the General Government, was to be distributed to the several States, or applied solely to the purposes for which it was authorized to be raised. That the gentleman into whose hands the present Administration of the General Government had fallen, construed the question in the sense favorable to the system of distribution, was evident from the fact that they had passed by the power of their majorities in Congress an act to raise money to a large amount, by borrowing and creating a national debt, and were going to pass another act by the same means, to raise money by additional taxation on articles of general consumption, for the mere purpose of distributing a portion of the public revenue. They are so impatient to borrow money and raise taxes, that they may distribute largely, that they cannot even wait to refund the Treasury what has been advanced to acquire the public lands. If the amendment now offered is adopted, they say the whole principle of their bill is destroyed. They want the principle to remain untouched, that they can borrow money, and raise revenue by increased taxation for the purpose of purchasing lands and distributing them, and so go on, taxing and borrowing to distribute, and distributing to create a necessity for further taxation and borrowing.

1st Sess.]

Fiscal Corporation.

[August, 1841.]

The States have to be bribed to wink at taking money out of the Treasury, that the people may be taxed to put it back again into the Treasury, and then the States bribed over again that the people may be taxed over again. And so it is to go on. The bill has been cunningly devised for this operation. It goes on to state that the proceeds of the public lands shall be distributed, and then it provides nevertheless that certain deductions are to be first made. And what are these deductions? Why, merely the expense of bringing them into market. The cost of the raw material is left out; the mere expense of survey and clerk hire is refunded, and then the balance is distributed. In other words, the money to purchase the lands, or extinguish the Indian title, is to be taken out of the Treasury, from the tax levied on the country, through its consumption, and then the lands or the money received from them is to be given to the States, as if they had not cost a dollar. The chairman of the committee indeed thinks there may be a balance due from the Treasury to the public lands. He forgets, when he says this, that he stated quite the reverse in his opening speech. At first this distribution was to last but five years; now it is to be perpetual, unless this bill was repealed.

The Senator from Indiana (Mr. SMITH) made a grand display of the resources offered by this immense fund, the public domain—assuming that there were yet two thousand millions of acres to be disposed of. Well, perhaps he was right; but the Senator forgot to state the whole truth, namely, that only about two hundred millions of acres had yet been paid for, and that money has to be borrowed, and taxes have to be raised, to pay for eighteen hundred millions of acres more, before their proceeds can be distributed. But the principle is established in this bill, and who can tell the extent of borrowing and taxation which is to be resorted to to carry out the whole design?

Mr. CALHOUN said the amendment proposed the naked issue, whether this bill is what it professes to be or not. It professes to be a bill to distribute the net proceeds of the public lands, when the course of those who advocated it in resisting amendments that will restrict it to that object, shows conclusively that it is to be a distribution of the revenue derived from customs. Gentlemen, by their silence, admit this to be its purpose, and they act prudently in remaining silent when they can neither deny nor defend. The bill was false, fraudulent, and deceptive; and he would inform Senators, if they intended to force it through to-day, they would have a hard job of it.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, called for the question.

Mr. WOODBURY, Mr. BENTON, Mr. CLAY of

Alabama, and Mr. ALLEN, respectively advocated the amendment.

And then the question was taken on its adoption, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Benton, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Rives, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—22.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—24.

Mr. CALHOUN offered an amendment, the purport of which was, that the money already due by the States, under the deposit act, distributing the surplus revenue, should be deducted in proportion to the debts of the respective States to the General Government, from their shares of distribution under this act. Mr. CALHOUN argued most convincingly, that there was no understanding at the time of distributing the revenue that it was to be considered a grant, not to be refunded to the General Government. He maintained, that there could not be an easier or more desirable way for the States to get rid of their debt to the General Government, than that proposed by this amendment. It would, in the end, be the same to them as if they were granted so much. He called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BENTON observed, that it would not only be an easy way for the States to get rid of the vexed question about their indebtedness for that distribution of surplus revenue, but would enable the General Government to retain twenty-five millions, to fill up some part of the vacuum occasioned by paying for the public lands about to be distributed.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, King, Pierce, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, and Wright—12.

NAYS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Rives, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—29.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 20.

Fiscal Corporation.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the committee took up House bill No. 14, being a bill reported from the Select Committee appointed by the House on the subject of the currency, entitled "A bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Fiscal Bank of the United States."

AUGUST, 1841.]

Fiscal Corporation.

[27TH CASE.]

Mr. SERGEANT said that he would state to the committee what he meant to propose to them. The committee would undoubtedly recollect the nature of the bill which had been reported by the Committee on the Currency some considerable time ago, and which was numbered "fourteen." His intention was now to move to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting what he would send to the Chair. His intention, further, was to ask, upon this motion being made, and certain amendments which he intended to propose being presented to the committee, that the committee should rise, in order that he might, in the House, move the printing of those amendments, that they might be laid before the members of the House. And then, as soon as that was done, he would ask the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the subject.

Mr. CHARLES BROWN said that it would be necessary to read the bill and amendments from beginning to end, before ordering the amendments to be printed.

The Clerk then read bill No. 14, with the amendments proposed by Mr. SERGEANT.

Mr. SERGEANT said that, as several inquiries had been made of him with regard to this bill, he would now proceed to make a short statement, to show in what respects it differed from that recently before this House. He would say, first, that there were two or three verbal errors in this bill, and there were words, in two or three places, which he thought had better have been left out, and which were intended to have been omitted by the committee. There were several gentlemen in the present Congress who entertained extreme hostility to the word "Bank," and, as far as he was concerned, he felt every disposition to indulge their feelings; and he had therefore endeavored throughout the bill to avoid using the word "Bank." If that word anywhere remained as applicable to the being it was proposed to create by this law, let it go out—let it go out. Now the word "corporation" sounded well, (laughter,) and he was glad to perceive it gave pleasure to the House. At all events, they had a new word to fight against. Now the difference between this bill and that which passed this House some days ago, would be seen by comparison. The present differed from the other principally in three or four particulars, and there were some other parts of the bill which varied, in minor particulars, from that which had been before the House a few days ago. Those differences gentlemen would have no difficulty in discovering and understanding when the bill should have been printed. He would now proceed to answer the inquiries of gentlemen in reference to this bill. Mr. S. then stated the following as the substantial points of difference between the two bills:

1. The capital in the former bill was thirty millions, with power to extend it to fifty millions. In this bill twenty-one millions, with power to extend it to thirty-five millions.

2. The former bill provided for offices of discount and deposit. In this there are to be agencies only.

3. The dealings of the corporation are to be confined to buying and selling foreign bills of exchange, including bills drawn in one State or Territory, and payable in another. There are to be no discounts.

4. The title of the Corporation is changed.

Mr. WISE raised the point of order that this bill was, in substance, the same as that which had yesterday been rejected, and that it could not, therefore, be taken up; otherwise the constitutional provision might thus be evaded.

After some conversation, the CHAIRMAN overruled the objection, on the ground that the measures were not the same, though parts of them might be similar.

No appeal being taken, the motion of Mr. SERGEANT was put, and agreed to.

SATURDAY, August 21.

Fiscal Corporation.

Mr. SERGEANT offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That at 4 o'clock this day all debate in Committee of the Whole on the bill (No. 14) to incorporate the subscribers to the "Fiscal Bank of the United States" shall cease, and the committee shall then proceed to vote on the amendments then pending, or that may be offered to said bill; and the same shall then be reported to the House with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee: Provided, That nothing in this resolution shall prevent the committee from reporting the bill to the House at an earlier hour, if it shall think fit.

Mr. SERGEANT then modified his resolution so as to substitute "Monday," instead of "Saturday" at 4 o'clock.

And the question on the motion to lay the resolution on the table was then taken, and decided in the negative, as follows—yeas 57, nays 110.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

And the question recurring on the demand for the previous question, there was a second.

And the main question (being on the adoption of the resolution) was ordered to be taken.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON asked to be excused from voting. The bill, he said, was a new bill, and had but just been laid on the tables of members; and it was impossible for him, if the resolution was adopted, to do justice to his constituents, to the country, or to himself. He hoped the House would excuse him, and he hoped that no true Democrat would record his vote on a proposition of this kind. If the minority had no rights on that floor—

Mr. J. was called to order, and some confusion followed.

[1st Sess.]

Fiscal Corporation.

[August, 1841.]

A motion was made that Mr. J. have leave to proceed.

The yeas and nays were asked and ordered, and being taken were—yeas 108, nays 84.

So Mr. J. was allowed to proceed.

After a few further remarks from Mr. J. the question was taken, and the House refused to excuse him from voting.

Mr. CHARLES BROWN, of Pennsylvania, now rose to give his reasons for not voting upon the resolution. He had nothing to ask from the courtesy of the House. He did not wish to be placed in a false position. He had heard no improper debate yet upon the "Fiscal Corporation," nor could he tell, until the debate proceeded, whether he would or would not take the bill out of committee on Monday afternoon.

He asked to be excused from voting on the resolution, for reasons which he would give, if allowed. The bill, which the resolution, as at first offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. SERGEANT) proposed to stop all discussion upon at 4 o'clock this afternoon, and which is now modified so as to extend it one day longer, was only laid upon their desks about half an hour before—not ten minutes preceding the resolution prescribing the time when it was to be voted upon; and this bill contained thirty-eight pages. No one had had an opportunity to read it, or know what were its provisions. It was said to be a new measure—the creation of a new species of institution, a Fiscal Corporation, hitherto entirely unknown in this country, either in State legislation or that of this Government. How, then, can any member now, before he reads it, before he knows what it is, or what it is not, say that he will be fully prepared to give his final vote upon it in one or two days? Why should he be made to say, before the discussion has been begun, before the first word is spoken, or even the bill itself brought under the consideration of the House, that he will, at a particular hour and minute, vote upon it? Can any one tell now that he will then have fully examined, not only the bill, long as it is, but all the amendments that may be offered to it? They might as well have been asked to vote on the bill yesterday, before they saw it, or on any other bill that the majority might introduce, at any time before they were seen or known. It was absurd to ask any one thus to commit himself, and no one could or would do it unless forced so to do, who believed himself to be a being capable of reasoning and judging, and had the perceptions and faculties usually bestowed upon man. The majority, said Mr. B., could finish the debate at any time they pleased, and if he found that it was unprofitable or unnecessary at any time, he would vote for its closing; but if it was calculated to enlighten the minds of members, to make the bill better, or better understood, it ought not to be stopped at any given moment. If the bill was to be debated or passed upon as a measure of legislation affecting the people of the United States, it ought to be well considered, but if it was merely, as was said, or supposed to be, a measure to "head Captain Tyler"—

The SPEAKER called Mr. BROWN to order, because he alluded to Captain Tyler, a high functionary of the country.

Mr. BROWN said he did not intend any disrespect to the high functionary, as assumed by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER said he had called the gentleman to order for irrelevancy, and not for disrespect.

Mr. BROWN said he was glad of it; for, as at present advised, the high functionary alluded to stood second to no man in his opinion.

Mr. BROWN was called to order.

Mr. BROWN said if gentleman would tell him what he could say, and be in order, he would be obliged to them. When he was stopped, he was endeavoring to show to the House that he could not knowingly or conscientiously vote on the resolution, because he did not know, and could not foresee, what course the debate would take—what was or might be shown to be the character of the bill, or of the amendments that might be offered. He said that if the bill was a bona fide measure of the legislature to be passed into a law, to last for twenty years—to do all the good assumed by its friends, or the evil predicted by its opponents—to affect his constituents and the country for weal or for woe, it could not be matured in two days; and, in this view of the subject, he would vote against the resolution. But if it was a measure merely to try the strength, or develop the character of fractions of the dominant party, and the debate should be one of mere political party broil, he might be disposed to stop it soon, for he could not agree that his time should be wasted, and the money of the country expended to promote the views of any political party or ambitious demagogue. It might turn out to be a war between the Administration proper, at the other end of the avenue, and the Administration improper, at this end of the avenue; and there was abundant evidence that this was the only object of the bill. In this view of the subject he—

The SPEAKER called Mr. B. to order for irrelevancy.

Mr. BROWN said, if the Speaker would tell him what would be in order, he would try to keep in order. He was giving his reasons for desiring to be excused, and he thought it was for the House to consider the relevancy, not the Speaker.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Pennsylvania must take his seat.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Virginia, moved that the gentleman from Pennsylvania have leave to proceed in order.

The SPEAKER said he would entertain no motion in behalf of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Brown) until he obeyed the order of the House by taking his seat.

August, 1841.]

Fiscal Corporation.

[27th Cong.]

Mr. B. then sat down.

The yeas and nays were asked and ordered on the motion that Mr. B. have leave to proceed; and, being taken, were—yeas 84, nays 106.

So Mr. B. was not allowed to proceed.

Mr. Brown said he would excuse himself when the time came.

Mr. RHETT, of South Carolina, now rose to offer his reasons for asking to be excused from voting. He did so with all respect to the House; and, lest he should forget himself in the excitement of the time, he had written them down, and asked the House to permit him to put them upon the journal. His reasons were:

1. Because the rule by which the resolution is proposed is a violation of the spirit of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that the freedom of speech and of the press shall not be abridged by any law of Congress.

2. Because it destroys the character of this body, as a deliberative assembly: a right to deliberate and discuss measures being no longer in Congress, but with the majority only.

3. Because it is a violation of the rights of the people of the United States, through their Representatives, inherited from their ancestors, and enjoyed and practised time immemorial, to speak to the taxes imposed on them, when taxes are imposed.

4. Because, by the said rule, a bill may be taken up in Committee of the Whole, be immediately reported to the House, and, by the aid of the previous question, be passed into a law, without one word of debate being permitted or uttered.

5. Because free discussion of the laws by which the people are governed, is not only essential to right legislation, but is necessary to the preservation of the constitution, and the liberties of the people, and to fear or suppress it, is the characteristic of tyrannies and tyrants only.

6. Because the measure proposed to be forced through the House within less than two days' consideration, is one which deeply affects the integrity of the constitution and the liberties of the people; and to pass it with haste, and without due deliberation, would evince a contemptuous disregard of either, and may be a fatal violation of both.

The vote was then taken upon excusing Mr. RHETT, by yeas and nays, and there were:—yeas 82, nays 119.

So Mr. R. was not excused.

Mr. PICKENS rose and said: It is now manifest, from the votes which have been taken, that the House does not intend to excuse any member from voting. And as enough has been done to call public attention to the odious resolution proposed to be adopted, our object will have been attained; and I respectfully suggest to our friends to go no further in this proceeding.

[Cries of "Agreed, agreed."]

The question on the adoption of the resolution, was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, L. W. Andrews, Arnold, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Birdseye, Black, Blair, Boardman, Botta, Brockway, Bronson, M. Brown, J. Brown, William Butler, William B. Campbell, T. J. Campbell, Caruthers, Childs, Chittenden, J. C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, G. Davis, William C. Dawson, Dean, Deberry, J. Edwards, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, A. Lawrence Foster, Gamble, Gates, Gentry, Goggin, Patrick G. Goode, Graham, Green, Greig, Habersham, Halsted, Henry, Howard, Hudson, Hunt, J. Irvin, James, J. P. Kennedy, King, Lane, Lawrence, Linn, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Matlock, Maxwell, Maynard, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Nisbet, Osborne, Owaley, Pearce, Pendleton, Powell, Benjamin Randall, A. Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Ridgway, Rodney, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Shepperd, Simonton, Smith, Solters, Stanly, Stokes, Stratton, A. H. H. Stuart, J. T. Stuart, Sumner, Tallaferrro, John B. Thompson, R. W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Wallace, Warren, Washington, R. A. White, J. L. White, Tho. W. Williams, L. Williams, C. H. Williams, Winthrop, Yorke, A. Young, and John Young—116.

NAYS.—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Banks, Beeson, Bidlack, Bowne, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, John Campbell, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Cross, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, John B. Dawson, Doig, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Egbert, John C. Floyd, Fornance, Gerry, Gilmer, Gordon, Gustine, Harris, John Hastings, Hopkins, Hook, Houston, Hubard, Ingersoll, William W. Irwin, Jack, John W. Jones, Keim, Lewis, Littlefield, A. McClellan, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, T. F. Marshall, Mathews, Medill, Newhard, Parmenter, Payne, Piekens, Plumer, Pope, Ramsey, Reding, Rescher, Riggs, Rogers, Roosevelt, Sanford, Shaw, Shields, Slat, Snyder, Sprigg, Steenrod, Sumpter, Sweney, Turner, Ward, Waterson, Weller, Westbrook, J. W. Williams, Wise, and Wood—76.

So the resolution was adopted.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, August 23.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Fiscal Corporation.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the House bill No. 14, being a bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Fiscal Bank of the United States.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. TURNER to strike out the enacting clause of the bill,

Mr. MARSHALL (who was entitled to the floor) addressed the committee. In the course of his remarks he expressed his satisfaction at the veto which the President had put on the Bank bill, which he said had received the approbation of no one; and at the same time he passed a high eulogium on the President for his eminent public services, and the purity of his principles.

[1st SESS.]

Fiscal Corporation.

[August, 1841.]

Mr. M. said he should vote for the bill, because the veto seemed to give evidence that this bill would be signed. He was glad that the first bill had been vetoed. He now thought this bill was less objectionable, and would be signed, and that the wars of the Roses would be ended forever. He then went at length to show that the bill might be signed by the President, and quoted clauses from the veto Message, to sustain his argument. If the President would veto the bill, he should feel bound, as a representative of the country, to try him with it, not to trap him, not to head him, not to catch him with a running noose, but to try him.

The first question was on the motion of Mr. TURNER to strike out the enacting clause of the bill; and, by yeas 82, noes 102, it was rejected.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. SERGEANT, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the amendments heretofore indicated by him.

The motion of Mr. SERGEANT was agreed to, and the amendments offered by him were, by yeas 118, noes 55, agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the committee rose and reported the bill to the House.

And the question on ordering the main question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 120, nays 97.

So the House determined that the main question should now be taken.

The House then concurred with the Committee of the Whole in the amendments.

And the question being on ordering the bill and amendments to be engrossed for a third reading—

Mr. EASTMAN asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 123, nays 94.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

And it was ordered to be read a third time now.

And the bill having been read by its title—

Mr. MORGAN moved the previous question.

Mr. WISE (who had endeavored to get the floor) submitted to the Speaker that the bill had not been read a third time.

The SPEAKER said that the reading of the bill by the title had been called for, and it had been so read accordingly.

Mr. WISE insisted on the bill being read at large; after which, he said, gentlemen could start fair for the floor.

And the Clerk then read the whole bill through, which occupied nearly an hour.

And the question being on the final passage thereof—

Mr. A. L. FOSTER, of New York, obtained the floor, and moved the previous question.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to lay the bill on the table; and asked the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 93, nays 126.

So the bill was not laid on the table.

And the question recurring on the demand for the previous question, there was a second.

And the main question was ordered to be taken.

And on the main question, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. STANLY asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, L. W. Andrews, S. J. Andrews, Arnold, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Birdseye, Black, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Milton Brown, J. Brown, Burnell, William Butler, Calhoun, Wm. B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, John C. Clark, S. N. Clark, Cooper, Cranston, Cravens, Cushing, Wm. C. Dawson, Deberry, J. C. Edwards, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, A. Lawrence Foster, Gamble, Gates, Gentry, Goggin, Patrick G. Goode, Graham, Green, Greig, Habersham, Hall, Halsted, William S. Hastings, Henry, Howard, Hudson, Hunt, James Irvin, James, William Cost Johnson, Isaac D. Jones, J. P. Kennedy, King, Lane, Lawrence, Linn, Thomas F. Marshall, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Nisbet, Osborne, Owley, Pierce, Pendleton, Pope, Powell, Ramsey, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Rencher, Ridgway, Rodney, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Shepperd, Simonton, Slade, Smith, Stanly, Stokeley, Stratton, John T. Stuart, A. H. H. Stuart, Summers, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Wallace, Warren, Washington, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, C. H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Winthrop, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—125.

NAYS.—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Banks, Beeson, Bidlack, Bowne, Boyd, A. V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, Wm. O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, P. C. Caldwell, John Caldwell, Cary, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Cross, Daniel, R. D. Davis, J. B. Dawson, Dean, Doan, Doig, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Egbert, Ferris, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Thomas F. Foster, Gerry, Gilmer, William O. Goode, Gordou, Gustine, Harris, John Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, William W. Irwin, Jack, Cave Johnson, J. W. Jones, Keim, A. Kennedy, Lewis, Littlefield, A. McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, J. Thompson Mason, Mathews, Medill, Miller, Newhard, Parmenter, Payne, Pickens, Plumer, Reding, Reynolds, Rhett, Riggs, Rogers, Roosevelt, Sanford, Saunders, Shaw, Shields, Snyder, Steenrod, Sumpter, Sweney, Turney, Van Buren, Ward, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, James W. Williams, Wise, and Wood—94.

So the bill was passed.

SEPTEMBER, 1841.]

Fiscal Corporation.[27TH CONG.]

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 24.

Fiscal Corporation.

Immediately after the reading of the journal—

A message was received from the House of Representatives by their Clerk, announcing that it had passed "An act to provide for the better collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the public revenue, by means of a corporation, to be styled the Fiscal Corporation of the United States."

Mr. BERRIEN moved that the bill be now read, for the purpose of reference; which was agreed to, and the bill read.

The CHAIR then put the question, shall this bill be read a second time? when a majority of voices seeming to be in the negative, a division and count was called for, when

The CHAIR announced that there were ayes 18, noes 17. So the bill was ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BERRIEN moved that it have its second reading now.

No objection being heard, the Secretary was proceeding to read the bill, when

Mr. ALLEN interposed an objection.

The CHAIR decided it was too late.

Mr. BERRIEN moved that the bill be referred to a Select Committee.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, seconded the motion; and after referring to the great amount of labor the former Select Committee had with the Bank bill reported by them, requested the Chair not to place him on the committee to be raised on the present bill, as he did not wish to have any thing particularly to do with it. Whether he should support the bill or not, depended on whether his friends on the committee could present some practicable and useful scheme of a Bank of the United States.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he would vote for the motion to refer this bill to a Select Committee. He felt too great a regard for the Senator from Kentucky to force this thing upon the Committee on Finance, of which he was chairman. A correct judge of human nature had said that there was but one step between the sublime and the ridiculous. The great Whig party had taken that step, when they determined to create this being, called "The Fiscal Corporation of the United States." If this thing had derived its name from its nature, it ought to have been called "The Kite Flying Fiscality." The great Whig party had descended through different gradations until they at length sank to this Fiscality; and he, for one, should certainly not, by his vote, subject the Senator to the mortification of becoming its sponsor.

The motion having been agreed to, the bill was referred to a select committee of five, consisting of Mr. BERRIEN, Mr. EVANS, Mr. ARCHER, Mr. MOREHEAD, and Mr. HUNTINGTON.

FRIDAY, September 8.

Fiscal Corporation.

The bill to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the public revenue by means of a Fiscal Corporation, coming up once more, as the unfinished business, and the question still being on ordering the bill to its third reading—

Mr. SIMMONS, of Rhode Island, spoke for about half an hour in favor of the bill.

Mr. BERRIEN, who had been charged with the bill, went into a general reply to the objections which had been urged against it, especially by Mr. BUCHANAN.

Mr. TAPPAN said when Senators on the other side declare that this Bank bill is intended to withhold from the corporation created by it the power of making loans and discounts, he felt himself bound to believe that such was their honest construction of it. He was, however, surprised that any man, in the slightest degree acquainted with the banking business of the country, who had read this bill, should suppose that, under its provisions, the company incorporated by it would not have unlimited power to loan their paper and to discount the paper of their customers. The ninth fundamental article says, that "the said corporation shall not directly or indirectly, deal or trade in any thing except foreign bills of exchange, including bills or drafts drawn in one State or Territory, and payable in another." This bill, in its last clause, sanctioned a mode of discounting paper, and making loans, common in the Western country. He spoke of a mode of doing business which he had a full knowledge of, and he asked Senators, therefore, to look at it. A man who wants a loan from a bank applies to the directors, and is told, we can lend you the money, but we do not take notes for our loans—you must give us a draft; but, says the applicant, I have no funds anywhere to draw upon; no matter, say the bank-directors, your draft is not met, or expected to be met, because you have no funds, that need make no difference; you pay it here, with the exchange, when the time it has to run is out; so the borrower signs a draft or bill of exchange on somebody in New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore, and pays the discount for the time it has to run; when that time comes round, the borrower pays into the Bank the amount of his draft, with two, four, six, or ten per cent., whatever the rate of exchange may be, and the affair is settled, and he gets a renewal for sixty days, by further paying the discount on the sum borrowed; and if it is an accommodation loan, it is renewed from time to time by paying the discount and exchange. Very few of the Western banks, he believed, discounted notes; they found it much more profitable to deal in exchange, as it is called; but this dealing in exchange enables the banks to discount as much paper, and to loan as much of their own notes, as the old-fashioned mode of discounting; it is a difference in form merely, with this advantage to the banks, that it enables them to get from their customers ten or twelve per cent. on their loans, instead of the six, to which, in discounting notes, they are usually restricted. How, then, he asked, could Senators say that this bill did not give the power to make loans and discounts? He had showed them how, under this law, both loans and discounts will be made without limitation.

1st Sess.]

Fiscal Corporation.

[SEPTEMBER, 1841.]

The question was then put, "Shall this bill be read a third time?" The yeas and nays having been demanded, the vote stood as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—27.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—22.

The bill was then read a third time by its title, and finally passed.

The question being next on the title of the bill,

Mr. TAPPAN moved that it be changed to the style and title of "The United States Bank." He contended that it was inconsistent with the boasted chivalry of the Senator from Kentucky to sanction any subterfuge, or shrink from calling things by their right names. This was nothing but a United States Bank, and it ought to be called by its real name, and not by one which was not applicable to it.

Several of Mr. TAPPAN's friends requested he would withdraw his motion, and at their request he did so.

The title was then agreed to.

[This bill, like the previous one, was disapproved by the President, and returned to the House, where it was rejected by a vote of 103 for the bill, 80 against it—less than the constitutional majority; and Congress adjourned.]

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.—SECOND SESSION.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

IN THE

SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 6, 1841.

The second session of the Twenty-seventh Congress convened to-day, in conformity with the Constitution of the United States. The PRESIDENT of the Senate took his seat at the hour of 12 o'clock.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD.

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate acquaint the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is in attendance, and ready to proceed to business.

A message was received from the House, informing the Senate that there was a quorum of that body in attendance, and ready to proceed to business. That a committee of three had been appointed on the part of the House to join such committee as might be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that quorums of both Houses of Congress were in attendance, prepared to transact business, and receive any communication he might be pleased to transmit; when,

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, the PRESIDENT of the Senate was directed to name two to constitute the committee on the part of the Senate, in conformity with the above message; when Messrs. BAYARD and BATES were named by the PRESIDENT.

On motion of Mr. TALLMADGE,
The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, December 6.

At 12 o'clock the SPEAKER called the House to order, and the roll was called, when 173 members answered to their names.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, informed the SPEAKER that Gen. HENRY DODGE, the newly elected Delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin, was in attendance, and moved that the usual oath be administered to him.

Mr. DODGE was accordingly qualified, and took his seat.

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE,

The Hon. FRANCIS GRANGER, elected a Representative from the State of New York, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. Mr. GREIG, was qualified, and took his seat.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. DICKINS, their Secretary, stating that a quorum of that body had assembled, and were ready to proceed to business.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, rose, and stated that his name stood on the list of one of the most important committees of the last session—the Committee on Public Lands; and, as the important measure which he had most at heart had been passed upon, in the enactment of the Land bill, he hoped the Speaker would omit his name in filling up that committee for this session. There was another measure in which he took an equal interest, and that was the establishment of a national foundry. He gave notice that he would take the earliest opportunity of moving for a Select Committee to take that subject into consideration.

On motion by Mr. WISE,
The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 7.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Joint Committee on the part of the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that Congress was organized for business, reported that that duty had been performed, and that the President had informed the committee that he would this day, at 12 o'clock, communicate to both Houses a message in writing. Whereupon

2D Sess.]

The President's Message.

[DECEMBER, 1841.]

A Message from the President of the United States was received by ROBERT TYLER, Esq., his private secretary.

The CHAIR then communicated to the Senate the Message of the President, which was read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

In coming together, fellow-citizens, to enter again upon the discharge of the duties with which the people have charged us, severally, we find great occasion to rejoice in the general prosperity of the country. We are in the enjoyment of all the blessings of civil and religious liberty, with unexampled means of education, knowledge, and improvement. Through the year which is now drawing to a close, peace has been in our borders, and plenty in our habitations; and although disease has visited some few portions of the land with distress and mortality, yet in general the health of the people has been preserved, and we are all called upon, by the highest obligations of duty, to renew our thanks and our devotion to our Heavenly Parent, who has continued to vouchsafe to us the eminent blessings which surround us, and who has so signally crowned the year with his goodness. If we find ourselves increasing, beyond example, in numbers, in strength, in wealth, in knowledge, in every thing which promotes human and social happiness, let us ever remember our dependence, for all these, on the protection and merciful dispensations of Divine Providence.

Since your last adjournment, Alexander McLeod, a British subject, who was indicted for the murder of an American citizen, and whose case has been the subject of a correspondence heretofore communicated to you, has been acquitted by the verdict of an impartial and intelligent jury, and has, under the judgment of the court, been regularly discharged.

Great Britain having made known to this Government that the expedition which was fitted out from Canada for the destruction of the steamboat Caroline, in the winter of 1837, and which resulted in the destruction of said boat, and in the death of an American citizen, was undertaken by orders emanating from the authorities of the British Government in Canada, and demanding the discharge of McLeod, upon the ground that, if engaged in that expedition, he did but fulfil the orders of his Government, has thus been answered in the only way in which she could be answered by a Government, the powers of which are distributed among its several departments by the fundamental law. Happily for the people of Great Britain, as well as for those of the United States, the only mode by which an individual, arraigned for a criminal offence, before the courts of either, can obtain his discharge, is by the independent action of the judiciary, and by proceedings equally familiar to the courts of both countries.

If in Great Britain a power exists in the crown to cause to be entered a nolle prosequi, which is not the case with the Executive power of the United States upon a prosecution pending in a State court; yet there no more than here, can the chief Executive power rescue a prisoner from custody without an order from the proper tribunal directing his discharge. The precise stage of the proceedings at which such order may be made, is a matter of municipal regulation exclusively, and not to be complained of by any other Government. In cases of this kind, a Government becomes politically responsible only, when its tribunals of last resort are shown to have rendered unjust and injurious judgments in matters not doubtful. To the establishment and elucidation of this principle, no nation has lent its authority more efficiently than Great Britain. Alexander McLeod having his option either to prosecute a writ of error from the decision of the Supreme Court of New York, which had been rendered upon his application for a discharge, to the Supreme Court of the United States, or to submit his case to the decision of a jury, preferred the latter, deeming it the readiest mode of obtaining his liberation; and the result has fully sustained the wisdom of his choice. The manner in which the issue submitted was tried, will satisfy the English Government that the principles of justice will never fail to govern the enlightened decision of an American tribunal. I cannot fail, however, to suggest to Congress the propriety, and in some degree the necessity, of making such provisions by law, so far as they may constitutionally do so, for the removal, at their commencement, and at the option of the party, of all such cases as may hereafter arise, and which may involve the faithful observance and execution of our international obligations, from the State to the Federal Judiciary. This Government, by our institutions, is charged with the maintenance of peace and the preservation of amicable relations with the nations of the earth, and ought to possess, without question, all the reasonable and proper means of maintaining the one and preserving the other. Whilst just confidence is felt in the Judiciary of the States, yet this Government ought to be competent in itself for the fulfilment of the high duties which have been devolved upon it under the organic law, by the States themselves.

In the month of September, a party of armed men from Upper Canada invaded the territory of the United States, and forcibly seized upon the person of one Grogan, and, under circumstances of great harshness, hurriedly carried him beyond the limits of the United States, and delivered him up to the authorities of Upper Canada. His immediate discharge was ordered by those authorities, upon the facts of the case being brought to their knowledge—a course of procedure which was to have been expected from a nation with whom we are at peace, and which was not more due to the rights of the United States than to its own regard for justice. The correspondence which passed between the Department of State and the British Envoy, Mr. Fox, and with the Governor of Vermont, as soon as the facts had been made known to this Department, are herewith communicated.

I regret that it is not in my power to make known to you an equally satisfactory conclusion in the case of the Caroline steamer, with the circumstances connected with the destruction of which, in December, 1837, by an armed force fitted out in the Province of Upper Canada, you are already made acquainted. No such atonement as was due for the public wrong done to the United States by this invasion of her territory, so wholly irreconcilable with her rights as an independent power, has yet been made. In the view taken by this Government, the inquiry whether the vessel was in the employment of those who were prosecuting an unauthorized war against that Province, or was engaged by the owner in the business of transporting passengers to and from Navy Island in hopes of private gain, which was most probably the case, in no degree alters the real question at issue between the two Governments. This Government can never concede to any foreign Government the power, except in a case of the most urgent and extreme necessity, of invading its territory, either to arrest the persons or destroy the property of those who may have violated the municipal laws of such foreign Government, or have disregarded their obligations arising under the law of nations. The territory of the United States must be regarded as sacredly secure against all such invasions, until they shall voluntarily acknowledge their inability to acquit themselves of their duties to others. And in announcing this sentiment, I do but affirm a principle which no nation on earth would be more ready to vindicate, at all hazards, than the people and Government of Great Britain.

DECEMBER, 1841.]

The President's Message.

[27TH CONG.]

If, upon a full investigation of all the facts, it shall appear that the owner of the Caroline was governed by a hostile intent, or had made common cause with those who were in the occupancy of Navy Island, then, so far as he is concerned, there can be no claim to indemnity for the destruction of his boat, which this Government would feel itself bound to prosecute—since he would have acted not only in derogation of the rights of Great Britain, but in clear violation of the laws of the United States; but that is a question which, however settled, in no manner involves the higher consideration of the violation of territorial sovereignty and jurisdiction. To recognize it as an admissible practice that each Government, in its turn, upon any sudden and unauthorized outbreak, which, on a frontier, the extent of which renders it impossible for either to have an efficient force on every mile of it, and which outbreak, therefore, neither may be able to suppress in a day, may take vengeance into its own hands, and without even a remonstrance, and in the absence of any pressing or overruling necessity, may invade the territory of the other, would inevitably lead to results equally to be deplored by both. When border collisions come to receive the sanction, or to be made on the authority of either Government, general war must be the inevitable result. While it is the ardent desire of the United States to cultivate the relations of peace with all nations, and to fulfil all the duties of good neighborhood towards those who possess territories adjoining their own, that very desire would lead them to deny the right of any foreign power to invade their boundary with an armed force. The correspondence between the two Governments on this subject, will, at a future day of your session, be submitted to your consideration; and, in the mean time, I cannot but indulge the hope that the British Government will see the propriety of renouncing, as a rule of future action, the precedent which has been set in the affair at Schlosser.

I herewith submit the correspondence which has recently taken place between the American Minister at the Court of St. James, Mr. Stevenson, and the Minister of Foreign Affairs of that Government, on the right claimed by that Government to visit and detain vessels sailing under the American flag, and engaged in prosecuting lawful commerce in the African seas. Our commercial interests in that region have experienced considerable increase, and have become an object of much importance, and it is the duty of this Government to protect them against all improper and vexatious interruption. However desirous the United States may be for the suppression of the slave-trade, they cannot consent to interpolations into the maritime code, at the mere will and pleasure of other Governments. We deny the right of any such interpolation to any one, or all the nations of the earth, without our consent. We claim to have a voice in all amendments or alterations of that code—and when we are given to understand, as in this instance, by a foreign Government, that its treaties with other nations cannot be executed without the establishment and enforcement of new principles of maritime police, to be applied without our consent, we must employ a language neither of equivocal import, nor susceptible of misconstruction. American citizens prosecuting a lawful commerce in the African seas, under the flag of their country, are not responsible for the abuse or unlawful use of that flag by others; nor can they rightfully, on account of any such alleged abuses, be interrupted, molested, or detained while on the ocean; and if thus molested and detained, while pursuing honest voyages, in the usual way, and violating no laws themselves, they are unquestionably entitled to indemnity. This Government has manifested its repugnance to the slave-trade, in a manner which cannot be misunderstood. By its fundamental law, it prescribed limits in point of time to its continuance; and against its own citizens, who might so far forget the rights of humanity as to engage in that wicked traffic, it has long since, by its municipal laws, denounced the most condign punishment. Many of the States composing this Union had made appeals to the civilized world for its suppression, long before the moral sense of other nations had become shocked by the iniquities of the traffic. Whether this Government should now enter into treaties containing mutual stipulations upon this subject, is a question for its mature deliberation. Certain it is, that if the right to detain American ships on the high seas can be justified on the plea of a necessity for such detention, arising out of the existence of treaties between other nations, the same plea may be extended and enlarged by the new stipulations of new treaties, to which the United States may not be a party. This Government will not cease to urge upon that of Great Britain full and ample remuneration for all losses, whether arising from detention or otherwise, to which American citizens have heretofore been, or may hereafter be subjected, by the exercise of rights which this Government cannot recognize as legitimate and proper. Nor will I indulge a doubt but that the sense of justice of Great Britain will constrain her to make retribution for any wrong, or loss, which any American citizen, engaged in the prosecution of lawful commerce, may have experienced at the hand of her cruisers, or other public authorities. This Government, at the same time, will relax no effort to prevent its citizens, if there be any so disposed, from prosecuting a traffic so revolting to the feelings of humanity. It seeks to do no more than to protect the fair and honest trader from molestation and injury; but while the enterprising mariner, engaged in the pursuit of an honorable trade, is entitled to its protection, it will visit with condign punishment others of an opposite character.

2d Sess.]

The President's Message.

[DECEMBER, 1841.]

I invite your attention to existing laws for the suppression of the African slave-trade, and recommend all such alterations as may give to them greater force and efficacy. That the American flag is grossly abused by the abandoned and profligate of other nations, is but too probable. Congress has, not long since, had this subject under its consideration, and its importance well justifies renewed and anxious attention.

I also communicate herewith the copy of a correspondence between Mr. Stevenson and Lord Palmerston, upon the subject, so interesting to several of the Southern States, of the rice duties, which resulted honorably to the justice of Great Britain, and advantageously to the United States.

At the opening of the last annual session, the President informed Congress of the progress which had then been made in negotiating a convention between this Government and that of England, with a view to the final settlement of the question of the boundary between the territorial limits of the two countries. I regret to say that little further advancement of the object has been accomplished since last year; but this is owing to circumstances no way indicative of any abatement of the desire of both parties to hasten the negotiation to its conclusion, and to settle the question in dispute as early as possible. In the course of the session, it is my hope to be able to announce some further degree of progress towards the accomplishment of this highly desirable end.

The commission appointed by this Government for the exploration and survey of the line of boundary separating the States of Maine and New Hampshire from the conterminous British Provinces, is, it is believed, about to close its field labors, and is expected soon to report the result of its examinations to the Department of State. The report, when received, will be laid before Congress.

The failure on the part of Spain to pay, with punctuality, the interest due under the Convention of 1834, for the settlement of claims between the two countries, has made it the duty of the Executive to call the particular attention of that Government to the subject. A disposition has been manifested by it, which is believed to be entirely sincere, to fulfil its obligations, in this respect, so soon as its internal condition and the state of its finances will permit. An arrangement is in progress, from the result of which, it is trusted that those of our citizens who have claims under the Convention, will, at no distant day, receive the stipulated payments.

A Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with Belgium was concluded and signed at Washington on the 29th March, 1840, and was duly sanctioned by the Senate of the United States. The treaty was ratified by His Belgian Majesty, but did not receive the approbation of the Belgian Chambers within the time limited by its term, and has, therefore, become void.

This occurrence assumes the graver aspect from the consideration that, in 1838, a treaty negotiated between the two Governments, and ratified on the part of the United States, failed to be ratified on the part of Belgium. The Representative of that Government, at Washington, informs the Department of State that he has been instructed to give explanations of the causes which occasioned delay in the approval of the late Treaty by the Legislature, and to express the regret of the King at the occurrences.

The joint commission under the Convention with Texas, to ascertain the true boundary between the two countries, has concluded its labors; but the final report of the commissioner of the United States has not been received. It is understood, however, that the meridian line, as traced by the commission, lies somewhat further East than the position hitherto generally assigned to it, and, consequently, includes in Texas some part of the territory which had been considered as belonging to the States of Louisiana and Arkansas.

The United States cannot but take a deep interest in whatever relates to this young, but growing Republic. Settled principally by emigrants from the United States, we have the happiness to know, that the great principles of civil liberty are there destined to flourish, under wise institutions and wholesome laws; and that, through its example, another evidence is to be afforded of the capacity of popular institutions to advance the prosperity, happiness, and permanent glory of the human race. The great truth, that Government was made for the people, and not the people for Government, has already been established in the practice and by the example of these United States; and we can do no other than contemplate its further exemplification by a sister Republic, with the deepest interest.

Our relations with the independent States of this hemisphere, formerly under the dominion of Spain, have not undergone any material change within the present year. The incessant sanguinary conflicts in, or between, those countries, are to be greatly deplored, as necessarily tending to disable them from performing their duties as members of the community of nations, and rising to the destiny which the position and natural resources of many of them might lead them justly to anticipate; as constantly giving occasion, also, directly or indirectly, for complaints on the part of our citizens who resort thither for purposes of commercial intercourse, and as retarding reparation for wrongs already committed, some of which are by no means of recent date.

The failure of the Congress of Ecuador to hold a session, at the time appointed for that purpose, in January last, will probably render abortive a treaty of commerce with that Republic, which was signed at Quito on the 13th of June, 1839, and had been duly ratified on our part, but which required the approbation of that body, prior to its ratification by the Ecuadorian Executive.

A convention which has been concluded with the Republic of Peru, providing for the settlement of certain claims of citizens of the United States, upon the Government of that Republic, will be duly submitted to the Senate.

The claims of our citizens against the Brazilian Government, originating from captures, and other causes, are still unsettled. The United States have, however, so uniformly shown a disposition to cultivate relations of amity with that Empire, that it is hoped, the unequivocal tokens of the same spirit towards us, which an adjustment of the affairs referred to would afford, will be given without further avoidable delay.

The war with the Indian tribes on the peninsula of Florida has, during the last summer and fall, been prosecuted with untiring activity and zeal. A summer campaign was resolved upon as the best mode of bringing it to a close. Our brave officers and men who have been engaged in that service, have suffered toils and privations, and exhibited an energy, which, in any other war, would have won for them unfading laurels. In despite of the sickness incident to the climate, they have penetrated the fastnesses of the Indians, broken up their encampments, and harassed them unceasingly. Numbers have been captured, and still greater numbers have surrendered, and have been transported to join their brethren on the lands elsewhere allotted to them by the Government—and a strong hope is entertained that, under the conduct of the gallant officer at the head of the troops in Florida, that troublesome and expensive war is destined to a speedy termination. With all the other Indian tribes we are enjoying the blessings of peace. Our duty, as well as our best interests, prompt us to observe, in all our intercourse with them, fidelity in fulfilling our engagements, the practice of strict justice, as well as the constant exercise of acts of benevolence and kindness. These are the great instruments of civilization, and through the use of them alone, can the untutored child of the forest be induced to listen to its teachings.

The Secretary of State, on whom the acts of Congress have devolved the duty of directing the proceedings for the taking of the Sixth Census, or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, will report to the two Houses the progress of that work. The enumeration of persons has been completed, and exhibits a grand total of 17,069,453; making an increase over the Census of 1830 of 4,302,646 inhabitants, and showing a gain in a ratio exceeding 32½ per cent. for the last ten years.

From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, you will be informed of the condition of the finances. The balance in the Treasury on the first of January last, as stated in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, as submitted to Congress at the Extra Session, was $987,845 08. The receipts into the Treasury, during the first three quarters of this year, from all sources, amount to $23,467,073 52. The estimated receipts for the fourth quarter amount to $6,943,095 25, amounting to $30,410,167 77; and making, with the balance in the Treasury on the first of January last, $31,397,518 20. The expenditures for the first three quarters of this year amount to $24,784,846 97. The expenditures for the fourth quarter, as estimated, will amount to $7,290,337 78—thus making a total of $32,025,070 70; and leaving a deficit to be provided for, on the first of January next, of about $627,557 90.

Of the loan of $12,000,000, which was authorized by Congress at its late session, only $5,432,726 88 have been negotiated. The shortness of time which it had to run has presented no inconsiderable impediment in the way of its being taken by capitalists at home, while the same cause would have operated with much greater force in the foreign market. For that reason the foreign market has not been resorted to; and it is now submitted, whether it would not be advisable to amend the law by making what remains undisposed of, payable at a more distant day.

Should it be necessary, in any view that Congress may take of the subject, to revise the existing tariff of duties, I beg leave to say, that, in the performance of that most delicate operation, moderate counsels would seem to be the wisest. The Government under which it is our happiness to live, owes its existence to the spirit of compromise which prevailed among its framers—jarring and discordant opinions could only have been reconciled by that noble spirit of patriotism, which prompted conciliation, and resulted in harmony. In the same spirit the Compromise bill, as it is commonly called, was adopted at the session of 1833. While the people of no portion of the Union will ever hesitate to pay all necessary taxes for the support of Government, yet an innate repugnance exists to the imposition of burdens not really necessary for that object. In imposing duties, however, for the purposes of revenue, a right to discriminate as to the articles on which the duty shall be laid, as well as the amount, necessarily and most properly exists. Otherwise the Government would be placed in the condition of having to levy the same duties upon all articles, the productive, as well as the unproductive. The slightest duty upon some, might have the effect of causing their importation to cease, whereas others, entering extensively into the consumption of the country, might bear the heaviest, without any sensible diminution in the amount imported. So, also, the Government may be justified in so discriminating, by reference to other considerations of domestic policy connected with our manufactures. So long as the duties shall be laid with distinct reference to the wants of the Treasury, no well-founded objection can exist against them. It might be esteemed desirable that no such augmentation of the taxes should take place as would have the effect of annulling the land proceeds distribution act of the last session, which act is declared to be inoperative the moment the duties are increased beyond 20 per cent., the maximum rate established by the Compromise act. Some of the provisions of the Compromise act, which will go into effect on the 30th day of June next, may, however, be found exceedingly inconvenient in practice, under any regulations that Congress may adopt. I refer more particularly to that relating to the home valuation. A difference in value of the same articles to some extent, will, necessarily, exist at different ports—but that is altogether insignificant, when compared with the conflicts in valuation, which are likely to arise, from the differences of opinion among the numerous appraisers of merchandise. In many instances the estimates of value must be conjectural, and thus as many different rates of value may be established as there are appraisers. These differences in valuation may also be increased by the inclination, which, without the slightest imputation on their honesty, may arise on the part of the appraisers in favor of their respective ports of entry. I recommend this whole subject to the consideration of Congress, with a single additional remark. Certainty and permanency in any system of governmental policy are, in all respects, eminently desirable; but more particularly is this true in all that affects trade and commerce, the operations of which depend much more on the certainty of their returns, and calculations which embrace distant periods of time, than on high bounties, or duties which are liable to constant fluctuations.

At your late session, I invited your attention to the condition of the currency and exchanges, and urged the necessity of adopting such measures as were consistent with the constitutional competency of the Government, in order to correct the uneasiness of the one, and, as far as practicable, the inequalities of the other. No country can be in the enjoyment of its full measure of prosperity, without the presence of a medium of exchange approximating to uniformity of value. What is necessary as between the different nations of the earth, is also important as between the inhabitants of different parts of the same country; with the first, the precious metals constitute the chief medium of circulation, and such also would be the case as to the last, but for inventions comparatively modern, which have furnished, in place of gold and silver, a paper circulation. I do not propose to enter into a comparative analysis of the merits of the two systems. Such belonged more properly to the period of the introduction of the paper system. The speculative philosopher might find inducements to prosecute the inquiry, but his researches could only lead him to conclude that the paper system had properly better never have been introduced, and that society might have been much happier without it. The practical statesman has a very different task to perform. He has to look at things as they are—to take them as he finds them—to supply deficiencies, and to prune excesses as far as in him lies. The task of furnishing a corrective for derangements of the paper medium with us, is almost inexpressibly great. The power exerted by the States to charter banking corporations, and which, having been carried to a great excess, has filled the country with, in most of the States, an irredeemable paper medium, is an evil which, in some way or other, requires a corrective. The rates at which bills of exchange are negotiated between different parts of the country, furnish an index of the value of the local substitute for gold and silver, which is, in many parts, so far depreciated as not to be received, except at a large discount, in payment of debts, or in the purchase of produce. It could earnestly be desired that every bank, not possessing the means of resumption, should follow the example of the late United States Bank of Pennsylvania, and go into liquidation, rather than by refusing to do so, to continue embarrassments in the way of solvent institutions, thereby augmenting the difficulties incident to the present condition of things. Whether this Government, with due regard to the rights of the States, has any power to constrain the banks, either to resume specie payments or to force them into liquidation, is an inquiry which will not fail to claim your consideration. In view of the great advantages which are allowed the corporations, not amongst the least of which is the authority contained in most of their charters, to make loans to three times the amount of their capital, thereby often deriving three times as much interest on the same amount of money as any individual is permitted by law to receive, no sufficient apology can be urged for a long-continued suspension of specie payments. Such suspension is productive of the greatest detriment to the public, by expelling from circulation the precious metals, and seriously hazarding the success of any effort that this Government can make, to increase commercial facilities, and to advance the public interests.

2d Sess.]

The President's Message.

[DECEMBER, 1841.]

This is the more to be regretted, and the indispensable necessity for a sound currency becomes the more manifest, when we reflect on the vast amount of the internal commerce of the country. Of this we have no statistics, nor just data for forming adequate opinions. But there can be no doubt but that the amount of transportation coastwise by sea, and the transportation inland by railroads and canals, and by steamboats and other modes of conveyance, over the surface of our vast rivers and immense lakes, and the value of property carried and interchanged by these means, form a general aggregate to which the foreign commerce of the country, large as it is, makes but a distant approach.

In the absence of any controlling power over this subject, which, by forcing a general resumption of specie payments, would at once have the effect of restoring a sound medium of exchange, and would leave to the country but little to desire, what measure of relief, falling within the limits of our constitutional competency, does it become this Government to adopt? It was my painful duty at your last session, under the weight of most solemn obligations, to differ with Congress on the measures which it proposed for my approval, and which it doubtless regarded as corrective of existing evils. Subsequent reflection, and events since occurring, have only served to confirm me in the opinions then entertained, and frankly expressed.

I must be permitted to add, that no scheme of Governmental policy, unaided by individual exertions, can be available for ameliorating the present condition of things. Commercial modes of exchange and a good currency, are but the necessary means of commerce and intercourse, not the direct productive sources of wealth. Wealth can only be accumulated by the earnings of industry and the savings of frugality; and nothing can be more ill-judged than to look to facilities in borrowing, or to a redundant circulation, for the power of discharging pecuniary obligations. The country is full of resources, and the people full of energy, and the great and permanent remedy for present embarrassments must be sought in industry, economy, the observance of good faith, and the favorable influence of time.

In pursuance of a pledge given to you in my last Message to Congress, which pledge I urge as an apology for venturing to present you the details of any plan, the Secretary of the Treasury will be ready to submit to you, should you require it, a plan of finance which, while it throws around the public treasure reasonable guards for its protection, and rests on powers acknowledged in practice to exist from the origin of the Government, will, at the same time, furnish to the country a sound paper medium, and afford all reasonable facilities for regulating the exchanges. When submitted, you will perceive in it a plan amendatory of the existing laws in relation to the Treasury Department—subordinate in all respects to the will of Congress directly, and the will of the people indirectly—self-sustaining, should it be found in practice to realize its promises in theory, and repealable at the pleasure of Congress. It proposes by effectual restraints, and by invoking the true spirit of our institutions, to separate the purse from the sword; or more properly to speak, denies any other control to the President over the agents who may be selected to carry it into execution, but what may be indispensably necessary to secure the fidelity of such agents; and, by wise regulations, keeps plainly apart from each other private and public funds. It contemplates the establishment of a Board of Control at the seat of Government, with agencies at prominent commercial points, or wherever else Congress shall direct, for the safe-keeping and disbursement of the public moneys, and a substitution, at the option of the public creditor, of Treasury notes, in lieu of gold and silver. It proposes to limit the issues to an amount not to exceed $15,000,000—without the express sanction of the Legislative power. It also authorizes the receipt of individual deposits of gold and silver to a limited amount, and the granting certificates of deposit, divided into such sums as may be called for by the depositors. It proceeds a step further, and authorizes the purchase and sale of domestic bills and drafts, resting on a real and substantial basis, payable at sight, or having but a short time to run, and drawn on places not less than one hundred miles apart—which authority, except in so far as may be necessary for Government purposes exclusively, is only to be exerted upon the express condition, that its exercise shall not be prohibited by the State in which the agency is situated.

DECEMBER, 1841.]

The President's Message.

[27TH CONG.]

In order to cover the expenses incident to the plan, it will be authorized to receive moderate premiums for certificates issued on deposits, and on bills bought and sold, and thus, as far as its dealings extend, to furnish facilities to commercial intercourse at the lowest possible rates, and to subduct from the earnings of industry the least possible sum. It uses the State banks at a distance from the agencies as auxiliaries, without imparting any power to trade in its name. It is subjected to such guards and restraints as have appeared to be necessary. It is the creature of law, and exists only at the pleasure of the legislature. It is made to rest on an actual specie basis, in order to redeem the notes at the places of issue—produces no dangerous redundancy of circulation—affords no temptation to speculation—is attended by no inflation of prices—is equable in its operation—makes the Treasury notes, which it may use along with the certificates of deposit, and the notes of specie-paying banks, convertible at the place where collected, receivable in payment of Government dues; and, without violating any principle of the constitution, affords the Government and the people such facilities as are called for by the wants of both. Such, it has appeared to me, are its recommendations, and in view of them it will be submitted, whenever you may require it, to your consideration.

I am not able to perceive that any fair and candid objection can be urged against the plan, the principal outlines of which I have thus presented. I cannot doubt but that the notes which it proposes to furnish, at the voluntary option of the public creditor, issued in lieu of the revenue and its certificates of deposit, will be maintained at an equality with gold and silver everywhere. They are redeemable in gold and silver on demand, at the places of issue. They are receivable everywhere in payment of Government dues. The Treasury notes are limited to an amount of one-fourth less than the estimated annual receipts of the Treasury; and in addition, they rest upon the faith of the Government for their redemption. If all these assurances are not sufficient to make them available, then the idea, as it seems to me, of furnishing a sound paper medium of exchanges, may be entirely abandoned.

If a fear be indulged that the Government may be tempted to run into excess in its issues at any future day, it seems to me that no such apprehension can reasonably be entertained, until all confidence in the representatives of the States and of the people, as well as of the people themselves, shall be lost. The weightiest considerations of policy require that the restraints now proposed to be thrown around the measure should not, for light causes, be removed. To argue against any proposed plan its liability to possible abuse, is to reject every expedient, since every thing dependent on human action is liable to abuse. Fifteen millions of Treasury notes may be issued as the maximum, but a discretionary power is to be given to the Board of Control, under that sum, and every consideration will unite in leading them to feel their way with caution. For the eight first years of the existence of the late Bank of the United States, its circulation barely exceeded $4,000,000; and for five of its most prosperous years, it was about equal to $16,000,000. Furthermore, the authority given to receive private deposits to a limited amount, and to issue certificates in such sums as may be called for by the depositors, may so far fill up the channels of circulation as greatly to diminish the necessity of any considerable issue of Treasury notes. A restraint upon the amount of private deposits has seemed to be indispensably necessary, from an apprehension, thought to be well-founded, that in any emergency of trade, confidence might be so far shaken in the banks as to induce a withdrawal from them of private deposits, with a view to ensure their unquestionable safety when deposited with the Government, which might prove eminently disastrous to the State banks. It is objected, that it is proposed to authorize the agencies to deal in bills of exchange? It is answered, that such dealings are to be carried on at the lowest possible premium—are made to rest on an unquestionably sound basis—are designed to reimburse merely the expenses which would otherwise devolve upon the Treasury, and are in strict subordination to the decision of the Supreme Court, in the case of the Bank of Augusta against Earle, and other reported cases, and thereby avoid all conflict with State jurisdiction, which I hold to be indispensably requisite. It leaves the banking privileges of the States without interference—looks to the Treasury and the Union—and, while furnishing every facility to the first, is careful of the interests of the last. But above all, it is created by law, is amendable by law, and is repealable by law; and wedded as I am to no theory, but looking solely to the advancement of the public good, I shall be among the very first to urge its repeal, if it be found not to subserve the purposes and objects for which it may be created. Nor will the plan be submitted in any overweening confidence in the sufficiency of my own judgment, but with much greater reliance on the wisdom and patriotism of Congress. I cannot abandon this subject without urging upon you, in the most emphatic manner, whatever may be your action on the suggestions which I have felt it to be my duty to submit, to relieve the Chief Executive Magistrate by any and all constitutional means, from a controlling power over the public Treasury. If, in the plan proposed, should you deem it worthy of your consideration, that separation is not as complete as you may desire, you will, doubtless, amend it in that particular. For myself, I disclaim all desire to have any control over the public moneys, other than what is indispensably necessary, to execute the laws which you may pass.

Nor can I fail to advert in this connection, to the debts which many of the States of the Union have contracted abroad, and under which they continue to labor. That indebtedness amounts to a sum not less than $200,000,000, and which has been attributed to them, for the most part, in works of internal improvement, which are destined to prove of vast importance in ultimately advancing their prosperity and wealth. For the debts thus contracted, the States are alone responsible. I can do no more than express the belief that each State will feel itself bound by every consideration of honor, as well as of interest, to meet its engagements with punctuality. The failure, however, of any one State to do so, should in no degree affect the credit of the rest; and the foreign capitalists will have as just cause to experience alarm as to all other State stocks, because my one or more of the States may neglect to provide with punctuality the means of redeeming their engagements. Even such States, should there be any, considering the great rapidity with which their resources are developing themselves, will not fail to have the means, at no very distant day, to redeem their obligations to the uttermost farthing; nor will I doubt but that in view of that honorable conduct which has evermore governed the States, and the people of this Union, they will each and all resort to every legitimate expedient, before they will forego a faithful compliance with their obligations.

2d Sess.]

The President's Message.

[DECEMBER, 1841.]

From the report of the Secretary of War, and other reports accompanying it, you will be informed of the progress which has been made in the fortifications designed for the protection of our principal cities, roadsteads, and inland frontier, during the present year; together with their true state and condition. They will be prosecuted to completion with all the expedition which the means placed by Congress at the disposal of the Executive will allow.

I recommend particularly to your consideration, that portion of the Secretary's report which proposes the establishment of a chain of military posts from Council Bluffs to some point on the Pacific Ocean, within our limits. The benefit thereby destined to accrue to our citizens engaged in the fur trade, over that wilderness region, added to the importance of cultivating friendly relations with the savage tribes inhabiting it, and at the same time of giving protection to our frontier settlements, and of establishing the means of safe intercourse between the American settlements at the mouth of the Columbia River, and those on this side of the Rocky Mountains, would seem to suggest the importance of carrying into effect the recommendations upon this head with as little delay as may be practicable.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy will place you in possession of the present condition of that important arm of the national defence. Every effort will be made to add to its efficiency, and I cannot too strongly urge upon you liberal appropriations to that branch of the public service. Inducements of the weightiest character exist for the adoption of this course of policy. Our extended and otherwise exposed maritime frontier, calls for protection, to the furnishing of which an efficient naval force is indispensable. We look to no foreign conquests, nor do we propose to enter into competition with any other nation for supremacy on the ocean—but it is due not only to the honor, but to the security of the people of the United States, that no nation should be permitted to invade our waters at pleasure, and subject our towns and villages to conflagration or pillage. Economy in all branches of the public service, is due from all the public agents to the people—but parsimony alone would suggest the withholding of the necessary means for the protection of our domestic firesides from invasion, and our national honor from disgrace. I would most earnestly recommend to Congress to abstain from all appropriations for objects not absolutely necessary; but I take upon myself, without a moment of hesitancy, all the responsibility of recommending the increase and prompt equipment of that gallant Navy, which has lighted up every sea with its victories, and spread an imperishable glory over the country.

The report of the Postmaster General will claim your particular attention, not only because of the valuable suggestions which it contains, but because of the great importance which, at all times, attaches to that interesting branch of the public service. The increased expense of transporting the mail along the principal routes, necessarily claims the public attention, and has awakened a corresponding solicitude on the part of the Government. The transmission of the mail must keep pace with those facilities of intercommunication which are every day becoming greater through the building of railroads, and the application of steam power—but it cannot be disguised that, in order to do so, the Post Office Department is subjected to heavy exactions. The lines of communication between distant parts of the Union, are, to a great extent, occupied by railroads, which, in the nature of things, possess a complete monopoly, and the Department is therefore liable to heavy and unreasonable charges. This evil is destined to great increase in future, and some timely measure may become necessary to guard against it.

I feel it my duty to bring under your consideration a practice which has grown up in the administration of the Government, and which, I am deeply convinced, ought to be corrected. I allude to the exercise of the power, which usage, rather than reason, has vested in the President, of removing incumbents from office, in order to substitute others more in favor with the dominant party. My own conduct, in this respect, has been governed by a conscientious purpose to exercise the removing power, only in cases of unfaithfulness or inability, or in those in which its exercise appeared necessary, in order to discountenance and suppress that spirit of active partisanship on the part of holders of office, which not only withdraws them from the steady and impartial discharge of their official duties, but exerts an undue and injurious influence over elections, and degrades the character of the Government itself, inasmuch as it exhibits the Chief Magistrate as being a party, through its agents, in the secret plots or open workings of political parties.

In respect to the exercise of this power, nothing should be left to discretion, which may safely be regulated by law; and it is of high importance to restrain, as far as possible, the stimulus of personal interests in public elections. Considering the great increase which has been made in public offices, in the last quarter of a century, and the probability of further increase, we incur the hazard of witnessing violent political contests, directed too often to the single object of retaining office, by those who are in, or obtaining it, by those who are out. Under the influence of these convictions, I shall cordially concur in any constitutional measures for regulating, and by regulating, restraining, the power of removal.

I suggest for your consideration the propriety of making, without further delay, some specific application of the funds derived under the will of Mr. Smithson of England, for the diffusion of knowledge, and which have, heretofore, been vested in public stocks, until such time as Congress should think proper to give them a specific direction. Nor will you, I feel confident, permit any abatement of the principal of the legacy to be made, should it turn out that the stocks, in which the investments have been made, have undergone a depreciation.

In conclusion, I commend to your care the interests of this District, for which you are the exclusive legislators. Considering that this city is the residence of the Government, and, for a large part of the year, of Congress, and considering, also, the great cost of the public buildings, and the propriety of affording them at all times careful protection, it seems not unreasonable that Congress should contribute towards the expenses of an efficient police.

DECEMBER, 1841.]

Message from the President.

[27th CONG.]

JOHN TYLER.

WASHINGTON, December 7, 1841.

The Message having been read,

Mr. MANGUM moved that the Message and accompanying documents be laid on the table, and printed.

Agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, moved that 1,500 copies of the Message with the accompanying documents, and 8,500 without the documents, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. BENTON observed, that he could not reconcile it to himself to let the resolution pass without making a few remarks on that part of the Message which related to the new Fiscal agent. Looking at that feature of it, as read, he perceived that the President gave an outline of the plan, leaving it to the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish the details in his report. He (Mr. BENTON) apprehended that nothing in those details could reconcile him to the project, or in any manner meet his approbation. There were two main points presented in the plan, to which he never could agree—both being wholly unconstitutional and dangerous. One was that of emitting bills of credit, or issuing a treasury currency. Congress had no constitutional authority to issue paper money, or emit Federal bills of credit; and the other feature is to authorize this Government to deal in exchanges. The proposition to issue bills of credit, when under consideration at the formation of the constitution, was struck out, with the express view of making this Government a hard-money Government—not capable of recognizing any other than a specie currency—a currency of gold and silver—a currency known and valued, and equally understood by every one. But here is a proposition to do what was expressly refused to be allowed by the framers of the constitution—to exercise a power not only not granted to Congress, but a power expressly denied. The next proposition is to authorize the Federal Government to deal in and regulate exchanges, and to furnish exchanges to merchants. This is a new invention—a modern idea of the power of this Government, invented by Mr. Biddle, to help out a National Bank. Much as General Hamilton was in favor of paper money, he never went the length of recommending Government bills of credit or dealings in exchange by the United States Treasury. The fathers of the church, Macon, and John Randolph, and others, called this a hard-money Government: they objected to bank paper; but here is Government paper, and that goes beyond Hamilton, much as he was in favor of the paper system. The whole scheme making this Government a regulator of exchange—a dealer in exchange—a furnisher of exchange—is absurd, unconstitutional, and pernicious, and is a new thing under the sun.

Now he (Mr. BENTON) objected to this Government becoming a seller of exchanges to the country, for which there is no more authority than there is for its furnishing transportation of goods or country produce. There is not a word in the constitution to authorize it—not a word to be found justifying the assumption. The word exchange is not in the constitution. What does this measure propose? Congress is called upon to establish a Board with agencies, for the purpose of furnishing the country with exchanges. Why should not Congress be also called on to furnish that portion of the community engaged in commerce, with facilities for transporting merchandise? The proposition is one of the most pernicious nature, and such as must lead to the most dangerous consequences if adopted.

The British debt began in the time of Sir Robert Walpole, on issues of exchequer bills—by which system the British nation has been cheated, and plunged irretrievably in debt to the amount of nine hundred millions of pounds. The proposition that the Government should become the issuer of exchequer notes, is one borrowed from the system introduced in England by Sir Robert Walpole, whose Whig administration was nothing but a high Tory administration of Queen Anne. He (Mr. BENTON) had much to say on this subject, but this was not the time for entering at large into it. This perhaps was not the proper occasion to say more; nor would it, he (Mr. BENTON) considered, be treating the President of the United States with proper respect to enter upon a premature discussion. He (Mr. BENTON) could not, however, in justice to himself, allow this resolution to pass without stating his objections to two such obnoxious features of the proposed fiscal policy, looking, as he did, upon the whole thing as one calculated to destroy the whole structure of the Government, to change it from the hard-money it was intended to be, to the paper-money Government it was intended not to be, and to mix it up with trade, which no one ever dreamed of. He (Mr. BENTON) had on another occasion stated that this Administration would go back not only to the Federal times of '98, but to the times of Sir Robert Walpole and Queen Anne, and the evidence is now before us.

He (Mr. BENTON) had only said a few words on this occasion, because he could not let the proposition to sanction bills of credit go without taking the very earliest opportunity of expressing his disapprobation, and denouncing a system calculated to produce the same results which had raised the unfunded debt of Great Britain from twenty-one millions to nine hundred millions of pounds. He should avail himself of the first appropriate opportunity to maintain the ground he had assumed as to the identity of this policy with that of Walpole, by argument and references, that this plan of the President's was utterly unconstitutional and dangerous—part borrowed from the system of English Exchequer issues, and part from Mr. Biddle's scheme of making the Federal Government an exchange dealer—though Mr. Biddle made the Government act indirectly through a board of bank directors, and this makes it act directly through a Board of Treasury Directors and their agents.

2d Sess.]

Board of Exchequer.

[JANUARY, 1842.]

This is the first time that a formal proposition has been made to change our hard-money Government (as it was intended to be) into a paper-money machine; and it is the first time that there has been a proposal to mix it up with trade and commerce, by making it a furnisher of exchanges, a bank of deposit, a furnisher of paper currency, and an imitator of the old confederation in its continental bills and a copyist of the English Exchequer system. Being the first time these unconstitutional and pernicious schemes were formally presented to Congress, he felt it to be his duty to disclose his opposition to them at once. He would soon speak more fully.

The question was then taken on the motion to print an extra number of copies of the Message and documents, and agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 29.

French Spoiliations.

Mr. CUSHING, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, made a report upon the petition for indemnity for spoiliations prior to 1800, accompanied by a bill to provide for the satisfaction of claims due to certain American citizens for spoiliations committed on their commerce prior to the 31st day of July, 1801; which bill was read the first and second time, and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

Bankrupt Law.

Mr. HOPKINS asked leave to introduce a bill, of which he had, he said, heretofore given notice, to wit, a bill to repeal the law of the last session providing for the establishment of a Uniform System of Bankruptcy.

The SPEAKER said the motion was not now in order; and the bill could only be introduced at this time by general consent.

Mr. CLARK rose and objected.

So the bill was not introduced.

The Public Treasury.

Mr. FILLMORE rose, and inquired of the Speaker whether the committees had been called through?

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. FILLMORE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to ask the unanimous consent of the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the bill amendatory of the Loan bill.

In relation to the necessity of this step, I beg leave to state that I have information from the Secretary of the Treasury, communicated this morning, that there is, at the present moment, a deficiency in the Treasury to the amount of two hundred and sixty thousand dollars. That sum must be immediately provided, or our Government must be disgraced.

It is under this strong pressure of necessity that I appeal to the House to grant permission now to take up and consider the bill.

Mr. EASTMAN objected, and claimed his right to the floor on the unfinished business of yesterday.

The Board of Exchequer.

Mr. STANLY desired, he said, to inquire of the chairman of the Select Committee on the Currency, when a report from that committee might be expected. The nation felt a deep interest in the matter, and so did the House.

Mr. CUSHING. I cannot give the gentleman a definite answer; but the House would facilitate the action of the committee by reference of the President's Message, which has not yet been done. [Laughter.]

Mr. STANLY said that the committee had the "plan" referred to them, and on that a report was expected.

Here the conversation ended.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 8, 1842.

The Vice Presidency.

Mr. PRESTON submitted a resolution, which was adopted, instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire whether any further legislation be necessary, in case of the removal, death, or resignation of the Vice President of the United States, or of the President of the Senate, and to report by bill or otherwise.

THURSDAY, January 18.

Board of Exchequer.

Mr. BENTON being entitled to the floor, discussed the plan at length, as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I have said on several occasions since the present Administration was formed, that we had gone back, not merely to the Federal times of General Hamilton, but far beyond them—to the Whig times of Sir Robert Walpole, and the Tory times of Queen Anne. When I have said this I did not mean it for sarcasm, or for insult, or to annoy the feelings of those who had just gotten into power. My aim was far higher and nobler—that of showing the retrograde movement which our Government was making, and waking up the country to a sense of its dangers before it was too late; and to the conviction of the necessity of arresting that movement, and recovering the ground which we have lost. History is said to be philosophy teaching by example; and I wish to have the benefit of the instructive voice of this great teacher in the lamentable circumstances in which we are now placed.

The Administration of Sir Robert Walpole was the fountain-head of British woes. All the measures which have led to the present condition of the British empire, and have given it more debt and taxes, more paupers, and more human misery than ever before was collected under the sway of one sceptre: all these date from the reigns of the first and second George; when this minister, for twenty-five years, was the ruler of Parliament by means of the moneyed interest, and the ruler of kings by beating the Tories at their own game of non-resistance and passive obedience to the royal will. The Tories ruled under Queen Anne: they went for church and state, and rested for support on the landed interest. The Whigs came into power with the accession of George the First: they went for bank and state; and rested for support on the moneyed interest. Sir Robert Walpole was the head of the Whig party; and immediately became the favorite of that monarch, and afterwards of his successor; and, availing himself during that long period of power of all the resources of genius, unimpeded by the obstacle of principles, he succeeded in impressing his own image upon the age in which he lived, and giving to the Government policy the direction which it has followed ever since. Morals, politics, public and private pursuits, all received the impress of the Minister's genius; and what that genius produced I will now proceed to show: I read from Smollett's continuation of Hume:

[Here Mr. B. read from Smollett's continuation of Hume.]

Such was the picture of Great Britain in the time of Sir Robert Walpole; and such was the natural fruit of a stockjobbing Government, composed of Bank and State, resting for support on heartless corporations, and lending the wealth and credit of the country to the interested schemes of projectors and adventurers. Such was the picture of Great Britain during this period; and who would not mistake it (leaving out names and dates) for a description of our own times, in our own America, during the existence of the Bank of the United States, and the thousand affiliated institutions which grew up under its protection during its long reign of power and corruption? But, to proceed with English history:

Among the corporations brought into existence by Sir Robert Walpole, or moulded by him in the form which they have since worn, were the South Sea Company, the East India Company, the Bank of England, the Royal Insurance Company, the London Insurance Company, the Obaritable Corporation, and a multitude of others, besides the exchequer and funding systems, which were the machines for smuggling debts and taxes upon the people and saddling them on posterity. All these schemes were brought forward under the pretext of paying the debts of the nation, relieving the distresses of the people, assisting the poor, encouraging agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, and saving the nation from the burthen of loans and taxes. Such were the pretexts for all the schemes. They were generally conceived by low and crafty adventurers, adopted by the minister, carried through Parliament by bribery and corruption, flourished their day, and ended in ruin and disgrace.

Corporation credit was ruined in Great Britain, by the explosion of banks and companies—by the bursting of bubbles—by the detection of their crimes—and by the crowning catastrophe of the South Sea scheme: it is equally ruined with us, and by the same means, and by the crowning villany of the Bank of the United States. Bank and State can no longer go together in our America: the Government can no longer repose upon corporations. This is the case with us in 1841; and it was the case with Great Britain in 1720. The South Sea explosion dissolved (for a long time) the connection there: the explosion of the Bank of the United States has dissolved it here. New schemes become indispensable; and in both countries the same alternative is adopted. Having exhausted corporation credit in England, the Walpole Whigs had recourse to Government credit, and established a Board of Exchequer, to strike Government paper. In like manner, the Webster Whigs, having exhausted corporation credit with us, have recourse to Government credit to supply its place; and send us a plan for a Federal Exchequer, copied with such fidelity of imitation from the British original, that the description of one seems to be the description of the other. Of course I speak of the Exchequer feature of the plan alone. For as to all the rest of our Cabinet scheme—its banking and brokerage conceptions—its exchange and deposit operations—its three dollar issues in paper for one dollar specie in hand—its miserable one-half of one per centum on its Change-Alley transactions—its Cheapside underbiddings of rival bankers and brokers:—as to all these follies, (for they do not amount to the dignity of errors,) they are not copied from any part of the British Exchequer system, or any other system that I ever heard of, but are the uncontested and unrivalled production of our own American genius.

I repeat it: our Administration stands to-day where the British Government stood one hundred and twenty years ago. Corporation credit exhausted, public credit is resorted to; and the machinery of an exchequer of issues becomes the instrument of cheating and plundering the people in both countries. The British invent: we copy: and the copy proves the scholar to be worthy of the master. Here is the British act. Let us read some parts of it: and recognize in its design, its structure, its object, its provisions, and its machinery, the true original of this plan, (the exchequer part,) which the united wisdom of our Administration has sent down to us for our acceptance and ratification. I read, not from the separate and detached acts of the first and second George, but from the revised and perfected system as corrected and perpetuated in the reign of George the Third.

2d Sess.]

Board of Exchequer.

[JANUARY, 1842.]

[Here Mr. B. read several extracts.]

Here, resumed Mr. B., is the original of our exchequer scheme! here is the original of which our united Administration has unanimously sent down a faithful copy. In all that relates to the exchequer—its design—operation—and mode of action—they are one and the same thing! identically the same. The design of both is to substitute Government credit for corporation credit—to strike paper money for the use of the Government—to make this paper a currency as well as a means of raising loans—to cover up and hide national debt—to avoid present taxes in order to increase them an hundred fold in future—to throw the burthens of the present day upon a future day; and to load posterity with our debts in addition to their own. The design of both is the same, and the structure of both is the same. The English board consists of the Lord Treasurer for the time being, and three commissioners to be appointed by the king; our board is to consist of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Treasurer for the time being, and three commissioners to be appointed by the President and Senate. The English board is to superintend and direct the form and mode of preparing and issuing the exchequer bills; our board is to do the same by our Treasury notes. The English bills are to be receivable in all payments to the public; our Treasury notes are to be received in like manner in all Federal payments. The English board appoints paymasters, clerks, and officers to assist them in the work of the exchequer; ours is to appoint agents in the States, with officers and clerks to assist them in the same work. The English paymasters are to give bonds, and to be subject to inspection; our agents are to do and submit to the same. The English exchequer bills are to serve for a currency; and for that purpose the board may contract with persons, bodies politic and corporate, to take and circulate them; our board is to do the same thing through its agencies in the States and Territories. The English exchequer bills are to be exchanged for ready money; ours are to be exchanged in the same manner. In short, the plans are the same, one copied from the other, identical in design, in structure, and in mode of operation; and wherein they differ, (as they do in some details,) the advantage is on the side of the British. For example: 1. The British pay interest on their bills, and raise the interest when necessary to sustain them in the market. Ours are to pay no interest, and will depreciate from the day they issue. 2. The British cancel and destroy their bills when once paid: we are to reissue ours, like common bank notes, until worn out with use. 3. The British make no small bills; none less than £100 sterling, ($500:) we begin with five dollars, like the old Continentals; and, like them, will soon be down to one dollar, and to a shilling. 4. The British Board could issue no bill except as specially authorized from time to time by act of Parliament: ours is to keep out a perpetual issue of fifteen millions; thus creating a perpetual debt to that amount. 5. The British Board was to have no deposit of Government stock: ours are to have a deposit of five millions, to be converted into money when needed, and to constitute another permanent debt to that amount. 6. The British gave a true title to their Exchequer act: we give a false one to ours. They entitled theirs, "An act for regulating the issuing and paying off of Exchequer bills:" we entitle ours, "A bill amendatory of the several acts establishing the Treasury Department." In these and a few other particulars the two Exchequers differ; but in all the essential features—design—structure—operation—they are the same.

Having shown that our proposed Exchequer was a copy of the British system, and that we are having recourse to it under the same circumstances: that in both countries it is a transit from corporation credit deceased, to Government credit, which is to bear the brunt of new follies and new extravagances: having shown this, I next propose to show the manner in which this Exchequer system has worked in England, that, from its workings there, we may judge of its workings here. This is readily done. Some dates and figures will accomplish the task, and enlighten our understandings on a point so important. I say some dates and figures will do it. Thus: at the commencement of this system in England the annual taxes were 5 millions sterling: they are now 50 millions. The public debt was then 40 millions: it is now 900 millions, the unfunded items included. The interest and management of the debt were then 1½ millions: they are now 80 millions.

Here Mr. B. exhibited a book—the index to the British Statutes at large—containing a reference to all the issues of Exchequer bills from the last year of the reign of George the First, (1727,) to the fourth year of the reign of her present Majesty, (1840.) He showed the amounts issued under each reign, and the parallel growth of the national debt, until these issues exceeded a thousand millions, and the debt, after all payments made upon it, is still near one thousand millions. Mr. B. here pointed out the annual issues under each reign, and then the totals for each reign, showing that the issues were small and far between in the beginning—large and close together in the conclusion—and that it was now going on faster than ever.

The following was the table of the issues under each reign:

Geo. 1, in 1727, (one year,) - - -	£370,000
Geo. 2, from 1727 to 1760, (33 years,) - - -	11,500,000
Geo. 3, from 1760 to 1820, (60 years,) - - -	542,500,000
Geo. 4, from 1820 to 1831, (11 years,) - - -	320,000,000
Will. 4, from 1831 to 1837, (6 years,) - - -	160,000,000
Victoria 1, from 1837 to 1840, (4 years,) - - -	160,000,000

£1,140,370,000

Near twelve hundred millions of pounds sterling in less than a century and a quarter—we may say three-quarters of a century, for the great mass of the issues have taken place since the beginning of the reign of George the Third. The first issue was the third of a million; under George the Second, the average annual issue was the third of a million; under George the Third, the annual average was nine millions; under George the Fourth, it was thirty millions; under William the Fourth, twenty-three millions; and under Victoria, it is twenty-one millions. Such is the progress of the system—such the danger of commencing the issue of paper money to supply the wants of a Government.

This, continued Mr. B., is the fruit of the exchequer issues in England, and it shows both the rapid growth and dangerous perversion of such issues. The first bills of this kind ever issued in that country were under William the Third, commonly called the Prince of Orange, in the year 1696. They were issued to supply the place temporarily of the coin, which was all called in to be recoined under the superintendence of Sir Isaac Newton. The first bills were put out by king William only for this temporary purpose, and were issued as low as ten pounds and five pounds sterling. It was not until more than thirty years afterwards, and when corporation credit had failed, that Sir Robert Walpole revived the idea of these bills, and perverted them into a currency, and into instruments for raising money for the service of the Government. His practice was to issue these bills to supply present wants, instead of laying taxes or making a fair and open loan. When due, a new issue took up the old issue; and when the quantity would become great, the whole were funded: that is to say, saddled upon posterity. The fruit of the system is seen in the 900,000,000 of debt which Great Britain still owes, after all the payments made upon it. The amount is enormous, overwhelming, appalling; such as never could have been created under any system of taxes or loans. In the nature of things, Government expenditure has its limits when it has to proceed upon taxation or borrowing. Taxes have their limits in the capacity of the people to pay: loans have their limit in the capacity of men to lend; and both have their restraints in the responsibility and publicity of the operation. Taxes cannot be laid without exciting the inquiry of the people. Loans cannot be made without their demanding wherefore. Money, i. e. gold and silver, cannot be obtained, but in limited and reasonable amounts, and all these restraints impose limits upon the amount of Government expenditure and Government debt. Not so with the noiseless, insidious, boundless progress of debt and expenditure upon the issue of Government paper! The silent working of the press is unheard by the people. Whether it is one million or twenty millions that is struck, is all one to them. When the time comes for payment, the silent operation of the funding system succeeds to the silent operation of the printing press; and thus extravagant expenditures go on—a mountain of debt grows up—devouring interest accrues—and the whole is thrown upon posterity, to crush succeeding ages, after demoralizing the age which contracted it.

The British debt is the fruit of the exchequer system in Great Britain, the same that we are now urged to adopt, and under the same circumstances; and frightful as is its amount, that is only one branch—one part of the fruit—of the iniquitous and nefarious system. Other parts remain to be stated, and the first that I name is, that a large part of this enormous debt is wholly false and fictitious! McCulloch states two-fifths to be fictitious; other writers say more; but his authority is the highest, and I prefer to go by it. In his commercial dictionary, now on my table, under the word "funds," he shows the means by which a stock of £100 would be granted when only £80 or £70 were paid for it; and goes on to say:

"In consequence of this practice, the principal of the debt now existing amounts to nearly two-fifths more than the amount actually advanced by the tender."

So that the English people are bound for two-fifths more of capital, and pay two-fifths more of annual interest, on account of their debt, than they ever received. Two-fifths of 900,000,000 is 360,000,000; and two-fifths of 80,000,000 is 12,000,000; so that here is fictitious debt to the amount of $1,600,000,000 of our money, drawing $60,000,000 of interest, for which the people of England never received a cent; and into which they were juggled and cheated by the frauds and villainies of the exchequer and funding systems! those systems which we are now unanimously invited by our Administration to adopt. The next fruit of this system is that of the kind of money, as it was called, which was considered lent, and which goes to make up the three-fifths of the debt admitted to have been received; about the one-half of it was received in depreciated paper during the long bank suspension which took place from 1797 to 1823, and during which time the depreciation sunk as low as 30 per centum. Here, then, is another deduction of near one-third to be taken off the one-half of the three-fifths which is counted as having been advanced by the lenders. Finally, another bitter drop is found in this cup of indebtedness, that the lenders were mostly jobbers and gamblers in stocks, without a shilling of their own to go upon, and who by the tricks of the system became the creditors of the Government for millions. These gentry would puff the stocks which they had received—sell them at some advance—and then lend the Government a part of its own money. These are the lenders—these the receivers of thirty millions sterling of taxes—these the scrip nobility who cast the hereditary nobles into the shade, and who hold tributary to themselves all the property and all the productive industry of the British empire. And this is the state of things which our Administration now proposes for our imitation.

2d Sess.]

Board of Exchequer.

[JANUARY, 1842.]

This is the way the exchequer and funding system have worked in England; and let no one say they will not work in the same manner in our own country. The system is the same in all countries, and will work alike everywhere. Go into it, and we shall have every fruit of the system which the English people now have; and of this most of our young States, and of our cities, and corporations, which have gone into the borrowing business, upon their bonds, are now living examples. Their bonds were their exchequer bills. They used them profusely, extravagantly, madly, as all paper credit is used. Their bonds were sold under par, though the discount was usually hid by a trick: pay was often received in depreciated paper. Sharpers frequently made the purchase who had nothing to pay but a part of the proceeds of the same bonds when sold. And thus the States and cities are bound for debts which are in a great degree fictitious, and are bound to lenders who had nothing to lend; and such are the frauds of the system which is presented to us, and must be our fate, if we go into the exchequer system.

I have shown the effect of an Exchequer of issues in Great Britain to strike paper money for a currency, and as a substitute for loans and taxes. I have shown that this system, adopted by Sir Robert Walpole upon the failure of corporation credit, has been the means of smuggling a mountain load of debt upon the British people, two-fifths of which is fraudulent and fictitious: that it has made the great body of the people tributaries to a handful of fundholders, most of whom, without owning a shilling, were enabled by the frauds of the paper system and the funding system, to lend millions to the Government. I have shown that this system, thus ruinous in England, was the resort of a crafty minister to substitute Government credit for the exhausted credit of the moneyed corporations, and the exploded bubbles; and I have shown that the Exchequer plan now presented to us by our Administration, is a faithful copy of the English original. I have shown all this; and now the question is, shall we adopt this copy? This is the question; and the consideration of it implies the humiliating conclusion, that we have forgot that we have a constitution, and we have gone back to the worst era of English history—to times of the South Sea bubble, to take lessons in the science of political economy. Sir, we have a constitution! and if there was any thing better established than another, at the time of its adoption, it was that the new Government was a hard-money Government, made by hard-money men, who had seen and felt the evils of Government paper, and who intended forever to cut off the new Government from the use of that dangerous expedient. The question was made in the Convention (for there was a small paper money party in that body) and solemnly decided that the Government should not emit paper money, bills of credit, or paper currency of any kind. It appears from the history of the Convention, that the first draft of the constitution contained a paper clause, and that it stood in connection with the power to raise money, thus: "To borrow money, and emit bills, on the credit of the United States." When this clause came up for consideration, Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved to strike out the words, "and emit bills;" and was seconded by Mr. Pierce Butler. "Mr. Madison thought it sufficient to prevent them from being made a tender." "Mr. Ellsworth thought this a favorable moment to shut and bar the door against paper money. The mischiefs of the various experiments which had been made were now fresh in the public mind, and had excited the disgust of all the respectable part of America. By withholding the power from the new Government, more friends of influence would be gained to it than by almost any thing else. Paper money can in no case be necessary. Give the Government credit, and other resources will offer. The power may do harm, never good." Mr. Wilson said: "It will have a most salutary influence on the credit of the United States to remove the possibility of paper money. This expedient can never succeed while its mischiefs are remembered; and as long as it can be resorted to, it will be a bar to other resources." "Mr. Butler remarked that paper was a legal tender in no country in Europe. He was urgent for disarming the Government of such a power." "Mr. Read thought the words, if not struck out, would be as alarming as the mark of the beast in Revelations." "Mr. Langton had rather reject the whole plan than retain the three words, 'and emit bills.'" A few members spoke in favor of retaining the clause; but on taking the vote, the sense of the convention was almost unanimously against it. Nine States voted for striking out: two for retaining. They were: New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, for striking out. The two States of Maryland and New Jersey alone voted for the retention of the clause. This is the history of the case from Mr. Madison's report; and to this he has added this note:

"The vote in the affirmative by Virginia was occasioned by the acquiescence of Mr. Madison, who became satisfied that striking out the words would not disable the Government from the use of public notes, as far as they could be safe and proper; and would only cut off the pretext for a paper currency, and particularly for making the bills a tender, either for public or private debts."

The Senator from Virginia (Mr. Rives) referred to this note some days ago, as if it qualified, or explained away the decision of the convention; but no such thing. The vote of the convention was nearly unanimous without Mr.

JANUARY, 1842.]

Board of Exchequer.

[27th Conv.]

Madison. His joining the majority did not alter the decision; there were enough hard-money men without him; and his note to the debate shows that he was opposed to a paper-money currency. The note shows that he considered the rejection of the clause had cut off the pretext for a paper currency; and I therefore claim the benefit of his authority in behalf of the constitution, and against this plan of exchequer issues which the Administration has sent down to us.

If there were a thousand constitutional provisions in favor of paper money, I should still be against it—against the thing itself, per se and propter se—on account of its own inherent baseness and vice. But the constitution is against it—clearly so upon its face; upon its history; upon its early practice; upon its uniform interpretation. The universal expression at the time of its adoption was, that the new Government was a hard-money Government, made by hard-money men, and that it was to save the country from the curse of paper money. This was the universal language—this the universal sentiment; and this hard-money character of the new Government was one of the great recommendations in its favor, and one of the chief inducements to its adoption. All the early action of the Government conformed to this idea—all its early legislation was as true to hard-money as the needle is to the pole. The very first act of Congress for the collection of duties on imports, passed in the first year of the new Government's existence, and enacted by the very men who had framed the constitution—this first act required those duties to be paid "in gold and silver coin only;" the word only, which is a contraction for the old English onely, being added to cut off the possibility of an intrusion, or an injection of a particle of paper money into the Treasury of the United States. The first act for the sale of public lands required them to be paid for in "specie"—the specie circular of 1836 was only the enforcement of that act; and the hard-money clause in the Independent Treasury was a revival of these two original and fundamental revenue laws. Such were the early legislative interpretations of the constitution by the men who made it.

The facility with which any industrious country can supply itself with a hard-money currency—can lift itself out of the mud and mire of depreciated paper, and mount the high and clean road of gold and silver: the ease with which any industrious people can do this, has been sufficiently proved in our own country, and in many others. We saw it in the ease with which the Jackson policy gained us eighty millions of dollars in seven years. We saw it at the close of the Revolution, when the paper money sunk to nothing, ceased to circulate, and specie reappeared as by magic. I have asked the venerable Mr. MACON how long it was after paper stopped, before specie reappeared at that period of our history? his answer was: No time at all. As soon as one stopped, the other came. We have seen it in England at the end of the long bank suspension, which terminated in 1823. Parliament allowed the Bank four years to prepare for resumption: at the end of two years—half the time—she reported herself ready—having in that short space accumulated a mass of twenty millions sterling (one hundred millions of dollars) in gold; and, above all, we have seen it in France, where the Great Emperor restored the currency in the short space of six years, from the lowest degree of debasement to the highest point of brilliancy. On becoming First Consul in 1800, he found nothing but depreciated assignats in the country—in six years his immortal campaigns—Austerlitz, Jena, Friedland—all the expenses of his imperial court, surpassing in splendor that of the Romans, and rivaling the almost fabulous magnificence of the Caliphs of Bagdad—all his internal improvements—all his docks, forts, and ships—all the commerce of his forty millions of subjects—all these were carried on by gold and silver alone; and from having the basest currency in the world, France, in six years, had near the best, and still retains it. These instances show how easy it is for any country that pleases to supply itself with an ample currency of gold and silver—how easy it will be for us to complete our supplies—that in six or seven years we could saturate the land with specie! and yet we have a formal Cabinet proposition to set up a manufactory of paper money!

The Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. WALKER,) who sits on my right, has just visited the island of Cuba, and has told us what he has seen there—a pure metallic currency of gold—twelve millions of dollars of it to a population of one million souls, half slaves—not a particle of paper money—prices of labor and property higher than in the United States—industry active—commerce flourishing: a foreign trade of twenty-four millions of dollars, which, compared to population and territory, is so much greater than ours, that it would require ours to be four hundred and twenty-five millions to be equal to it! This is what the Senator from Mississippi tells us that he has seen; and would to God that we had all seen it. Would to God that the whole American Congress had seen it. Devoutly do I wish that it was the custom now, as in ancient times, for legislators to examine the institutions of other countries before they altered those of their own country. The Solons and Lycurguses of antiquity would visit Egypt, and Crete, and other renowned places in the East, before they would touch the laws of Sparta or Athens; in like manner I should rejoice to see our legislators visit the hard-money countries—Holland, France, Cuba—before they went further with paper-money schemes in our own country. The Cabinet, I think, should be actually put upon such a voyage. After what they have done, I think they should be shipped on a visit to the lands of hard money. And although it might seem strange, under our form of Government, thus to travel our President and Cabinet, yet I must be permitted to say that I can find constitutional authority for doing so, just as soon as they can find constitutional authority for sending such a scheme of finance and currency as they have spread before us.

2d SEM.]

Board of Exchequer.

[JANUARY, 1842.]

Holland and Ouba have the best currencies in the world: it is gold and the commercial bill of exchange, with small silver for change, and not a particle of bank paper. France has the next best: It is gold, with the commercial bill of exchange, much silver, and not a bank note below 500 francs, (say $100.) And here let me do justice to the wisdom and firmness of the present King of the French. The Bank of France lately resolved to reduce the minimum size of its notes to 200 francs, (say $40.) The king gave them notice that if they did it, the Government would consider it an injury to the currency, and would take steps to correct the movement. The Bank rescinded its resolution; and Louis Philippe, in that single act, (to say nothing of others,) showed himself to be a patriot King, worthy of every good man's praise, and of every legislator's imitation. The United States have the basest currency in the world: It is paper, down to cents; and that paper supplied by irresponsible corporations, which exercise the privilege of paying, or not, just as it suits their interest or politics. We have the basest currency upon the face of the earth; but it will not remain so. Reform is at hand; probably from the mild operation of law; if not, certainly from the strong arm of ruin. God has prescribed morality, law, order, government, for the conduct of human affairs; and he will not permit these to be too long outraged and trampled under foot. The day of vindicating the outraged law and order of our country, is at hand; and its dawn is now visible. The excess of bank enormity will cure itself under the decrees of Providence; and the cure will be more complete and perfect than any that could come from the hands of man.

It may seem paradoxical, but it is true, that there is no abundant currency, low interest, and facility of loans, except in hard-money countries: paper makes scarcity, high interest, usury, extortion, and difficulty of borrowing. Ignorance supposes that to make money plenty, you must have paper: this is pure nonsense. Paper drives away all specie, and then dies itself for want of specie; and leaves the country penniless until it can recruit.

This, sir, is my answer to the demand for a national currency, meaning a currency of paper money issued under the authority of a law enacted, or of a charter granted by Congress. I am against such a currency, but am ready to recommence all the hard-money measures for the restoration of the currency of the constitution, and to stop the curse of depreciated notes and shinplasters from local banks and individuals, by applying a bankrupt law to bankrupt banks, and placing a tax upon every bank note, which the small and weak will not be able to carry.

How capricious, Mr. President, are the ways of fortune! how differently she treats different men, and even the same thing coming from different men! Of this we have a signal instance in the case now before us. We, the American Senate, are now gravely employed in the consideration of a plan to establish a Federal Exchequer, sent down to us by the Administration, when the same plan, submitted to us a few years ago by a respectable citizen of the South, received not the slightest attention; and was suffered to sink down lifeless from the hands of the author. What thus fell dead from the hands of a respectable citizen in the South, is now picked up by half a dozen gentlemen at the west end of Pennsylvania avenue, adopted for their own, and sent down to us for the most grave and weighty consideration of the two Houses of Congress. Coming from their hands, we respectfully entertain what, before, we disdained: and so uncertain is fame—so capricious is fortune—that many Senators now present, will hear, for the first time, that this plan on which we are called to deliberate, as a fresh conception of our Cabinet, is actually an old copyright invention of a Southern citizen! Strange as this may be, it is no less true than strange; and, as the maxim—suum cuique—let every one have his own—is as fair in its application to the mental productions as it is to the fruit of any other industry, so I proceed to vindicate the title of the true author of this plan of a Federal Exchequer, by showing the original plan itself. Here it is, said Mr. B., holding up a printed pamphlet in his hand; here it is! and I will read some extracts from it, to show the identity of the two propositions. And, first, the title-page. "All the world is a title-page." So says William Shakspeare, as the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) reminded us the other day; the said William Shakspeare meaning thereby that every thing in the world is falsely labelled. Without going into the question of the general truth of that inuendo, I must be permitted to say of the pamphlet from which I propose to read, that it is most truly entitled—its title a true label; and that, in this particular, as well as in others, it possesses a marked advantage over the cabinet edition of the same work. The title is this:

"A plan for the establishment, by act of Congress, not a coining mint, for there is one already, but a General Print Mint at Washington city, for the emission of paper money to the amount, perhaps, of two hundred millions of dollars; to be founded on a rock, and upon a credit of ten years, at six per centum, which will be productive of a rise of property immediately of 10, 15, perhaps 20 per centum; and perhaps more. By John H. Sargent, Esq., Attorney and Counsellor at Law. Charleston: Printed

JANUARY, 1842.]

Bankrupt Bill.

[27th CONG.]

by Edward C. Council, No. 1, Green street, anno Domini, 1837." "Entered in the office of the Clerk of the District of South Carolina, and copyright secured according to law."

This is the title: and I admit, Mr. President, that it differs from the title which our Cabinet production bears; but I must be permitted to say that it is only the difference between a false and a true label upon the same box of sundries. Mr. Sargent entitles his plan "A General Print Mint" to strike two hundred millions of paper money for a national currency; and in so doing he truly entitles it, and gives us a clear perception of its design. Our Cabinet, on the contrary, entitle theirs "A bill to amend the several acts establishing the Treasury Department," which is a mystification and bamboozlement, there being no such acts to which it can apply as an amendment, nor any thing in the title which can give the least idea of the design of the plan. In this the titles differ—one enlightens us, and the other mystifies and bamboozles us—and in this difference we see the difference between the confidence of the two parties in the merits of what they propose; one exhibiting his wares fairly, and calling every thing by its true name, and showing his confidence in success by fair means—the other concealing theirs under a fictitious appellation, and showing their belief that it can only be passed by being smuggled through under the disguise of a false character.

[Mr. B. then continued the comparison of the two plans, and closed thus:]

It was a noble answer which the old French merchants gave to the great minister, Colbert, when he proposed to ameliorate their trade by some Government regulation. Colbert was no projector, but the wise and virtuous minister of a great King. The old merchants knew the respect which was due to his well-meant offer; but they knew also that all success in their business depended upon themselves; and gave that memorable answer which history preserves for the instruction of generations. Laissez nous faire!—(Let us alone)—was their wise reply! This was their reply: and would to God that our Government could learn it, and practise upon it, and confine itself to its own business and its own duties. The care of our foreign relations, and the concerns of the Union—peace at home and abroad, foreign and domestic trade, and light taxation, comprise the sum of Federal duties. This Federal Government was not created to act upon individuals—not created to manage private concerns—not created to guide the hand of private industry; and just so long as it has been engaged in that business, every thing has been going from bad to worse. Let it cease this vain intermeddling with what does not belong to it: let it give us honorable peace with foreign nations—subdue the revolt of the moneyed corporations—reduce the insurgent banks to subordination to law and to government—give us fair trade—hard money—economy in the Administration—domestic security of person and territory: let it do this, and our people will do the rest, and will be the richest and happiest of the world.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 15.

Bankrupt Bill.

Mr. BARNARD said: I desire to state to the House very distinctly, that I consider the Committee on the Judiciary, and myself as a member of that committee, as having been instructed several days ago, (since Friday last Mr. B. was understood to say,) under the peremptory order of this House, to bring in a bill repealing the bankrupt law instantly. I have held myself ready to make that report at any instant that the House has been in session since that time. My opinion certainly is, that the instructions just passed by the House add nothing to the force of the previous instructions. I hold myself ready to report that bill at any moment when the House will hear it, and I will now report it if the House will hear it.

Mr. HOWARD, of Michigan, rose and objected, insisting that the call of the States for petitions should be proceeded with.

Mr. SAUNDERS here rose and said, that he understood the gentleman from New York to say that he felt himself bound by the former decision of the House to make a report; that he proposed to do so forthwith, and that he now asked leave—

[Cries "Not at all; not at all; he does not ask leave."]

Mr. SAUNDERS proceeded to say since that time I have been directed to make a report in obedience to the order passed this day, and I now send the report to the table in obedience to that order.

Mr. S. here sent a report to the Clerk's table by the hands of a messenger boy.

[Very great disorder and confusion, lasting for some time, and rendering any attempt to hear what was said almost impossible.]

The first thing the Reporter heard after this, was a declaration by the SPEAKER that there was only one way of bringing this confusion to an end. The Chair would take the responsibility of doing it; and that was by calling upon the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to make a report.

Mr. BARNARD said he had never yielded the floor, and that he was ready to make a report when in order.

The SPEAKER said this was a new case, and not without difficulty. Let the Chair decide either way, an appeal would be taken from the decision, and the House would settle the matter as it pleased, in despite of any existing rules of the House. If the Chair decided that the report should not be made, an appeal would be taken from the decision, and a majority could overrule it. So it would be if the Speaker decided the other way. It was not very material, therefore, which way the Chair decided. And, under all the circumstances of the case, inasmuch as the House had now again peremptorily ordered the committee to report a bill in compliance with the former order, (under which the Chair then thought the report could not be received, and which opinion the House sustained,) and inasmuch as the matter now assumed another form, and the language of the order was that the report should be made instantly, the Chair thought it his duty to call on the committee to make a report.

2d Sess.]

Bankrupt Bill.

[JANUARY, 1842.]

Mr. CUSHING. I appeal from the decision.

The SPEAKER. I expected it.

[Much confusion in the Hall, and cries to "order."]

Mr. FILLMORE. I have once witnessed a scene in this House of even more violence than that which has taken place this day. I recollect when an effort was made—

[The voice of Mr. FILLMORE was here lost amid the tumultuous cries of "order."]

Mr. FILLMORE. I recollect when—

Mr. WISE. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. SPRIGG. I call you to order, sir.

Mr. WISE read the 112th rule, which is as follows:

"All questions relating to the priority of business to be acted on shall be decided without debate."

Mr. FILLMORE. I am speaking on an appeal; not on a point of priority.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the appeal; and debate upon that appeal is in order unless the previous question is moved.

Mr. FILLMORE proceeded. I say I have witnessed once a scene of violence here when perhaps the House was as much excited as it is now. I refer to the odious New Jersey case, when an effort was made on the part of the majority—

Mr. CHAPMAN rose and called Mr. FILLMORE to order.

The SPEAKER said that the gentleman from New York must confine himself strictly to the subject-matter of the appeal.

Mr. FILLMORE. Have I not a right to show that there is a precedent bearing on this very case?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. FILLMORE said he would then use milder language in relation to that precedent, if it was desired, although the country had long since pronounced its judgment upon it.

He desired to say in reference to that case, that it would be recollected by those who were members of this House, that a majority ordered a committee to report forthwith; that the committee, in obedience to that order, presented a report at the bar of the House, and asked leave to present it at the table. Objection was made; and, notwithstanding the strong party violence then pervading this hall, there was yet found independence and integrity enough here to sustain the rules of the House, and to prevent that report being made.

[Great sensation in the House.]

Mr. F. proceeded. The report was retained in the possession of the committee three, four, or five days, before the committee was called in its order to make a report; and, till they were so called, it could not be made. The last report which was made in that case, just before the adjournment, was also attempted to be made at various times. It was suggested at that time that it was a privileged question, having reference to the seats of members, although no effort was made to break down the rules; and although the Speaker decided that it was not, yet an appeal was taken, the decision overruled, and the report made, but made upon the ground that it was a privileged question, and not upon the ground that it was within the rules of the House to make it out of order.

Vol. XIV.—25

Was it necessary, he would ask, in a case like this that this extraordinary proceeding should be had, and that the rules of the House should be broken down to reach the object? He knew that the Bankrupt bill was doomed in this House. He regretted that it was necessary that resort should be had to the Opposition here, by those who made this movement, to accomplish it in such great haste. He regretted that the House should suffer its rules thus to be broken down and trampled upon when the object was within the rules; and he called upon the members on all sides of this House to come forward now and sustain its rules and its character. If this decision of the Chair was to be sustained, all that was wanting when there was a wish to break down the rules, would be to introduce a resolution, to pass it by a majority, to make it imperative to act forthwith; and thus the whole order of business would be changed. Was the House prepared for this? We had passed through more violent scenes without doing it, and he called upon the House to pause before doing it now.

Mr. WELLER demanded the previous question on the appeal.

Mr. BORDON moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PROFFIT asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 87, nays 107.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurring on the demand for the previous question,

The SPEAKER asked the indulgence of the House while he gave the reasons for his decision.

The SPEAKER said he was aware that this was a new question, notwithstanding the authority which had been introduced by the gentleman from New York. Indeed, it would be seen in a moment that that authority did not meet the case. The question was not free from difficulty; but the gentleman from New York must see that the two propositions were not analogous. In the present case a petition was presented, and an order—an undisputed order—had been passed, by which a majority of the House had given directions to the Committee on the Judiciary to report; and that report was tendered by the chairman of that committee.

[Cries of "Oh no; not at all; not at all."]

The SPEAKER continued. By one of the members of the committee then; it was unimportant which. Such was the condition of this case.

In the New Jersey case there was no tender; no announcement on the day of the order that the committee was ready to report. No call upon the committee was made: but, immediately upon the order being passed, a motion to adjourn was carried. In the present case, the Chair would have had infinitely more difficulty if a day, or an adjournment, had intervened. But now, as the case stood, the House in session, no business having intervened, with an imperative demand upon the House to carry out an undisputed order, the Chair could not decide otherwise than as it had done. The result of such a decision would be, to render nugatory the order which the House itself had given—to deprive it of the power to carry out its own instructions.

Mr. O. H. WILLIAMS moved that the appeal be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER stated the question to be on laying the appeal on the table.

Mr. FILLMORE asked the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. WINTHROP was understood to inquire if it would be competent to raise a new appeal, should this be laid on the table?

The SPEAKER replied no.

The question on laying the appeal on the table was then taken, and decided in the affirmative.

The bill was read as follows:

A Bill to repeal the act establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved the 19th day of August, 1841, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The bill having been read,

Mr. WINTHROP rose and objected to any question being taken upon it, and insisted on his point of order.

Mr. HOPKINS insisted that the question was (objection having been made), Shall this bill be rejected? And on that question he demanded the previous question.

The SPEAKER said there was a great deal of enthusiasm in this matter for the House, but none for the Chair; so rapidly did questions of a delicate character arise one on the other.

The SPEAKER here read the order, or instructions.

This order, the SPEAKER said, was limited in its terms, and could not be exceeded in its spirit. The order commanded the committee to report, but there it stopped. The report had been made, and the gentleman from Massachusetts now raised the question of order whether any thing further could be done with the bill at present, the order having been discharged. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. HOPKINS) had submitted that the next question was, "Shall the bill be rejected?" The Chair had no doubt about that. If the point of order had not intervened, or if the bill was now regularly up for action, that would certainly be the next question; but the question which now arose upon the point of order of the gentleman from Massachusetts was this: "Was it in order, consistently with the authority by which this bill was brought before the House, to press it further than the reading at this time?" In the judgment of the Speaker it was not.

Mr. WISE appealed from this decision.

Mr. J. C. CLARK inquired if the appeal was debatable?

The SPEAKER answered affirmatively.

Mr. WISE expressed his sentiments on the point of order, and moved the previous question on the appeal.

Mr. EVERETT, remarking that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WISE) had made an argument on the point of order, and then moved the previous question, was understood to ask Mr. W. to withdraw the demand.

The demand was not withdrawn.

Mr. EVERETT moved to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. WELLER asked the yeas and nays.

Mr. ANDREWS, of Kentucky, moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PROFFIT asked the yeas and nays.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, (addressing the Speaker:) If we adjourn now, will this appeal and bill be the first question on Monday morning?

The SPEAKER (after a moment's reflection) said: The Chair thinks that the appeal would be the first thing in order on Monday morning, coming up as unfinished business.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, if that is the case, we will adjourn.

The question on the motion to adjourn was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 105, nays 102.

So, at half-past 5 o'clock, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 19.

Death of the Hon. Davis Dimmock, Jr.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he rose for a purpose far different from that of participating in this debate. The House of Representatives had officially announced to the Senate the death of the Hon. DAVIS DIMMOCK, Jr., a member of that body from the State of Pennsylvania; and, although it might not have been the practice, he owed it to his own feelings, as well as to the respect which was so justly due to the character of the deceased, to ask that the Senate

2d Sess.]

Death of the Hon. Davis Dimmock, Jr.

[JANUARY, 1842.]

should adjourn, as a testimonial of respect for his memory.

The deceased, observed Mr. BUCHANAN, acted well his part in all the relations of life. He was an indulgent husband, a kind father, and a sincere friend. He was a man, the quiet influence of whose example tended to make the society by which he was surrounded, both wiser and better.

His judgment was excellent; and, under its dictates, his course through life was steady, honest, and consistent. He lived respected and beloved wherever he was known; and, so far as I have ever heard, he had not a personal enemy. He came to the extra session in the enjoyment of his accustomed health, and with the full confidence of his constituents, and here contracted the disease which has proved mortal. There is often but a step between the highest earthly honors to which ambition aspires, and the grave. He died at his residence, in Montrose, Pennsylvania; and I consider it fortunate that he died at home, surrounded by the endearments of the domestic circle, and was not called away to meet his God from the bustling and busy struggles of political life, in which we are all here involved. I now move that the Senate adjourn.

This motion being unanimously adopted,
The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 19.

Death of the Hon. Davis Dimmock, Jr.

Mr. BIDLACK rose and said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It has become my painful duty to announce to this House the mournful intelligence, just received, of the death of one of my colleagues and friends.

The Hon. DAVIS DIMMOCK, Jr., late a member of this House, departed this life on the 18th of the present month, at his residence in Montrose, in the county of Susquehanna.

Mr. DIMMOCK appeared for the first time, and took his seat in the councils of the nation, at the last extra session of Congress. From the retiring and unassuming nature of his habits, and the short space of time allotted him to mingle in these busy scenes, it is quite probable his acquaintance with the members was not very extensive. But what is of more consequence, and what is more to his honor and his credit, it may be said with strict verity, "those who knew him best, loved him most." His mild deportment and sterling worth endeared him to those who met him, as it had not failed to render him popular with those who sent him here. At the same time that he was open, frank, and manly in the declaration of his sentiments, and in his adherence to them, he was bland and forbearing in his conduct towards those who differed with him.

Mr. Speaker, with such a man I am proud to have had an acquaintance, and to be able to call him my friend. That acquaintance enables me to say, the amiable and unobtrusive character of his disposition, and the urbanity of his manners, were not more remarkable than the sound and discriminating nature of his energetic mind.

This acquaintance enables me also to add, that in all the different relations of life, he was governed by a noble sense of honor and moral obligation. Whether he was likewise influenced by still higher considerations, connected with an adherence to the Christian religion, I am unable to say. I do not know that he professed any mode of faith; but, if he did, it must have been a correct one; for "his can't be wrong whose life is in the right."

It is a most beautiful illustration of his character, that upon inquiry among those who associated with him most while here, it will be found the impression is very general, that he was not only an honorable and moral, but a pious man, although no declaration to that effect can be recollected to have escaped his lips. His "actions spoke louder than words." But, sir, I must not forget that I came to "bury," not to "praise" him." Permit me, however, to indulge in one further reflection. The deceased was, comparatively speaking, a young man. He took his seat among us at the extra session in all the buoyancy of hope, with the confidence of youth and a vigorous constitution. But disease soon fastened upon him, and withdrew him from his attendance here. He, however, recovered sufficiently to be enabled to return to the bosom of his family and his friends, where, after much suffering, he has at last returned to the "bosom of his mother earth." He is now no more! His place here, as well as his own fireside, is vacant! His children are fatherless! His wife is disconsolate! Nothing that we can say—nothing that we can do, will calm the troubled waters that overflow her spirits or soothe the anguish of her bosom.

Nevertheless, sir, we have a duty to perform—a duty, the observance of which I hope never to see neglected. For, however fleeting and transitory may be the honors paid to the memory of the dead, and however worthless and unavailing to the spirits of the departed, they have a deep and abiding influence upon the conduct of the living. I will not enlarge upon this topic. There may be those among us who are heedless of public opinion while we live; but there are none who would like to be forgotten, or remembered with disrespect, when we are dead.

This feeling should be cultivated. It is this laudable desire to be remembered with tokens of regard and esteem, that actuates to deeds of patriotism and usefulness. Those in public life should endeavor to deserve public demonstrations of regret, while the most humble individual may be cheered and encouraged to deeds of noble daring, or private virtues, by the hope that it may induce some fond heart to "Come at evening hour, to shed

The tear of memory o'er his narrow bed."

JANUARY, 1842.]

Treasury Note Bill.

[27TH CONG.]

With these views, and these feelings, I send to the Chair the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this House has learned with feelings of deep sensibility the intelligence of the decease of the Hon. DAVIS DIMMOCK, JR., late a member of this Congress, and as an evidence of the sympathy which the members entertain, and hereby tender to his surviving relatives and personal friends, they will wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, Also, as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, this House do now adjourn.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted; and

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 21.

Treasury Note Bill.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the Treasury Note bill. The question being, "Shall the bill be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading?"

Mr. BENTON rose, and offered the following additional sections to the bill, viz:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the last day of December, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, there shall be laid and collected throughout the United States, its Territories, and the District of Columbia, a tax on bank notes, and all other paper put in circulation as money, by corporations, individuals, or companies, as follows:

On each note or piece of paper so put into circulation, promising or ordering the payment of money, or other thing, or creating a liability on the part of the issuer for such payment, the sum of ten cents for the year eighteen hundred and forty-two; to be increased ten cents per annum, until the whole tax amounts to — cents on each note or piece of paper so put into circulation.

And be it further enacted, That every description of paper put into circulation by corporations, companies, or individuals, for the payment of money, or other thing, which shall be transferable by delivery and without the endorsement of each passer thereof, and without being subject to the laws which apply to inland bills of exchange, shall be held and deemed to be circulating paper within the meaning of this act, and shall be subject to the tax hereby imposed.

And be it further enacted, That every corporation, company, or individual, who shall issue notes or papers of the foregoing descriptions, shall be subject to the tax aforesaid, and within thirty days after the last day of September, in each and every year, shall make out and transmit to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the marshal of the district in which the said issue is made, a statement, verified by affidavit, showing the average quarterly number of notes or paper in circulation for the first three quarters of the year, and the estimated average number of such notes or paper for the remaining quarter; the average of which four quarters shall be held and taken to be the annual number of the notes or other circulating paper in circulation; the said statement to be made out according to a form to be obtained from the Secretary of the Treasury, through the marshal of the district; on failure to make which return, the said corporation, or individual, shall be liable to a double tax, and to a fine of fifty thousand dollars.

And be it further enacted, That immediately on receiving said returns, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the tax accruing thereon to be collected by the marshal, and duly accounted for and paid over by him.

And be it further enacted, That five per centum shall be allowed to each marshal, for his compensation in collecting and paying over said moneys.

And be it further enacted, That additional and separate security shall be required from each marshal for the faithful discharge of his duties under this act.

And be it further enacted, That all double taxes incurred under this act, for a default in not making the returns of the circulation, shall be computed by the marshal of the district and the Secretary of the Treasury, according to the reputed capital employed or circulation issued, by the delinquent party; and all fines under this act shall be recoverable by action of debt, and shall be divided between the informers and the law officers of the United States prosecuting the same.

Mr. BENTON supported his amendment in a brief speech. He urged a return to the good old practice—good with Governments as well as individuals—to provide for the payment of a debt whenever it was created; and considered this a very appropriate manner for providing for this present new debt, as it was taxing paper to pay for paper. The amendment proposed to tax all paper put into circulation, be it large or small, and coming from what source it might—a bank or a shoe-black. The tax was proposed to begin at ten cents on each note, or piece of paper, so put out, and to be increased ten cents annually till the whole tax amounted to — cents. He did not fix the maximum. His object was to tax all alike, and take a sum which the large notes could pay easily, and the small ones would sink under. His object was twofold: first, to make the money corporations pay a little tax in these taxing times, when nothing escapes taxation but banks. The mode of collecting it was easy—it was merely for the banks, companies, corporations, and individuals engaged in the issue of notes or tickets, to give in the annual average number of their notes or tickets, like a farmer gives in the number of his cattle or horses, or acres of land—the list to be given in to the United States Marshal for the district. The tax to begin at ten cents on each note or ticket, and to be increased ten cents annually, until it amounted to — cents on each. The second object was to operate the suppression, gradually, of small bank-notes and shinpasters. A uniform tax of a given amount would accomplish this. To lay a uniform tax of a certain amount on all bank-notes and shinpasters, would be like putting a pound weight upon the backs of all animals. The large and noble animals, such as horses, could carry it without feeling it; the vermin would be killed under it. A flea would never hop again with this pound weight on its back. So of the large notes and the small ones. The large would carry the tax easily, and ought to carry it; the small ones would sink under it, and ought to sink. Taken in conjunction with a Bankrupt act against banks, which was now becoming the general doctrine, and this tax would complete the remedies against the evils of paper money. They were remedies of different kinds, but uncurrent; the one preventive, the other curative. The Bankrupt act would cure the evil after it happened; the tax would almost prevent it from happening; and would save the small-dealing part of the community from all loss—that class which now bears nearly all the loss. Mr. B. showed that bank-notes were taxed in England, and had been taxed in the United States, and that this was a most appropriate time to tax them again.

2d Sess.]

The Bankrupt Law—Repeal.

[JANUARY, 1842.]

Mr. CLAY called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he had not intended to say a word on this amendment, till the yeas and nays were ordered; but, being called on to record his vote, he would, in a few words, assign his reasons for voting against it. If the mover intended his proposition as the commencement of a system, all he would say, under that aspect of the subject, was, that he had anticipated, but for a short time, what would be forced on those in power, if the scheme of extravagant expenditures, which formed a part of their system of measures, should be carried out. He would tell them that, as they were going on, loans and Treasury notes would soon fail them, and that it would be impossible for them to extort from commerce the means of meeting the demands on the Treasury.

But he did not understand that the mover, in proposing the amendment, intended it exclusively as a measure of revenue. One, at least, of his objects, as avowed by himself, is so to arrange the proposed tax on notes as to suppress those of a small denomination. According to his (Mr. C.'s) opinion, this would be a dangerous and unconstitutional use of the taxing power. He held that all the powers delegated by the constitution were trust powers, and that, like all other powers of like description, they were limited in their application to the nature and object of the trust. To extend them beyond, to other objects, would be a perversion of the power—the most dangerous of all the modes of violating the constitution, because the most insidious, and easily and safely perpetrated.

Entertaining this view, he held that, as the exclusive object of the taxing power was revenue, to use it for any other purpose—as, in this case, to suppress a certain description of bank-notes—was a perversion of the power, and, of course, not warranted by the constitution. It was, in fact, to change the taxing into a penal power—two powers, however alike in form and appearance, that were wholly different in their nature and intention. The object of the penal power is to put down, destroy, and suppress that against which it is directed; it is directly hostile to it: while, on the contrary, the taxing power, although it may have to some extent the same effect, does not will it; and, so far from seeking that suppression or distinction of its object, that would be fatal to its real design, revenue; just, as in this case, the suppression of the small notes would be a loss of the revenue from that source.

Mr. BENTON, at the urgent appeal of Mr. KING, withdrew his amendment, to permit the Treasury Note bill to proceed; and pledged himself to be as true as the needle to the pole in offering the amendment to the first revenue bill that came up; and that would be very soon under this tax-laying Administration.

The question was then taken, and carried without a division, on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

TUESDAY, January 25.

The Bankrupt Law—Repeal.

On motion of Mr. BERRIEN, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill of the House of Representatives to repeal the Bankrupt law.

Mr. BERRIEN occupied the floor during the remainder of the day, in opposition to the repeal of the law. He remarked that his opinions as to the constitutionality, expediency, and justice of the law for the relief of the bankrupts, had not changed; but that, so far as time and reflection had had any influence with him, they had only tended to impress him with the belief that the vote he gave at the last extra session was correct. He maintained that so far as there was any manifestation of the popular will as to the propriety of the passage of that law, it was in favor of it. The Legislature of the State he in part represented, had expressed opinions adverse to that law; which had been communicated to him. He did not concur with those opinions, and did not feel justified, from his sense of what was due to a suffering people, to vote for the bill to repeal it. He spoke at some length on the bad effect of a vacillating course of legislation, such as would be exhibited if this Congress at this session reversed their will as expressed at the last session; and argued that it would afford to the enemies of free institutions material on which to found arguments against the salutary and practical operations of free Government. They had deliberately adopted a measure of great public policy, at the instance of a vast multitude of the people of the United States; and he thought if they changed their own act of legislation before it was permitted to go into operation, such course ought to deprive them of the confidence of the American people. The law, he argued, was correct in principle, and in detail was as free from imperfections as any plan that could be devised by the wisdom and ingenuity of Congress, before they had the lights of experience, as would be developed by the practical operations of the law. He did not believe the law was so imperfect as its enemies had alleged. It was simple in its details, and was not encumbered by the complicated machinery of the bankrupt laws which had not heretofore met the approbation of the people. The law, as it exists on the statute, could be safely permitted to go into operation, without speculating on the amendments thought necessary to make it practicable, and then they would have the experience of its operations to guide them in the amendments they were now speculating about.

He spoke at some length to show that the law was practicable, and contended that it was because of its practicability that it was so objectionable. It was opposed by its enemies, because it was susceptible of such practical operations, that it would defeat the machinations of those who were anxious for its repeal. It was objectionable, not because it was a bankrupt law, but because it was a leading measure of the Whig party, and one of its measures for the relief of the country, for which the extra session was called; all of which measures, it was now contended by some of those who opposed them, the people had rejected as injurious to their interests, and must be repealed. He did not, however, so understand the language of the country. It was but the wishes and opinions of those who felt that all those measures must be undone, or the two vetoes of the Whig President will have lost all their charms. He then spoke at some length on the constitutional power of Congress to make a Bankrupt law to operate on others than traders, in the common acceptation of that term; and contended that, so far as the origin and history of the practice of the law of England, from which he borrowed it, had any bearing upon the intention of the framers of the constitution, or the construction which they intended should be given that instrument, it conclusively established the right in Congress to pass a law to operate on all persons, without regard to their occupation or pursuits in life.

THURSDAY, January 27.

The Bankrupt Law—Repeal.

Mr. BAYARD addressed the Senate for upwards of an hour, investigating the whole ground of argument upon which the friends of the Bankrupt law advocated its constitutionality and expediency. He first dwelt upon the exaggeration of the assumption that there were five hundred thousand bankrupts in the United States, calling for, and entitled to relief. He showed from the returns of the late census, that the whole amount of persons engaged in trade and manufacturing business did not exceed nine hundred thousand, and that it was an utter impossibility that more than one in a hundred of these could be bankrupt. The probability was that the whole of the persons in the United States, properly coming within the provisions of the system of bankruptcy contemplated by the framers of the constitution, in giving the power to the General Government to pass laws on the subject—did not exceed nine thousand. He showed that this being an agricultural population, must necessarily have fewer subjects for the operation of bankrupt laws than England, which is emphatically and essentially a nation of shopkeepers and manufacturers. Yet, in reviewing the history of bankruptcy in England, from the years 1700 to 1808—a period of one hundred and eight years—it had been found that the aggregate number of bankrupts in that country during more than one hundred years was but eleven thousand.

Mr. CHOATE, in continuation of the debate, said he could assure his friends that he would not keep them long from the vote upon the bill before the Senate, or the Senator from Missouri from submitting what he had to say in conclusion of the discussion. He would take about three minutes of the time of the Senate in presenting three reasons in favor of the retrospective part of the law. He sustained the retrospective character of the bill, because he represented a creditor State, as he had been reminded by the Senator from Georgia, (Mr. BARKEN.) Massachusetts was in favor of the law. The Legislature of Massachusetts had passed resolutions in favor of it. $30,000,000 of property had been represented here in one petition from Boston opposed to the repeal of the law. This property was employed at Mexico, up and down the father of waters, and in almost every place of the country, and far beyond its borders. Other memorials of a like character had also been presented, and why? Massachusetts was a creditor State, and there was due to that State $15,000,000 at this time in the Southwest; and there were at this and other sections of the Union more than ten millions due her over and above the amount of the indebtedness of individuals in his State.

Mr. C. also said that he voted also for the retrospective law, because it was a moral right of Government to pass such a law. If the bill did, as was said by the Senator from Delaware, sponge out debts, he admitted that it was a weighty objection, and would be an effective one, if the objection was not borne down by ten thousand superior claims. Admirable and beautiful as he admitted the law, and anxious as he was (to use the language of Edmund Burke) to see it "carried into the brazen tablets of every system of jurisprudence in the world," yet he would not vote for the bill if these and all other objections were not fully overcome by the virtues of the bill. The practice of the whole world did not forbid, nor did sound ethics forbid, the enactment of such a law. What would the creditor gain, he would ask, by leading the debtor round the world, as under the old Scotch law, with the habiliments of bankruptcy upon him? Nothing. By setting one captive free, he made two men where before there was but one, and two blades of grass to grow where but one grew before.

2D Sess.]

The Treasury Note Bill.

[JANUARY, 1842.]

It was well and beautifully said by Judge Johnson, of South Carolina, that a part of public duty was to relieve humanity. More than this was done in the passage of this bill. Besides, we had the power to do this, to pass a retrospective law, and he would say, that there never was a system in which the retrospective power was not given. More than this. It was our hand that struck these men down, and our hand might be as beneficently, as benevolently, employed in raising them up.

It was a "Federal Whig measure," said the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON.) He thought it a measure that absorbed and swallowed up party distinctions. In Boston, at the Capitol, the people had assembled night after night. The people there rose and fell like the billows of the sea, throwing out their voice in eloquent appeals that this bill might remain the law of the land. It was, he admitted, a relief and a humane measure, and passed to set the debtor free; but let no man, be he never so good a lawyer, or so severe a moralist, say he could not vote for this law. He rejoiced to say a word in behalf of, and for such a measure as this, and had blessed God at the opportunity to do so. For himself and for others to hear, upon the approaching 1st of February, the meek and silver voices of freemen swelling the jubilee of the captive set free, would be the consummation of an event not only devoutly wished, but never to be forgotten.

Mr. BENTON, after some prefatory remarks, observed that, with the closest attention he had been able to give to the arguments of those who opposed the repeal of the Bankrupt law, he had not discovered that one of the eighteen objections he had on a former day urged against the law, had been answered. Of these eighteen objections not one had been attempted to be answered, because they were unanswerable. They would remain so; but he would now confine himself to only two of those objections—one, that the law is, in its primary and initiatory provisions, wholly and solely for the relief of the debtor. It is not a bankrupt law. It is a vast insolvent law, the object of which is, the abolition of debt, at the will and pleasure of the debtor, and without regard to the wishes of the creditor, or the consequences so far as his rights are concerned. All its provisions and enactments have for their object and end, the abolition of contracts of debt. All the rest was mere mockery. His next objection was as to time and place. The law gives the debtor his own choice of time and place. He may profess himself a bankrupt, when he pleases—when he has something to pay, or when he has spent the last cent. He may wait till he has wasted all the substance of his creditors, or he may not, just as he chooses; for the law is entirely for his convenience, and not for the protection of his creditors. He may go where he pleases—to the most remote limits of this Union, to become a bankrupt—where his creditors will not incur the expense of following him or contesting his discharge, and where he may give notice, in compliance with the law, by a letter dropped in the post office, or by a publication in an obscure newspaper, that will never reach a creditor. He may do this, though the interests of men, women, children, idiots, lunatics, and persons resident beyond the seas, are concerned. The Senator from Georgia asks, "would you charge the future earnings of a man who has given up all his property, with the payment of his old debts?" He (Mr. B.) answered, yes, he would. He would never release him from his obligation till the debt was paid. What was the capital of the lawyer, the professional man, the mechanic, the laborer, the manufacturer, or any one else, living by the exercise of manual skill or mental faculties, but their industry and powers of productiveness? On the faith of these depended their credit; and they should be always liable to the discharge of their obligations. The very first memorial sent to Congress three years ago for such a system of bankruptcy as the law of last session—for this abolition of all debts—this general law of relief for all insolvents—and which system was advocated by a gentleman, then a Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER)—not now in this body—was signed by a person (Mr. STILLWELL) who has received an appointment from this Administration as marshal of the Southern district of New York, in view of his own benefit; and was he (Mr. B.) now to be asked, if he would leave the six or nine thousand dollars a year salary of that beneficiary of office, liable to the claims of his creditors, and not let him take the benefit of this Bankrupt law, that he might live with his family in luxury and splendor? He would answer, yes; he would leave the salary of every such official, open to the claims of his creditors, just as he would the earnings of any contractor of debt, whose creditors had trusted him in faith of his capability of repayment.

At half-past three o'clock, Mr. BENTON, without having concluded, yielded to a motion to adjourn.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 29.

The Treasury Note Bill.

When the bill was last before the House, Mr. FILLMORE had moved that the House concur in the amendments made thereto by the Senate.

And Mr. SPRIGG had moved that the bill and amendments be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FILLMORE desired to make a brief explanation in relation to the last amendment. It was now apparent that the House would not do any business on Monday. Almost a month had elapsed since the bill had been brought into this House under the extreme pressure of the immediate wants of the Treasury; and he should conceive himself culpable if he were to delay the action of the House for a moment. The first amendments pending were merely verbal, as he had said on a former occasion, and he hoped the vote would be taken.

JANUARY, 1842.]

Death of Senator Dixon.

[27TH CONG.]

Mr. STANLY rose and said he thought the House and country must be satisfied that too much valuable time had been already consumed in this debate. And now, without further preliminary remarks, in which he could indulge if he chose, he would move the previous question.

In answer to inquiries, the SPEAKER said that the effect of the previous question, (if sustained,) would be to cut off the motion to commit, and bring the House to a direct vote on the amendments of the Senate.

And the main question (being on concurring in the amendments of the Senate) was ordered to be now put.

And the two first amendments of the Senate (which are merely verbal) were concurred in.

And the question again recurring on concurring in the amendment of the Senate striking out the proviso of the House, that the amount of Treasury notes which might be issued under the authority of this act, should be deemed and taken in lieu of so much of the loan bill, &c.,

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Ayer, Baker, Barnard, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Briggs, Brockway, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Cushing, Garrett Davis, Deberry, John Edwards, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, Gamble, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Patrick G. Goode, Graham, Granger, Green, Hall, Halsted, Henry, Hudson, Joseph R. Ingersoll, William W. Irwin, James, William Cost Johnson, Isaac D. Jones, J. P. Kennedy, Lawrence, Linn, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Meriwether, Moore, Morgan, Morrow, Osborne, Pendleton, Pope, Powell, Ramsey, Benjamin Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Ridgway, Rodney, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Shepperd, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stokeley, Alexander H. H. Stuart, Summers, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Trumbull, Wallace, Warren, Washington, Edward D. White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Augustus Young, and John Young—100.

NAYS.—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Beeson, Bidlack, Botta, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, S. H. Butler, William Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, Cary, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Cross, Daniel, R. D. Davis, Dean, Doan, Doig, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Egbert, Ferris, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, T. F. Foster, Gerry, Gilmer, Goggin, Gordon, Gustine, Gwin, Harris, John Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubard, Hunter, Jack, Keim, Andrew Kennedy, Lane, Lewis, Littlefield, Lowell, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, John Thompson Mason, Mathews, Medill, Miller, Newhard, Owsley, Partridge, Payne, Pickens, Proffit, Reding, Reynolds, Rhett, Riggs, Roosevelt, Sanford, Saunders, Shaw, Shields, William Smith, Snyder, Sprigg, Steenrod, Stratton, John T. Stuart, Sumpter, Richard W. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Underwood, Van Buren, Van Rensselaer, Watterson, Westbrook, James W. Williams, and Wood—100.

[A tie vote.]

The SPEAKER (with great promptness) voted in the affirmative, causing the vote to stand, yeas 101, nays 100.

So the amendment was concurred in.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 31.

Death of Senator Dixon.

Immediately after the reading of the journal to-day, and the announcement, by message from the House of Representatives, that that body had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the Treasury Note bill,

Mr. SIMMONS, of Rhode Island, rose, and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: My position imposes on me the painful duty to announce to the Senate the death of my colleague, the Hon. NATHAN F. DIXON, of Rhode Island. It took place on Saturday last, at noon.

I witnessed the event. It was accompanied by every consoling circumstance which can be mingled with such an affliction. It was attended by moderate, not excruciating pain; by the presence, to the last, of a clear and unclouded mind; and by a composure which enabled my deceased friend to breathe out his life as upon a pillow of rest. Having said this, my feelings would direct me to sit down, and silently commune with the emotions which this allusion to the event revives. Those who have recently witnessed such a scene can feel how impotent is language to describe it, or the emotions which it produces.

When we witness such a separation as death produces, the mind earnestly seeks to catch a gleam of that hope which the spirit has fled to; and the eye turns again to gaze on the desolate body which it has left behind. We silently say, what a wonderful transition! The intellect cannot comprehend its mysteries. And we come out among ourselves to speak of our loss, and to feel the distinct and individual admonition, that we must also follow.

The loss sustained by us in the event I have now brought to the notice of the Senate, is that of a benevolent, an honest man.

Col. DIXON was born at Plainfield, Connecticut, in December, 1774. He graduated at Rhode Island College in 1798-'9. He studied law in his native State, and came to Rhode Island, in 1802, to practise in the courts of that State, while he continued to pursue his pro-

2D SESS.]

Death of Senator Dixon.

[JANUARY, 1842.]

professional labors in his own. He was married soon after, and settled permanently in Rhode Island. He was a graduate of the college of that State, near which he had always lived, and where he had many acquaintances. He was attached to our people and our institutions. Ours, therefore, became his adopted State. Subsequent events show that his attachment was reciprocated, and that he not only adopted Rhode Island, but was also adopted by her people as a son of that State. In 1813 he was elected a member of the General Assembly of the State, and was elected by the same constituency at thirty-four successive elections. In October, 1838, he was elected by Rhode Island a member of the Senate of the United States for a term of six years, to commence the following March.

In the councils of the State he occupied a commanding position, won for himself by the amenity of his deportment, his great intelligence, and his sterling integrity. Of his career in this body, other Senators know more than I do, having but recently become his colleague. I had known him intimately for sixteen years, and have been highly gratified to perceive, by the positions assigned to him in the Senate, that his character was thus appreciated here, and especially to find, in the more intimate relations of confidential consultation, that he was eminently honored by his friends. Others may have occupied more elevated positions, but none more endearing ones. It was, however, in another sphere, and upon a another theatre of usefulness, that my colleague was most prominent. It was in his own neighborhood, among his numerous kindred, and in his own family, that the distinctive characteristics of his generous mind and his peculiar social qualities, have made their deepest impression; and it is in the large space he filled among them, that his departure will produce the most painful void. It is in the circles where the deepest impressions have been made by the life and influence of the deceased, that every consolation will be needed. To them his long life of usefulness, the position he had attained, his tranquil death, and the kind attention of the individual members of the Senate and its officers, attentions which leave no doubt of the general sympathy and respect of this body, will be presented and commended to their relief.

There will remain another duty for me to perform when I shall visit the bereaved family. His will be to detail to them that which has inspired in the confidential intercourse of private friendship, and in the sick room of the deceased; and it is of a character which I trust will prove a solace to them. It is in such a place that the virtues are tested. There, here a man sees in a shortened perspective the end of his journey, and discloses his reflections to his friends—where he finds the resources of intellect and philosophy give way, and his affections grasp the consolations and hopes of our holy religion, which graciously invites us all to its beneficent provisions.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE rose next, and spoke as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: It seems to have been the custom from the foundation of this Government, when a member of this body has been suddenly wrested from it by the hand of death, that the Senate should render some appropriate tribute of respect to his memory. This custom is a good one, for it is founded in the best feelings of our nature. It is a good one, for it leads us to consider more seriously and more profoundly of the character and the object of the high duties we are sent here to perform. It is a good one, for in its very observance we are admonished of the shortness and uncertainty of our own lives, and of the comparative worthlessness of all selfish, all ephemeral considerations. It chastens our affections; it prepares us to look, alone, and with singleness of purpose, to the ulterior, future, and permanent good of the whole country.

Nor does the question fail of producing beneficial influences upon society beyond the limits of this Capitol; and especially in so far as such mark of respect to the memory of the deceased manifestly tends to strengthen the moral ties which bind the people of the State, from which he may have come, to the Government itself. In accordance, then, with a custom so sanctioned, resolutions have been prepared in the usual form, in relation to the memory of our friend, whose decease has just been announced to us.

I could have wished, sir, that it had been devolved upon some older member who had done more than I have done to build up the high character of the Senate, to have introduced them; for all with whom the deceased has been so long associated here would be alike ready, I am sure, to bear testimony to the soundness of his judgment, the equanimity of mind, and the singleness of heart, with which he always applied himself to his public duties here.

But it was my happiness, sir, to be an inmate of the same dwelling with the deceased during the last session, and again during this, and to have possessed, I hope, a good share of his friendly feeling. The State which gave him birth was my native State also; many of his early friends were mine, and mine were his.

From such considerations, it has been thought by others than myself, that it might be proper for me to present these resolutions; and this I do, sir, the more readily, because none can estimate more highly than I do that ingenuousness of nature, that honesty of purpose, and that elevated love of country, which I know so eminently distinguished the deceased, and which an intimate and active connection with public affairs for thirty years seems in nowise to have polluted or impaired.

I most respectfully then, present to you

JANUARY, 1842.]

Death of Senator Dixon.

[27th CONG.]

these resolutions, and move that they be adopted by the Senate.

Resolved, unanimously, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of the late Hon. NATHAN F. DIXON, which will take place to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, and that notice thereof be given to the House of Representatives.

The following Senators were appointed under the resolution, as the Committee of Arrangements, viz: MESSRS. WOODBRIDGE, HUNTINGTON, WRIGHT, MANGUM, and BUCHANAN.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of NATHAN F. DIXON, deceased, late a Senator thereof, will go into mourning for one month, by the usual mode of wearing crape on the left arm.

Resolved, unanimously, That, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolutions having been unanimously adopted, the Senate accordingly adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 31.

Death of Senator Dixon.

A message was received from the Senate, by A. Dickins, Esq., Secretary, informing the House that the Hon. NATHAN F. DIXON, Senator from the State of Rhode Island, had departed this life in this city on the 29th instant, and that his funeral would take place to-morrow, the 1st day of February, at 12 o'clock.

Mr. TILLINGHAST thereupon rose and said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It is with no common emotion that I rise to notice the sad communication which has now been sent to us by the honorable Senate. It tells us that a pure heart has ceased to throb—that a wise head has ceased to think—that a life of virtuous action, which had held on in unbroken health and usefulness to a green and hale old age, has now, in the midst of public toils, and in a station of well-won and well-worn honor, terminated—that the spirit which informed that life, and directed it to all that the cultivated instincts of a generous nature perceived to be good, has been freed from the incumbrance of flesh, and entered upon the high and congenial destinies which are unfolded in the world of immortality. It tells us, too, that, while we occupy these halls, and tax our strongest faculties, and embark our loftiest virtues or our sternest passions in the agitating interests which seem to demand these efforts, there is an unseen Power amongst us, in whose presence all the powers of man are but as stubble and ashes—who has but silently to touch either the silvered crown of age or the firm and confident brow of earlier manhood, and, instantly, and equally, they fall—the eloquent tongue is mute and the heaving bosom is still.

Mr. Speaker, were it not that the notices appropriate to these melancholy occasions must of necessity be brief, I would gladly speak of the deceased Senator (Colonel DIXON) more largely than I shall now allow myself to do. I would speak of him with the privilege of one who for nearly thirty years has enjoyed his friendship; who has been associated with him in professional and in legislative labors; and who, in any effort for the improvement of the laws and institutions of his State, and for the advancement of whatever was thought conducive to the permanent prosperity of his fellow-citizens—always relying upon him as amongst the foremost—never relied upon him in vain.

To most of the members of this House he was, probably, known only in his public station. To those distinguished Senators whose nearer acquaintance he was so happy as to enjoy, (and he could not enjoy that without enjoying also their affection,) it would be superfluous to enlarge upon the traits of that modest and bland, but at the same time strong, energetic, influential character, which marked him in his individual and social, as well as in his official relations to men and things. Though few opportunities may have occurred to him here for the development of all his qualities, yet I believe that his quick and accurate power of observation—the promptness of his penetration—the soundness of his deliberate judgment—the constant sunshine of his cheerful benevolence—his serene patience under trials and vexations—the simple-hearted truth the transparent honesty, of his desires and purposes—the boldness of his assertion of the right—the enduring firmness of his resolution—the clear integrity and the high-toned honor of his daily thoughts—these, I believe, have not been without their witnesses here. But I will not attempt to group all the strong and clear and beautiful qualities of mind and heart that constituted in him ability in action and in council, and invested him with a moral influence, (of greater value than all talent,) which added its just force to every effort of his intellectual strength. Sweetness of disposition, and power of intellect, were in him blended in that happy and harmonious union, without which neither can be of distinguished value to the possessor or to the world.

His sterling character, unobtrusive and unambitious of daily distinction, was one of those reserved moral resources of which this nation has many—though few, if any, more marked and sure than he—on which, in the testing times of trial call for the better powers of man, she might draw, with a confidence that need not falter, for the conservation of all that may be in peril.

I am not aware that he ever made a profession of Christianity according to the forms of any church; but his life was a continual profession of the truth and divine excellence of its precepts. His respect for its solemnities and love of its worship, his ready aid in the promotion of its interests, and conscientious performance of the duties it enjoins, his untiring exhibition of all the charities of life which it inculcates, are evidence that, if he postponed a more precise demonstration, it was still the very spirit of Christianity which wrought in his bosom and regulated his actions.

2d Sess.]

The Case of the Creole.

[FEBRUARY, 1842.]

The history of our State will not be without its testimonies to his character and services; and it is there where he was best known, that his loss will be most truly appreciated and deeply deplored. Though born in the adjoining State of Connecticut, he early selected Rhode Island for education and citizenship. He graduated with honor from the college which is now Brown University, at Providence, and after completing his preparatory study of the law in the office of Judge Goddard, at Norwich, he commenced a practice which soon became extensive in both States, and made his permanent residence in Rhode Island. He was first brought into public life by an election to the Legislature of that State; and such was the estimation in which he was held by the citizens of his immediate community, that at thirty-four successive elections they continued to return him as their representative. During this period he was a prominent and active participator in all the important transactions of the body, and his last effort there was in behalf of the then doubtful and obstructed, but now triumphant cause of the temperance reform.

Passing thence again to private life, he occupied himself in the honorable pursuit of his profession, in the prosecution of important public works, in kind attention to the interest of others, and in the affectionate offices that endeared him to a happy home, until, in 1838, without his own solicitation or effort, he was elected by the Legislature to a seat in the Senate of the United States, for the term commencing in March, 1839. It is gratifying to the citizens of his State to perceive that, in that body of distinguished men with whom he became thus associated, a just appreciation of his worth has been manifested, both by the assignment to him of important positions in relation to the public business, and by the kindest personal demonstrations of respectful regard.

In the discharge of every Senatorial duty he was vigilant and constant, and unsparing of himself, until his labors were interrupted at the present session by the first and only disease that ever in his life reduced him to his bed; and this has now proved fatal. On Saturday last, at noon, at the age of sixty-seven years, in the full possession of unclouded faculties, with a patient and even cheerful resignation, and with humble hope, he died.

The death of a Senator of so much intellectual superiority and moral worth, is an event for the wide and deep regret of the nation. The abrupt loss of their long loved and honored fellow-citizen will be felt and deplored by the citizens of his own State with a still keener and deeper grief.

But, sir, there is a circle to which this all unanticipated blow has carried bitterness and agony, which it were as vain as it would be obtrusive to attempt to depict. The sorrows in the hearts of that circle are too new and too sacred for any comment here, except to refer to the fact that there are such to suffer. To the widowed survivor, and to the bereaved sons and daughters, I can trust myself only to say, that, in all sincerity of true sympathy and respect, we commend them to that Power which alone could deal the blow, and alone can impart the consolations which may convert it into mercy.

Mr. T. then submitted the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the House has received with deep sensibility the communication from the Senate announcing the death of the Hon. NATHAN FELLOWS DIXON, a Senator from the State of Rhode Island.

Resolved, That, in token of sincere and high respect for the memory of the deceased, this House will attend his funeral obsequies to-morrow, at the hour appointed by the Senate, and will wear crape upon the left arm as mourning for thirty days; and, as a further mark of respect,

Resolved, That the House do now adjourn.

And then the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 3.

The Case of the Creole.

Mr. CALHOUN made a proposition to refer to the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Message from the Executive on the subject of the mutiny and murder by the slaves on board the Creole, and the liberation of those slaves by the British authorities in Nassau, New Providence.

Mr. CALHOUN said that his object in rising was to move a reference of the Message of the President, in reply to his resolution in the case of the Creole, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. He had read the report of the Secretary of State which accompanied it, with attention. It met fully the call of the resolution, as it related to the facts of the case. It gave a full and well-authenticated statement of the rising of the slaves, and mutiny and murder on board; the carrying of the vessel into the port of Nassau; the occurrences there; the conduct of the British authorities, and the inhabitants of the place; the seduction of the slaves on board from their owners, and those having charge, except five, who refused to leave the vessel, and those who perpetrated the mutiny and murder. They were taken from on board, and are to be confined till the decision of the Government at home should be known in relation to them.

As to the remaining portion of the resolution, that which asked for information as to what steps had been taken to bring the guilty in this bloody transaction to justice, and to redress the wrong done to our citizens, and the indignity offered to our flag, he regretted to say, the report of the Secretary is very unsatisfactory. He, Mr. C., had supposed, in a case of such gross outrage, that prompt measures for redress would have been adopted. He had not doubted but that a vessel had been despatched, or some early opportunity seized for transmitting directions to our Minister at the Court of St. James, to demand that the criminals should be delivered to our Government for trial; more especially, as they were detained with the view of abiding the decision of the Government at home. But in all this he had been in a mistake. Not a step has yet been taken—no demand made for the surrender of the murderers, though the Executive must have been in full possession of the facts for more than a month. The only reply is, that he (the Secretary) had received the orders of the President to prepare a despatch for our Minister in London, which would be "prepared without unnecessary delay." He spoke not in the spirit of censure; he had no wish to find fault; but he thought it due to the country, and, more especially, of the portion that has so profound an interest in this subject, that he should fearlessly state the facts as they existed. He believed our right to demand the surrender of the murderers clear, beyond doubt, and that, if the case was fairly stated, the British Government would be compelled, from a sense of justice, to yield to our demand; and hence his deep regret that there should have been such a long delay in making any demand. The apparent indifference which it indicates on the part of the Government, and the want of our views on the subject, it is to be feared, would prompt to an opposite decision, before any despatch can now be received by our minister.

He repeated that the case was clear. He knew that an effort had been made, and regretted to say, even in the South, and through a newspaper in this District, but a morning or two since, to confound the case with the ordinary one of a criminal fleeing from the country where the crime was perpetrated, to another. He admitted that it is a doubtful question whether, by the laws of nations, in such a case, the nation to which he fled, was bound to surrender him on the demand of the one where the crime was committed. But that was not this case, nor was there any analogy between them. This was mutiny and murder, committed on the ocean, on board of one of our vessels, sailing from one port to another on our own coast, in a regular voyage, and committed by slaves, who constituted a part of the cargo, and forcing the officers and crew to steer the vessel into a port of a friendly power. Now there was nothing more clear, than that, according to the laws of nations, a vessel on the ocean is regarded as a portion of the territory of the State to which she belongs, and more emphatically so, if possible, in a coasting voyage; and that if forced into a friendly port by an unavoidable necessity, she loses none of the rights that belong to her on the ocean. Contrary to these admitted principles the British authorities entered on board of the Creole, took the criminals under their own jurisdiction, and that after they had ascertained them to be guilty of mutiny and murder, instead (as they ought to have done) of aiding the officers and crew in confining them, to be conveyed to one of our ports, where they would be amenable to our laws. The outrage would not have been greater, nor more clearly contrary to the laws of nations, if, instead of taking them from the Creole, they had entered our territory, and forcibly taken them from one of our jails; and such, he could scarcely doubt, would be the decision of the British Government itself, if the facts and reasons of the case be fairly presented before its decision is made. It would be clearly the course she would have adopted had the mutiny and murder been perpetrated by a portion of the crew, and it can scarcely be that it will regard it less criminal, or less imperiously her duty, to surrender the criminals, because the act was perpetrated by slaves. If so, it is time we should know it.

He (said Mr. C.) had deliberated for some time what course he should adopt in reference to the Message. He at one time had concluded to leave it quietly on the table, as the subject would necessarily come into the negotiation between the two Governments on the arrival of the special mission to England. He availed himself of the opportunity of expressing his pleasure that such a mission was to be sent. He hoped and he believed it was sent, and would come in the spirit of peace, and that an end would be put to all the questions in controversy between two people that ought to be at peace. He intended to avoid, on his part, any step that might throw impediments in the way of a fair and honorable adjustment. But, on full reflection, he came to the conclusion that it was due to the importance of the subject that it should be referred to the appropriate committee. An omission to do so might be construed into an indifference to the subject, and thereby sink it in the scale of relative importance, compared to the other questions at issue between the Governments. Of all those questions, he deemed it by far the most important in character, and most dangerous to the peace and quiet of the two countries, and of greater magnitude to the section of the Union more immediately interested. As important as was the boundary question to Maine, or the question of search to navigation and commercial interests engaged in the African trade, they were nothing in importance to the interests which more than a third of this Union has in this question. If we yield to the pretension which would refuse the surrender of these criminals, and that would confiscate the property of our citizens under circumstances similar to the case of the Creole and the Enterprise, where would it end? If we may not safely sail on our own coast, with our slave property on board, because Great Britain may choose to deny our right to hold property in slaves, may she not, with equal propriety, extend the same rule to our cotton and other staples? If we have no right to those whose labor produced them, what better right have we to the product of their labor?

2d Sess.]

General Appropriation Bill—Appeal.

[FEBRUARY, 1842.]

He more readily moved to refer the subject to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, because the chairman (Mr. RIVZ, who, he regretted, was not in his seat,) was from the State more immediately interested in it. The Creole sailed from Richmond, and his constituents were among the sufferers; and he did hope that he would give that able and lucid exposition of all the deeply interesting points involved in the subject, of which he was so capable of doing.

Mr. PIERCE, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, regretted the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. He was detained, and had been detained from his place for some days past by indisposition. When in his place, he would act in reference to this matter, he had no doubt, with the greatest promptitude and zeal. The case was so important that it could admit of the promptest action; but he did not believe it was discreet to anticipate Executive action on the subject, which, no doubt, would have justice done as effectually as the delicate nature of the subject would permit. It was a delicate question, and in reference to this matter he could assure the gentleman from South Carolina that the committee would give the subject the consideration called for by its importance. The Executive branch of the Government, it was presumed, would take such action as was called for by its importance. He was glad, too, that a special minister was to come out here to negotiate upon matters at issue between the two countries, and with full power to adjust all those questions. Mr. P., however, said he had risen only to announce the indisposition of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and to assure the Senate, in his absence, that the committee would give the subject the examination due to its importance.

Mr. CALHOUN knew that the chairman was disposed, but he presumed that no objection would be made to the reference.

The communication was then referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 16.

Motion in Committee to strike out Enacting Clause—Appeal.

Mr. CLIFFORD suggested to the gentleman from New York (Mr. McKEON) to withdraw his present appeal, and if the Chair decided that a motion to strike out the enacting clause was not in order in committee, to appeal from that decision for the purpose of settling the point.

Mr. McKEON then withdrew his appeal, and moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN decided that the motion in Committee of the Whole was not in order, from the authority of the Manual, which declared that it was not competent for a committee to whom a bill was referred to destroy that bill. He would read from page 150 of the Manual, where they found the following:

"If it be a bill, draught of an address, or other paper originating with them, they proceed by paragraphs, putting questions for amending, either by insertion or striking out, if proposed: but no question on agreeing to the paragraphs separately. This is reserved to the close, when a question is put on the whole, for agreeing to it as amended, or unamended. But if it be a paper referred to them, they proceed to put the questions of amendment, if proposed, but no final question on the whole: because all parts of the paper having been adopted by the House, stand of course, unless altered, or struck out by a vote. Even if they are opposed to the whole paper, and think it cannot be made good by amendments, they cannot reject it, but must report it back to the House without amendments, and here make their opposition."

By a rule of the House it was provided, that a motion to strike out the enacting clause of a bill should take precedence of a pending amendment. This motion to strike out the enacting clause was a motion to destroy the bill, which the laws of the Manual declared it was not competent for the Committee of the Whole to do. In conformity with this, a day or two since, in Committee of the Whole, the gentleman from Virginia had moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill then before the Committee. The Chairman then decided that the motion was not in order, an appeal was taken, and the decision of the Chair was sustained. On the motion to strike out the enacting clause, the whole merits of the bill would be open, but the rules of the House directed that, when a bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole, the bill should first be read through by the Clerk, and then the Clerk should proceed to read it by clauses for separate consideration. That was the injunction of the rules. When the committee should have passed through the bill in that manner, and a motion was made to rise and report the bill, it furnished ample opportunity for unrestrained debate. And that motion could not be put when any member chose to debate the bill.

Mr. McKENZIE appealed from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CLIFFORD said, if he had understood the decision of the Chair as relating merely to a question of time, and that after the bill had been gone through, it would be in order to strike out the enacting clause, he should not have debated it at all. If the Chair now decided that it was a mere question of time, he would not quarrel with the decision.

The CHAIRMAN decided that the motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill while entering on its reading by clauses for amendment or discussion, was not in order generally under the law of the Manual, which was that the committee could not destroy a paper committed to them. The Chair said that when the committee had gone through this bill by clauses, on a general motion to report the bill to the House, the question would be open for full discussion. Then the gentleman from Maine, or any other gentleman, might move to report the bill to the House with a recommendation that the bill be not passed.

The Chair decided that the rule must be followed, and the bill be read through by clauses for amendment or discussion, on each clause separately, before the general merits of the bill were debated.

The appeal was debated at some length by Messrs. HOPKINS, FILLMORE, TILLINGHAST, and UNDERWOOD, who sustained, and by Messrs. ATHERTON, PROFFIT, and POPE, who opposed the decision of the Chair.

Mr. COOPER, of Georgia, said, when this appeal was first taken, he felt entirely disposed to sustain the Chair, being driven by an impulse to restrain the licentiousness of the debate, and confine it to the points at issue. On reflection, he perceived this would not be the effect; for it had been conceded by members on all hands, as well as by the Chair, that, after discussing the whole bill, section by section, it will be open for all the latitude of debate allowable under the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The motion to strike out the enacting clause was designed to cut off useless debate, in cases where a majority of the House might be opposed to the principle of the bill. In such cases, therefore, it will be a saving of time to anticipate the discussion of the details by a vote on a proposition to strike out the enacting clause. But in cases where the House would hold on to the bill and amend, it is a mere matter of form and immateriality whether the discussion in chief shall precede or follow the debate on the details.

So much, then, for the effects of the decision as to the expediency and alleged reform of the proceedings of the House. But this question must be determined by the authority on which the Chairman rests, saying, that "the committee cannot destroy a bill." This being good authority, if the effect of this motion be to destroy the bill, or in other words, to reject it, in the purview of the authority cited, there is no room to doubt. But I take it that the force of this authority is, that the bill must be reported back to the House with such recommendations as the committee may make in regard to it, as stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Here I need some information of the Chairman, and desire to ask two questions: The first has been anticipated by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts on the right, showing that, admitting the decision of the Chair to stand, the bill will still be open to equal latitude of debate.

The second is this: If, on the motion to strike out the enacting clause, the committee should decide affirmatively, will the enacting clause be obliterated or annihilated?—or will it, with the rest of the bill, be reported to the House, accompanied by the recommendation of the committee to strike out the enacting clause?

The CHAIRMAN replied, that in that event the striking out would be the destruction of the bill, and the committee would report that fact to the House.

Mr. COOPER not being satisfied with the answer, repeated the question.

And the CHAIRMAN substantially repeated the same answer.

Mr. COOPER said he had failed to get the desired information of the Chair, and would vary the question, so as to apply it to the second clause of the bill, and ask whether, if that were ordered to be stricken out by the committee, it would not still, with the residue of the bill, be reported back to the House, with the proposition of the committee to strike it out; that it would not in fact be stricken out by the committee, but abide the action of the House on the committee's recommendation?

The CHAIRMAN said it would be reported back with the recommendation to strike out.

Then, said Mr. COOPER, what is true of the second section, must also be true of the first. And it follows, that a motion to strike out the enacting clause made in Committee of the Whole, does not involve the destruction of the bill, but merely the propriety of recommending its destruction to the House, since the act or fact of striking out must be decided and performed by the House.

This being true, it follows that the authority relied on by the Chair is not applicable, and therefore the motion to strike out the enacting clause is in order, and the decision of the Chair erroneous.

Gentlemen are mistaken as to the supposed advantages of the decision. The advantage is in favor of existing practice.

The mistake or error of the Chair, grows out of a misinterpretation of the purport of the authority on which he relies. Its object and end was to reserve to the House the fate of the bill, and not suffer the committee to smother it in its arms. If this authority is made to operate an exclusion of this motion, it will, for the same reason, exclude every motion that shall involve a rejection of the bill. But, in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts on the right, (Mr. ADAMS,) the Chair has advised us that such a proposition, with privilege of discussing in its broadest latitude, would be in order. The motion now made involves no more, and is, therefore, likewise in order. If so, the appeal ought to be sustained.

2d Sess.]

Death of Hon. Lewis Williams.

[FEBRUARY, 1842.]

The CHAIRMAN said he would briefly state the grounds for his decision. A bill had been committed by the House to its committee; and now what was the duty of the committee when they entered on the consideration of the bill? The House had described by their rules what it must be. First, that the bill should be read through by the clerk for information; second, that it should be read by clauses, to be amended and debated by clauses, and when they had gone through the bill, noting such amendments as they might make on a separate paper, that they should report it to the House. The Clerk had now read the bill through, and had commenced reading it by clauses. They had passed one, and came to the second. The gentleman from New York (Mr. McKENZIE) had proposed to amend it, which was in order, and on that amendment he had proposed to debate the whole merits of the bill. The Chair had decided this was not in order. The gentleman then had moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. The Chair had decided that it was not in order. And first, because it was contrary to the rule of proceeding laid down in the rules of the House, which were laid without regard to expediency. It had been said by gentlemen that the rules of the House governed in committee. They did, so far as they were applicable. Was the motion which was now made, a motion to amend the bill? It was not. It was a motion to destroy the bill. And did that come within the law by which the House had given their committee power to proceed to read the bill by clauses, and amend and debate them separately? He apprehended not.

But the Chair did not rest here. He turned to the parliamentary law, which declared that when a bill was referred to them by the House, they could not do—what? Not, in the language of the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. COOPER,) destroy the bill; but that they could not reject. That was the language of the law. If they struck out the enacting clause of the bill, did they not reject it?

If this motion prevailed, here was a bill of some two or three hundred clauses, in the discussion of the second clause of which they would strike out the enacting clause, and report to the House, not that they had gone through the bill & examined clause by clause, but that they had rejected the bill without that examination. Gentlemen had said if the decision of the Chair was sustained, it would cut off debate. The Chair did not so understand it. The rule was intelligent and reasonable, and, if this committee adopted it, they would see the great advantage of going through the bill by clauses, and discussing the clauses on their several merits. And when the committee should have gone through the bill by clauses, a motion to rise and report it to the House would open the whole merits, and the question could not be put until every member had had an opportunity of debating it, if he desired. If the committee overruled the decision of the Chair, the gentleman from New York would make his speech on this motion, and then withdraw it. Another gentleman would, perhaps, on the next clause, move to strike out the enacting clause, and make a speech, and thus it would lead to a protracted debate, without discussing the details of the bill.

The question now was, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of this House?"

The question was taken by tellers, who reported, ayes 78, noes 52.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 18.

Mr. SIMMONS presented the credentials of the Hon. WILLIAM SPRAGUE, Senator elect from Rhode Island, in the place of the Hon. N. F. DIXON, deceased. Mr. S. was then qualified, and took his seat.

THURSDAY, February 24.

Death of Hon. Lewis Williams.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MATTHEW ST. CLAIR CLARKE, their Clerk, informing the Senate of the melancholy intelligence of the death of the Hon. LEWIS WILLIAMS, member of the House from the State of North Carolina, and inviting the Senate to attend his funeral, to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, M., from the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Mr. GRAHAM, of North Carolina, rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I was a spectator of the melancholy event which is announced in the message from the House. It was the result of a sudden and violent attack of disease, which, defying all remedy, proved fatal in less than thirty-six hours from its commencement. On Monday, Mr. WILLIAMS was in his seat until the close of the session of the House. On Wednesday, but little more than an hour after the meeting of the House, he lay a lifeless corpse. Of the dreadful lesson which is taught by this most unexpected calamity, it is fitting that others should speak with more propriety than myself. But the occasion gives rise to a few reflections in which I hope to be indulged. A public servant has been struck down by the hand of death, almost in the harness of his public labors; a man whose long life of nearly sixty years has been devoted to useful, honorable, and patriotic service. The occurrence is well calculated to arrest the ordinary course of thought and action here, and to turn our minds to the contemplation of that awful change to which we are all ultimately destined. It reminds us, too, that the older men are passing away from the public councils, and naturally excites some inquiry as to the life and character of him who has so long shared in the deliberations of Congress, and in the gratitude and confidence of his countrymen.

MR. WILLIAMS was a native of the county of Surry, North Carolina, in which he always continued his residence. His education was liberal, having been graduated at the University of his native State, and having remained some time subsequently as a tutor in the same institution. Not very long afterwards he was chosen by the Legislature a member of the Board of Trustees of the University, of which he was ever one of the most vigilant, active, and faithful guardians. Anxious to be useful in the employment of the country, he seems early to have contemplated a public career. In the year 1814, he was returned from the county of Surry one of the members of the House of Commons in the General Assembly of the State; and, although a young man, he took a prominent part in the proceedings of the ensuing session. In 1815 he was elected the Representative in the Congress of the United States, of the 13th Congressional District, which embraces the county of his residence; and at every election since that time he has been returned by the same constituency to the same station. Of his talents and services as a member of Congress it would be superfluous to speak here, in the scene of his labors, and among his earlier and later associates. His legislative history is incorporated with the history of the country for more than a quarter of a century, in one continued series, and is found in the journals and documents of the House, the reports of its committees, and the register of its debates during that period. Few members of the House ever performed more useful or laborious service than did Mr. WILLIAMS for many years, while he acted as the chairman of the Committee of Claims, in adjusting the numerous demands on the Government which grew out of transactions connected with the late war with Great Britain. And none, it is believed, ever possessed the confidence of his associates in legislation in a greater degree.

With a mind patient, laborious, and strictly impartial, he applied himself diligently to this branch of the business of Congress, and was found so generally accurate that his opinions acquired the greatest weight. His continuous service for so many years, not only made him the Father of the House by seniority of membership, but his intimate acquaintance with public affairs, his enlightened views of the structure and policy of our Government, and his inflexible honesty and manliness of character, rendered him one of the most valuable of the public counsellors. But, sir, it is not so much his public action in the high places of the country, and his capacities to be serviceable there, that I wish particularly to mark. His character will bear closer examination and a severer scrutiny. I wish to bear my humble testimony to the eminent purity of his private life and moral integrity, and to speak what I believe is the common sentiment in his wide circle of acquaintance, that, during his long public career, neither the angry contests of parties, the temptings of ambition, of avarice, of vice, have sullied his name with a single action which should cause one moment's regret to his friends. In his public conduct, he was manly, frank, ingenious, and devoted to his duties. It happened to me, in my boyhood, to have been sent to school in one of the counties of his district; and I well remember to have witnessed the feelings of gratitude, of kindness, and affection with which he was cherished by those who so early and constantly honored him with their confidence, and whom he repaid with such fidelity and disinterested service. Always moral, he became later in life a religious man, and uniformly regulated his conduct by the principles of virtue and a conscientious conviction of duty.

But it was in the charities and kind offices of private and domestic life that Mr. WILLIAMS was most favorably known and appreciated. Although he never contracted the relation of marriage, there are those by whom his demise will be as deeply deplored as would be that of their immediate parents. He was a member of a numerous family, the head of which acquired an honorable fame by his patriotism and service in the war of the Revolution, and by his public spirit and elevation of character in after life. A twin brother of my lamented colleague now presides as judge in the courts of Tennessee. His elder brother, Col. JAMES WILLIAMS, was distinguished for his gallantry as an officer during the late war, and for his talents and character at a subsequent period, as a Senator in this body from the State of Tennessee, and in our diplomatic service abroad. A third brother was for a long period Adjutant General of the State of North Carolina. The two latter, though deceased, have left children. Others of his brothers and near relatives yet survive, and are among the most enlightened, hospitable, and liberal gentlemen, both in North Carolina and Tennessee. On the families of these the intelligence of their bereavement will fall as the thunder from a cloudless sky. To these, however, wherever situated, it will be consoling to know that, though the pangs of his dissolution were severe, they were of short duration, and that he met his fate with the calmness and resignation arising ing from the consciousness of a well-spent life, and the hope of an immortality beyond the grave.

[2d Sess.]

Death of Hon. Lewis Williams.

[FEBRUARY, 1842.]

In response to the message of the House, I beg leave to offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with deep sensibility the communication from the House of Representatives, announcing the death of the Hon. LEWIS WILLIAMS, representative from the State of North Carolina.

Resolved, That in token of sincere and high respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate will attend his funeral to-morrow at the hour appointed by the House of Representatives, and will wear crape on the left arm, as mourning, for thirty days; and, as a further mark of respect,

Resolved, That the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CLAY said: Prompted by a friendship which existed between the deceased and myself of upwards of a quarter of a century's duration, and by the feelings and sympathies which this melancholy occasion excites, will the Senate allow me to add a few words to those which have been so well and so appropriately expressed by my friend near me, (Mr. GRAHAM,) in seconding the motion he has just made?

Already, during the present session, has Congress, and each House, paid the annual instalment of the great debt of nature. We could not have lost two more worthy and estimable men than those who have been taken from us. My acquaintance with the lamented LEWIS WILLIAMS commenced in the fall of 1815, when he first took his seat as a member of the House of Representatives from the State of North Carolina, and I re-entered that House after my return from Europe. From that period until his death, a cordial and unbroken friendship has subsisted between us; and similar ties were subsequently created with almost every member of his highly respectable family.

When a vacancy arose in the responsible and laborious office of chairman of the Committee of Claims, which had been previously filled by another distinguished and lamented son of North Carolina, (the late Mr. YANOR,) in virtue of authority vested in me, as the presiding officer of the House, I appointed Mr. WILLIAMS to fill it. Always full of labor, and requiring unremitting industry, it was then, in consequence of claims originating in the late war, more than ever toilsome. He discharged its complicated duties with the greatest diligence, ability, impartiality, and uprightness, and continued in the office until I left the House in the year 1835. He occasionally took part in the debates which sprung up on great measures brought forward for the advancement of the interests of the country, and was always heard with profound attention, and, I believe, with a thorough conviction of his perfect integrity. Inflexibly adhering always to what he believed to be right, if he ever displayed warmth or impatience, it was excited by what he thought was insincere, or base, or ignoble. In short, LEWIS WILLIAMS was a true and faithful image of the respectable State which he so long and so ably served in the National Councils—intelligent, quiet, unambitious, loyal to the Union, and uniformly patriotic.

We all feel and deplore, with the greatest sensibility, the heavy loss we have so suddenly sustained. May it impress us with a just sense of the frailty and uncertainty of human life! And, profiting by his example, may we all be fully prepared for that which is soon to follow.

The resolutions of Mr. GRAHAM were then unanimously adopted;

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 24.

Death of Hon. Lewis Williams.

The journal of yesterday having been read and approved—

Mr. RAYNER, of North Carolina, addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I rise to perform a most painful and melancholy duty. Painful, most unaffectedly painful, it is to me; and melancholy it ought to be, and must be, in the associations accompanying it, to the members of this House. The Hon. LEWIS WILLIAMS, a member of this House from North Carolina, is no more. He who has been so long, and I may say so affectionately entitled "the Father of this House," has finished his earthly career. He expired at his boarding-house, in this city, about half-past one o'clock, P. M., on yesterday, after a short but most violent illness of only thirty-six hours in duration. All that medical attention and the kindness of friends could do, were exerted in his behalf, but all in vain. From the very commencement of his attack death seemed to have marked him for its own.

I am well aware that no words of mine can avail him aught; no sympathy of ours can restore him to his country and his friends. And it now only remains for us to perform the last sad rites to his memory, before we consign him to that "dust whence he sprang."

If I may be allowed to refer to the relations between him and myself, he was not only my colleague, but my friend. I have known him long, and known him well. Ever since I first formed his acquaintance, he has extended to me that friendship and that confidence, of which any one who knew him might justly feel proud. How mysterious is Divine Providence! how weak is human knowledge! Little, ah little, did I suppose one week since, that I should thus be called on to announce to this House that this political patriarch had fallen! What a sad commentary is this upon human vanity—upon the strife of contending factions! But three days since he was in the discharge of his duties on this floor, now he lies extended on the bed of death!

The deceased was in the fifty-eighth year of his age. He presented one of those rare instances in our history, of a man whose whole life may be said to have been devoted to the public service of his country. He first entered political life in 1818, when he was elected to represent his native county in the Legislature of North Carolina; and so satisfactory was his conduct there, that in the following year he was elected to represent the district in which he resided, in the House of Representatives of the United States, of which body he continued, without intermission, to be a member till the period of his death.

FEBRUARY, 1842.]

Death of Hon. Lewis Williams.

[27th Conn.]

The history of his life affords a practical refutation of the oft-repeated slander, that a long course of public service is incompatible with private virtue and personal honor. It is equally illustrative of that endearing confidence which should ever exist between the constituent and the representative—and of the meed of approbation which an honest people are ever willing to accord to a faithful public servant.

It needs no labored eulogy from me, to do justice to the manner in which he discharged his duties on this floor. It is a matter of history that, from his first appearance here, he was marked for his habits of industry, and his meekness of character, combined with energy, sterling sense, and disinterestedness of purpose. Those who have served with him, whether for a longer or a shorter period, know that he was always among the first in his seat, and the last to leave it. He always kept a vigilant eye on the progress of business through this House; and was ever as ready to sustain and advocate those measures which he believed to be for the good of his country, as to oppose those which he believed to be founded in injustice and wrong. The duties of his station he never neglected. Neither the inclemency of weather, nor personal inconvenience, ever restrained him from the performance of his trust. He was for years favorably known to this House and to the country, as the able and efficient chairman of the Committee of Claims; and it is well known that whilst he always guarded the public treasure, like a faithful sentinel, he never turned a deaf ear to the well-founded claims of justice.

His talents were of the useful and modest, and not of the showy and ostentatious order. He seemed to think that the duty of the statesman consisted in acting for the welfare of his country, and not in speaking for the entertainment of his hearers. He spoke but rarely, and then but briefly, and directly to the subject. His object was usefulness, and not display. His style was as terse and bold as it was vigorous and unaffected. And we all know how often, in moments of confusion, a few words from his lips removed our difficulties, and relieved the House from embarrassment.

In his intercourse with his fellow-members I need not say, what is well known here, that he was uniformly mild, conciliatory, and amiable. And although remarkable for the firmness and tenacity with which he adhered to his purposes and his principles, yet those who knew him well know that he always exercised a becoming charity for the honest difference of opinion entertained by others. He was distinguished for the decorum and orderly propriety of his deportment. And never, in the most trying and exciting scenes, did he so far forget the dignity of his station, as to suffer his feelings to triumph over his judgment. A rigid advocate for the maintenance of order, he always strengthened his precept by the force of his example.

Such he was as a public man in the discharge of public duty. But it was equally in his private and social relations, that his character presented an example worthy of imitation. His firm and unbending integrity, his uncompromising devotion to principle, his scrupulous regard for truth, sincerity, and honor, have long been proverbial. A warm and devoted friend, a charitable and kind-hearted man, his heart was always responsive to the appeals of sympathy, his purse was ever open to the voice of distress. Such being the case, may we not well and truly exclaim—an honest and virtuous man has died! His course has, indeed, been an eventful one. With a calm and contemplative mind, he has, for more than a quarter of a century, viewed the shifting scenes on the great drama of his country's history; and during the darkest periods of that country's peril, he has clung to her with patriotic affection. He has seen peace and war, prosperity and calamity, excitement and calm, succeeding in their turns. He has seen parties and administrations, factions and dynasties, rise and fall. Yet, during all the twenty-eight years of his public career, censorious as is the world, the tongue of slander has never whispered aught against his integrity and his virtue. To the last he continued to "fight the good fight," and to "keep that faith" which is based on the true principles of liberty and an unwavering devotion to the free institutions of his country. Let me not be misunderstood; I have no allusion to party.

No matter how others may be affected, his colleagues know how to appreciate his loss. How often, in the hour of difficulty, have we consulted his sound practical wisdom and tried integrity! He stood, as it were, an impersonation of the character of the "Old North State," whose interests he represented so faithfully, and which he loved so well—combining energy with calmness, patriotism and virtue with unpretending simplicity. Although his ears will no more listen to the murmuring of waters from her western mountains; although his eyes will no more be gladdened with the view of his dear native hills; yet his memory will live in the hearts of his confiding constituents, and be handed down with reverence to their succeeding children.

Although we mourn his loss, yet we have the consolation to know, that he died in "the triumphs of that faith" to whose precepts he conformed in life. At an early age he attached himself to the Presbyterian church, and continued an exemplary member of the same down to the period of his death. He never suffered public duty or private pleasure to interfere with the discharge of those duties which he owed to his God. To his latest breath he looked with humble and calm resignation to that Great and Good Being, in whom he trusted when living, and whom he "confessed before men." Those of us who witnessed his last moments, have had read to us the impressive and never-to-be-forgotten lesson, with what quiet composure a Christian can die. He has left this world forever; but still

2d Sess.]

Death of Hon. Lewis Williams.

[FEBRUARY, 1842.]

The sweet remembrance of the just Shall flourish while he sleeps in dust.

Mr. RAYNER then sent to the Clerk's table the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House has heard with the liveliest sensibility the announcement of the death of the Hon. LEWIS WILLIAMS, late a member from the State of North Carolina, and the oldest member in service in this House.

Resolved, That this House tenders to the relatives of the deceased the expression of its sympathy on this afflicting event; and as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members and officers will wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That the members and officers of this House will attend the funeral of the Hon. LEWIS WILLIAMS, deceased, late a member of this House, to-morrow, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

The resolutions having been read—

Mr. ADAMS rose and said: Mr. Speaker, I second the motion, and ask the indulgence of the House for the utterance of a few words, from a heart full to overflowing with anguish which no words can express.

Sir, my acquaintance with Mr. WILLIAMS commenced with the second Congress of his service in this House. Twenty-five years have since elapsed, during all which he has been always here at his post, always true to his trust, always adhering faithfully to his constituents and to his country—always, and through every political vicissitude and revolution, adhered to faithfully by them. I have often thought that this steadfastness of mutual attachment between the Representative and the Constituent was characteristic of both; and, concurring with the ideas just expressed with such touching eloquence by his colleague, (Mr. RAYNER,) I have habitually looked upon LEWIS WILLIAMS as the true portraiture and personification of the people of North Carolina.

Sir, the loss of such a man, at any time, to his country, would be great. To this House, at this juncture, it is irreparable. His wisdom, his experience, his unsullied integrity, his ardent patriotism, his cool and deliberate judgment, his conciliatory temper, his firm adherence to principle—where shall we find a substitute for them? In the distracted state of our public councils, with the wormwood and the gall of personal animosities adding tenfold bitterness to the conflict of rival interests and discordant opinions, how shall we have to deplore the bereavement of his presence, the very light of whose countenance, the very sound of whose voice, could recall us, like a talisman, from the tempest of hostile passions to the calm composure of harmony and peace.

Mr. WILLIAMS was and had long been, in the official language which we have adopted from the British House of Commons, the Father of the House; and though my junior by nearly twenty years, I have looked up to him, in this House, with the reverence of filial affection, as if he was the father of us all. The seriousness and gravity of his character, tempered as it was with habitual cheerfulness and equanimity, peculiarly fitted him for that relation to the other members of the House, while the unassuming courtesy of his deportment, and the benevolence of his disposition, invited every one to consider him as a brother.

Sir, he is gone! The places that have known him shall know him no more; but his memory shall be treasured up by the wise and the good of his contemporaries, as eminent among the patriots and statesmen of this our native land; and were it possible for any Northern bosom, within this hall, ever to harbor for one moment a wish for the dissolution of our National Union, may the spirit of our departed friend, pervading every particle of the atmosphere around us, dispel the delusion of his soul by reminding him, that in that event he would no longer be the the countryman of LEWIS WILLIAMS!

Mr. W. O. JOHNSTON rose and said: I rise, Mr. Speaker, to add my humble tribute to the virtues and memory of a departed friend—one who I may truly say stood to me in the place of a father; for, when young and inexperienced, I first entered this hall, it was to him I was indebted for the prudent counsel and kind aid which inexperience always finds grateful from the head and heart of such a man. His public career, identified for more than a quarter of a century with the legislation of this House, is one upon which every patriot should delight to gaze. "As Aristides, just; as Cato, pure;" he has stood before the world the advocate of justice to individuals and the Government.

His indomitable and unbending integrity, his consistency as a politician, and his adherence to the best interests of his country, are too distinguished even for eulogy.

Remarkable for his sound judgment and common sense, his voice was never raised without instruction; and his purposes were never perverted amid the excitement of party feeling.

Though not brilliant and eloquent, yet men of brilliancy and eloquence in this hall were his inferiors; and his light, safe and steadfast, shone even over the path of more aspiring statesmen.

Sudden and melancholy as is his death, he was still spared long and faithfully to serve his native State, and his memory will be among the richest of her treasures.

JUNE, 1842.]

The Apportionment Bill.

[27TH CONG.]

When called to visit my departed friend, I found him sinking into death, and at the bedside of the dying patriot I realized the loss which I, this House, and this country, have sustained; and I cannot repress the utterance of my deep grief at this sudden and overwhelming bereavement.

It is with an aching heart I have now risen to speak the language of a long-cherished affection for a friend, a patriot, and an honest man.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolutions, and they were unanimously adopted.

On motion of Mr. STANLY, the usual message was ordered to be sent to the Senate.

And the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1.

Portrait of Columbus.

The SPEAKER presented to the House the following communication:

CHARLESTON, May 24, 1842.

To the Hon. Speaker of the House of Representatives:

SIR: I have the honor to solicit your acceptance, on behalf of Congress, of the accompanying portrait, representing the great discoverer of our hemisphere—the immortal Columbus; none of whose likenesses hitherto extant can be regarded as authentic.

While in charge of our legation at Madrid, it was my good fortune, after many fruitless searches in quest of the genuine likeness, to fall in with that of which I now present the copy, executed for me by Senor Madrazo, director of the Royal Museum in that capital.

The certificate annexed to the portrait of Don Fernandez de Navarrete will, no doubt, appear conclusive as to its superiority over other likenesses, to all aware (and all who know him are so) as well of his high sense of honor, as of his unrivalled acquaintance with the history, private and public, of all the great discoverers. And if, after referring to his testimonials, this painting be regarded worthy your acceptance, my satisfaction will be shared by every true American, in seeing it placed, as it ought to be, among the effigies of the fathers of our great Republic.

I have the honor to be, sir,

With the greatest respect,

Your obedient servant,

ARTHUR MIDDLETON.

Mr. EVERETT and Mr. HOLMES rose simultaneously.

Mr. EVERETT moved the reference of this communication to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. HOLMES submitted a resolution of acceptance of the portrait; that it be placed in the library of Congress; and that the thanks of the House be returned to the donor.

Mr. EVERETT reiterated that it was proper that the communication should be referred to the Committee on the Library before the House took any final action on the subject.

It was so referred accordingly.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, JUNE 8.

The Apportionment Bill.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. WRIGHT to amend the following section:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in every case when a State is entitled to more than one Representative, the number to which each State shall be entitled under this apportionment shall be elected by districts, composed of contiguous territory, equal in number to the number of Representatives to which said State may be entitled—no one district electing more than one Representative.

Mr. WRIGHT had moved to strike from the above section the words “no one district electing more than one Representative,” and to insert the words “as far as that can be done in conformity with the established election systems of the States; but no State shall, by virtue of the provisions of this section, consider itself called upon to divide counties, or other election districts, for the purpose of furnishing single districts.”

Mr. BAGBY observed, that whatever the views of Senators on this side of the House might be, with regard to the second section of the bill—whether modified, as proposed, or not—he was opposed to it in any form in which it could be presented. He considered it a proposition wholly unconstitutional. This Government possesses no powers, except those expressly granted to it in the constitution, and the power to pass laws necessary for carrying out those expressed powers. This he showed from the context of the instrument itself; and he pointed particularly to the power granted by the constitution to the Legislatures of the States, of electing two Senators each; and asked, was not the same right insured to the people of the States to elect their own Representatives? What, he asked, was it that led to the Revolution, but the denial of the right of representation? and was not this constitution a guarantee of the corrective?

Some gentlemen seem to think that although the general-ticket system may be more convenient to some of the States, yet precedent, and the sanction of years, have been in favor of the district system. In great political questions, however much entitled to consideration both precedent and the sanction of former ages may be, yet the experience and the judgment of the present generation should, in his mind, be entitled to preference.

He reviewed in detail the arguments in favor of the district system, pointed out their fallacy as he proceeded, and showing that the operation of such a system, instead of producing that balance of interests in the National Legislature contemplated by the framers of the constitution, would destroy that balance. If the effect of the general-ticket system was to give the large populations of the large States a preponderance over the small populations of the small States, that was a circumstance foreseen by the framers of the constitution; and it was well understood that such preponderance was inevitable. To balance it, the Senate was constituted upon such a foundation as to secure to every State, whether large or small, an equality in its representation in one branch of the Legislature.

2d Sess.]

The Apportionment Bill.

[JUNE, 1842.]

He contended that it was entirely visionary to hope, by any change from the general-ticket system to the district system, to effect the chimerical object of representing minorities, as well as majorities. The whole foundation of the republican institutions of this country, was based on the principle of the majority being entitled to the government of the whole. The very principle of the capacity of men to govern themselves, rested on this element of republican institutions. He did not wish to be understood as denying the right of minorities. He had been bred in the school of minorities; but he believed the right of those in the minority was secured in the right to vote.

He supported his argument as to the unconstitutionality of the district system, by reference to the proceedings of conventions in several States. He asked, would any gentleman contend that it was constitutional to divide one county entitled to four members, into four districts, confining a voter to vote for only one member, and denying him the right of voting for the other three Representatives of his county? The constitution entitles the voters of the county to vote according to their respective numbers; and the respective numbers of that county entitle it to four members. But Congress says no voter in such county shall vote for these four members; how can such an order be constitutional? And if it is not in this case, it cannot be in respect to the whole State.

If it was true that the adoption of the general-ticket system would lead to a great overgrown oligarchy, it was not his fault, or that of the Senator; for he was quite satisfied both had the same object in view—the best means of securing popular rights. But, if any change was necessary, it could not, he contended, be effected constitutionally in any other way than that pointed out by the constitution itself. Would the Senator from Kentucky say that such an organic law could be passed, according to the constitution?

Mr. CHITTENDEN explained, that he had made use of the term "organic law" in reference to a law necessary to organize the House of Representatives.

Mr. BAERY was glad the Senator had called his attention back to the organization of the House of Representatives. He considered it a great mistake to suppose that local interests were to be represented in detail in that House;—these details were taken care of in the State Legislatures; it would be wholly out of place to introduce local influences into a National Legislature, intended to represent the people of a State collectively, in reference to matters of national import, or affecting the interests of States.

He wanted to have the whole people represented in the whole number of their Representatives. He wished to enjoy the right of an American citizen, which he considered paramount to the rights of either a Senator or Representative; and it was in maintenance of that primary right, that he contended for the enjoyment of the right to vote for every Representative of his State, as well as for the Representative of his own vicinity.

The bill was not only constitutional in principle, but grossly unconstitutional in its details. It is contended that Congress has power over the time, manner, and place of elections, in the power to alter the regulations of the States. But he could point out many things in relation to the time, manner, and place of elections, which solely belong to the States, and which Congress could not constitutionally attempt to regulate. And if Congress was precluded from interfering in any one thing, it could not be more certain that it was precluded from interfering in the manner proposed by this bill. It may be passed into a law; but it will be a dead-letter law, for it never can be carried out. He did not know how many States would obey it; but he knew at least one State which never would. It might be called an order, mandate, or a regulation; its name, however, would not sanction its usurpation. He would ask for the grant of the power, satisfied that it could not be produced. If gentlemen are convinced that the crisis has arrived in which it is imperatively necessary to act, and to act decisively, how did it happen that they stopped short half-way, and proposed to accomplish only half the work necessary to carry out the change they contemplated? Why not come out like men, and, if they have the power, assert it, when the necessity is so apparent and imperious? He could not help looking to the consequences which must result from this bill being adopted, and attempted to be carried out in its present form. These consequences are unavoidable.

He did not deny the power of Congress over the time, manner, and place of elections, in reference to making, or altering regulations made, or neglected to be made, by the States; but this power did not, and could not, reach to the interference with any personal rights secured to every citizen by the constitution. He would illustrate his meaning: As to time, Congress might direct a particular day for elections—such as the first day of August; as to place, Congress might direct that the elections should be held at the county seats of each county, or in different precincts; as to manner, it might direct the vote to be taken by ballot or viva voce; but it could not, constitutionally, order a voter to vote for one man and not another. Now, here was an unconstitutional usurpation of power, which would be a direct violation of the constitution.

He maintained that every qualified voter of a State, had the right to vote for every member to which such State was entitled to represent her in the House. If any other course was pursued, the design of the constitution would be defeated; for the constitution secures to each State her proper quota of Representatives, to be elected by the people of such State—not by a portion of the people, but by the whole people. He argued that, if the district system was a proper one by the constitution, Congress had the power to adopt it, and fix its details; but that she had no right to call upon any State to do it. An act making such a call, would be therefore unconstitutional. The march of Federal power was to be more strongly marked in this Congress, than by any preceding one since the formation of the Government. He meant that the Federal Government had made, and was making, greater stretches towards engrossing the powers of the States, than at any previous period in the history of Congress.

The National Treasury, too, had become as empty as space. The Government is bankrupt; its credit is destroyed. You have instituted loans, and gone into market with your certificates, which could not be disposed of on any terms. You have refused to bring back to the Treasury one of the standing sources of revenue. You beg with one hand and give away with the other. One of the Federal encroachments was to be found in the establishment of the bankrupt law, which Congress had refused to suspend. The bill before the Senate was another step towards Federal encroachment. A measure was now in progress in this body—for what purpose? For the purpose of stripping the States of their criminal jurisdiction—not in all cases, but such as the Federal Government, in its discretion, thinks proper to prescribe.

He hoped this course of legislation would soon be arrested, and that a return would be made to the first principles of this Government. He viewed the tendencies of such measures as this, in connection with other measures infringing upon the sovereign powers of the several States, as the lion's tracks on the broad plain—all leading to one den. No encroachment could be made on the sovereign powers of the States that did not weaken them, and, in the same ratio, aggrandize and consolidate power in the Federal Government. This was a progression that could not long continue, without reaching a point at which an organic change would be inevitable.

Suppose it should happen that this law would be passed? he asked, what would be the first question put to gentlemen on their return to their constituents? Would it not be, What in the world put it into your head to vote for this change? What occasion was there for it? We did not call for it, or want it. The people of Georgia, of Alabama, of Mississippi, &c., &c., did not call for it, or want it. There was no necessity for it.

Mr. GRAHAM wished very much to see the vote taken on this occasion; and it was, therefore, with reluctance he felt himself obliged to delay that event by expressing his views in relation to the subject. He had listened with great attention to the remarks of the Senator from Alabama, and was not a little surprised to find a doctrine—advanced by him for the first time, as far as he knew—that all the States are constitutionally bound to establish the general-ticket system.

Mr. G. entered at large into the refutation of this doctrine, and quoted several passages from the Federalist, to show that the district system was the mode of electing members to the popular branch of the National Legislature, contemplated by the founders of the constitution. He had not been able to find, in the debates in the convention, that any one was in favor of the adoption of the general-ticket system. The district system was adopted by most of the States immediately after the ratification of the constitution; and, among these, was the State of Virginia, in which Mr. Madison, Gen. Washington, and many of the framers of the constitution resided. It was clear, then, that the system was considered not only undoubtedly constitutional, but most eligible. He next reviewed the evidences of public opinion in favor of the district system, from the organization of the Government down to the year 1816. It was a system so much in favor with the people of North Carolina, that Dr. Smith brought the subject before the House of Representatives in 1820, in a resolution in favor of an amendment to the constitution—that Representatives should be so elected; and the vote on it was 94 yeas, 54 nays; and it was only for want of two-thirds that it failed. He referred to Mr. McDuffie's report in favor of making a uniform law for the election of members for the House of Representatives, in the sentiments of which he fully concurred.

Mr. G., for the purpose of showing that this was not the first time that the subject of restricting the States had been agitated in Congress, read extracts from this report of Mr. McDuffie, to establish the fact that it had not only received the countenance of Congress, but of the people of the States. He coincided with that gentleman, that it was highly expedient to adopt that system. He argued that in every country of which he had any knowledge, where a Representative Government existed at all, they had not elected by the whole mass of the voters; but, on the other hand, in every country which possessed freedom to any extent, the people had elected their public agents by districts, parishes, counties, or whatever they were called; so that evidences of the public opinion might be brought to the capital. In order to have a correct representation, there should be something of intimacy between the Representative and his constituents, so that he might explain to them the opinions which he entertained of public affairs, and give to them an account of his stewardship. This was the case where the district system was in force, but not so with the general-ticket system.

In order to have a fair representation, it was necessary that the Representative should have an opportunity to meet the people he represents face to face. This could only be done by the district system. When the districts are made of a convenient size, a man must have more worth than mere talent to recommend him to the consideration of the people—he must also have virtue, which was essential in a Representative. He believed it was necessary, to preserve the Representative system in its purity, to bring the representative in a close alliance with the constituency. This could not be done through the general-ticket system. Of the virtues of the candidates, it would be difficult for the mass of the population of a State to know.

2d Sess.]

The Apportionment Bill.

[JUNE, 1842.]

Mr. G. contended that the evidences of the public sentiment were in favor of the district system. He quoted Mr. Madison, from the Federalist, to sustain him in the position that the plan proposed was excellent and proper; and, so far from being a rule through which to acquire new power, it was one merely to produce uniformity. The system was not a novel one, but was long known to the American people, and was pressed upon the consideration of Congress by the people, not only as a matter of experience, but as a constitutional provision, for the purpose of preventing the institutions of the country from falling into the hands of a faction.

It was admitted, he believed, on all hands, so far as he understood the argument, that Congress might district the States, and cause the Representatives to be elected according to the district system; yet, it was argued, that if she preferred the district system, she must execute the law—she must lay off the districts, but could not command the States to do it; that is, if she legislated at all upon the subject, she could not do it partially, but must do it fully, and leave nothing to depend upon the volition of the States.

Now he (Mr. G.) maintained that, by the superseding power in the constitution, which gives Congress the right to alter the regulations of the States as to the times, place, and manner of election of Representatives, she had the right to declare that the district system should be adopted, without executing it. She has the right to supersede what the States have done upon the subject, which involved the further right to make. The power given to the States over the subject was a mere trusteeship, and not absolute; but liable to be superseded, and capable of being controlled by the action of Congress. If Congress has the power to establish and lay off the district system, she has the power, also, to grant a trusteeship to execute the law for her.

Mr. BUCHANAN had not yet spoken on this subject at all, nor did he know that he would; but it appeared to him that the Senator had not yet touched on the main point; and that was, whether he considered Congress had a right to order the States to carry out this law? and, if so, how the power is to be enforced? and, if Congress passed the law, was it not bound also to carry it out itself?

Mr. GRAHAM said he understood the Senator from New York to concede the whole power; and all he contended for was, that Congress might, at its discretion, exercise the power in part, in preference to an exercise of the whole power. But until Congress acted, the power of the State Legislatures over the question was full. But the power became absolute in Congress so soon as she acted upon the subject. In reply to the argument that there was no cause for the action of Congress, no State having failed to provide for election of Representatives; he maintained that Congress could act without a State being in default. He did not think it was proper to defer the exercise of such a power till some State should be in default. It was better to provide in anticipation, and not wait till such default should occur, when the feelings and affections of the people would be fixed.

In conclusion, he contended that if the Legislatures of the States should fail to district the States under this law, Congress would be obliged to declare elections under any other system null and void. It would not be necessary, in default of action by any States, to attempt to force, by the powers of the General Government, any such States to act. If they failed to elect under the law, their Representatives would be repudiated and a new election ordered. He further argued that it would be a departure from the theory of the constitution, and from what it was intended by its framers, to adopt a general-ticket system, which looked rather to a representation of States than to individual citizens. The Senate was the body in which, by the constitution, the States, as sovereignties, were intended to be represented; and the House of Representatives the body in which the people were intended to be represented—not as communities, but as individual citizens. The interests of individuals would be swallowed up and lost sight of, if the principle of representing States or communities in both branches of Congress should be established as a principle.

Mr. WALKER observed, that before the Legislature of his State should meet at its next regular session, if this bill was passed in its present form, the election of her Representatives must take place before any law of the State can be passed to carry out the mandate of Congress. How, then, was the State to be represented at the next Congress, if the power existed of rejecting its Representatives for not being elected in conformity with this law?

He contended that this bill would be a return to the principles of the old confederation. Both Mr. Madison and Mr. Jefferson had declared the difference between the old confederation and the new Constitution of the United States, was, that the powers of the old confederation were exercised as imperative mandates on the States; whereas the constitution secured to the States the principle that no powers should be exercised over the States but those they agreed specifically should be so exercised.

It was never contemplated by the framers of the constitution that Congress would pass a law compelling a State to pass a law, any more than that it would have power to compel a man to vote for a law which he believed to be unconstitutional. Suppose the State of Alabama should continue of opinion that the mandate of the constitution is, that elections shall be by general ticket; what would be the consequence of attempting to enforce this law, ordering them to change their system to the district system, but that Alabama should either go without any representation, or that her citizens should be compelled to vote for a law they believed to be unconstitutional? This is going back to the principles of the old confederation, the great evil of which, Mr. Jefferson says, was, that it issued its mandates to sovereign States, compelling them to obedience.

Every law which Congress has power to pass, it must have power to execute. Who will be sent to execute this law? Will it be the President of the United States, who is sworn to carry out the laws of Congress? Can he go into every State, and compel legislatures to assemble and pass a law, and then compel the Governor to sign the law? The proposition involves an absurdity. The whole thing is an absurdity.

Mr. BAYARD interposed. He took it for granted that, when a question is asked in argument, it is either for the purpose of obtaining an answer, or for assuming the admission of an implied conclusion. Now, he was ready to answer the Senator's questions, but not to admit his inference. His answer was, that there was neither absurdity nor want of precedent in this mode of using a power, without asserting the execution of the law, which is left for the States themselves to execute.

He referred to the 15th paragraph of the 8th section of the 1st article of the constitution, for a case in point. That paragraph is: Congress shall have power "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." Now, he asked the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. WALKER,) was not this an instance in which Congress had the power to pass a law regulating the discipline of the militia? Yet it might be said because the State had the appointment of the officers, and the officers commanded the militia, Congress could not make use of that force to execute its own law. It was for Congress to make the law, and for the State Legislatures to provide the means of carrying it out. Such, too, was the case in relation to the bill before the Senate.

Mr. WALKER said, if that was so, Congress must wait till the officers are appointed by the States before it can attempt to carry out its laws by military force. And here the Senator had given a clear demonstration that the President would have no business going into a State to carry out this law.

Mr. W. considered it was the officers appointed to carry out the laws who were amenable to Congress for not carrying them out—not the citizens, who deny their constitutional obligation to obey the law. Was there any power to pass a law to carry this law into effect, should the officers appointed to carry it out fail to do so? It could not be done; which shows that it is not a power within the meaning of the proviso in the constitution, that Congress shall have power to pass all laws necessary to carry out the enumerated powers of the constitution.

It was because he wished to discourage collisions between the States and the General Government, that he had risen to oppose this clause. He was in favor of the district system; but he was opposed to carrying it to such extremes as to carve up districts in such a manner as to make them temptations for gerrymandering from one to another. He could not but look upon this law as a law tending to bring Congress into contempt; for the result would be, if it is passed, that Representatives elected in contravention of the law must be admitted to their seats—evincing a practical illustration of its nullity.

Mr. RIVES had listened with attention to the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina, so well and so eloquently expressed; and would not have stood up to say a word, had it not been for the allusion which the Senator had made to the action of Virginia in 1816. He agreed in every thing the Senator had said in favor of the district system in preference to the general-ticket system. But he contended that all the proceedings to which the Senator had alluded, were for the purpose of procuring an amendment to the constitution, and not as any indication that Congress ought to exercise the power. He challenged the Senator to point out a solitary instance in which it had ever been proposed or suggested that Congress should exercise this power of ordering the district system to be established throughout the States. It was too delicate a power to be used without imperious necessity. His main objection was yet unanswered: it was, that if this law be passed now, another Congress might come in, and, for party purposes, repeal it, and establish the general-ticket system.

Mr. HENDERSON, in answer to the question which had been repeatedly asked, Would Congress command the obedience of the States? replied by reading the clause in the bill, and stating that all Congress conceived it necessary to do was to pass the law. It was the duty of the legislatures of the States to carry it out.

The Senate then adjourned.

SATURDAY, JUNE 4.

The Apportionment Bill.

The question pending when the Senate ad-

2d Sess.]

The Apportionment Bill.

[JUNE, 1842.]

jourled on yesterday, was the motion of Mr. WRIGHT to amend the bill.

Mr. MOREHEAD said: When the convention met in 1787, for the purpose of framing a constitution to be adopted by the several States then forming the Confederation, great difficulties arose as to the details of formation; and, in order to lessen those difficulties, it became necessary to appoint a committee of details. Before this committee all questions at issue were debated and adjusted, and then laid before the Convention. The first questions were brought forward in the form of resolutions, and were discussed for some time, till all their bearings were ascertained. In the month of August, the Committee on Details was appointed to consider and report a plan for the constitution. On the 6th of August, 1787, a report was made, accompanied by the plan of constitution approved by the Committee on Details. In the first section of the sixth article of this plan, there was a provision, that the time, manner, and place of holding elections, should be prescribed by the Legislatures of the States, respectively; but that the regulations of the States might, at any time, be altered by the Congress of the United States. Here was a direct reservation to the States that they should prescribe the time, manner, and place of holding elections; and, until that was done, Congress could not interfere; but, being done, it could interfere and alter the time, manner, and place appointed by the State Legislatures. This plan was discussed at great length. He would call the attention of the Senate to what was said by Mr. Madison, and others, on that occasion; with a view of showing how fully all the bearings of the question now at issue were then considered. Mr. M. read passages at considerable length from the debate to which he alluded.

Here, then, the very question of power now under discussion came up—whether the States should reserve it wholly, or the Congress of the United States should have power to control the subject by alteration. He quoted still more at large from the debates in convention, to show the opinions entertained by the most prominent of the delegates, and the motives which influenced the choice of the clause as it now appears in the constitution. He considered it perfectly conclusive, from this evidence, that the members of the convention intended that the power should be exercised as now proposed, whenever Congress should decide upon the expediency. It was given, in the first place, to counteract any movements of the Legislatures of the States to carry out any specific object inconsistent with the general interests of the Confederation. One of the great objects was, that the Federal Government should possess the power of producing uniformity throughout the Union, and prevent the destruction of the General Government—a power necessary for self-preservation.

Particular regulations were to be left to the Legislature of the States; but general regulations were to be given to the Federal Government. Suppose an amendment to this bill should prevail, that elections should be carried on throughout the United States by the general-ticket system: could it be denied that Congress had the power to order its adoption, under the provision of the constitution which gives the control of the general regulation to the Federal Government? If the power over the one proposition is undoubted, so it is with regard to the other.

In 1789, the first Congress met under the constitution. It is well known that it met under circumstances of embarrassment; some of the States having hesitated about ratifying the constitution. He referred to various propositions made at that time to limit Congress in the exercise of its power over the time, manner, and place of holding elections, except in cases where the States should refuse or be disabled from exercising the power—propositions which bear the strongest evidence that the power was conceded to the Federal Government; and that, so undoubted was the power of Congress, that it was thought by some necessary to curtail it. The amendment was rejected by a majority of some five or six votes. Such is the contemporaneous exposition of this clause.

The Senator from New Hampshire puts his opposition on the ground that Congress cannot interfere, except for proper and sufficient reasons. Now, he contended that the provision of the constitution was explicit and unconditional. It is, therefore, a power to be exercised at the discretion of Congress. If the States exercise properly the power which they are suffered to exercise, Congress may not see fit to interfere; but if Congress conceives the power is improperly exercised by the States, it has undoubted discretionary power to make or alter the regulations of the States. Who was to be the judge of the discretion of Congress? Who could be, but Congress itself? When it is once admitted that the power exists, there is no appeal. The only question, then, which could arise, was the question of discretion; but if Congress decided that it was expedient to exercise the power, surely the Senator from New Hampshire would not contend that it would be consistent with the terms of confederation that New Hampshire should set at naught a law of Congress, deliberately considered and adopted, and decided to be within the powers of the Federal Government.

Great objection had been made to this clause that it is mandatory—that it commands the obedience of the State Governments. It has in contemplation no such purpose. It claims no right to issue a mandate—issues no order—demands no obedience. But, it is said, if this law is passed, and Congress has no power to carry out its own law, the law must be a nullity; which refutes the assertion of the power. His first answer to this was, that Congress performs its defined duties in making a law to carry out an express power; and the matter then is taken out of the hands of Congress by the constitution, and its execution is confided to the Legislatures of the States. They are accountable to their States for the non-fulfilment of their duties. Why would the States disregard this law? Why should any State be offended, and prefer taking the power from the Federal Government? Does not Congress, in effect, say to the States—We forbear to exercise our power in full, because we prefer, out of courtesy, to exercise the power only in part. We declare the district system shall prevail, and be uniform all over the United States; but we leave to the State Legislatures the carrying out of the law in detail.

Is there any thing disrespectful in this? Is it less disrespectful than to assert the whole power, and exercise it, without any courtesy to the States? Upon what principle of policy, of affection, or of propriety, could a State set up the standard of opposition to the exercise of an express power conferred on the Federal Government?

The case of Tennessee was referred to the other day. That State, at present, is without representatives in this chamber; and is it not as imperative on the State to send Senators as to send Representatives? But it is left to the State itself to decide on this matter, although it is as much within the province of the Federal Government to require that State to send Senators as to send Representatives. Suppose the State of New Hampshire should decline to carry out this law, and refuse to send Representatives to Congress. What then? Was not that a subject of full as much interest to New Hampshire as to the Federal Government? The Federal Government did not claim to have the power to compel New Hampshire to send Representatives. Whenever it came to such a crisis as that, if there should be a general movement of the kind, it would be an evidence that the power of cohesion no longer existed: there would be an end to all mutual duties and obligations.

With regard to the enumerated powers of Congress, it was a plain case that these powers might be either dormant or active; they might be subject to laws to assert and carry them out, or they might lie in abeyance till asserted by laws of Congress. If in abeyance, the States might use them till they were superseded by a law of Congress asserting their exercise on the part of the Federal Government. The States had the reserved right to their use till demanded by the Federal Government. He next alluded to the arguments on the other side, made by the Senator from Alabama yesterday—that it was all visionary to expect the representation of minorities. This was a monstrous doctrine; no such state of things could exist.

Mr. BAGBY explained that he had said minorities could not, and would not, in great political questions, be represented. He asked the Senator from Kentucky if the party lines in his State were drawn?

Mr. MOREHEAD said he believed they were pretty much as in other States.

Mr. BAGBY asked the Senator if, in a great political question—not with regard to private rights, but public rights—a question between the majority and the minority—he would feel bound to conform his votes in this chamber to the will of the majority or of the minority of his State?

Mr. MOREHEAD observed, that he would answer the Senator's question without hesitation. In any great political question between the majority and the minority of his State, he would religiously conform to the will of the majority. In great public questions, he should be thus governed; but in private rights, he would be uninfluenced by party motives, and he would faithfully represent the minority as the majority.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed, that if he thought any remarks he had to make would prolong the discussion so as to prevent the bill being advanced on its passage to-day, he would not say a word. He would ask the Senator from Georgia whether the discussion was to be carried any further.

Mr. BERRIEN could not say; he would not interfere with the course the Senator should think proper to pursue.

Mr. BUCHANAN then proceeded, and enforced the following points:

1. That this provision, requiring the State Legislatures to divide the several States into single Congressional districts, ought not to have been embraced in the present bill. It was the imperative duty of Congress, under the constitution, to apportion Representatives among the several States, according to their respective numbers. It was necessary to the very preservation of the Government that this duty should be performed. If it had been the intention of the framers of the bill (which it certainly was not) to have defeated this purpose altogether, they could not have devised any better means to accomplish their purpose. Suppose twenty Senators must vote against the bill, because they deem the provision unconstitutional: if five more should vote against it, because they deem the ratio too small, or too great, or for any other reason, this apportionment bill is thus defeated; and we shall have no apportionment of Representatives among the States. The subject of districting the States ought, therefore, to have been kept distinct from the apportionment of Representatives.

2. Admitting that Congress possesses the power over the whole subject, can we exercise it, by issuing a mandamus to the State Legislatures, directing them what legislation they shall adopt? or must not Congress pass the law, and execute it by its own authority? The governing principle of the framers of the constitution—the very key which unlocks its meaning—is, that the enumerated powers conferred upon Congress are to be executed by Federal, and not by State authority. The system of requisitions upon States existed under the old Confederation; but the States neglected or refused to obey those requisitions. It was for the purpose of enabling the Federal Government to act by its own authority directly upon the people, and not upon the State sovereignties, that the Federal Convention was called together. You now propose to direct the Legislatures of sovereign States how they shall act, just as you did under the old Confederation. These Legislatures must exercise their own discretion; and if they solemnly believe your law to be unconstitutional, they cannot vote for carrying it into effect, without violating their oaths. The principle has been admitted by all, that Congress cannot direct a State Legislature what law it shall pass; but the fact is denied that this bill contains any such mandate. This appeared to him to be too clear for argument. The bill was as positive in its language as it could be; and the penalty annexed for disobedience was, that the States should have no representation in Congress. If, then, you desire to establish the district system, do it under your own authority—which you have a right to do; but do not command the States to do it for you.

[2d Sess.]

The Apportionment Bill.

[JUNE, 1842.]

The third point made by Mr. BUCHANAN was, that, although Congress possesses the constitutional power to district the States for the election of Representatives, if it will carry out the whole process by its own authority, yet, under existing circumstances, it would be a great abuse to exercise this power.

All the dangerous collisions which have ever existed between the State and Federal authorities, have arisen from the exercise of doubtful and dangerous powers by Congress. This is an attempt to interfere with what immediately concerns the dearest domestic institution of the States—their discretion as to the mode in which they will elect their own Representatives to Congress. So jealous were our fathers in this particular, that seven of the State conventions which ratified the constitution solemnly protested against the exercise of this power, unless to perpetuate the Government itself. Does any such necessity exist now for interposing? Have the States neglected to perform their appropriate duties? Has any complaint come up to us from the people on this subject? Not one. We now propose to legislate, not for any existing evil, but for evils which may hereafter exist, but, for the present, are confined to the imagination of Senators. Mankind are too much governed. This dangerous power ought never to be exercised without necessity. Why, then, interfere?

Mr. B. then proceeded to defend Mr. WAIGHT against the attacks which had been made upon him by Whig Senators. He said, if you pass this bill, the Legislatures of the different States may consider it, as he did, unconstitutional. How can they try the constitutionality of the bill, in a constitutional manner, but by providing a different mode of electing Representatives from what this bill prescribes. The Representatives thus elected will present themselves to the House, and demand admission. That House is the only tribunal on earth which can decide the question. If several States should pursue this course—and some of them must pursue that course, for it is now too late to change their laws—it would involve the country in great confusion, and subject it to imminent danger. The Senator from New York, then, made no threat; but he merely said, under such circumstances, the House of Representatives would long pause before they would reject Representatives thus elected by sovereign States.

The large States have never complained that a few of the small ones elect by general ticket. In a political view, they counterbalance each other. The general-ticket system is gradually growing into disrepute in public opinion. It will wear out of itself, if you would leave the subject alone. But your very legislation may arouse this slumbering lion. If you carry this provision by a strict party vote, it will probably, ere long, be repealed by a party vote. Congress may then go still farther. The people of Pennsylvania will think that they ought not to exercise less political power in the House of Representatives than New Jersey; and they may insist upon the general-ticket system to correct this inequality. If left to themselves, they will remain content with the existing system.

He concluded by solemnly appealing to the Senate not to exercise this doubtful and dangerous power, when no necessity existed for its exercise.

Mr. TALLMADGE conceived that if there ever was a question agitated, in this or the other House, free from doubt, this was that question. If there had been a doubt on his mind, the debate on the subject would have dispelled it. To him, it was now perfectly plain that the law was both constitutional and expedient. He did not design to recapitulate the arguments adduced in support of the constitutional question; but he would submit his views in relation to one or two points. The constitution allows the States to make regulations in relation to the time, manner, and place of holding elections, and Congress may alter the regulations of the States.

If he understood the Senator from Pennsylvania, he denies this right of Congress.

Mr. BUCHANAN interposed to say that he had made no such denial.

Mr. TALLMADGE. Well, then, he understood the Senator now to concede the right of Congress to alter the time appointed by the States for holding elections; to alter the place of holding elections; or to alter the manner of holding elections. This being conceded, he did not conceive how it could be contended that Congress had the discretion to exercise the power in part or wholly.

JUNE, 1843.]

The Apportionment Bill.

[27th CONG.]

He held that, whatever time, manner, or place Congress may think fit to appoint for holding elections, the States are bound to conform—it is their duty. A Legislature which refuses to do this, violates not alone its duty to the United States, but its duty to its own State. But he was in favor of exercising this power, at present, as far only as to single districts, but no further; because he thought it would be most satisfactory to a majority of the States not to have double districts. He held that it was altogether expedient for Congress to pass this law now; and if it was passed, he would undertake to say that the people of his State would obey it. He denied that there was any disposition in that State to question the power of Congress in this matter. New York hesitated long about coming into this Union; but it was not on any question of this power; it was wholly on the ground of having to give up her immense imposts. He would not say that he did not know that New York would or would not obey this law; for he did know that she would not hesitate—she never would be so recreant to her duty as not to perform it, knowing that it is enjoined by the constitution.

Mr. WALKER said he would occupy the Senate but a very short time, to answer one of the observations of the Senator from New York. The argument of the honorable Senator was, that Congress had the power of fixing the place for the election of members to Congress. Let this be granted. Congress may undoubtedly do so; but when Congress does so, they must do it specifically, and not issue their mandate to the State Legislature to fix that place. No, sir; the law must be complete within itself, and it will then execute itself, and will require no intervening power. Let us put an analogous case; and I call the attention of the Senator from New York to it. Will the Senator from New York say that, provided Congress pass an act declaring that the elections shall be held at such place as the Legislature shall establish—will the Senator say that the State Legislature would be bound by it? This is precisely analogous to the present case. Admitting the power of Congress to exist to pass such a law, yet, by leaving that law imperfect, and to be completed by the action of the State Legislature, it amounts to little better than if they passed no law at all. It is, in truth and in fact, a mere nullity. And no districts being made, no elections can take place by districts. We do not command the State Legislatures, for we have no power to command them. Now, suppose Congress had passed a law declaring that the time of holding the elections should be on such day in the month of October as the State Legislature might determine. There being no day fixed until the intervention of the State Legislature, provided that State Legislature omit or refuse to comply with the mandate of Congress, the law is imperfect and cannot execute itself. You cannot compel the State Legislature to obey your mandate; and, as your law cannot be executed by halves, a power which is vested in Congress cannot be executed in part by the State Legislature.

Mr. EVANS, in reply to the arguments of the Senator from Mississippi, that Congress never had passed a law prescribing certain bounds of time or place of holding elections, but requiring the States to fix the precise time or place within the prescribed bounds, referred the Senator to the law of 1792, prescribing the time for electing electors for President to thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December.

TUESDAY, JUNE 7.

The Apportionment Bill.

The question pending, when the Senate adjourned on yesterday, was the motion of Mr. WRIGHT to amend the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT said no one could be more sensible than himself that an apology was due to the Senate for again troubling them with my remarks. He should not have done so, had he not found himself unconsciously, and unexpectedly, made a nullifier in the course of this debate. He took exception to the application of the term to himself—at least according to his understanding of its meaning. He had been compelled, in the course of a short political life to assume many political appellations, and he had never very strongly resisted any of them: but he had been tenacious of the privilege of applying his own definition to them; and it was so in this case. Notwithstanding it might seem to many in the Senate that he had made himself a member of that political body whose denomination was Nullifiers, yet his friend from South Carolina (Mr. PRESTON) had read him out of church; for it appeared that his nullification was not of the right sort. If, therefore, the term was to be applied to him, he must be permitted to give it his own definition. In the early part of this debate he had undertaken to discuss the question then involved; and he should avoid, as much as possible, repeating the arguments he had then used. Yet he would be compelled to glance at the substance of them. It would be remembered that the proposition before the Senate at that time, was on the alternative that the States were either to be divided into single congressional districts for the election of Representatives, or they were to be permitted to elect them by general ticket. He had avowed at that time, and very frankly, that he would sustain the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary; because, if Congress were to lay down a rule of legislation for his State, he desired that there should be as much latitude in the rule as possible; and he preferred having two alternatives to having only one. After considerable debate, however, the latter failed, almost by a unanimous vote of the Senate—only three Senators, besides the chairman of the committee, he believed, voting for it. They had, then, left only the provision made by the House of Representatives; and as a moment when the debate upon that provision had assumed such an aspect as endured the subject with a very deep interest to himself—an interest which led him into the use of language, perhaps, rather too strong. He had not failed, however, to derive very great amusement from the debate which had occupied the Senate for two or three days, since the somewhat impetuous remarks which he had made at that period. His remarks had been elicited thus: For some two hours before the vote was called for, the Senate had been addressed by the Senator from Maryland—not in the frank, open, and undisguised manner which the Senator from South Carolina had since used, but using arguments calculated to produce a certain result, without acknowledging the true purpose of those arguments. And what were they? That this was the peculiar occasion to characterize and define the boundaries of power between the large and the small States of this Union; and he added, substantially, that the former must be bound and fettered to prevent them from being dangerous members of the confederacy. Well, (pursued Mr. W.,) I would have borne, I believe, with great patience, this argument; because I have been very much accustomed to listen calmly to all arguments in this body; and, from the very condition of the body, it is somewhat natural that arguments of an extraordinary character should be sometimes made; but when I add to this, that it was argued—not that the Senate, not that Congress should bind these large and dangerous States; but that Congress, by its sovereign order, should compel the States to bind themselves, I was, I confess, a little impatient under the argument; and I now regret that I was so. I met the case, however, with perfect fairness then, and I intend to meet it now in the same spirit; because it is now avowed, by the Senator from South Carolina, (to use his own phrase,) that this is a war waged by the small States upon the large ones—a war, not in the sense of a war of arms, I admit; but a political warfare, to diminish what he considers the dangerous political power of the large States. Well, sir, I would much rather that this war had been waged in another forum, (inasmuch as it respects one of the constitutional rights of the people of the States,) where the people are appropriately represented. But I have no right to complain of its being waged here—none whatever. I do not complain. It is one of the duties of the Senate to act upon each proposition which comes here from the Representatives of the people; and no Senator is in fault for expressing his views clearly and truly as to its nature. And it was worthy of the honorable Senator's candor to characterize it as he did; because it is the true aspect of the question as it is presented to us, although I do not for a moment presume to imagine that it is so regarded by all its supporters. So much, sir, as my apology for making the petulant remarks which I did; and I do not offer it as a justification, for I feel unfeigned regret at having been led to make those remarks. But, sir, I have been not a little surprised that, since that unfortunate occasion, the debate has been carried on very much—so far as arguments have been offered to sustain the proposition—in one aspect of the matter, on what has been assumed to be my admission of the powers of Congress. That admission has been assumed by the Senator from Kentucky as the foundation of his argument. I do not know what precise terms I may have used upon that occasion, but I know what my meaning and intention was. I saw, or thought I saw, a manifest disposition, as well here as in the debate upon this subject elsewhere, to put the question upon the technical question of constitutional power. I did not choose to rest it there, because I did not think it was the strong, practical, and unanswerable ground. I did believe, and do now, that it was an attempt to exert a power which those who formed the constitution, and those who adopted it on the part of the States, never dreamed would be attempted under such circumstances. Of this I have not the least doubt; and, to prove it, I exhibited the proceedings of the conventions of several of the States. I was sure that I should be answered as I was. I knew very well the arguments which might be employed; and I anticipated them, by stating that I did not produce the proceedings of those conventions for the purpose of disproving that which has been made a singularly offensive expression—the technical existence of the power; but for the purpose of showing the true spirit and meaning of the instrument; and that, under the true construction of the constitutional duties of Congress, that power ought not now to be exercised. Yet, (and Senators will remember that I made another point,) because I believe it would be considered by some Senators hypothetical, I made and discussed the question, whether the language of the constitution, giving to the State Legislatures the power to regulate the times, places, and manner of holding elections, involved the power of determining whether members of Congress should be elected by congressional districts, or by general ticket; and whether the very construction of the language was not clearly this—that they should have the power of determining the places where the elections should be held; the circumference within which the citizens should come to the same polls; the manner in which they should vote; and the manner in which their votes should be received, and all other regulations respecting the holding of elections. This was the question which I raised. I said, and I candidly repeat, that I doubt whether the contemporaneous construction of the powers of Congress, as shown in the proceedings of the State conventions, would justify the conclusion that it was a power which Congress ought to exercise. But the Senator from Kentucky said I had admitted the technical power of Congress to pass this bill. Well, sir, I naturally said I did not deny

[2d Sess.]

The Apportionment Bill.

[JUNE, 1842.]

JUNE, 1842.]

The Apportionment Bill.

[37TH CONG.]

the technical power to pass the bill; but I did, and do, deny that, in the shape in which it came from the House of Representatives, it would have no force or effect if passed into a law. This is what I said upon this point; and the Senator found it convenient to base his argument upon this admission, as he called it, of the power to pass the bill.

Mr. TALLMADGE remarked that his colleague had displayed much of the ingenuity for which he was so distinguished. He says Congress is bound to three great principles—their duty to the constitution, to the States, and to the people. If he means that Congress owes any duty to the people, paramount to its duty to the constitution, or in any sense conflicting with their duty to the constitution, he denied the proposition. The constitution points out the mode in which the thing now proposed to be done is to be done. If the whole power of holding elections is comprised in the times, places, and manner of holding elections, the constitution says the States shall exercise it; for they are to prescribe the times, places, and manner; and they are obliged to do it until Congress chooses to act. When Congress, in conformity with the constitution, takes the matter up, and makes or alters the regulations of the States as to time, place, or manner, the power of the States is superseded to that extent.

Mr. T. reiterated his former arguments in support of the power thus conferred by the constitution on Congress to make or alter the regulations of the States; contending that this covered the whole ground, and justified, to the very letter, the clause in the bill now under discussion.

He took the regulation of the times, of the places, and of the manner of holding elections, distinctly, with a view of showing that this regulation, being for convenience left in the hands of the State Legislatures, under the condition as specified—namely, that they shall make the necessary regulations—the express power was equally declaratory, that Congress may make or alter such regulations; and this, he contended, Congress had a perfect discretionary power of exercising in part, or to any extent it might conceive necessary.

He then referred to the sensitiveness evinced by his colleague, (Mr. WRIGHT,) in the conclusion of his remarks, in which the Senator had said, in allusion to him, (Mr. T.), that it would be well if he had known less of the doctrines of the Hamiltons, and more of the Livingstons and the Tompkinses of his State.

[A remark was made, that his colleague did not say "known." On which Mr. TALLMADGE observed, "Well, what did the gentleman say?"]

Mr. WRIGHT observed, that what he did say was, that if the gentleman had drunk less deeply of the doctrines of Hamilton, and more deeply of the doctrines of the Livingstons and Tompkinses, he would not have assumed that resistance to the exercise of this power by the Federal Government would be a blot upon the escutcheon of the State of New York.

Mr. WALKER considered the second section of the clause of the bill now under discussion, nothing but a direction to the Governors of the States, in which the general-ticket system prevailed, to assemble their Legislatures in extra session, to repeal their own acts providing for the election of their Representatives in Congress.

But in some of those States the old apportionment gave them the same number of Representatives that this bill will give—whether under the ratio chosen by the House, or that substituted by the Senate. Those States may not have any extra session of their Legislatures before the election of Representatives; and if they elect the members of Congress, it must be under the old law of their Legislatures; yet this bill says, the law must be altered. Would not this present a new and irreconcilable difficulty? In his own State, the meeting of the Legislature is biennial, and the people are opposed to yearly sessions. At their last session, they provided for the election of their Representatives by the general-ticket system. Before they can be again convened, the election must take place; but this bill says the Governor must convene the Legislature, to repeal the law. It was his conviction the Governor would not convene the Legislature for the purpose. If he do not, will that law be repealed? Can an order from Congress to alter a law have the effect of altering it? Is the law altered by a mere order to alter it? No: it can only be altered by a law of Congress, actually districting the States. A mere mandate to alter a law does not alter the law; and the law being still in existence, the State has every right to elect its Representatives under its existing law, and Congress cannot refuse to recognize them.

Mr. CUTBERT observed, that the people of Georgia were to assemble on the first Monday in October, to elect the Representatives of the State. This law is to affect only those States in which the general-ticket system prevails, to whom it must be a most offensive exercise of power, and on whom alone the expense of extra legislation falls. It is an offensive and hazardous step. He would propose a suspension of this clause till the States have had time to assemble in their regular way.

Mr. LINN concurred with the Senator from Georgia, who had anticipated all that he had intended to say; and, for the purpose of testing whether time would be given to the States as soon as the motion of the Senator from New York should be disposed of, he would offer an amendment, exempting the State of Missouri from the operation of the law until after the next meeting of her Legislature.

Mr. BERRIEN stated, that the people of Georgia had exercised the right of choosing their Representatives by the general-ticket

2d Sess.]

The Apportionment Bill.

[JUNE, 1842.]

system since the beginning of the Government. It was a system to which they gave the preference by unanimous assent; and, therefore, he felt it to be his duty to advocate their right to preserve that system as long as they conceive they can be best represented by it.

But in the course of this discussion, gentlemen, contending for the right of the States to decide, themselves, upon what system they should hold their elections and send their Representatives to Congress, had taken grounds which were revolting to his judgment. He could not doubt the power which the constitution confers on Congress. It seemed to him to be a power written plainly on the face of the constitution. But he conceived it to be given primarily to the States, and ultimately and provisionally to Congress.

He examined the positions taken by the Senator from Alabama, (Mr. BAEHR,) and the Senator from New York, (Mr. WRIGHT,) contending that the position of the Senator from Alabama was untenable, namely—that the only constitutional mode of electing was that by the general-ticket system. The qualification made by the Senator from New York did not virtually alter the position. This position Mr. B. proceeded at some length to controvert, at the same time denying that this was the first time—as some of his friends imagined—that such a doctrine had been brought forward. He presented the fact to the consideration of the Senator from Alabama—that the second section of the first article of the constitution provides for the election of Representatives by the people; and the third section for the election of Senators by the Legislature.

The Senator had presented a very startling and ingenious sophism in his next position—that, although Congress had the same right over the manner of electing Senators as Representatives, it could not direct the Legislature of a State to pass a law districting itself, so that one portion should elect one Senator, and the other portion another Senator; and if it could not do this, it could not direct them to pass a law districting their State for the election of Representatives.

But, startling as this proposition seemed at first sight to be, its fallacy was apparent on close examination. The fact had only to be considered, that the Legislature of a State is a political incorporation, having no integral fragments capable of independent action or separate existence; but, in the popular body, there is a different principle—it is that of individuality, existing in the natural body, of each integral part, separately called upon to act. The Senator's position may be an argument plausible in its aspect—startling from its novelty—and embarrassing to minds not accustomed to investigation; but it was one which dissolved before a logical examination. It was like the argument brought forward against miracles—that it is contrary to experience that the order of nature can be departed from to such an extent as is necessary to admit of miracles. But it is not at all contrary to experience that testimony is deceptive and false; therefore the inference is irresistible, that the testimony of miracles, contrary to the order of nature, must be false. Miracles, however, did exist; so the reasoning falls to the ground.

The sophism consisted in judging of miracles, which were things out of the order of nature, by the standard of experience, which had to be superseded before miracles could exist; and the very existence of which implied the absence of experience. Mr. B. applied his illustration in refutation of what he conceived to be the sophism in the position relied upon by the Senator from Alabama and his friends.

The powers had been treated as if they were concurrent in the State Legislature and the Federal Legislature. This was not, certainly, his view of the subject. But, for the sake of argument, supposing that they were concurrent, he contended that the power of the State should yield to the concurrent power of the General Government. It was, however, argued that the Federal Government cannot delegate its power to the Government of the States. In referring to analogous cases, he showed what had been the decision of the courts. It was, that because Congress, as it might do, did not render the jurisdiction of its own courts paramount in all things over the States, the power of the State judiciary was not subject to the mandates of the Federal judiciary in many cases; this was evidence that the Federal Government only chooses to exercise a portion of the power, which it might have exercised wholly, if so disposed.

The right of the people to be represented depends upon themselves; and if those they intrust to make the regulations necessary to enable them to enjoy this right, fail to make the regulations, they will have to suffer the inconvenience of not being represented; which is the only punishment that can properly be spoken of. The Senator from New York inquires whether the people are to be deprived of the right, by the malfeasance of their Legislatures? The answer is, that it is in consequence of the neglect of their own agents; and to them they must look, and they must make them accountable. Disposed as he was to preserve to the States the right of exercising this power, he could not recognize the doctrine that there is no authority to exercise the power in the constitution. What he contended was, that the Congressional power was not a primary one, but an ulterior and provisionary one. His proposition was, that it was only with this understanding the constitution was ratified by the States; and, however it may exist on the face of the constitution as a literal power, yet he maintained that good faith—more important to the Government than the exercise of the power—should impel Congress to refrain from the exercise of the literal power.

He inferred the intention that it was not to be exercised, not alone from contemporaneous evidence, but from the very words of the instrument itself. The first phrase of the section confirms the primary power in the States; the ulterior and conditional power is given to Congress. That this was the view taken of it by the framers of the constitution, was deducible from contemporaneous evidence of an abundant character. He quoted the opinions of Mr. Madison and Mr. Hamilton, as presented in the Federalist. They argued that the power of Congress was secondary, not primary; and that its existence at all was only necessary for its moral influence, and not for its exercise. He also quoted Judge Story's Commentaries, and those of Chancellor Kent, as well as others, in support of this view of the subject.

JUNE, 1842.]

The Apportionment Bill.

[27TH CONG.]

The consequence of exercising the primary power by the Federal Government was foreseen; and to guard against this, it was made only a secondary power. It was foreseen that, if the primary power was given to Congress, the Federal Government would have to provide Federal machinery, and go into the States to exercise a supervisory and offensive power, derogatory to their sovereign dignity.

The experience of fifty years was in favor of not exercising the secondary power in subversion of the primary power. To exercise it would be a violation of the good faith upon which the constitution was ratified by States which never would have ratified it, had the understanding been that Congress was to exercise the primary power.

It is argued that the minority cannot be represented by the general-ticket system. What minority had called upon Congress for redress? May not the aggregate minorities be as great in a State, under the district system, as under the general-ticket system? No such protection of minorities is invoked at the hands of Congress; the assumption is entirely gratuitous.

Fearful pictures have been drawn of the consequences of the consolidated party influences in a combination of large States; but there was nothing in reality in these terrors. The growth of population was antagonist to all combinations. What has never happened in the infancy of this Government, never can happen in its maturity. It is said now is the accepted time; but will it not be time enough to act, when facts, not apprehensions, demand the interference of Congress?

He enumerated the differences which exist throughout the several States, with regard to the time, manner, and place of holding elections. The avowed object of this change is to provide uniformity in all the States; yet it can only produce uniformity in a single particular, leaving all the other diversities just as great as they ever have been. The end proposed will not, therefore, be attained.

He did not anticipate resistance on the part of the States; but if they did resist, it would remain for Congress to act itself; and the only action it could take would be to refuse admission into the other branch to any Representatives not elected according to this law. Congress, in that case, would be placed in an antagonist position to the States. The States would be in an attitude of hostility to the General Government. Should a vacancy occur in the representation of a State, the Governor alone has the right of issuing a proclamation to provide for the election of a Representative to fill the vacancy.

He would not depict the consequences which might result from the dissent of a large number of the States. They might be, although favorable to the district system, yet aroused by law, asserting a power the exercise of which would be a violation of good faith. They might reverse their system.

Mr. BAYARD did not propose to make a speech; but had merely risen to make a single remark in reference to an argument made use of by the Senator from New York, (Mr. WRIGHT.) The clause in the bill which he proposes to amend, merely says that each State shall be divided into a number of districts equal to the number of members to which the State is entitled. It does not say each district shall have a full ratio; and that was a complete answer to the notion of fractions being unrepresented. It is not true that any portion of a district goes without a Representative. The first thing is to fix the proper number to form a House of Representatives; and then to apportion them according to respective populations among the States. The Senator's amendment, therefore, is evidently unnecessary. He asked the Secretary to read the proposed amendment. [It was read.] This was quite unnecessary. There was nothing to prevent the State of New York from apportioning its forty districts into whatever divisions of population it pleased.

Mr. WRIGHT was very glad to be instructed by the new view which the Senator from Delaware had taken. He says there is nothing to prevent New York being made one district or ten districts, notwithstanding her 300,000 inhabitants. Now, if such was the latitude left by the law, he would be better pleased to see the districts settled by Congress at once, without calling upon the Legislature of New York to do it.

Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut, asked at what point the national legislation was to begin, and the State legislation to be left off, if the power is concurrent, and yet the Federal power is paramount?

Mr. BREKEN explained, that the assertion of the concurrent power by the Federal Government would be only partial. If it related to time, the State Legislature would have primary power to exercise over place and manner; so if Congress exercised the power over place, the State would exercise the primary power over time and manner; so also in relation to manner. The primary power was paramount till

2D SESS.]

West Point Academy.

[JUNE, 1842.]

the secondary power of alteration interfered, and made the power of the State to carry out the law secondary.

Mr. SMITH contended that Congress did not act at all in this bill; it only orders the States to act. This is stopping where Congress began—it is an order without the force of a law, and therefore is the same as no action at all. If Congress begins to do what it may do, it has a right to do what it undertakes, or not at all.

The question was called for on Mr. WRIGHT'S amendment.

Mr. ALLEN would vote for this, or any other amendment that would make this section less objectionable; but would afterwards vote to strike out the whole section, no matter how amended.

The ayes and nays were then taken, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—19.

NAYS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—29.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 7.

Mr. CLIFFORD presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Maine, in relation to the pay and mileage of members of Congress.

Also, the petition of A. L. Hobson and others, praying for the establishment of a mail-route.

Bill Extending the Operation of Tariff Law.

Mr. FILLMORE, by instructions of the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to extend for a limited period the present laws for laying and collecting duties on imports. Read twice, referred to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

[N. B. The bill extends the operations of the present tariff laws to 1st August next.]

West Point Academy.

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE,

The House took up the bill making appropriations for the support of the army and of the military academy for the year 1842; the question being on concurring with the amendments made yesterday in Committee of the whole.

Mr. INGERSOLL said he should now move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, or to any other, as the House might determine, with instructions, such as were contained in the identical resolution by which the army was reduced in 1821.

VOL. XIV.—27

Mr. FILLMORE inquired if this motion was in order.

The SPEAKER was understood to reply in the affirmative.

Mr. REYNOLDS desired to amend the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. INGERSOLL,) by the addition of instructions to inquire into the expediency of altering or changing the laws establishing the West Point academy—or, in other words, to abolish it. My only excuse and justification for presenting this subject to the House is, that I am clearly satisfied that the military academy at West Point was established in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and that the policy and principles on which it is conducted are hostile to the free institutions of the country.

Entertaining these sentiments, I consider it my duty to my constituents to present them to this House for their consideration. And I am not alone in believing the academy at West Point ought to be abolished, or so regulated as to be made acceptable to the public. The Legislatures of the States of Tennessee and Ohio have both passed resolutions, requesting their members in Congress to appropriate no more money for the support of this institution; and each State has condemned the academy in the most severe terms. Those resolutions passed the General Assembly of Tennessee on the 26th November, 1838; and those in Ohio on the 8d March 1834. The resolutions of the State of Ohio use this bold and energetic language:

"That said military establishment ought to be abolished," and "is partial in its operations, and wholly inconsistent with the spirit and genius of our liberal institutions."

In the preamble to the resolutions passed by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, they express themselves in the following strong and forcible manner. Speaking of the constitutional power, they say:

"Such power is wholly unknown to the Constitution of the United States, and at war with those principles and maxims which should ever be held sacred by a free and enlightened people."

Am I not sustained in my position by the solemn judgments of two free and enlightened States of this Confederacy? These decisions were not pronounced without reflection and consideration, but were the result of solemn and serious deliberation in both States. Moreover, I have no hesitation in saying that a great majority of the people of this whole Union entertain the same sentiments as expressed by the two States above mentioned; and would rejoice, with exceeding great joy, if the academy were abolished. So soon as the facts in relation to its institution are laid before the people, and a discussion is had on them, the institution will crumble to the dust.

Mr. Speaker, there is no person who appreciates education more than I do. I know

JUNE, 1842.]

West Point Academy.

[27TH CONG.]

it not only elevates man to the highest state of happiness and perfection of which human nature is susceptible, but it is also the foundation of our national existence. Education not only makes man that elevated "being, holding large discourse, looking before and after," but it also enables him to know his rights, and thereby govern himself according to the principles of free government.

The system of primary schools has received, on all occasions, my most hearty support. No matter in what situation I may have acted, either in public or private life, I have never ceased my exertions, feeble as they may have been, to promote education amongst the people. I give to it the greatest value and consideration. Nevertheless, although it may be of such inestimable value, yet we must advance it by the rules of justice, and the constitution of the country.

Religion, although it is the greatest blessing to man, may yet be carried to such extremes that it ceases to be religion—becomes fanaticism, and a curse rather than a blessing to the people. So with the military academy, when it is established in violation of the constitution, and its operations are contrary to the principles of equality.

In giving the Constitution of the United States that reasonable and limited construction which confines the General Government within the meaning of that instrument, no power can be discovered to authorize Congress to establish the military academy. No one pretends there is any express provision in the constitution, authorizing Congress to create this institution; but the power, if any, must be raised by construction and implication.

It is considered at this day unwise and dangerous for the General Government to exercise powers by implication and construction, which are not expressly granted by the constitution. If Congress will enter the field of "common defence and general welfare," there is no place to stop at; and, in fact, the constitution would be entirely subverted. The General Government is confined to only a few general objects of legislation, which are expressly granted by the constitution. Amongst these subjects, on which Congress have the power to act, I am clearly satisfied the military academy cannot be found. This was the opinion of Mr. Jefferson, while he was Secretary of State, in 1798, when this subject was first discussed in the cabinet of President Washington. In the fourth volume of Jefferson's Works, page 499, Mr. Jefferson's opinions are there recorded as follows:

"It was proposed to recommend the establishment of a military academy. I objected that none of the specified powers given by the constitution to Congress would authorize this."

In the same page, Mr. Jefferson again states, that "I opposed it, as unauthorized by the constitution."

President Washington submitted the propriety to Congress of establishing the military academy or not, as they pleased, without any recommendation whatever at this time.

Mr. Speaker, the honorable member from New York, (Mr. WARD,) in a speech, stated to the House that "the Democratic party adhere to a strict construction of the constitution. They take nothing by implication, and nothing that is not plainly expressed in the grant of power to the General Government. Hence they have ever opposed the establishment of a Bank of the United States; for there is nothing in the terms of the constitution to authorize the incorporation of such an institution. Hence, also, they were opposed to the system of internal improvement by the General Government, and to the exercise of other powers not clearly conferred by that instrument upon Congress." This is the general doctrine of the party, as far as I am informed on the subject. This being the judgment and decision of the party, will not the same judgment apply to the military academy, and abolish it? If either of the above subjects be unconstitutional, the academy must follow the same fate. I hope the gentleman (Mr. WARD) will apply his own doctrine to the academy, and join me in doing the people the best service we can perform—which is, to abolish the military academy at West Point.

On the 7th December, 1796, President Washington, in direct terms, recommended the establishment of a military academy, and in the same message he also recommended "a national university." "A primary object of such national institution should be," says the message, "the education of our youths in the science of government."

No one venerates the name and character of General Washington more than I do. He is venerated and honored by all the nations of the earth; and his fame, no doubt, will endure forever. Yet, "to err is human." With the most pure and patriotic motives, he recommended a national university to the consideration of Congress, "to educate our youth in the science of government." I presume no one, at this day, will contend that Congress has the power to establish a national university for the objects mentioned in the message. There is no more constitutional ground for the military academy, than for the national university; and none exists for either.

Although many of the greatest sages and patriots that ever existed in this country have yielded to the constitutionality of this institution, yet it is the birthright of every free American citizen to construe the constitution according to the dictates of his own conscience. No one in this House is sworn to support the constitution according to the opinions of Washington, Jefferson, or other great men, but according to the sober and deliberate dictates of his own conscience. Humble and feeble as I may be, I will give to the constitution such exposition as will satisfy my own conscience, and allow the same privilege to all others. Many of the American Presidents, with the purest motives, have signed bills incorporating banks, for internal improvements, &c., which have been considered, on experience and reflection, not to be authorized by the constitution. May not the same be the decision of after-times in regard to the military academy—that it is also unconstitutional?

2D SEM.]

West Point Academy.

[JUNE, 1842.]

Mr. Speaker, the academy is, in my opinion, not only unconstitutional, but it is also founded on principles which render it extremely obnoxious to the people. This institution is established and conducted in direct hostility to all the principles of equality and free government, which are always held sacred by an enlightened people.

According to the report of Major-General Macomb, the military academy was established by act of Congress of the 16th March, 1802. Before that time an attempt was made to create a military school at West Point for the regiment of artillery and engineers. This school progressed slowly, and with but little success. By act of the 28th February, 1803, one teacher of the French language and one teacher of drawing were added to the institution; also one artificer and eighteen men, to aid in making practical experiments. Ten cadets were then authorized for the engineers, and forty for the artillery.

The act of the 13th April, 1808, authorized the appointment of twenty cadets for the light artillery, one hundred for the infantry, sixteen for the cavalry, and twenty for the riflemen.

The act of the 29th April, 1812, authorized the appointment of cadets between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one, not to exceed 250 in all. Cadets are to serve five years, unless sooner discharged. The same law provides that cadets when they graduate, are candidates for a commission for an office in the army, and if no vacancy exists at the time, the cadets are continued in office by brevet, and attached to the army as supernumerary officers. The last act added one professor of natural and experimental philosophy, with one assistant; one professor of mathematics, with one assistant; and one professor of engineering, with one assistant, to the institution.

This short history of the academy will show the principles on which this institution is founded. I may also add to the above history, the following facts, taken from a report of the Secretary of War, of the 28th January, 1831, and confirmed by an excellent report made by the honorable Mr. Smith of Maine, dated March 1st, 1837, to the House of Representatives. By an estimate of the last five years, (from the 28th of January, 1831,) the supply of the army from the corps of graduated cadets has averaged about twenty-two annually; while those who graduate are about forty—making an excess of eighteen cadets each year. The number two hundred and fifty are always in the academy. This makes the annual proportion of graduates to the whole number entered in the academy fall short of one in six; and the number annually entering the army to the number entering the academy, falls short of one in eleven.

In regard to the expenses of each cadet entering the army, the above two reports state "that, in 1831, the cost of education of each cadet entering the army was six thousand dollars." This calculation is based on the whole amount of money expended on the academy, and on the whole number of cadets entering the army; so that the expenses to the Government, by this mode of education, is six thousand dollars for each officer before he enters the public service.

Mr. Speaker, it will be seen, by these acts of Congress, that an order of nobility is established at West Point. The cadets educated at this institution at the public expense, without rendering any equivalent to the public for the same, fall precisely within the meaning and definition of the privileged classes of Europe. The meaning of the word "nobility" is also applicable to them in this country, as well as in nations where that class of people is tolerated by law. I find the meaning of the word defined in the 2d vol., p. 158, of William Leggett's writings, and the application will be readily made to the cadets at West Point.

"A noble is defined by English writers, to mean a person who has a privilege that raises him above the commoner, or peasant. On the continent, the word noble is less restricted than in England. The French academy thus define the word: 'one who, by birth, or by patent from the prince, makes part of a distinguished class in the state.'"

The cadets are raised above "the commoner," and are made by law "part of a distinguished class in the state." They are fed, clothed, and supported at the public expense, without rendering any equivalent, and therefore fall directly within the class of nobility, which the constitution says, shall not exist in the United States.

By the provisions of the act of Congress, the cadets have a complete monopoly of all the offices of the army of the United States. No person can be appointed to an office in the army, if he be not a cadet graduated at the West Point academy.

This presents a most serious consideration to the people. Is it right to exclude all the American people, no matter what be their qualifications, and confine all the offices in the army to young men educated at the military academy?

In this Republic monopolies are odious. They are at war with all the principles of equality and free Government, which should always be held sacred by the people. The good sense of the people has condemned a bank and other monopolies. But the monopoly of the army offices is more extensive, and more dangerous to the liberties of the people, than all the others together. All the force and power of the whole army are under the control of these cadet officers. In peace, the army has an immense controlling influence: but in war, it is irresistible and all-powerful. Nevertheless, all this power and influence are in the hands of a complete monopoly. Is this right in a country of freedom and of equal rights? We hear it asserted that a standing army is dangerous to the liberties of the people; but how much more dangerous is it to have all the offices in the army controlled by a monopoly!

JUNE, 1842.]

West Point Academy.

[27TH CONG.]

The cadets composing this monopoly are secluded from any intercourse with the mass of the people—are educated apart from the people, and form a distinct and separate class in the community. These cadet officers are appointed for life, and are not dependent directly on the people for support. They cannot, under these circumstances, have any congenial or common feelings with the people; and are a monopoly dangerous, at the head of a large standing army, to the liberties of the country.

Is it possible that the cadets educated at the military academy will have more merit, and possess better qualifications for the army, than can be found amongst all the other people in the Union? No man will believe that forty young men, graduated annually at the West Point academy, possess better qualifications for military command than all the rest of mankind in the United States.

These young men are selected between fourteen and twenty-one years of age—when they are so young that their talents and capacity for military command cannot be known. The natural ability of the youth, at this tender age, cannot be ascertained; and all the education on earth, without it, cannot succeed in forming a great military commander. Moreover, the Secretary of War cannot be acquainted with all the young men throughout the Union between the years of fourteen and twenty-one; and, in making the selections for the military academy, he must, therefore, be guided by the information of others. Through the medium of this information and recommendation of others, is it likely—is it probable—that the poor, and those without friends and in obscure situations, are likely to be recommended and appointed cadets to the academy? The influential and wealthy will be better known, and more likely to be appointed; while the poor and obscure will be overlooked. This is human nature, and will more or less operate on the appointing power.

Mr. Speaker, will it be safe, or will it be wise and prudent, to commit the destinies of this nation, so far as its military operations are concerned, to these cadets alone? In time of war, the rights and liberties of the people are dependent in a great degree on the army. It is the right arm of the nation's defence; and is it wise and prudent to exclude all the nation from any command in the army, except the cadets, and confine the main defence of the people to these young men?

Much glory, or much dishonor to the country, is always depending on the honorable and elevated bearing of the army. In war, it is the main pillar of the nation; almost every thing—our safety, national honor, &c., &c., are committed to it. And is it wise, I again ask, to exclude all the military talents of the country from the service, except the graduates of West Point?

The principles on which this institution is founded destroy that patriotism and ambition to become qualified to fill stations in the army, that are so necessary to be encouraged in a republic. No person who is not the favorite of West Point will deem it important to qualify himself for the military service of the country, as he has not the least hope of entering it. All the honors and emoluments are monopolized in the hands of the cadets at West Point. This policy will destroy that patriotic emulation among the people that is so essential to the existence of a free Government. But the oppression and positive injury inflicted on the private soldier in the army are incalculable.

This is one principal reason that it is so difficult to fill the ranks of the army in time of peace. No matter what good morals, and generous and meritorious conduct throughout his life, a private soldier may observe in the army—it matters not what glorious and brilliant actions he may perform in the tented field for his country—it is quite immaterial. Should the private soldier in the American army survive the most gallant and hazardous enterprises, performed for the honor and glory of his native country, yet that country, by the operation of the military academy, has not the power to reward his patriotic services, and place him in any rank in the army according to his merit. He is excluded from any office in the military service, no matter what may be his merit.

And by whom excluded? By a young cadet, just graduated at the public expense—never having performed, at the time, the least service for his country. Perhaps this veteran soldier bears the honorable marks of wounds received while he was defending the rights and liberties of the people; and he is excluded from honor and office in the army, by a stripling reared at the public expense, without performing any service whatever. This injustice cries aloud for redress.

Many of the greatest military commanders that ever existed took their rise from the ranks of the army, and from humble and private life. History is replete with these facts, in all ages and in all countries. In the Revolution, and since, in our country, memorable and distinguished examples are known to all. Is it right to exclude merit from the army more than any other service in the Government?

Where is the inducement for a private

[Sens.]

West Point Academy.

[JUNE, 1842.]

soldier to either enter the service, or perform brilliant actions in it, if merit be not rewarded?

Out of forty graduates each year, twenty-two enter the army; and eighteen are also attached to it, as supernumerary officers, receiving pay from the public, because they had the good fortune to be educated at the public expense. Thus it is that the privates in the army, and all others, are excluded from any office in the military service of the United States. This is wrong; and the country will not sustain it when the facts are made known to the people.

With equal propriety might the United States educate young men for the various other offices in the Government, as for the offices in the army. The young men at West Point cannot be considered a part of the army, but only as preparing for it; and the Government might, with the same justice, prepare young men for the bench of the Supreme Court, for Congress, or for the office of President itself. It would be a large stride towards monarchy to educate young men for the Presidency. The electors might be constrained to make a choice from those educated young men for President, as well as the President is forced to take all the officers of the army from the graduates at West Point. Congress has no more power to make a law in one case than in the other.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot see any necessity at this time for the military academy at West Point. When it was first established here, there might have been some necessity for it. The country was at that day thinly settled, and the means of education not so abundant as at the present time. All the arts and sciences, and all the substantial education, which is had at West Point, are now taught in almost every section of the Union; all the improvements and education of the youth of the country, that will be necessary to qualify them for any office, either civil or military, in the Government, can be easily procured, and will be embraced by them if proper inducements are held out to the public. When the offices of the army are open to competition, a generous emulation will exist among the people to fill them; merit and competency will be the basis of preferment. Under this new order of things, citizens will qualify themselves to fill these offices with honor to themselves and advantage to the country. Then, and not before, individuals will fill the offices in the army, having the confidence of the people.

We see by the statement of the Secretary, already alluded to, that there is less than one to eleven that become officers in the army to those entering the academy. Thus it is, that so many young men receive their education at this institution, at the public expense, and then retire from the public service to private avocations.

The honorable member (Mr. INgersoll, of Pennsylvania) suggests that there are three Reverend bishops in the church, who received their education at this institution. This, with various other cases that might be shown, proves the perversion of the objects of this establishment from the original intention. Is it just and right that the public should educate eleven young men for their private benefit, for one for the army? And this one cadet costs the Government about six thousand dollars when he enters the army.

I pretend to know nothing about the manner of conducting this academy. All I complain of are the laws establishing it; they all should be repealed, and the academy abolished.

Mr. Holmes, of South Carolina, rose and said: What was the main objection of the gentleman to the academy at West Point? It gave young men education without expense; and, if what the gentleman had said was true, this education was only offered to the sons of the nobility or aristocracy in this country. Such was not the fact. How many men were there at this time engaged in constructing railroads, and carrying on great civil works, who never could have obtained a competent education but at West Point? Again: the gentleman had said that the academy was of no use, because it bred up officers before it was known whether they would be fit for the service. The gentleman objected to training up men to the profession, for fear some might not prove competent to discharge its duties. Really, to his mind, this seemed to be about as much as saying that, before a child should be sent to school, he should be allowed to grow up to manhood, in order that it might be seen to what profession he was adapted.

In spite of the sneers against the aristocracy and the gentility of this institution, he imagined there would be found sufficient comprehension in the country to know that, notwithstanding its existence, we should be in no danger from a standing army; that our dependence would ever have to be upon the militia of the country; and that it was necessary to have a school which would diffuse throughout the country the military science, so that at any moment it might be brought into practical operation. The argument of the gentleman, that this academy would make priests, and furnish them with the military art, so that they could command the church militant to the imminent danger of the people, he thought was a mere spectre. He could not himself apprehend any danger, even though the people, when called out on the occasion of a sudden invasion by the Indians, were headed by a priest, as in the time of the Crusades.

He hoped, in conclusion, that the House would not concur with the gentleman in his opinion of the inefficiency of the academy; but would appropriate such a sum of money as would adequately defend the nation, so that the whole people might repose in safety under the shadow of our great country.

THURSDAY, JUNE 9.

The Hon. NATHAN APPLETON, of Boston, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. WINTHROP, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

The Tariff Bill.

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. McKENNA, of Pennsylvania, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on our imports, and for other purposes.

Mr. SALTONSTALL moved to amend the bill, by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting, in lieu thereof, the tariff bill reported by the Committee on Manufactures, with the exception of the last clause.

Mr. J. CAMPBELL rose to a point of order. His point of order was, that, in the Committee of the Whole, the bill, having been first read through, was taken up by sections; and the first section being under consideration, it was not in order to move to strike out the entire bill—as well as the clauses under discussion, as the clause under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN decided that the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts was not in order.

Mr. SALTONSTALL then moved to strike out the first section, which was under consideration, and substitute the entire amendment which he had before offered.

Mr. FILLMORE then commenced his speech to the committee; and, after giving utterance to a few words—

Mr. J. CAMPBELL rose and said the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. SALTONSTALL) was a mere evasion of the rule. The gentleman from Massachusetts had moved to strike out a single clause, and offered to substitute for it an entire bill.

The CHAIRMAN decided it to be in order. He said the gentleman could substitute any thing for the clause he proposed to strike out.

Mr. J. CAMPBELL appealed from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN decided that he was out of order, the gentleman from New York (Mr. FILLMORE) having obtained the floor and commenced his address before the objection was taken.

Mr. FILLMORE, then, as the exordium to his speech, entered at great length into the difficulties which the Committee of Ways and Means had had in the preparation and perfecting of the measure now before the committee. He said it was a question of the greatest magnitude that could come before an American Congress. Nothing short of the question of peace or war could be more important than the question of the mode of raising the necessary revenue to carry on the Government. It was also a subject that was complicated in its character, and he therefore regretted that the House should have refused authority to the Committee on Manufactures to collect such information as the settlement of so important a subject rendered necessary. They were denied the privilege of sending for persons and papers, and they were denied the aid of a clerk; but, notwithstanding all these circumstances, it was due to the committee to state, that they had gone on and collected a mass of facts that would be found useful both to the House and to the country, though falling short of what ought to have been obtained to enable the House to consider this subject properly. He alluded to this "more in sorrow than in anger," and only by way of apology for the committee, if the results of their labors should be found imperfect. He next recapitulated the services which had been rendered by the head of the Treasury Department to the committee, and then proceeded to the all-important question itself.

In the first place, he begged to state that this was a revenue bill, intended to supply the wants of the Treasury; and he therefore should consider it in that point of view. And the first question which presented itself for consideration, was, What was the amount of revenue that would be required to carry on the Government? That question had been rather fully considered by the Secretary of the Treasury, and he begged to call the attention of the committee to the remarks of the Secretary on that subject. In the Secretary's report accompanying his projet, he estimates the expenses of the Government for the year 1842, including civil, foreign, miscellaneous, and the army and the navy, at $24,424,858 95; and for the other permanent appropriations for the year, $922,000. There was then, in addition to the amount required to pay the public debt, an estimated amount of between $25,000,000 and $26,000,000. The Secretary then estimated the amount that would be required on the part of the Government for the payment of debts, and other liabilities; which made the aggregate demand on the Treasury for the present year $33,822,000. The Secretary then went on to estimate the expenditures for the years 1843-4, and for three years he made the aggregate amount $98,242,000—that sum, of course, including the amount required to pay the Treasury notes outstanding, and other debts contracted.

If, however, they passed from these opinions of the Secretary to examine some collateral facts, for the purpose of ascertaining what amount would be necessary, they would find that, during the four years of Mr. Van Buren's administration, the annual expenditures, independent of all payments for the public debt, were near $28,000,000; and if the experience of the past was to afford a guide for the future, they might calculate the annual expenditures of the Government hereafter to be between $27,000,000 and $28,000,000, independent of the amount requisite to pay the public debt now existing.

2D Sess.]

The Tariff Bill.

[JUNE, 1842.]

But there had been so much discussion in reference to the probable expenditures of the Government for some years to come, both in this body and the other branch of Congress, that he might be excused from going into details. He might, however, remark, that the estimates of the various gentlemen who had investigated the subject, and which they showed by tables and figures, ran up from $18,000,000 to $26,000,000; whereby it was shown that, where intelligent men differed so much, it must, to a great extent, be found to be a matter of conjecture. But, from what he had seen for the last few days, he thought there was a spirit of reform at work, that, however much he might regret its destructive character to some of the essential establishments of the country, if carried out, might diminish the expenditures between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 below what they had been for the last three or four years. The expenditures, therefore, might be reduced to between $23,000,000 and $24,000,000. If, then, to this be added $3,000,000 to pay the interest on the public debt, the annual expenditure would be about $27,000,000; and this amount would be necessary to carry on the Government. He should assume, then, for argument's sake, that the annual expenditures would not exceed $24,000,000, with the addition of $3,000,000 to pay the interest of the public debt; and then the next question that presented itself was, How should this amount be raised? The constitution, in its grant of legislative powers on this subject, gave the power to lay taxes, to collect duties on imports, and, in the third place, to raise the money by excise. Now, to which mode would they resort? It had been contended that the best mode was by direct taxation; and this idea had had a general circulation in the country. That they had the power to supply the treasury by direct taxation, could not be denied; but was any gentleman, after a full examination of the subject, willing to resort to that mode of supplying the wants of the treasury, except in the direst necessity? They had tried it once, and there were gentlemen who had intimated their willingness to try it again. As early as 1798—when, he believed, there was some apprehension of war—an attempt was made to supply the wants of the treasury by direct taxation; and a law was passed, directing the valuation of land and negroes, for the purpose of levying a direct tax. But he desired the committee to look at the number of officers that would be spread over the country, to make the requisite valuation. For even when that was once done, they must take into consideration that the value of land and negroes, and other property to be taxed, was constantly changing in value; and what a tremendous power, then, it would give the appointing power of this Government. The requisite number of officers for this purpose would be like the frogs of Egypt.

He had taken occasion to look into the amount of money thus collected by direct taxation, and he found, since the commencement of this Government, leaving out small items, that there had been collected, for the purpose of paying the debts of the Government and its accruing expenses, the sum of $918,000,000. And from what source did they suppose that it had come? The question had ever been asked, from what source can the money be drawn with the least oppression to the people? And, in answering such a question, the experience of fifty or sixty years was not to be overlooked. It would be found that $746,000,000 were from duties levied on goods imported.

In answer to a question from Mr. RHETT, he said he did not include the amount of the Post Office revenues, which Mr. RHETT said, during the last ten years, had averaged from three to five millions of dollars. The Post Office paid its own expenses out of its receipts; and he (Mr. FILLMORE) was only considering the mode by which they should raise the requisite amount to defray the ordinary expenses of the Government, and to pay existing debts.

He then proceeded with his enumeration of the sources whence the receipts had been drawn. Twenty-two millions had been raised by excise, and only twelve millions by direct taxes. He stated the amount which had been received from the public lands, and added that dividends and bonuses from that odious monster—the United States Bank—amounted to $20,000,000; being $8,000,000 more than had been collected by direct taxation. He had merely alluded to these facts to show that the experience of more than fifty years had demonstrated that direct taxation was not the mode by which the wants of the Government could be supplied.

The next question, then, was, whether they would supply the treasury by excise? He had heard gentlemen—very intelligent gentlemen—both within and without the walls of that House, speak of that as a very eligible mode by which to supply the wants of the Government; but he asked if any gentleman there was then prepared to resort to it! The very name of excise was odious in Great Britain, where it was practised; and though they found in the constitution a power to raise revenue by excise, he was surprised to find that the word had not been used in this country. And why was it so? A duty in the shape of excise was recommended during the two first years of our Government; but the name was so odious, that the Administration that ventured to impose the duty, did not venture to use the name. He found a report was made by Mr. Secretary Hamilton, in which, instead of excise, he called it "internal revenue." There was a great deal in changing a name.

And what had been the history of raising the revenue of a country by excise? Mr. McCulloch said of that mode of raising revenue in Great Britain, that it was a name given to duties and taxes on such articles as are produced and consumed at home; while custom duties were those duties which were levied on imports from other countries. It was a duty on their own manufacture, the produce of their own labor, and consumed in their own country; and hence everybody would perceive that it would be necessary that they should have a swarm of officers to see who was engaged in the manufacture of any excisable article.

June, 1842.]

The Tariff Bill.

[27th CONG.]

Another consideration was the complicated legislation which was necessary to such a system; for if they imposed a duty on articles manufactured by their own citizens, they prevented them coming fairly in competition with the citizens of other countries—unless, indeed, they deducted the excise duty when the articles were exported; and, consequently, at every port of exportation there must be an examination, to see if the articles had paid an excise duty into the treasury, that, if so, the amount might be refunded. Another consideration was, that in Great Britain the excise duties were often evaded by the producer, notwithstanding the utmost vigilance in a country where the population was thick; but when it came to a country like ours, which is spread over thousands of miles, everybody must see it would be evidently impossible safely and fully to carry into effect a law imposing excise duties. And if not, what would be the consequence? Why, the duty would be a reward for exporting them; and it would be paid to the producer or exporter, instead of finding its way into the treasury.

But another consequence which had grown out of the system in England—which was, perhaps, not less deleterious to the morals of the country—was, that the legislation had been such, that the excise duties refunded often exceeded the amount paid. Take, for instance, sugar or glass. By the law of Great Britain, the duty on glass, to enable the producer to meet the citizens of other countries in the market of the world, was to be refunded when the article was exported.

He then called the attention of the committee to another instance of the impolicy of excise duties. The Committee of Ways and Means had had many gentlemen before it, to give information as to the operation of the various duties upon articles manufactured and exported. They represented that the manufacturer of sugar could, by means of the protection afforded him by the excises and our tariff, afford to sell sugar for six cents per pound. In answer to an inquiry as to the cost of the raw article, it was stated that the manufacturer had to pay eleven cents for the same article. It was then asked, how he could afford to buy the raw article for eleven cents, manufacture it, send it across the ocean, and then sell it for six cents? The apparent absurdity was explained thus: By the laws of England, an excise duty was imposed upon sugar and molasses, and a drawback allowed on all exported. It so happened, however, that the amount received by way of drawback exceeded the amount paid the Government by way of excise. There was, also, a residuum, after taking out the refined article; and this the manufacturer sold as sugar-house molasses, exporting it and receiving a drawback, although they had paid no duty upon it. In this way they were enabled to sell the refined article for six cents, when the raw material cost them eleven.

He read from Blackstone's Commentaries a brief history of excise duties in England, where they were first imposed, in 1643, upon ale, beer, cider, bread, &c. Both parties, however, agreed that they should continue during the war; and Blackstone declared their very name was odious to the people. Their enforcement required the severest regulations in England; and if they had to be attended with such severe pains and penalties in that small country, what would be necessary here?

The recent movement in the British Parliament showed that every expedient for raising revenue had been exhausted in that country, and the Government was now compelled to resort to that last of measures—the income tax. Here was the experience of England to prove that imposts were not efficient. He begged gentlemen who considered them so, to read the report of Mr. Randolph, when it was proposed to supply the treasury by means of imposts, and when Pennsylvania was in a state of rebellion. That report stated the cost of collecting imposts at thirty-five per cent. Was any one prepared to sanction that rate?

If, then, as he had endeavored to show, the system of imposts could not be advantageously adopted, there was but one other mode in which revenue for the public treasury could be raised—and that was, by imposing duties upon foreign imports, as contemplated in this bill. Of the nine hundred millions of revenue collected by our Government, seven hundred and forty-six were received from duties. He thought no further argument was necessary to show that this was the best mode of raising revenue to carry on our Government.

The next question was, whether the bill was sufficient to supply the wants of the treasury. Here he would state that it was, in substance, the projet of the Secretary of the Treasury: though altered in some of its details, and a section added at the end, by the committee, to provide for future legislation. The amount estimated to accrue was about the same as that according to the Secretary's bill. The Secretary took the imports of 1840 as the basis of his calculation, and estimated the receipts as follows:

Total receipts from duties - - -	$32,608,000
Expenses of collection and drawbacks - -	5,160,000
Net reveque - - -	27,448,000

He regretted the Secretary did not give the articles in detail, on which drawbacks were to be allowed, and the amount of the different items making up the sum which had to be deducted from the gross receipts. All goods were

2d Sess.]

The Tariff Bill.

[JUNE, 1842.]

liable to be exported, and to have a drawback. Thus, there was always in reality less revenue collected than there appeared to be.

But, although the Secretary had calculated with care the amount to be received from the operation of this bill, and though he conceded that the lowest year had been taken as a basis, yet he thought the House could not altogether rely on the calculations which were submitted to it. The amount of imports into the country in 1840 was $107,000,000; and the average amount of the seven preceding years, $141,000,000. Though there was this large discrepancy between the two amounts, and it might seem that the imports would always be equal to the standard of 1840, he still feared the bill could not be relied on to produce the necessary amount of revenue. The excessive importation which had happened during a few of the past seven years, was owing to various causes; such, for instance, as the great fire in New York, which consumed so many goods that their places had to be supplied by fresh importations. During some of those years, prices were high and money abundant; and therefore the value of the imports was swelled considerably. At present, however, importation of goods was checked. Where was the man who did not wear his coat longer now than formerly, and who did not economize in every way he could? Such would inevitably be the case until prosperity was fully restored in the country. Yet it was thought that the receipts from customs would amount to $27,000,000 per annum, from the operation of this bill. If any one would look at the receipts, and see how, during past years, they had varied from thirteen to twenty-four millions, he must be satisfied that it was impossible to make an accurate calculation of the receipts according to any one year, but only by a series of years. Assuming, however, that this bill would produce from twenty-five to twenty-seven millions, it was unnecessary to discuss it further, unless gentlemen could show that it might be amended so as to produce more.

He thought it needless to discuss the question of protection. As a measure of revenue only did he desire the bill to be considered. Though gentlemen might seek a reduction of some of the duties imposed, on the ground that they afforded protection to our manufactures; he yet thought it right to protect, when it could be done advantageously. He would not legislate for Europe, but for the interests of his own country, which he preferred to all the world. If all restraint upon trade was done away with here, as well as elsewhere, and we could be sure of a continuance of peace, it would be decidedly more advantageous for each country to produce what it could best, to sell its productions where it could get most money, and to buy where goods were cheapest. This was a beautiful and a correct theory, if we could have it in operation.

But it was said by the advocates of free trade, that the duties on imports gave the preference to the manufactures of the East. This was not so. Suppose a high duty is placed on cotton-cloth, to protect the manufacturers, so as to prohibit its importation altogether: the consequence would be that many men would enter into the business, on account of the supposed profit. Competition would then become so great, that the protection would amount to nothing. These duties, then, would not be for the benefit of the manufacturers only, but of the whole nation. He could not now say when it was proper to encourage, and when not; yet he thought it unwise not to encourage necessary articles, and thereby make ourselves independent in case of war. There were many articles of clothing and of food indispensable to the country, for which we would find it economical to pay rather more now, in being able to obtain them at hand when war came upon us, and our ports were closed to foreign importations. He illustrated the idea, by referring to the army and navy, upon which the nation expended so much in time of peace, that they might be ready for war.

There was another case in which he thought we should give protection to our own productions—and a case, he regretted to say, which occurred but too often. It was, when our productions were excluded from the markets of other countries by foreign legislation. Our agriculturists, occupying a boundless territory, were willing to send out their productions to England, and to receive in return various articles which they wanted, and were obliged to have. But England—who supplied them with cloth, and other manufactures—refused to receive the products of their labor, and compelled them to pay specie for what she furnished them. He thought the shield of our Government should be interposed to protect these interests, and meet restriction with restriction. He did not deny Great Britain the power to impose these restrictions. It was a national, a sovereign right, under which she acted. This country, however, should, by countervailing legislation, create that market which she refused to grant.

He appealed to experience to show that all—even those who advocated a tariff solely for revenue—must discriminate between different articles. On costly articles, for instance—articles which were small in bulk, and could be concealed, as watches—a small duty was always imposed, because a high one admitted too great opportunity of fraud. England and France both admitted diamonds duty free. The same principle applied to jewelry and laces, which might be easily smuggled in without paying duty. There was another rule, too, by which discriminations were made, and which he expected many of the anti-tariff men here would follow. It was in reference to articles produced in our own country, on which a high duty could not be levied with advantage; because, if a high duty was placed on such, the consequence would be that the home production would supply the market, and the foreign be entirely prohibited. It was, indeed, a strange phenomenon which we now saw in England—a leader in Parliament coming forward and declaring that no duties should be imposed above 20 per cent. Considering the past history of England with respect, this circumstance reminded him of the saying of Solomon, who, having passed through a long life of excesses, at the end of it declared that all was vanity, vanity. [Laughter.] He had observed the cautious reserve of Sir Robert Peel in relation to the duty on sugar. He would explain the reason of this reserve, and show why it was that Sir Robert Peel, though proposing reductions on other articles, said nothing about this:—England was too cold to produce sugar. There could be no competition at home; and, therefore, as it must be brought in, it might be taxed to any extent. This was why the Premier did not explain. From the English report, it appeared that £22,000,000 was collected from duties on imports in 1840. It was a remarkable fact, that one-half of the sum was derived from three articles—tea, tobacco, and sugar. If the high duties on these articles could enable England to produce them, she would do it. But it was impossible. The tobacco of the gentleman from Virginia would not be taxed 1,000 per cent. if the soil of England could produce that article.

In the present bill, he thought no duty was too high to defeat the object of providing a revenue adequate to the wants of the Government. If any gentleman could show that any article was taxed too high, he would vote for a reduction in the duty.

Mr. ROOSEVELT inquired whether some of the rates of duty proposed by the bill were not so high as to diminish, instead of increasing, the revenue of the country?

Mr. FILLMORE said it might be the case, but he was not aware of it. He would not go for such a high duty on foreign manufactures as would flood the country with our own, and thereby break them down; but would advocate the lowest duty consistent with their prosperity. He called the attention of the committee to the fact, that the revenue bill of 1832, as modified by the bill of 1833, had not produced enough of revenue to carry on the Government. It was a fact, that the revenue from duties equalled the expenditures of the Government but one year. He would state the amounts of receipts from customs, together with the amount of public expenditures for each year, from 1834 to 1840:

	Receipts.	Expenditures.
In 1834,	$16,000,000	$18,000,000
1835,	19,000,000	17,000,000
1836,	23,000,000	29,900,000
1837,	11,000,000	31,000,000
1838,	16,000,000	31,000,000
1839,	23,000,000	25,000,000
1840,	18,000,000	22,000,000

Here was the result of the wise legislation by which our duties were reduced; showing that, during seven years, our receipts from them were but $122,000,000; whilst the cost of the Government during that period was $176,000,000; making an average excess of $7,000,000 per annum. From this, he concluded that the greatest difficulty would be encountered in arranging the duties so as to get the highest amount of revenue.

In relation to protection, he would add, that a distinction should be drawn between protection at first and afterwards. It was a voluntary act on the part of the Government to encourage manufactures at first—an act which might be determined on, or not, according to the pleasure of those having possession of the Government. But when protection came to be considered proper, and was afforded, the faith of the nation was pledged; and no blow should be struck at the manufacturers, who commenced their enterprises calculating upon the continuance of protection from the Government.

Another question was, as to the mode in which these duties should be levied. It was known to the House that there were two modes of imposing duties: one was on the value of the article, and the other was specific. Now, he was aware that there was a feeling in the community, since the adoption of the compromise act, in favor of ad valorem duties; and that many strong reasons might be given in their favor. But experience had shown that they had, at times, led to the most injurious results; and therefore, in the tariffs of every country in Europe, the duties were specific on almost every article. One of the reasons against ad valorem duties, and in favor of specific duties, was, that the former offered strong inducements to fraudulent invoices. Indeed, it had become an every-day practice to make out two invoices—one for the custom-house, and the other for the consignee; and the consequence was, that not only was the revenue defrauded, but the fair trader was greatly injured in his business. Under all the considerations applicable to the subject, he had come to the conclusion that specific duties were preferable.

There was one other subject to which he wished to call the attention of the committee. The Secretary of the Treasury had recommended that the duties should be collected in cash; and the committee had come to the conclusion to adopt that system. Mr. F. then went on to give the reasons why the cash system should be adopted; and, at the same time, showed the disadvantages of the credit system, which, he said, had involved us in debt and embarrassment. He was, however, in favor of a modified warehousing system, by which some indulgence would be extended to the importer. Mr. F. then explained the warehousing system of Great Britain, and showed the extent to which it might be judiciously carried in this country, answering the objections that had been urged against it. After a few more remarks on the subject of wool, the duty on which the committee proposed to put at 30 per cent., Mr. F. concluded his remarks.

2D Sess.]

The Provisional Tariff.

[JUNE, 1842.]

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, JUNE 10.

The Apportionment Bill.

The special order of the day brought up the apportionment bill, engrossed for a third reading.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading; and having been read the third time, and the question now being, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. WALKER demanded the yeas and nays on that question; which were ordered. The question was put, and the bill was passed in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Choate, Conrad, Crafts, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—25.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Berrien, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Rives, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—19.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, JUNE 10.

The Provisional Tariff.

Mr. FILLMORE again moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of taking up the bill to extend, for a limited period, the present laws for laying and collecting duties on imports.

After a few remarks from Mr. PICKENS and Mr. WISE, the motion was agreed to; and the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A Bill to extend for a limited period the present laws for laying and collecting duties on imports.

Be it enacted, &c., That all laws existing in force on the first of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, regulating and fixing the amount and rate of duties to be levied and collected on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and prescribing the mode of collecting the same, and all provisions relating thereto, shall continue and be in force as they existed on that day, until the first day of August, eighteen hundred and forty-two, and no longer; any thing in the act entitled "An act to modify an act of the fourteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, and all other acts imposing duties on imports," approved March second, eighteen hundred and thirty-three, to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall suspend the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, any thing herein contained, and any thing contained in the proviso to the sixth section of the act approved fourth September, eighteen hundred and forty-one, entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights," to the contrary notwithstanding.

The committee negatived a motion to strike out the words "first day of August," as the limit of the extension of the present laws, the proposition being to leave the period indefinite.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House.

Mr. WISE was very willing to do so, because it was the best mode of defeating an increase of the duties for the present session.

Mr. ROOSEVELT moved to strike out the proviso. He said that proviso was not found in the bill which was reported to the House a day or two since, and its insertion appeared to have been an after-thought. This bill, as it originally appeared before the House, was simply to extend all the revenue laws to the 1st of August next from the 30th of June next. The present bill not only proposed the same object, but also provided that nothing therein contained should interfere with the operation of the distribution act. Without such a proviso, the effect of this bill would have been to annihilate the distribution law, which directs the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands amongst the States. He then proceeded to notice the operation of this law if it should be passed by Congress. He was understood to say that the receipts from the public lands, which had come into the treasury, had been used for the general purposes of the Government; and the Secretary of the Treasury would again be driven as a borrower into the market, for money to divide amongst the States; and he wished to be informed if it was the intention of gentlemen to put the treasury in that position.

Mr. FILLMORE explained.

Mr. PICKENS said when he saw the gentleman from New York move to recommit the bill to extend the operation of the existing tariff laws, a day or two since, he was satisfied there was something more behind the curtain.

Mr. FILLMORE said he should have given his reasons if he had been permitted. It was the very reason which the subsequent bill would suggest. It was, that the former bill would have prevented the distribution in July.

Mr. PICKENS said that was precisely what he was going to remark. He considered it exceedingly remarkable that this bill should have been postponed to this late period, and that it should not sooner, considering its consequences, have been brought before the House and the country. The House had gone into committee, and they were induced to believe they were about to enter upon the discussion of the tariff bill fully. But the gentleman from New York came in and moved to lay that bill aside, and to take up this bill—a proceeding utterly unprecedented in the history of legislation since he had had a seat in this House. The honorable gentleman went into some statements of these laws, and of the bill now proposed; and he said he should like to know if, as the gentleman from New York intimated, there was none of the money to be distributed in the public treasury; and, if there were none there, if they would compel the Government to borrow the money for distribution among the States.

June, 1842.]

The Provisional Tariff.

[27th Conn.

Mr. GWIN offered an amendment, which he hoped would be accepted by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and put an end to the debate entirely. It provided for a suspension of the law, distributing the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, until the 1st of August.

Mr. CUSHING desired to understand the operation of this bill, upon other and collateral questions. The third section of the act of 1833 provided for a reduction of duties to twenty per cent., after the 30th of June, 1842. What would be our condition, after that time, without any intermediate action on the part of Congress? At the close of the third section of the act of 1833, it was provided that all duties should be paid in ready money. That was definite. But it was further provided, that all duty on imports should be collected according to their assessed value, at the ports where they were entered, according to such regulations as should be provided by law. The duties were to be assessed according to the home valuation. How was this to be ascertained? There was no existing law, and no treasury machinery by which the collectors could be guided. The law of 1833 contemplated some action on the subject prior to the 1st of July, 1842. No act has yet been passed; neither the custom-house officers, nor the Secretary of the Treasury, nor the importing merchants had any guide, according to which they could act. These facts showed that the House should seriously determine whether any duties were to be collected or not. It was certain that some legislation would be necessary; and, acting upon this view, the Committee on Manufactures, and the Committee of Ways and Means, had both reported bills for the establishment of a permanent tariff. Should either of those bills be passed before the 30th of June, the necessity of further action would be superseded. But the bill now before the committee contemplated the contingency of no action by Congress before the 30th of June. It was a virtual acknowledgment that it would be impossible to pass a revenue bill before that time; and that the effect of the present bill was to extend the present laws until the 1st of August. There was, then, an imperative moral urgency to enact some tariff law. Without it, the treasury must be without money. In the second place, our market would be flooded with foreign merchandise. There might be $25,000,000 of them in New York now. The owners of these goods might export them to some near port in a British colony, and receive the duties which they had paid in the way of drawback. Then, in one week after the 1st of July, they might bring the goods back and enter them free. This might, or might not, happen; he stated the case as one of the possible consequences of a want of legislation. Following in this train, there was a third consequence of the failure to act upon the tariff; and that would be the entire prostration of the protective interest. Not only would the interest dependant on a protective tariff be injured, but it would be entirely prostrated and overwhelmed by the torrent of foreign productions which would come into our ports.

With these three effects of inaction—a bankrupt treasury, our country flooded with foreign productions, and her protective interests prostrated—staring the Representatives of the people in the face, there was a strong constitutional and moral obligation upon them to do something for the benefit of the country. The effect of the present bill was to take away the urgent necessity for action before the 30th of June. It merely gave another month to debate that great question of the enactment of a permanent tariff.

But this bill related to other questions beside that of the tariff. He referred to its operation upon the distribution law. The first section of that law provided that, from and after December 31st, 1841, certain things should happen: among those things, was the distribution of such sums as should be received into the treasury from the public lands, between December and June, to the States. Therefore, if nothing occurred before that time, the distribution would take effect. Was there any thing in this bill to prevent the accomplishment of that object? The sixth section of the distribution law provided that, if the tariff should be so altered as to be inconsistent with the compromise act of 1833, no distribution should be made. On these premises, how did the first part of the bill now before the committee apply? It was obvious that it changed the existing facts—the status in quo; and its effect, in that part, was to repeal the distribution law.

But the bill contained a proviso, that “nothing herein contained shall suspend the operation of the law directing a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands,” &c. The effect of this was to keep the distribution law in force. Every one was aware that this law had other relations besides those of a financial character. It was based upon political considerations. After some further remarks upon this point, he proceeded to reply to the argument advanced, that the act of 1833 gave an implied stipulation that no duties should exceed 20 per cent. after the 30th of June.

The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. PROKENS) had said he was in favor of the bill without the proviso. He did not doubt the gentleman's friendship for it in that state, for it left the tariff as it was before; and in proportion as it was agreeable to that gentleman on this account, it was disagreeable to himself. In regard to the compromise act, (about which gentlemen were in the habit of conversing as a contract,) he could not see how that was more binding upon Congress than the compromise in the distribution law, which the gentleman himself wished to overthrow.

Mr. UNDERWOOD could not agree that the distribution law was passed by means of a bargain between different interests represented on the floor of the Senate. He himself had voted against the proviso of that law, foreseeing the consequences which were now at hand. Such a principle as that by which the law was suspended whenever the duties on imports exceeded twenty per cent., should never have been incorporated into it. Since one Legislature had no right to bind its successors, the proviso itself might become inoperative. He had no idea that any bargain was entered into, to procure the passage of the bill, by inserting the proviso; certainly, he was no party to it, if there was.

2d Sess.]

The Provisional Tariff.

[JUNE, 1842.]

He predicted that there would be some curious developments in the course of the debate and votes upon this bill and the amendments. In the first place, there were many gentlemen, and (he would be candid) himself among them, who would vote upon the bill so as to get the land fund for the States. He should himself vote to obtain that money, at all events—20 per cent. or no 20 per cent. If he could not get the land money without bringing down the tariff, he would do that. He would bring it down to 20 per cent., and also he would bring the $65,000,000 worth of articles now duty-free, and subject them to the operation of the tariff. It was well known that there were three classes of articles imported through our custom-houses—those paying duties ad valorem, those paying specific duties, and a large class which were entered free. This last class he would embrace in a tariff, and thus enlarge the number of dutiable articles.

There was another view of the question—a view, too, which could be carried. He hoped it would be; for they were strong enough to carry it, if they would only co-operate and show their strength now. [Laughter.] There were many men in the House willing to vote for a tariff greater than 20 per cent., and thus protect the manufacturers. Many were thus situated, and were willing to help the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CUSHING) with his tariff, on the condition that they should get the land money for themselves. [Laughter.] Some gentlemen said they must have protection, and others said they should vote for such a tariff as would give it incidentally. He was willing on his part. He was not ultra, but would go beyond 20 per cent., in various instances. But gentlemen must show him that the land money would be distributed. He did not wish to make a bargain, but was merely telling gentlemen these things for information. [Laughter.] He repeated, he did not wish to make a bargain; but he would watch gentlemen when they voted on these various questions. This was the second view of the question. The third was this: if the House should refuse to pass this bill, with the proviso by which the distribution law would be secured, it would prove that the free-trade, anti-protective interest had the ascendancy, and intended to adhere to their policy. He should regard the votes given on the question. As they voted on it, so would they show their hands.

He then went on to say that it would be useless for him to debate the question upon its general principles, with a view to changing the vote of any member. He believed that, were he to speak every day in the week till sundown, he could not alter a vote. He might convince members about the propriety of duties on particular articles; he might modify their views as to some of the details; but he could not make an anti-tariff man a tariff man. The House would be engaged in a long debate; but the speeches would be intended mostly for home consumption.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON inquired whether the gentleman would consider those who voted in favor of a repeal of the distribution law, as opposed to a protective tariff; and those who voted against the repeal, as friendly to a protective tariff?

Mr. UNDERWOOD replied that he would.

Mr. WISE, after a few remarks, observed, that if he understood the gentleman from Kentucky correctly, his first object was to increase the duties above 20 per cent., and to provide what he considered proper protection, and also to repeal the 20 per cent. clause in the land distribution bill—that is, to hold on to distribution and protection both. The gentleman's second proposition was equally important. He understood him to proclaim to the protection interest, inside of this House and out of it, that if they would not give him the repeal of the 20 per cent. clause—if they would not give him distribution, he would not give them duties above 20 per cent. [Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is right.] But he would go for cutting down every branch of the public expenditures—every branch of the public service. [Mr. UNDERWOOD said the gentleman was here wrong, and explained what he did say.] Then the gentleman will reduce the expenditures of the Government, and tax tea and coffee, in order to hold on to distribution. That was precisely what he held out to his constituents and others to be the policy to be pursued, not by the gentleman from Kentucky alone, but by the majority of the House; and the gentleman now avowed it. Now (said Mr. W.) we understand the votes that have been given at this session. Sink the navy, sink the army, sink protection, and every Government establishment—every industrial interest is to be sacrificed to one man's hobby—distribution. The people are to be taxed to distribute; the Government is to borrow to distribute; the navy, the right arm of our defence, and the army, the left arm, are to be sacrificed; and those who have heretofore professed to be par excellence the friends of protection, are now to be its worst enemies. New England, Pennsylvania, and every manufacturing State, are to be told that they are to have no protection, unless they will give away the proceeds of the public lands. They have announced to them that the main difficulty in their way, now that protection—which is incidental to a revenue tariff, and a large revenue, too—is required for the wants of the Government—that the only bugbear in the way is the land distribution bill. This was avowed—honestly avowed—by the gentleman from Kentucky; and he would hold him to it.

JUNE, 1842.]

The Provisional Tariff.

[27TH CON.

Mr. W. said he would go for a liberal tariff for revenue. He would vote to-day to raise the duties above twenty per cent., because the Government was in debt, and wanted money to carry on its operations; and he would do that under the existing law—the land bill—which bore on its face the declaration—the pledge—that when the duties should exceed twenty per centum, distribution should cease. He agreed with the honorable gentleman that there was no principle of legislation by which one Congress could bind its successors, except good faith. Those who devised the land distribution law enacted—did not pledge merely, but enacted—that when it should be found necessary to raise the duties above twenty per cent., the distribution should be suspended. Was there nothing, in good faith, binding the very same men who made that law, to fulfil it? Sir, the time has come when Government needs more revenue than can be collected under existing laws; when it needs so much revenue, that a revenue tariff will give that reasonable protection to our domestic manufactures, to which no Southern man will object; and while the gentleman threatened the tariff-men with a loss of protection if they did not repeal the clause of the distribution act, I, to get a repeal of that act, will go for raising the duties above twenty per cent. He might see some partial good in protection; but he could see no good—nothing but bribery, corruption, and ruin—in the distribution act. He wanted neither a high tariff nor distribution; but, though he was an anti-tariff man, he would agree to give some protection, rather than retain the distribution act. He would rather see some portion of the country benefited, than the whole country injured. He was not, however, called on to vote for protection, but for revenue; and, in voting revenue enough for the purposes of the Government, he would give as much protection as the manufacturers ought to expect.

Mr. EVERETT observed that he voted for the distribution act on the ground that the lands were the original property of the States, and because he wished to take them out of the political market. If there had been no other way of doing this, he would have been willing to cede them back to the States who gave them. With regard to the twenty per cent. clause, every consideration with him was in favor of its repeal. He would rather that this bill should not pass, and trust to the consequences, than stop the distribution. He voted for that clause because there was a necessity to adopt it, in order to pass the bill; but he gave that vote with a determination that, at the first opportunity that offered, he would get rid of it. He did not consider that honor or good faith required of him to adhere to a measure that had been forced on him as that was.

Mr. FOSTER understood the gentleman from Vermont to say that he voted for this proviso in the distribution act, in order to obtain the advantage of passing the law, and, afterwards, of repealing the proviso. He heard this admission with deep regret; for there was no gentleman for whom he entertained a higher respect than he did for him. He was aware that there was no law but what could be repealed, and that one Congress could not bind its successors; but, in passing that act, there was a faith pledged, that ought not to be violated. He believed there was not a man in the House, or in the Senate, that would get up and say that the distribution law could have passed without that clause. It was a contract, as well understood at the time, as any that had ever been made between individuals: and those who voted for it seemed to him to be under the same obligations to adhere to their contracts. No man believed that the bill could have been passed without that proviso. What was it? It was this, [reading from the law:] "If, at any time during the existence of this act, there shall be an imposition of duties on imports inconsistent with the provisions of the act of 2d March, 1833, and beyond the rate of duty fixed by that act, viz., 20 per cent. ad valorem, the distribution provided for by this act shall be suspended, and shall continue suspended until the cause of suspension shall be removed." Mr. F. continued his remarks a some length; concluding with the position, that the act was passed in good faith, and should be adhered to.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL replied at some length, contending that, if good policy required the repeal of the clause, there was nothing that rendered it obligatory on Congress to retain it. He argued that there was no contract expressed or implied; and that, unless there was a contract, (one essential ingredient of which was a valuable consideration,) no Legislature was bound to abide by the acts of its predecessor.

Mr. PROFFIT remarked, (Mr. I. yielding the floor for the purpose of explanation,) that there was a consideration—and that was, the passage of the bankrupt bill, nearly at the same time. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was not here at that time, and did not know the circumstances under which these two acts were passed: but, if he could get the floor, he would explain them all, and show that it was said in the Senate that there was a contract by which the passage of the one bill depended on the other.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, JUNE 13.

Mr. WOODBURY presented to the Senate the credentials of the Hon. LEONARD WILCOX, who had been elected by the Legislature of New

2d Sess.]

The Provisional Tariff.

[JUNE, 1842.]

Hampshire to fill the unexpired term of the Hon. FRANKLIN PIERCE, resigned.

Mr. KING suggested that, notwithstanding the honorable Senator had been heretofore qualified under the appointment by the Governor, it would be necessary for him to qualify again.

Mr. WILCOX was accordingly again qualified, and took his seat.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 18.

The Apportionment Bill.

Mr. EVERETT moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking up the apportionment bill, which had been returned from the Senate with amendments; and the yeas and nays having been ordered, the question on the suspension was taken, resulting in yeas 182, nays 25.

So the bill and amendments were taken up.

The question recurred upon the motion to concur with the Senate in their first amendment, increasing the ratio from 50,179 to 70,680, and resulted in the negative—yeas 95, nays 112.

The question next recurred upon the motion to concur with the Senate in their second amendment, giving an additional Representative to fractions over and above one moiety of the ratio, and it was lost.

TUESDAY, June 14.

The Provisional Tariff.

On motion of Mr. W. COST JOHNSON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. McKENNA in the chair.) The committee took up the bill to extend the operation of the existing revenue laws of the country until the 1st of August.

Mr. GILMER, who was entitled to the floor when the committee rose on Friday, addressed the committee at length in opposition to the bill. He said he should interpose no objection whatever to its passage, did he believe it to be such a bill as its title imported—to extend the operation of the existing revenue laws of the country. But he believed it to be a bill of a totally different character, and, therefore, he felt bound to trespass upon the indulgence of the committee with a few remarks. He would briefly call their attention to the circumstances by which we were surrounded, and which had brought us to our present position. It was generally considered that the compromise act of 1833 would not, on the 30th of June, yield revenue enough to pay the debts and defray the expenses of the Government, and that the amount must be increased. This must be done, the committee had been told, in one of two modes: either by increasing the number of articles subject to a duty of 20 per cent., or by increasing the amount of duty on those articles which would have to pay but 20 per cent. according to the compromise act. It was evident that we could no longer rely upon loans. The credit of our Government was exhausted, and we were now literally brought to the necessity of raising the ways and means. This was a revenue question—one which must be looked at in all its aspects, and promptly decided. The time had arrived when, the committee was told, it could no longer postpone action, which was demanded by public faith, credit, character, and honor.

Three bills had been reported to the House, all proposing to raise an amount of revenue which their several advocates considered necessary to pay the debts, and to defray the expenses of the Government. These bills were founded upon different principles—upon protection and revenue, and upon both blended, according to the views of their advocates. He would call the attention of the committee to the fact, that they all proposed to raise more revenue than could be raised by the compromise act. But there was not time enough to act upon them before the 30th of June, which would arrive in fifteen days, when the reduction of all duties to the twenty per cent. standard would take effect. There was obviously not time enough to discuss, consider, and decide a question, which the honorable chairman of Ways and Means had informed the House, not long since, was one of the most difficult and complicated which our Government had ever been called upon to consider.

He repeated, he would have no objection to the passage of the bill, if it was in reality what, by its specious title, it purported to be. But whilst it was apparently a bill to suspend, it in fact repealed the whole revenue system, after a certain day. Its effect would be to throw the Government into chaos; for, without revenue, the Government could not be carried on. It would place the country where it was at the end of the Revolutionary war, without means and in debt. It would exhibit Congress in the attitude of repealing the only laws by which revenue might be derived. He did not wish to deal unfairly with the bill, and would, therefore, read it. He then read the bill by which the present revenue laws are to continue in force until the first day of August, "and no longer." These words "and no longer," he contended, would have the effect of leaving the country entirely without revenue laws. Where was the security for the bill in its present shape? The committee was told that the present laws would not be in force after the 30th of June, when the duties would be reduced to 20 per cent. Suppose the bill be passed, and the 1st of August arrive without action: would not the Government be in as bad a condition as at the end of June? But it went further than that. The words "and no longer" contained as positive a repeal of all existing laws, as if they had been repealed in express language.

If the chairman of the Committee of Ways

JUNE, 1842.]

The Provisional Tariff.

[27TH CONG.]

and Means wished to obviate this objection, it was easy for him to do so. Let the bill stop in the tenth line; and then its effect would be to continue existing laws until the further action of Congress. In that case, there would be no doubt of the passage of this bill. What was its object? To allow time to Congress to deliberate upon permanent revenue laws. That object could be attained by declaring that the present law shall remain in force until further action by Congress. But he heard the honorable chairman of Ways and Means whisper across, that there might be no action on the part of Congress. He thanked him for the whisper. He wished to show that the gentleman, in this bill, gave Congress six weeks to deliberate; but if, at the end of that period, no tariff should be matured, there were to be no revenue laws. All the means of the Government were exhausted. Only six weeks remained to discuss the tariff; and yet we were called on to repeal all existing laws, unless Congress should take further action prior to the 1st of August.

Nor was this all. The bill before the committee violated the compromise acts—acts recognized by Congress as such. He was not one of those who attached a sacred character to ordinary acts passed by Congress. In the Legislature of Virginia he had declined declaring that the compromise act of 1833 was sacred. He would not declare the constitution sacred; and there was but one book or written instrument in the world to which he would apply that appellation. He would, however, say that this bill violated compacts; and the faith of man was as much involved in the defence of a compact of a simple as of a sacred character. About twelve months since, when this Congress found itself in extra session, the opponents of the land distribution bill, which was then introduced, objected to it on the ground that it would interfere with the compromise of 1833, increase the taxes, and take from the people with one hand, while it gave with the other.

The clause limiting the operation of the law to the period during which the compromise act of 1833 should not be violated, was ingrafted with the bill, as a guarantee that the consequences which its opponents foretold would not ensue. It was, therefore, a compromise agreed upon by the friends of the distribution law to secure its passage. Indeed, it was a double compromise, since it secured the former compromise of 1833. But the present bill violates both of these compromises. And gentlemen here declared they would vote for a distribution of the land fund, whether the duties on imports be 20 or 50 per cent.

He would not discuss the question, whose extravagance it was that spent the money in our treasury, and brought us to our present necessities. Our necessities existed, and were likely to put in force the clause of the distribution law which repealed itself. The question now was, whether Congress would re-enact the distribution law, without the 20 per cent.

provision; whether they would give away the land money, revenue or no revenue. Should the distribution law be re-enacted, without regard to the tax which will have to be imposed upon the people, who are to receive the money? This was the true question; and all that the opponents of distribution asked was, that its friends would adhere to the very principles on which the law was enacted. Were we to be told that there was no such thing as public faith? that, although Congress had pledged its faith in that very law against any increase of taxes, we were at liberty to disregard it?

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 15.

The Florida Armed Occupation Bill.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill to provide for the armed occupation and settlement of the unsettled part of the peninsula of East Florida, having been correctly engrossed, was read the third time and passed.

The Apportionment Bill.

On motion of Mr. BERRIEN, the Senate took up the message from the House, returning the bill apportioning Representatives among the States according to the sixth census, and giving information that that House had non-concurred with the Senate in all their amendments to said bill.

The question now being on the motion to insist on the amendment of the Senate, providing that such States as have a fraction of more than a moiety of the ratio shall be entitled to an additional Representative, it was put, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 18.

The question was then taken on the motion to insist on the amendment of the Senate, increasing the ratio adopted by the House from 50,176 to 70,680, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 30, nays 14.

The other amendments of the Senate, conforming the number of Representatives for each State to the ratio, were also insisted on; and

The Secretary was directed to return the bill to the House, and inform it of the action of the Senate.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 15.

The Provisional Tariff.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. McKENNA, of Pennsylvania, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill to extend for a limited period the present laws for laying and collecting duties on imports.

When the bill was last under consideration, Mr. ROOSEVELT had moved to amend it by striking out the proviso at the end thereof.

[Sens.]

The Provisional Tariff.

[JUNE, 1842.]

And Mr. GWIN had moved to amend the amendment, by adding at the end of the sixteenth line of the bill the words, "to a later period than 1st August, 1842."

And the pending question was on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. JOHN W. JONES said: Was the proposition which had been laid down true—that, in the event of the passage of this bill, the laws in force on the 30th of June would be continued precisely as they existed? It was necessary to inquire, first, what were the laws in force on the 1st of June; and, secondly, whether it was proposed by this bill to change any of their material provisions. He apprehended it would be admitted on all hands that the compromise act was in force on the 1st of June, and had not yet accomplished its purposes; that the revenue bill of last session was also in force; and last, but not least, that the land bill of last session was still in force. Then, if no legislation should be had now, what would be the condition of our revenue laws? Why, on the 30th of June, the compromise act of 1833 would accomplish the great objects for which it was originally introduced, and all duties be brought down to 20 per cent. In contemplation of that event, what further consequences would ensue? The land law of last session would, the day after, distribute all the proceeds of the public lands received into the treasury since the 31st of last December. These would be the effects of no legislation. The compromise act would have performed all its purposes; and, in contemplation of that event, the distribution law would distribute all the proceeds of the sales of public lands on the day after.

But, legislate as proposed in this bill—enact the proviso to it which is proposed to be stricken out—and what would then be the consequences? Instead of bringing down the duties on imports, you actually keep them up beyond twenty per cent. If this be done, what, according to the land bill, must follow? Why, distribution must be suspended. What would be the consequences with this bill in operation? The distribution law would take effect; and this was what gentlemen termed leaving things precisely as they were on the first day of June.

It should not be forgotten that, in 1833, the public lands were regarded as a part of the revenue of the Government. The compromise act was then entered into, in contemplation of their continuance as such. It was also remarkable, that the proceeds of the public lands was the only branch of revenue in which the great mass of the people bore an equal share of the public burdens. The land bill itself so regarded it; because in that bill it was provided, in express terms, that where a greater amount of duty than twenty per cent. was laid upon any of the articles enumerated in the compromise act of 1833, the distribution should be suspended. Here was not only one compromise, but two—the compromise of 1833, and that of last session. Here was a bond originally executed between two contending parties. It was enacted by the very individuals now seeking to violate its provisions. Yes, this bond of compromise was signed under circumstances which he need not here repeat. It had been kept inviolate for years. Here was the original contract, (alluding to the act of 1833,) and here your subsequent recognition of its validity, (the distribution law.) Were these contracts not to be regarded? Did gentlemen mean nothing when they entered into them? Did they now intend that nothing should be accomplished by them?

In speaking of the compromise of 1833, he need only call the attention of the committee to the time when it received the sanction of Congress. Gentlemen here remembered the difficulties by which we were then surrounded, and the opposition which was made to the enforcement of the then existing law. Such was the state of dissension and disagreement which prevailed, that this country was brought to the very verge of disunion. All remembered the deep excitement prevailing at that time in relation to the contest between a State and the General Government; and those on the spot at the time could call to mind the sleepless nights which were spent in devising some scheme to save the Union from the most fearful of calamities. Yet, after a law had been passed under such circumstances, we were told it had no binding influence upon party, or any one else! Look at what was then said, when apprehensions were expressed lest it should not be observed. What said the leader of a great party, then as now? He (Mr. J.) could not quote his words, but he remembered that the leader to whom he referred said that it would be wrong to think of violating that act; and no man could stand up before the country and advocate such a design.

Let it be recollected that one party, at least, had kept its faith to the country; that, during nine years, whilst the South had to bear the burdens of the arrangement, it tamely and quietly submitted to the consequences—and under circumstances, too, which afforded the most plausible pretext for the violation of the principles embodied in the act. What had been the condition of the country during that period? Its treasury was overflowing, and it had deposited its millions with the States. Yet the law was looked upon as sacred. How strong would have been the appeal which might have been addressed to the people of the South, who bore the burdens of the act! Might it not have been said to them, "Why collect millions annually, when the treasury is so full, and when you may be so easily relieved without embarrassing the operations of the Government?" But what said the South then? True to its engagements, it never once looked to the consequences of such a measure. This, too, was at a time when the manufacturers were trembling lest the compromise should be disturbed.

The nine years had expired, and during that time, the South had kept its part of the engagement. Now, when we (said Mr. J.) are to reap the advantages of the compromise act, what is the spectacle which we see exhibited? The very party who enacted the law have come forward, and declared that they will not execute the promises nor discharge the obligations there imposed. Again: who does not know that the land bill, which was passed at the extra session of Congress, would not have received the sanction of the Senate, but for the introduction of the 20 per cent. clause? What said gentlemen when the bill came back from the Senate with that provision attached? They said, "We assent to the proviso, in order to get the bill passed." Yet, when, by the proviso to the present bill, it is proposed to change a material provision in the land bill, and subtract seven or eight hundred thousand dollars from the means of the Treasury, this is called leaving things precisely as they were.

If such had been the object of gentlemen advocating the present bill, how easy would it have been for them to have passed another bill, emanating from the same committee which introduced this, but the day before, and now lying on the table. That bill had not been reported sixty minutes before it became apparent that its effect would be to suspend the distribution law. What was the course pursued? A motion was made to recommit it to the same committee, and; no doubt, for the purpose of substituting the present. If the object sought after was to leave the laws as they existed, where was the necessity for the present movement? The conviction was plain. Who was so blind as not to see that this bill re-enacted the land bill, and repealed the compromise? He asked, was it just or fair? You passed the distribution law by the incorporation of a principle, without which it could not have become a law; and, in less than a year, you seek to violate your own faith.

The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the committee, according to order, proceeded to vote upon the several amendments offered to the bill.

The question was first taken upon the motion to strike out the proviso to the bill, which re-enacts the distribution law. This motion was rejected—ayes 102, noes 118.

Mr. GWIN then renewed his amendment, (previously withdrawn,) according to which the operation of the distribution law would be suspended until the 1st of August. The vote on this amendment was taken by tellers, and resulted—ayes 87, noes 111.

Mr. GILMER moved to strike out the words "until the 1st day of August, 1842, and no longer," and insert "until the same shall be changed by law." The effect of this amendment would be to prolong the operation of the bill. It was rejected by the committee—ayes 90, noes 105.

After several ineffectual attempts had been made to carry amendments to the bill,

Mr. FILLMORE moved to strike out the words "and no longer," and insert "at which time, if there shall be then no further legislation on the subject, the laws shall be the same as if no action had been had." This amendment was adopted without a count.

The committee then rose and reported the bill to the House, and the amendments adopted in committee were then agreed to.

Mr. EASTMAN moved that the proviso to the bill be stricken out.

The House refused to strike out the proviso by a vote of 107 to 118.

The bill having been ordered to its engrossment, by general consent it was read a third time, and then passed by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Appleton, Arnold, Ar-craig, Baker, Barnard, Birdseye, Boardman, Bots, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Milton Brown, Burnell,
Calhoun, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Casey,
Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clark,
James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Cushing, Garrett Davis, Deberry, John Edwards, Everett, Fer-senden, Fillmore, A. Lawrence Foster, Giddings, Goggin, Patrick G. Goode, Graham, Granger, Green,
Hall, Halsted, Howard, Hudson, Hunt, Joseph E.
Ingersoll, James Irvin, William W. Irwin, James William Cost Johnson, Isaac D. Jones, John P. Kennedy, Lane, Linn, McKennan, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Mitchell,
Moore, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Owley, Parmenter, Pearce, Pendleton, Pope, Powell, Ramsay,
Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Randolph,
Ridgway, Rodney, William Russell, James M. Russell,
Saltonstall, Shepperd, Simonton, Slade, Trumbull,
Smith, Sprigg, Stanly, Stokeley, Stratton, Alexander
H. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Summers, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Washington, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—116.

NAYS.—Messrs. Atherton, Beeson, Bidlack, Black,
Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Charles
Brown, Burke, William Butler, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Colquhoun, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Doan, Doig, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Egbert, Ferris, John G. Floyd, Charles A.
Floyd, Foranoe, Thomas F. Foster, Gamble, Gilmer, William O. Goode, Gordon, Gustine, Gwin, Haber-sham, Harris, John Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubbard, Hunter, Charles J.
Ingersoll, Jack, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones,
Keim, Andrew Kennedy, King, Lewis, Littlefield,
Lowell, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, Mc-Kay, McKeon, Alfred Marshall, John Thompson,
Mason, Matthews, Medill, Miller, Newhard, Oliver, Patridge, Payne, Pickens, Plumer, Proffit, Reed,
Reding, Rencher, Reynolds, Rhett, Riggs, Rogers, Roosevelt, Saunders, Shaw, Shields, Snyder, Stearrod, Sumter, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Van Buren, Warren, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, Wise, and Wood—103.

2D SESS.]

General Jackson's Fine.

[JUNE, 1842.]

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 16.

The Provisional Tariff Bill.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the bill from the House to extend, for a limited period, the present laws for laying and collecting duties on imports, was taken up and read the first time.

Mr. EVANS moved that the bill be now read a second time, with a view to its reference.

Mr. SEVIER objected to its second reading.

Mr. EVANS demanded the yeas and nays on the question, "Shall the bill be read a second time, with a view to reference?" which were ordered.

Mr. BUCHANAN remarked that, as the yeas and nays had been called, he would just say he would vote for referring the bill to a committee; certainly, he would for its reference. But, if the question was on the passage of the bill, with the proviso inserted in it, he would as certainly vote against it. He would vote for its reference, to give the Committee on Finance and the Senate an opportunity to strike out the proviso.

Mr. KING said he would vote against countenancing the bill, for one moment, in any form. He viewed it as an attempt to force the Senate to violate a solemn promise made to the country, and particularly to those who were induced to vote for the distribution law, under the direct pledge that the compromise act was not to be disturbed. He held that the distribution law never would have passed, had it not been for the distinct understanding (as strong as if it had been made in writing) with those who voted for it, that the compromise act should not be disturbed, and that, if the rate of duties should go above 20 per cent., the distribution of the sales of the public lands should cease. That was the understanding by both Houses, deliberately given—certainly on the part of the Senate—and which induced gentlemen to vote for the bill, who would otherwise have opposed it. He maintained that the Senate was bound, by the understanding, to resist the passage of the bill. The Senate owed it to itself, to its honor and integrity, and to the country and its interests, not to lend its sanction or countenance, for a moment, to this bill, and thereby violate every obligation to themselves and the great interests of the country. He would not, as far as he was concerned, give his countenance to the proposed measure for a moment.

Mr. EVANS said, any discussion on the merits of the bill would be inappropriate at this stage; he would not, therefore, say a single word. He hoped the bill would be permitted to take the ordinary course, as it would be brought before the Senate again at an early day.

The question was then taken on the motion to read the bill a second time, and resulted in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Buchanan, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Ker, Man-gum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—28.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—18.

The bill was then read the second time; when,

Mr. EVANS moved that it be referred to the Committee on Finance. Carried.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, June 17.

General Jackson's Fine.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, rose and begged leave to report a bill for the relief of General Jackson. He supposed it would be necessary to move the suspension of the rules for the reception of this bill, and he would, therefore, make that motion.

[Cries of "Oh, no; there will be no objection."]

There being no objection thereto, he reported the bill, and it was read a first and second time. It was a bill to restore the fine of $1,000 imposed on General Jackson in 1815.

Mr. INGERSOLL then rose to present a report to accompany the bill just read; and he said it was due to himself, and to some members of the committee, (a majority of whom were opposed to accompanying the bill with this report,) that he should say that he offered it as the report of three members of the committee; and, as such, he trusted it would be laid on the table, and be printed. He submitted that motion.

Mr. BARNARD begged leave to submit to the House (that the House might act understandingly) the fact—which it was due to the Committee on the Judiciary should be known—that it was true, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the Committee on the Judiciary had directed him to report a bill for the relief of General Jackson. It was also true that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania presented a written report, which was not adopted by the committee; and there was, therefore, no report of the committee accompanying the bill. The question for the House to determine, therefore, was, whether they would, for the first time in the practice of the House, adopt in the shape of a minority report, a paper emanating from one or more of the committee, when the majority of the committee had made no report whatever. That was the only exception he felt it to be his duty to take to the adoption and printing of this paper; it would be the opening of the door to a practice which might be hereafter injurious, or at least inconvenient.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL said, in moving for the printing of this report, he was far from supposing that the printing was a sanctioning of the report by the House. Whether gentlemen agreed with, or disagreed from, the report, he might say of it, that it was, in itself, very inoffensive; it was but such an argument as he had thought fit to submit with the bill; and the House could print it, or not, as they might think proper.

JUNE, 1842.]

The Apportionment Bill.

[27TH CONG.]

Mr. FOSTER, of Georgia, made some observations, which were not heard at the reporters' desk; and then the motion was agreed to.

The Apportionment Bill.

The House took up the apportionment bill.

The question pending was, "Will the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate?" on which Mr. THOMPSON, of Indiana, had moved the previous question; but, before any action was had thereon, the House adjourned.

Mr. BIRDSEYE called for the yeas and nays on the question of receding, which were ordered; and the House determined to recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate: yeas 109, nays 104.

The question then recurred upon agreeing to the first division of the Senate's amendment, (i. e. that increasing the ratio,) and resulted in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Barnard, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Black, Bronson, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burke, William Butler, Patrick C. Caldwell, Thomas J. Campbell, Casey, Chapman, Childs, John C. Clark, Coles, Cravens, Cross, Daniel, Dawson, Eastman, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, Thomas F. Foster, Gamble, Gilmer, Goggin, Patrick G. Goode, Granger, Gustine, Gwin, Habersham, Hall, Hopkins, Houston, Howard, Hunter, Hunt, Chas. J. Ingersoll, James Irvin, Jack, James, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Isaac D. Jones, King, Lane, Lewis, Lowell, McKay, Samson Mason, John Thomson Mason, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Miller, Mitchell, Moore, Morgan, Morrow, Owaley, Parmenter, Pickens, Pope, Powell, Proffit, Benjamin Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Read, Reding, Rhett, Ridgway, Rodney, Rogers, William Russell, J. M. Russell, Saltonstall, Saunders, Shaw, Shepperd, Slade, Truman Smith, Sprigg, Stokeley, Alexander H. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Summers, Sumter, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Trumbull, Turney, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Warren, Washington, Watterson, Edward D. White, James W. Williams, Wise, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—113.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Appleton, Arnold, Atherton, Aycrigg, Baker, Birdseye, Boardman, Borden, Botts, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Charles Brown, Burnell, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Calhoun, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Caruthers, Chittenden, Staley N. Clarke, Clifford, Clinton, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cushing, Garrett Davis, Richard D. Davis, Dean, Deberry, Doig, John Edwards, John C. Edwards, Egbert, Ferris, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, A. Lawrence Foster, Gentry, Giddings, William O. Goode, Gordon, Graham, Green, John Hastings, Hayes, Holmes, Hook, Hubard, Hudson, Joseph R. Ingersoll, William W. Irwin, Wm. Cost Johnson, Keim, John P. Kennedy, Andrew Kennedy, Linn, Littlefield, Robert McClan, McKennan, McKeon, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, Mathews, Maynard, Medill, Meriwether, Morris, Newhard, Oliver, Osborne, Patridge, Payne, Pearce, Pendleton, Plumer, Ramsay, Reynolds, Riggs, Roosevelt, Sanford, Shields, Simonton, Snyder, Stanly, Steenrod, Stratton, Sweeney, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Van Buren, Weller, Joseph L. White, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Wood—103.

After some conversation upon points of order between the SPEAKER and Mr. W. COST JOHNSON, the question was taken upon the second division of the Senate's amendment, (i. e. that which admits of the principle of fractional representation,) and it was agreed to, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Appleton, Arnold, Aycrigg, Barnard, Barton, Black, Boardman, Borden, Briggs, Bronson, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Wm. Butler, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Casey, Chapman, Childs, John C. Clark, Coles, Cranston, Cravens, Cross, Cushing, Garrett Davis, Dawson, John C. Edwards, Everett, Fessenden, Gamble, Gentry, Wm. O. Goode, Granger, Gwin, Habersham, Hall, Holmes, Houston, Howard, Hunter, Hunt, J. B. Ingersoll, James Irvin, William W. Irwin, James, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Lane, Lewis, McKennan, Samson Mason, John Thomson Mason, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Mitchell, Moore, Morgan, Morrow, Parmenter, Pearce, Pickens, Pope, Powell, Proffit, Benjamin Randall, Reed, Rencher, Rhett, Ridgway, Rodney, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Saunders, Shepperd, Shields, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Sprigg, Stokeley, John T. Stuart, Sumter, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Trumbull, Turney, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Warren, Washington, Watterson, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Wis, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—110.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Atherton, Baker, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Blair, Botts, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Brockway, Charles Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burke, Burnell, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Calhoun, Chittenden, Clifford, Clinton, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Cowen, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dean, Deberry, Doig, Eastman, John Edwards, Egbert, Ferris, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, A. Lawrence Foster, Thomas F. Foster, Giddings, Gilmer, Goggin, Patrick G. Goode, Gordon, Graham, Gustine, Hays, Hopkins, Hook, Hudson, C. J. Ingersoll, Jack, William Cost Johnson, Isaac D. Jones, Keim, Andrew Kennedy, John P. Kennedy, King, Linn, Littlefield, Lowell, Robert McClan, McKay, McKeon, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, Maynard, Medill, Meriwether, Miller, Morris, Newhard, Oliver, Osborne, Owaley, Patridge, Pendleton, Plumer, Ramsay, Randolph, Rayner, Reding, Reynolds, Riggs, Rogers, Roosevelt, Wm. Russell, Sanford, Shaw, Snyder, Stanly, Steenrod, Stratton, Alexander H. H. Stuart, Summers, Sweeney, Taliaferro, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, and Weller—102.

2d Sess.]

The Tariff.

[JUNE, 1842.]

SATURDAY, June 18.

The Tariff.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The following item (No. 1.) of the bill being under consideration :

"Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the 30th day of June next, in lieu of the duties now imposed on the articles hereinafter mentioned, and on such as may now be exempt from duty, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, the following duties, that is to say :

"First. On wool unmanufactured, the value whereof at the last port or place from whence exported to the United States shall exceed eight cents per pound, shall be levied a duty of thirty per cent. ad valorem."

Mr. SALTONSTALL had moved to strike out the said item, and insert in lieu thereof a portion of the bill reported from the Committee on Manufactures.

[NOTE.—This motion embraced the whole of that bill, with the following modifications :

In the first item of the proposed amendment, the words "thirtieth day of July" were substituted for the words "thirtieth day of June."

And the last section, which is in the following words, was stricken out :

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, knowingly and wilfully, with intent to defraud the revenue of the United States, smuggle, or clandestinely introduce into the United States, any goods, wares, or merchandise subject to duty by law, and which should have been invoiced, without paying or accounting for the duty, or shall make out or pass, or attempt to pass, through the custom-house, any false, forged, or fraudulent invoice, every such person, his, her, or their aiders and abettors, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be liable to a fine or imprisonment, or both; the fine not to exceed five thousand dollars, or the imprisonment two years.]

Mr. HABERSHAM had moved to amend the amendment by inserting, in lieu thereof, after the words "Be it enacted," &c., the bill which had heretofore been reported by him from the minority of the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. H. said the most objectionable feature which he found in this bill was the specific duties and the principle of minimums, upon which Mr. H. entered into an argument of some length to show the inequality and injustice of these provisions. In the course of this part of his remarks, he quoted a report of Mr. ADAMS made at the 1st session of the 26th Congress, containing a powerful argument against the minimum principle as well as specific duties; the substance of which was, that they prevent revenue, by excluding to that extent foreign importations; secondly, that they deceive the people; and, thirdly, make the man who uses coarse manufactures pay a higher duty than that paid by the man who consumes the finest and costliest articles. In this bill Mr. H. said that that unjust principle was carried to a great extent on a good many articles. For instance, on the article of sugar. On the coarse kind of sugar, the duty would be one hundred per cent.; while on the finer, it would amount to about thirty per cent. On carpets which cost comparatively little, the duty would be higher than on Turkey or ingrained carpeting. Mr. H. deprecated the effects that would be produced by this bill, and foretold the great dissatisfaction with which it would be received throughout the country, by the great body of consumers. The best policy, he contended, for this country, would be to distribute the taxes as equally as possible among all classes of the community; and he contrasted the approach that was now making in England to liberal principles with the selfish and monopolizing spirit that prevailed here.

Mr. A. V. BROWN addressed the committee for one hour, in opposition to the increased rate of duties. He could find nothing in either of the bills to redeem them from the abhorrence in which he held them. They both had the obnoxious purpose of violating a solemn instrument of compromise. He should, however, speak to but one bill, because the other had been introduced by the committee without any report or recommendation of its principles.

He thought Congress should have nothing to do with the question of increasing the duties at the present session; and to take it up for the purpose of a general revival, and the imposition of duties higher than 20 per cent., he held to be an act of legislative perfidy.

He would not refer to the various party struggles on the tariff. In every instance, however, until 1833, the principle of protection had triumphed. In 1833, the burdens became so onerous as to cause almost a state of revolution. The compromise was passed, and the high duties brought down. Protection had now become odious, and many who once advocated it, now merely expressed themselves for a tariff for revenue, though in disguise for protection.

The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had denominated his bill a revenue measure. Not so with the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures. He was more bold, and too candid to style his measure a revenue bill. No one could doubt that both bills were for the purpose of protection. He spoke of the construction of the Committee on Manufactures—nearly all of whom were from the North—but two from the South—and himself alone from the great West. He gave a history of the progress of the bills between the two committees and the Secretary of the Treasury. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. SALTONSTALL) regretted that the House would not allow him to send for persons and papers before the committee. The fact was there was no need of witnesses. They swarmed around the committee-room like locusts—all of them interested manufacturers. Although the House passed a resolution saying that the testimony of interested persons should not be taken, the committee refused to take any other, and made their statements from the representations of men whose very bread depended upon the answers they gave.

JUNE, 1842.]

The Tariff.

[27th CONG.]

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, June 20.

The Bankrupt Law.

Mr. BENTON, agreeably to notice heretofore given, asked leave to introduce a bill to repeal the bankrupt law of 1841.

The CHAIR had great doubt whether the bill could be introduced, except by a vote of two-thirds of the Senate. Since notice had been given by the Senator from Missouri (Mr. BENTON) of his intention to ask leave, he had examined the rule.

Mr. BENTON said he had given ten days' notice.

The CHAIR said the joint rule also seemed to contemplate a vote of two-thirds. He read the rule as follows: "When a bill or resolution which has been passed in one House, shall be rejected in the other, it shall not be brought in during the same session, without a notice of ten days, and leave of two-thirds of that House in which it shall be renewed."

Mr. BENTON again remarked that he had given the requisite notice.

Mr. BERRIEN remarked that it appeared by the rule that a vote of two-thirds was necessary to grant permission to bring in the bill, and he therefore demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BENTON desired, as he would like to say something upon the subject, that the question might be permitted to lie over till to-morrow. Acquiesced in.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 21.

The Tariff.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. McKENNA, of Pennsylvania, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill "to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing regulations imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes."

Mr. HABERSHAM had moved to amend the amendment, by inserting, in lieu thereof, after the words "Be it enacted," &c., the bill which had heretofore been reported by him from the minority of the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. COWEN denied that there had been any legislative perfidy in relation to this subject. The compromise act contemplated a modification of duties; and by the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, the people got the benefit, as it lessened the necessity for direct taxation; and it never, for a moment, entered his mind, that the States were too extravagant to be trusted with it. By the distribution act, the people got the benefit directly; by paying the amount into the national treasury, they received it indirectly; and the question was, would the House lower the direct or the indirect taxation. He preferred the former; and he preferred it, also, because it took the land from out of the political market.

He then took a rapid glance through the history of this question, and strongly advocated the doctrine of protection, as the true policy of this country.

Mr. KENNEDY, of Indiana, said he would commence by saying that he had no patience with this doctrine of protection; he would just as calmly sit down and reason about the modus operandi of stealing from his pocket the produce of a day's labor, as about this doctrine of protection. When he heard gentlemen talk about the necessity of protecting the people of the West, he was astonished. He was born in the West, and he had resided in the West—indeed, he had never resided anywhere else; and if he knew any thing of the opinion of the Western people, it was the reverse of this doctrine of protection.

On the subject of the constitutionality of protection, Jackson, and Madison, and Jefferson, had been quoted. He had not had an opportunity to look up authorities; but he held that a tariff for protection was unconstitutional, and, in a few words, he would give the reasons on which his opinions were based. It would, doubtless, be admitted that the tariff, whether for revenue or protection, was an exercise of the taxing power; and he wished the word "tariff" had never been used. If the word "tax" had been used, as it ought to have been, the people would have been much less humbugged than they had been.

The constitution clothes Congress with the taxing power—with power to lay and collect taxes, imposts, and excises: and for what was this power given? To pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States. Now, if the framers of the constitution had intended to give freedom to Congress to exercise the taxing power for "protection," it would have been very easy to have added to the purposes for which taxes were to be raised, "and for the protection of domestic manufactures." It had been intimated that the exercise of the taxing power for protection was indirectly to provide for "the general welfare." To this he replied, that the taxing power was given for simple and enumerated purposes; and to exercise it for other purposes, was to violate the trust which had been confided in them. He held that to levy a tax, by which one portion of the community was made to pay out of their hard earnings for the benefit of another portion of the community, was not a raising of taxes to pay the debts or to provide for the general welfare of the United States; it was to provide for the welfare of a few favorite individuals, at the expense of the general welfare.

2d Sess.]

The Provisional Tariff.

[JUNE, 1842.]

He wanted to ask the advocates for protection a few questions. They said that they wanted a market for the surplus produce of the farmers, and that, by protecting the manufactures, that market would be created. They say to the farmers of the West: "You raise a great deal of corn, beef, and pork; and as the British have closed their ports against it, you must make a market at home, by turning the New Englanders into manufacturers." Now this, at the first blush, seemed to be very plausible, but he wished to ask them how much of the surplus produce of the Western farmers they would take. Will they give us a market for all our surplus produce? No; they will not, and cannot. One of the rich States of the valley of the Mississippi would keep all the manufacturing establishments in New England in hog and hominy for three years. They could not take any thing like the surplus produce of the West. Our country is too vast and too rich for its surplus produce to be consumed by the manufacturing establishments of a few States. It was eminently calculated for an agricultural, and not for a manufacturing country; and he never would make it the latter, if he had the power to do so. Let any man travel through the Western country, breathe its pure air, look upon its fertile fields, and witness the freedom and happiness of its population, and say if he would change it for the crowded atmosphere of a manufacturing town, with all its vice and misery—which, said he, I pray God to keep us from. Then, he would say, that in the very nature of things, the manufacturers never could be made to consume the surplus produce of the Western country. But suppose that it could—suppose that you adopt a tariff, excluding all foreign commodities. If we buy nothing, we can sell nothing; and here will be the spectacle of the American Republic, like a second Celestial Empire, drawn up within her shell—cut off from commerce with all the world. When we come to this condition, some new lights may spring up with notions like those of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, and set all the world against us, for a violation of the laws of nations, and to whip us into commerce again.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, JUNE 28.

The Fiscal Year.

Mr. EVANS, agreeably to notice given, and on leave, introduced a bill to define and establish the fiscal year of the Treasury of the United States; which was read the first time.

Mr. BUCHANAN inquired whether there was any necessity for the reference of the bill to a committee?

Mr. EVANS did not think there was; and asked that the bill might be read a second time.

The bill was then read the second time.

[The bill proposes that the fiscal year shall commence on the 1st of July, in each year.]

Mr. EVANS said that the object of the bill had been long desired; that it was recommended by the Senator from New Hampshire, (Mr. WOODBURY,) when at the head of the Treasury department. He (Mr. E.) hoped it would become a law at the present session of Congress. If there was no desire that the bill should be committed, he hoped it would be acted upon without delay.

Mr. WOODBURY agreed with the Senator from Maine, (Mr. EVANS,) that the object of the bill was a desirable one—to make the fiscal year correspond with the commercial year.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the bill was then taken up as in Committee of the Whole, considered, and, there being no proposition to amend, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Provisional Tariff.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the Senate proceeded to the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill to extend for a limited period the present laws for laying and collecting duties on imports.

Mr. EVANS observed that the explanations he should make of this bill would be very brief; and he hoped the bill itself would be disposed of to-day, one way or another. Its object is to postpone, for one month, the operation of that part of the compromise act, the provisions of which would come into effect on the 1st of July. A very considerable reduction of duties takes place by that act on the first day of next month.

It is well known that the revenue receipts of this year, like those of several years back, will fall very far short of the actual expenditures of the year. The demands of the treasury, for ordinary purposes, independent of the public debt, will be very little short of twenty-three millions of dollars. The appropriations of this session, it is now certain, will amount to twenty-two millions, including a million for objects not specified. The income of the treasury, under present laws, cannot approach anywhere near the amount of these demands. The receipts from customs, under existing laws, cannot surpass fifteen millions; leaving a deficit of seven millions to be supplied by treasury notes, or some other provision of Congress.

It is evident that a necessity exists to increase the means of the treasury. The bill for the reorganization of the tariff has not yet been matured; and there is no hope that it can be ready to go into operation sooner than the 1st of August. He believed the benefit of a home valuation will be about equal to the reduction contemplated by the compromise act; so that there will be no violation of the principles of that act if the duty now payable be continued. The necessity for this temporary bill is apparent from the doubt which exists whether any duty can be collected after the 30th of June, unless so far as secured by the revenue bill of last session; which bill imposed duties on a small portion of the imports. This doubt arose out of the compromise act passed in March, 1838. He quoted the first section of that act, and assumed that, if the act stopped here, no doubt could exist; but the third section specified that the rate of duties should be continued until the 30th of June, 1842; and there was another section which provides, in effect, that other laws shall be passed regulating the duties to be collected after the 30th of June. This was in the last part of the fifth section, stating that articles shall not be imported unless subject to such duties as shall be imposed by law, not exceeding 20 per cent.

Here, then, was considerable doubt whether any duties can be collected. Ought it to be left a matter of doubt? Every one knows that the importers are under an impression that no duty can be collected under the compromise act, after the 30th of June. This indicates that there may be considerable disputes referable to judicial courts, and they have not been favorable to revenue laws. It is, at least, not so clear a case as to justify reliance on the power of collecting duties. Preparations are made for very large importations, if the duty shall be only 20 per cent., which will be vastly increased under the chance of being admitted duty-free. The condition of the treasury imperiously required the passage of this bill; and the necessity was so pressing, that he could not anticipate any hesitation. It is even very questionable whether the home valuation can be regulated in time. So that, even if the act of 1838 can be made available for the collection of duties, it is very plain its operations must be very unequal and very unjust. As far as the main question of revenue was concerned, there could be no objection to the passage of the bill. But it is said it will be a violation of the compromise act, by exceeding 20 per cent. duty after the 30th of June. He asked Senators, was no duty beyond 20 per cent. absolutely required for the wants of the Government, even if the proceeds of the public lands are taken back? It can be no violation of the compromise act to exceed 20 per cent. duty on imports, while the necessities of the Government demanded more.

He very much questioned whether the rate of duties, now existing, will not be continued after the 30th of June, by the adoption of the home valuation. But, as that home valuation cannot be adjusted in time, there would be no violation of the compromise act by continuing the rate of duties the same as at present.

Let the matter be what it may, Congress must provide means for the necessities of the treasury. There is another objection to be anticipated; and that is, in relation to the clause repealing the section of the land distribution act of last session, which returns the land fund to the treasury, should the duties be raised past 20 per cent. It has been insisted that this section was introduced into the distribution act as a compromise, and that this attempt to repeal it is a violation of the compact by which the act was passed. How could it be called a compromise, when the gentlemen opposite stand pledged to repeal the whole act the moment they can get the opportunity? Urgent appeals have been made to Senators supposed to have committed themselves. He saw himself alluded to as having said he did not contemplate that any attempt would be made to increase the duties beyond twenty per cent. He never had expressed an opinion as to what Congress would do. What he had said was, that if it was necessary to go into the subject at a future session, Congress would have the whole subject before it, and could repeal the distribution act if it saw fit.

His own impression was, that the whole matter—the adjustment of the tariff, and also the distribution subject, till 1st of August, as to give time for adjustment—would leave neither the friends nor the enemies of either increased tariff or distribution in a worse condition than at present. His object was, in effect, to postpone the 1st day of July to the 1st of August, so that the passage of this bill shall have no effect on either tariff or distribution; and if no other law be passed, on the 1st of August the compromise act and distribution act shall both go into effect, according to their specific powers.

It seemed to him, that all those who are opposed to distribution ought to go with him for postponement. Neither party would suffer any disadvantage, or obtain any advantage. If the bill pass as it is, the distribution will take effect; but if the proviso be stricken out, every gentleman will stand in the same condition on the 1st of August as on the 1st of July. For the purpose of rendering the bill acceptable to all, he would propose to strike out the proviso in the bill, and insert in its place the following:

"That the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, authorized and directed by the act of Congress passed the 4th of September, 1841, entitled 'An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights,' shall be, and the same is hereby, suspended and postponed until the 1st day of August, 1842; and the said act of the 4th September, 1841, shall be no otherwise or further affected or modified, than merely to postpone to the said 1st day of August next the distribution of the said proceeds directed by that act to be made on 1st day of July, 1842; any thing contained in this act, or the said act of the 4th of September, 1841, to the contrary notwithstanding."

2d Sess.]

The Provisional Tariff.

[JUNE, 1842.]

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, JUNE 24.

The Provisional Tariff.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to extend, for a limited period, the present laws for laying and collecting duties on imports.

The question pending was the proposition of Mr. EVANS to strike out the proviso in the bill, and insert a substitute.

Mr. RIVES said with regard to the amendment of the Senator from Maine, (Mr. EVANS,) it simply postponed the distribution until the 1st of August, at which time it was proposed to take place, any thing in the distribution law, or any other law, to the contrary notwithstanding. But no man had admitted that they had the constitutional power to distribute money, if they had to raise it by taxation; and yet all these principles must be trampled on, to grasp at distribution as a practical measure! Nor had any man admitted that they had a right to distribute, except in case of a surplus. This was the language of Mr. CLAY in 1838, and the language of all the advocates of distribution, from that time to the recent revival of the measure, when distribution was contended for on the single principle that by "a duty of 20 per cent. on luxuries," in the fashionable language of the day, there would be more than a sufficiency of means for the support of the Government; and, therefore, the proceeds of the public lands could be distributed among the indebted States. But there was now no surplus—nobody dreamed of one; and yet a distribution was contemplated and insisted on by Senators, notwithstanding the impoverished state of the treasury, and the difficulty of negotiating loans to carry on the Government.

Fifteen millions of dollars in revenue was all that could be got, under existing laws, from customs. Twenty-seven millions was the least sum required, according to the estimate of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the other House. But where was the balance of twelve millions to be got? Upon credit? The most thriftless resource ever thought of, even by the prodigal son! He showed that little dependence was to be placed on loans. Out of all the loan bills of the extra session and this session, only a million and a half had been obtained since the last act passed; and that at the sacrifice of national credit—ninety-seven and a half per cent.; he understood from rumor, being the rate at which that pittance was obtained. How much money was likely to be in the treasury on the 1st of August? When the navy appropriation bill, the army appropriation bill, &c., will have been thirty days in force, how much money will be left in the treasury? How, then, is the money to be got which this proviso says shall be distributed to the States on the 1st of August, instead of the 1st of July? Did gentlemen mean to borrow it? and, if they did, of whom, and at what sacrifice of national honor and national credit? And was this to be done in spite of the want of constitutional power to borrow money for distribution, admitted by every one? No man has, hitherto, even dared to propose a distribution, unless from a surplus. When the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) made his celebrated report in favor of distribution, it was on the ground that the treasury was then bowed down by the weight of surplus revenue, which it was necessary to get rid of. Now, the proposition is to distribute from an exhausted treasury, which can have no surplus, unless created by borrowed money.

Nothing, he conceived, was so utterly indefensible as the assumption that the public lands are the property of the States, and not of the United States. This he argued at great length, in opposition to the heretofore expressed views of the Senator from Indiana, (Mr. SMITH,) and others.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, interposed to explain. His position, as would be seen by his public speeches, was, that the proceeds of the lands covered by the deeds of cession, after the objects of the cession had been accomplished, were due to the States; but, as to the lands not covered by those deeds, they were subject to the disposal of Congress, at its discretion, as was declared in the constitution, and contended for by General Jackson, the head of the Democratic party. He hoped he was understood, and he would not further interrupt the Senator.

Mr. RIVES resumed. He understood the Senator to say that, after the accomplishment of certain purposes, the proceeds of the ceded lands belonged to the States. [Mr. S. nodded assent.] He quoted the deed of cession, with a view of showing that the language was perfectly justified by the condition of alliance which held the States together at that time. There was to be a common treasury, to which the States were to contribute. How, then, could that compact ever be carried out, but by bringing the proceeds into the common fund, to be applied to the common defence?

This he expatiated upon at large, and quoted the declaration of Maryland—now brought forward by him for the first time, having accidentally discovered it in the archives of Virginia. After quoting contemporaneous evidence from various authorities in support of his views, Mr. R. deduced that, whatever may be Mr. CLAY's views now, when he first advocated distribution, and for many years, he never broached the idea of any thing beyond distribution from an inconvenient surplus in the treasury.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said the only refutation he thought necessary to offer to the Senator's arguments, was a reference to his own speeches; he would, if time permitted, only ask to oppose the Senator to himself. He would set up his vote in favor of the distribution bill of last session, as a complete answer to his arguments to-day.

JUNE, 1842.]

The Provisional Tariff.

[27th CONG.]

Mr. RIVES reminded the Senator from Kentucky that he had been induced to vote for that measure by the solemn stipulation of the suspension clause. His arguments to-day were in favor of carrying out the provisions of that bill in good faith.

Mr. CHITTENDEN said he never regarded this distribution act in any other light than that of an act of common and ordinary legislation, subject to future revision and correction. It is very true that, at the time of passing it, the friends of the measure, in order to carry it earlier than they otherwise could carry it, were, for the present, content to modify it so as to insure a sufficient number of votes for its passage; but surely that was not to preclude them, whenever they should have a majority strong enough to amend the act, from expunging the obnoxious clause forced upon them by the circumstances of the moment. Did the Senator mean to contend that an act is to be perpetual, or even to continue a moment longer in full force than Congress chooses, when prepared to repeal or modify it? There was no pledge,—no violated faith. All parties got by this act just what they could get, and no more. Such, too, must be the case now, in relation to any modification Congress may choose to make.

It seemed to him strange that any doubt should be entertained as to the import of the proviso now under consideration.

What is the fact? That Congress is called upon to pass a law continuing the revenue laws now existing for one month. What is fair, on such an occasion, with regard to the friends and opponents of distribution? That the operation of the act of 1841, in relation to distribution, should be merely suspended during the rise of revenue after 30th of June, 1842, for one month pending the adjustment of the whole question. If the compromise act were to be carried out in full, on the 1st of July, would not the duties be 5, 6, or 7 per cent. higher than 20 per cent. under the home valuation and cash duties?

It was but for one short month. And was it right that this temporary act should be allowed to suspend the operation of a great national distribution act so long agitated and so solemnly enacted? The proviso will continue in operation—so will the distribution act. How, then, could gentlemen contend that it would have the effect of a repeal? This act will expire on the 1st of August. If then the duty should be higher than 20 per cent., how can the distribution be made after that, without some fresh enactment, or duties fall down to 20 per cent.?

Mr. BUCHANAN said in his opinion there was but little difference between the amendment and the proviso which it proposed to strike out. Under the bill as it came from the House, the first instalment under the distribution law would be payable to the States on the 1st day of July; whilst the amendment of the Senator from Maine would postpone the payment until the 1st of August. This was the whole difference. If Senators supposed that the amendment changed the original bill in any other particular, they were mistaken.

The great question still remained, whether any portion of the proceeds of the public lands ought to be distributed, in violation of the proviso to the sixth section of the distribution law? and this question was as fairly raised by the Senator's amendment as it had been by the proviso to the bill as it came from the House. The avowed and manifest purpose of the amendment was to save to the States the first instalment under the distribution law, notwithstanding the bill to which it was annexed increased the duties on imports to a rate above twenty per cent. If this bill were to become a law before the 1st day of July, without any proviso whatever, the distribution of the instalment, which would otherwise have become due on that day, would be suspended and gone. This bill, then, in any event, whether the proviso from the House or the amendment of the Senator from Maine shall prevail, will save the first instalment for the States. The amendment will accomplish this purpose as effectually as the proviso from the House. Both equally preserve the right, and prevent the forfeiture. It was in vain for Senators to attempt to evade the question of principle by any such modification of the original bill as the amendment proposed.

In point of principle, then, the question arises as much upon this amendment, as if it were a proposition absolutely to repeal the proviso to the sixth section of the distribution law. The question, shall the operation of this proviso be suspended for one month, and in regard to one instalment, involves the principle as effectually as if the proposition were to suspend it forever. It is true, that the interest to be effected would not be so great; but the principle which must govern, is the same in both cases. The amendment of the Senator from Maine, then, is less obnoxious than the original bill, only because it extends the time of payment for one month; and this indulgence is given in the avowed hope that the general revenue bill, which we expect from the House, will contain a clause to repeal absolutely the proviso to the sixth section of the distribution law. This, then, is the favorable moment to decide the question; and fortunate it is that it arises upon a bill of comparatively small importance.

This (said Mr. B.) was all that I had intended to say when I rose. But I must proceed a little further. The necessities of the treasury, as well as the great interests of the country, imperiously demand the passage of a revenue bill at the present session of Congress. Whilst I would strictly limit the amount of revenue to the necessary expenditures of the Government, and the gradual extinguishment of the existing public debt, yet I would make just and reasonable discriminations in favor of domestic manufactures. If we shall not split upon the rock

2D Sess.]

The Provisional Tariff.

[JUNE, 1842.]

of distribution, such a revenue bill as ought to be satisfactory to all interests will become a law before the close of the present session. But I confess I fear the result. I now say, in my place, that all these great interests are to be perilled by connecting them with this miserable scheme of distribution.

What connection necessarily exists between the two subjects? Why not separate them? Let us have one revenue bill, and another bill to repeal the proviso contained in the 6th section of the distribution law. Then we can each act freely, fairly, and independently.

The question being on the proposition of Mr. EVANS to strike out the proviso in the bill, and to insert his modification of it—

Mr. EVANS demanded the yeas and nays on his proposition, which were ordered; and the question being put, it resulted in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—23.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Berrien, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Preston, Rives, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—18.

Mr. KING moved to strike out the whole proviso to the bill, as amended; and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, the question being put, it was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Benton, Berrien, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Preston, Rives, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—21.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Graham, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—21.

The bill was passed by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Berrien, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Preston, Rives, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—19.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 27.

The Provisional Tariff.

This bill was taken up, and the Clerk read the amendment of the Senate, as follows:

The House had inserted the following proviso—

“Provided, That nothing herein contained shall suspend the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, any thing herein contained, and any thing contained in the proviso to the sixth section of the act approved 4th September, 1841, entitled ‘An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights,’ to the contrary, notwithstanding.”

The Senate had stricken out this proviso, and inserted, in lieu thereof, the following:

“That the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, as authorized and directed by the act of Congress of the 4th September, 1841, entitled ‘An act to appropriate the proceeds of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights,’ shall be, and the same is hereby, suspended and postponed until the 1st day of August, 1842; and the said act of the 4th September, 1841, shall be no otherwise affected or modified than merely to postpone to the said first of August next the distribution of said proceeds directed by that act to be made on the 1st July, 1842, any thing in this act, or the said act of the 4th September, 1841, to the contrary, notwithstanding.”

Mr. YORKE moved the previous question.

The question then recurred on the motion for the previous question, which was agreed to.

The next question was the following: “Shall the main question be now put?”

Mr. TURNER called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The House determined that the main question should be now put—ayes 105, noes 90.

The main question was then taken on concurring in the amendment of the Senate, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Appleton, Arnold, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Milton Brown, Burnell, William Butler, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Casey, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Garrett Davis, Deberry, John Edwards, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, A. Lawrence Foster, Gamble, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Patrick G. Goode, Graham, Granger, Green, Hall, Halstead, Hudson, Hunt, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, William W. Irwin, James, John P. Kennedy, Lane, Linn, McKennon, Samson Mason, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Mitchell, Moore, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Owaley, Parmenter, Pendleton, Pope, Ramsay, Benjamin Randall, Randolph, Ridgway, Wm. Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Shepperd, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stokeley, Stratton, Alexander H. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Taliaferro, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Warren, Washington, Edward D. White, Christopher H. Williams, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—104.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Arrington, Beeson, Bidlack, Black, Bowne, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Patrick O. Caldwell, John Campbell, Cary, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Mark A. Cooper, Cravens, Cross,

June, 1842.]

Death of the Hon. Samuel L. Southard.

[27TH CONG.]

Cushing, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dean, Doig, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Egbert, Ferris, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Thomas F. Foster, W. O. Goode, Gwin, Habersham, Harris, John Hastings, Hays, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Howard, Hubbard, Hunter, Charles J. Ingersoll, Jack, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Andrew Kennedy, Lewis, Littlefield, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Mallory, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, John Thomson Mason, Mathews, Medill, Meriwether, Miller, Newhard, Oliver, Patridge, Payne, Pickens, Plumer, Proffit, Reding, Rencher, Reynolds, Rhett, Riggs, Rogers, Roosevelt, Sanford, Saunders, Shaw, William Smith, Snyder, Steenrod, Sweney, Turney, Van Buren, Ward, Weller, Joseph L. White, James W. Williams, Wise, and Wood—96.

So the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

The Apportionment Bill.

John Tyler, jr., the President's private secretary, delivered to the House a Message from the President.

The Clerk read this communication; and it appeared to be one informing the House that he had signed the apportionment bill, and that he had filed his reasons for doing so in the State Department.

Mr. ADAMS said this Message was a novelty in the history of this country. The constitution required the President, if he approved a bill, to sign it, and not to accompany it with reasons. He spoke at great length on the dangerous precedent that might be thus set, and concluded by moving that the Message be referred to a select committee, with power to send for persons and papers.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, JUNE 27.

Death of the Hon. Mr. Hastings.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the reading of the journal of Saturday was dispensed with.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by its Clerk, announcing to the Senate the death of the Hon. WILLIAM S. HASTINGS, late a Representative from the State of Massachusetts; which, being read—

Mr. BATES addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: As we advance in age, the notices of the death of those who have been of our acquaintance become more and more frequent; and, give me leave to add, more and more admonitory. During the present session of Congress, the House of Representatives has announced to the Senate the death of no less than four of its members; and the Senate has been pained by the loss of one of the most worthy, most respected, and most cherished of its own; and—it grieves me to think it—again of another. Mr. President, these events, although they cannot stop the progress of the hours upon the dial-plate, demand of us at least a pause—a pause for our own sake; and not for our own sake merely—a pause that we may do what we can in our affliction, by respectful tokens of sympathy and regard, to mitigate the affliction of others, the relations and friends of the deceased.

Mr. HASTINGS, the subject of the message from the House, had been, from time to time, in ill health. A few weeks since, by the advice of his physician, he went to the springs in Virginia, in the hope that the use of the water would afford him relief. His hope was disappointed—as, sir, human hopes often are. He died on Friday, the 17th. The news of his death was received last Saturday.

Mr. HASTINGS was unobtrusive, unpretending, unostentatious, but of a very sound mind, and of great integrity and worth; most respected and most esteemed by those who knew him best. He was a native of the county of Worcester. For several years he was in the Senate of Massachusetts. As a member of Congress, he had the confidence of a most respectable constituency in the heart of the State; and well he deserved it. But, sir, all that we have now left us is to lament the loss of him, and do the customary honors to his memory.

Mr. B. concluded by offering the following resolutions, which, having been read, were unanimously adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with deep sensibility the communication from the House of Representatives, announcing the death of the Hon. WILLIAM S. HASTINGS, a representative from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That, in token of sincere and high respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate and its officers will wear crape upon the left arm, as mourning, for thirty days.

Death of the Hon. Samuel L. Southard.

Mr. MILLER rose, and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: I rise to add another shade of gloom to that which already pervades this body—to announce to you the sad intelligence of the death of my colleague, the Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD. He died yesterday, at 20 minutes before ten o'clock, at Fredericksburg, Virginia. It is but one short month since he occupied that honored seat which you now fill. He left us, to be sure, somewhat broken down in health and constitution, though he carried with him our sincere hopes and fervent prayers that, after a short relaxation from his official duties, he would be restored to us with renewed health. But it has pleased a mysterious Providence to order otherwise. Our hopes have been disappointed by the decree of Heaven. Death has separated him from us forever—from the scene of his usefulness, leaving us nothing but to mourn over him dead, whom it has been our delight to honor while living.

After announcing this sad intelligence, the feelings of my heart would prompt me to sit down in silence, leaving the life and the virtues of my deceased friend to be spoken of by others, until a more fitting occasion; for to speak now of the many honors which he deservedly acquired, the virtues he cultivated, and the talents he devoted for so many years to the service of his country, would only sharpen our grief, and deepen our sense of the calamity which has fallen upon us.

[D. Sigs.]

Death of the Hon. Wm. S. Hastings, of Mass.

[JUNE, 1842.]

The Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD was born in 1787, in the county of Somerset, New Jersey. Born and reared under her free institutions—educated in her schools—a graduate of her colleges—he was, in principle and feeling, emphatically a Jerseyman. Deeply appreciating his birth, his native State, at an early period, called him into her public service. He was made Judge of the Supreme Court at an early age; and, after serving six years, with distinguished ability, he was, in 1821, elected as a Senator in Congress, in which capacity he served until President Monroe honored him by placing him in charge of the Navy Department, where his services were so highly appreciated that he continued to hold that office during Mr. Adams's administration. His conduct in that department is fully known to the country, and duly appreciated by the navy, the interests of which was his honor and delight to foster and promote. On the retirement of Mr. Adams's cabinet, Mr. SOUTHARD returned to his native State, and she received him with all the affection due to a faithful and devoted son. After successively filling the offices of Attorney-General and Governor of that State, he was again elected a member of this body; and, after a public career of usefulness for twenty years, in the vigor of his mind, with ripened intellect, and in the enjoyment of the entire confidence of his fellow-Senators, it has pleased God to put an end to his mortal career. Another blow has been struck; another seat is vacant; another voice is silent! Afflictive as this blow is to us, it has fallen with tenfold severity upon that little and anxious circle which stood around his dying bed, and soothed—as far as human affection can soothe—his last moments. I do not intrude within the family circle to sympathize, but merely to speak of the private virtues which endeared him to his family and friends—of that intellect of high order, talents which could grasp the destinies of a nation—of those endearing virtues which drew around him sincere friends, and converted even enemies into friends.

Early impressed with the precepts of pious parents, their influence was never lost upon him through the course of his long and honored existence. Deeply impressed with the truths of Christianity, he was on all occasions its defender; and, we have reason to hope, he embraced the truths of our holy religion, to the saving of his immortal soul.

Mr. M. having concluded—

Mr. KING rose, and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: The eloquent and feeling manner in which the melancholy event has just been announced to the Senate by the Senator from New Jersey, of the death of the distinguished individual—his friend and colleague, who is now no more—leaves me nothing to say. I will not, therefore, attempt, by any remarks of my own, to impair the force of that eloquence. It has been my fortune, for very many years, to be intimately acquainted with the distinguished man whose death has been just announced. I have known him in private life, and can bear testimony to his kindness of heart, amiableness of disposition, and uniform courtesy. I have known him in public stations, and can, with the same truthfulness, testify to his courtesy, and to the ability with which he discharged the various trusts confided to his care. But he is gone; and it becomes our duty—though it is a melancholy one—to pay to his memory that tribute of respect so deservedly due. I will not detain the Senate further, but move the following resolutions:

Resolved, unanimously, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of the honorable SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, which will take place to-morrow at 12 o'clock; that the Senate will attend the same, and that notice thereof be given to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the honorable SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, deceased, late President pro tempore thereof, will go into mourning for him one month, by the usual mode of wearing crape on the left arm.

Resolved, unanimously, That, as an additional mark of respect for the honorable SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, the Senate do now adjourn.

The question was put, and the resolutions were agreed to; and

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 27.

Death of the Hon. Wm. S. Hastings, of Mass.

The Chaplain to the Senate (the Rev. Septimus Tuston) commenced the day's proceedings with an affecting and impressive prayer, in which he delicately alluded to the melancholy events which had so recently taken place, in the death of a member of each branch of the National Legislature.

The journal of Saturday was then read: after which,

Mr. ADAMS rose, and spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker: In the course of twelve years of public service in this hall, it has been my fortune too often to witness, with sympathizing sorrow, some member from one or other of the States of this Union other than that of my own nativity, rise from his seat, and, with agitated feelings, and in the accents of a trembling heart, announce to this assembly the departure, for a world of harmony and peace, of a respected and beloved colleague. It is always an impressive, a solemn, and an affecting scene; and

JUNE, 1842.]

Veto Message of the President.

[27TH CONG.]

I have never beheld it but with an ejaculation of prayer to the Father of Spirits, that at least this cup might pass away from me; and that I might never be called, in the discharge of my duty, to perform so painful, so severe, a task. It has not so pleased the great Disposer of events. At the request of my colleagues on this floor, I am now required to announce to this House the death of WILLIAM SODEN HASTINGS, late a member of this body for the ninth congressional district of Massachusetts, and to move the resolutions of respect for his memory, on the part of this House, usual on similar occasions.

In the month of September, 1837, at the first and special session of the 25th Congress, Mr. HASTINGS first entered this hall as the Representative of a portion of the people of Massachusetts. That he continued to enjoy the confidence of his constituents, has been manifested by two successive elections to the same station. The same favor had been preceded by reiterated elections to both branches of the Legislature of the Commonwealth. It was a confidence in his talents and integrity, spreading and expanding in proportion to the experience of his worthiness of the trust. He came here in the prime and vigor of life, to all external appearance destined to a long and useful career of public service; taking an active and efficient, though not obtrusive, part in the deliberations of this body; and, amid all the conflicts, personal and political—which we all so deeply lament—making friends of all parties, in proportion as he became known to his associates in this hall; and, so far as I have known or heard, not one personal enemy to the day of his death.

In the descending line of the generations of men, Mr. HASTINGS was one step downwards from my own. More than thirty years ago, his father, then my personal and political friend, was a member of this body, while I was representing the Legislature of our native Commonwealth in the other branch of the National Legislature. In the ordinary course of human affairs, it would have been more to be expected that he should have been called to perform for me the melancholy office of afflicted friendship and respect which I am now performing for him. He first came here with a bodily frame robust and athletic; but, for the last two years, his health has been gradually declining. During a large portion of the present session of Congress, though faithfully here at his post, he has been disabled from giving his attendance at the daily meetings of this House; and, about one month since, as the ravages of the destroyer were encroaching upon the sources of life within him, he repaired to the Sulphur Springs in Virginia, in the faint hope of recovering by the effect of those salubrious waters; but, under the operation of irremediable disease, on the 17th of this month, he sank without a struggle into the repose of the grave, "by strangers honored and by strangers mourned."

Mr. HASTINGS was never married: his parents have long since paid the debt of nature. The nearest and tenderest ties of human existence were not lacerated by his death; but he left a surviving brother—himself a man of the highest respectability, now, or recently, a member of the Senate of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts—and he left multitudes of friends, in whose memory he will live as long as life remains with them, as, I humbly hope and trust, he will live forever in the blessedness of a better world.

Mr. A. then submitted the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep sensibility the death of the Hon. WILLIAM SODEN HASTINGS—a member of this House from the State of Massachusetts—which took place at the Red Sulphur Springs, in the State of Virginia, on the 17th instant.

Resolved, That the members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of the deceased, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House communicate to the Executive of the State of Massachusetts that a vacancy has occurred in the representation of the ninth congressional district of that State.

On motion by Mr. BRIGGS,
The House adjourned.

TUESDAY, JUNE 28.

Death of the Hon. Samuel L. Southard.

A message was received from the Senate announcing the death of the Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, late a Senator of the United States from the State of New Jersey, and communicating the resolutions and arrangements for the funeral of the deceased adopted by that body.

Impressive addresses, suitable to the solemnity of the occasion, were delivered by Messrs. MAXWELL, of New Jersey, and ADAMS. After the adoption of the usual resolutions, (of which, as well as of the addresses, a copy could not be obtained,) the House adjourned, and proceeded in a body to the Senate chamber, to attend the funeral services there performed.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 29.

Veto Message of the President.

Mr. CUSHING suggested that the House proceed to consider the Message of the President; and, no objection having been made, the Clerk read the Message, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return the bill which originated in the House of Representatives, entitled "An act to extend, for a limited period, the present laws for laying and collecting duties on imports," with the following objections:

It suspends—in other words, abrogates for the time—the provision of the act of 1833, commonly called the "compromise act." The only ground on which this departure from the solemn adjustment of a great and agitating question seems to have been regarded as expedient, is the alleged necessity of establishing, by legislative enactments, rules and regulations for assessing the duties to be levied on imports, after the 30th June, according to the home valuation; and yet the bill expressly provides that "if, before the 1st of August, there be no further legislation upon the subject, the laws for laying and collecting duties shall be the same as though this act had not been passed." In other words, that the act of 1833, imperfect as it is considered, shall in that case continue to be, and to be executed, under such rules and regulations as previous statutes had prescribed, or had enabled the Executive Department to prescribe for that purpose, leaving the supposed chasm in the revenue laws such as it was before.

TO SESS.]

Veto Message of the President.

[JUNE, 1842.]

I am certainly far from being disposed to deny that additional legislation upon the subject is very desirable; on the contrary, the necessity as well as the difficulties, of establishing uniformity in the appraisements to be made in conformity with the true intention of that act, was brought to the notice of Congress in my message to Congress at the opening of its present session. But however sensible I may be of the embarrassments to which the Executive, in the absence of all aid from the superior wisdom of the Legislature, will be liable, in the enforcement of the existing laws, I have not, with the sincerest wish to acquiesce in its expressed will, been able to persuade myself that the exigency of the occasion is so great as to justify me in signing the bill in question, with my present views of its character and effects. The existing laws, as I am advised, are sufficient to authorize and enable the collecting officers, under the directions of the Secretary of the Treasury, to levy the duties imposed by the act of 1833.

That act was passed under peculiar circumstances, to which it is not necessary that I should do more than barely allude. What may be, in theory, its character, I have always regarded it as imparting the highest moral obligation. It has now existed for nine years, unchanged in any essential particular, with as general acquiescence, it is believed, of the whole country, as that country has ever manifested for any of her wisely established institutions. It has insured to it the repose which always flows from timely, wise, and moderate counsels—a repose the more striking, because of the long and angry agitations which preceded it. This salutary law proclaims, in express terms, the principle which, while it led to the abandonment of a scheme of indirect taxation founded on a false basis, and pushed to dangerous excess, justifies any enlargement of duties that may be called for by the real exigencies of the public service. It provides "that duties shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government." It is therefore in the power of Congress to lay duties as high as its discretion may dictate, for the necessary uses of the Government, without infringing upon the objects of the act of 1833. I do not doubt that the exigencies of the Government do require an increase of the tariff of duties above 20 per cent.; and I as little doubt that Congress may, above as well as below that rate, so discriminate as to give incidental protection to manufacturing industry—thus to make the burdens which it is compelled to impose upon the people, for the purposes of Government, productive of a double benefit. This, most of the reasonable opponents of protective duties seem willing to concede; and, if we may judge from the manifestations of public opinion in all quarters, this is all that the manufacturing interests really require. I am happy in the persuasion that this double object can be most easily and effectually accomplished, at the present juncture, without any departure from the spirit and principle of the statute in question. The manufacturing classes have now an opportunity, which may never occur again, of permanently identifying their interests with those of the whole country, and making them, in the highest sense of the term, a national concern. The moment is propitious to the interests of the whole country, in the introduction of harmony among all its parts and all its several interests. The same rate of imposts, and no more, as will most surely re-establish the public credit, will secure to the manufacturer all the protection he ought to desire, with every prospect of permanence and stability which the hearty acquiescence of the whole country, on a reasonable system, can hold out to him.

But of this universal acquiescence, and the harmony and confidence, and the many other benefits that will certainly result from it, I regard the suspension of the law for distributing the proceeds of the sales of the public lands as an indispensable condition. This measure is, in my judgment, called for by a large number, if not a great majority, of the people of the United States; by the state of the public credit and finances; by the critical posture of our various foreign relations; and, above all, by that most sacred of all duties—public faith. The act of September last, which provides for the distribution, couples it inseparably with the condition, that it shall cease—first, in case of war; second, as soon and so long as the rate of duties shall, for any reason whatever, be raised above 20 per cent. Nothing can be more clear, express, or imperative, than this language. It is in vain to allege that a deficit in the treasury was known to exist, and that means were taken to supply this deficit by loan when the act was passed. It is true that a loan was authorized at the same session during which the distribution law was passed; but the most sanguine of the friends of the two measures entertained no doubt but that the loan would be eagerly sought after and taken up by capitalists, and speedily reimbursed by a country destined, as they hoped, soon to enjoy an overflowing prosperity. The very terms of the loan, making it redeemable in three years, demonstrate this beyond all cavil. Who, at the time, foresaw or imagined the possibility of the present real state of things, when a nation that has paid off her whole debt since the last peace, while all the other great powers have been increasing theirs, and whose resources, already so great, are yet but in the infancy of their development, should be compelled to haggle in the money-market for a paltry sum not equal to one year's revenue upon her economical system? If the distribution law is to be indefinitely suspended, according not only to its own terms, but by universal consent, in the case of war, wherein are the actual exigencies of the country, or the moral obligation to provide for them, less under present circumstances, than they could be were we actually engaged in war? It appears to me to be the indispensable duty of all concerned in the administration of public affairs, to see that a state of things so humiliating and so perilous should not last a moment longer than is absolutely unavoidable. Much less excusable should we be in parting with any portion of our available means, at least until the demands of the treasury are fully supplied. But, besides the urgency of such considerations, the fact is undeniable, that the distribution act could not have become a law without the guarantee in the proviso of the act itself.

JUNE, 1842.]

The Provisional Tariff.

[2TH CONG.]

This connection, thus meant to be inseparable, is severed by the bill presented to me. The bill violates the principles of the acts of 1833, and September, 1841, by suspending the first, and rendering, for a time, the last inoperative. Duties above 20 per cent. are proposed to be levied, and yet the proviso in the distribution act is disregarded. The proceeds of the sales are to be distributed on the 1st of August; so that, while the duties proposed to be enacted exceed 20 per cent., no suspension of the distribution to the States is permitted to take place. To abandon the principle for a month, is to open the way for its total abandonment. If such is not meant, why postpone at all? Why not let the distribution take place on the 1st of July, if the law so directs? (which, however, is regarded as questionable.) But why not have limited the provision to that effect? Is it for the accommodation of the treasury? I see no reason to believe that the treasury will be in better condition to meet the payment on the 1st of August than on the 1st of July.

The bill assumes that a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands is, by existing laws, to be made on the 1st day of July, 1842, notwithstanding there has been an imposition of duties on imports exceeding 20 per cent. up to that day, and directs it to be made on the 1st of August next. It seems to me very clear that this conclusion is equally erroneous and dangerous; as it would divert from the treasury a fund sacredly pledged for the general purposes of the Government, in the event of a rate of duty above 20 per cent. being found necessary for an economical administration of the Government.

The bill under consideration is designed only as a temporary measure; and thus a temporary measure, passed merely for the convenience of Congress, is made to affect the vital principle of an important act. If the proviso of the act of September, 1841, can be suspended for the whole period of a temporary law, why not for the whole period of a permanent law? In fact, a doubt may be well entertained, according to strict legal rules, whether the condition, having been thus expressly suspended by this bill, and rendered inapplicable to a case where it would otherwise have clearly applied, will not be considered as ever after satisfied and gone. Without expressing any decided opinion on this point, I see enough in it to justify me in adhering to the law as it stands, in preference to subjecting a condition so vitally affecting the peace of the country, and so solemnly enacted at a momentous crisis, and so steadfastly adhered to ever since, and so replete, if adhered to, with good to every interest of the country, to doubtful or capricious interpretation.

In discharging the high duties thus imposed on me by the constitution, I repeat to the House my entire willingness to co-operate in all financial measures, constitutional and proper, which in its wisdom it may judge necessary and proper to re-establish the credit of the Government. I believe that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands being restored to the treasury—or, more properly speaking, the proviso of the act of September, 1841, being permitted to remain in full force, a tariff of duties may easily be adjusted, which, while it will yield a revenue sufficient to maintain the Government in vigor, by restoring its credit, will afford ample protection, and infuse a new hope into all our manufacturing establishments. The condition of the country calls for such legislation, and it will afford me the most sincere pleasure to co-operate in it.

JOHN TYLER.

WASHINGTON, June 29, 1842.

A debate ensued, in which Messrs. W. COT JOHNSON, GRANGER, SALTONSTALL, FILLMORE, and CUSHING, took part; and the Message was ordered to be printed.

THURSDAY, June 30.

The Provisional Tariff.

The Message of the President of the United States received yesterday returning the provisional tariff bill, with his objections, was taken up; the question being that prescribed by the constitution, on ordering the Message to be inserted in the journal, and reconsidering the bill.

Mr. BRIGGS said that, by the law of March, 1832, called the compromise act, all the duties on the importation of foreign goods were on this day to be brought down to 20 per cent.: and that, after this day, the home valuation was to take effect, but under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by law. From this he argued that the compromise act would be inoperative, because no rules and regulations had been provided by Congress for the home valuation. Under these circumstances, he examined the reasons given by the President, in his Message, for returning the bill, which he contended were entirely insufficient. Mr. B. then went into an argument, in which he defended the policy of distributing the proceeds of the public lands. He replied to the remarks of his colleague (Mr. CUSHING) in favor of the veto power. He referred to the fact, that the veto had not been called into requisition for one hundred and fifty years in Great Britain—a fact made use of by Mr. Madison in favor of granting this power to the President. He contrasted the opinions of Edmund Burke with those of his colleague, who thought that the “co-ordinate branch of the Government” at the other end of the Avenue might exercise the veto power at will.

Mr. STUART, of Virginia, argued against the use of the veto power as dangerous in the extreme. It effectually gave the President the power to say in what mode taxes should be levied. There were but three or four modes of raising revenue; and, by vetoing each as they might be adopted by Congress, he might thereby prescribe his own system, or sunder the Union. In the present instance, he could see no circumstance to justify, or in any manner palliate, the course of the President. This was a question affecting the dignity of the House; and, should it yield, there would be no necessity for Congress whatever. They had better send an address to his "gracious majesty" at once, and beg him to accede to their wishes. He begged that they would emulate the example of their Saxon ancestors in resisting the arbitrary will of one man.

2d Sess.]

The Tariff.

[JULY, 1842.]

Mr. PROFFIT said: It was not his intention to occupy even the time which the rules of the House allotted to him; but to offer a very few remarks on the veto power, and on the circumstances attending its recent exercise; and he asked the gentlemen who contend against the veto, to make a fair and palpable issue before the people of the country, that the question might be known and decided at the next Presidential election. He was made aware—by a paper some time since issued by a portion of this House—that this question would be brought up before the country. But he hoped it would not be deemed unkind in him, if he said that those gentlemen were making the veto power unpopular, by forcing upon the President bills which they knew he could not sanction. Was that their present object? He trusted in God it was not. But really, to the people of the country, who looked on these things with an unjaundiced eye, it so appeared. There was not a gentleman on this floor who did not know that this veto would come; and if the great tariff bill, as it was called, should be passed with the clause in it which it now contained in reference to distribution, they knew well what would be its fate. Was there a gentleman on that floor who did not know that? (A voice cried out: "We'll give it him.") They had the power to do it. (A voice: "And we will do it.") He had no doubt such was their intention. But he (Mr. PROFFIT) hoped wise and prudent counsels would prevail. He hoped they would act with a proper regard for the interests of the laborer, the farmer, the mechanic; and not, in a spirit of partisan warfare, send to the President measures which they knew he could not sanction.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, spoke as follows: The issue was now truly presented between the President of the United States and the Representatives of the people. The Congress of the United States, with a sincere desire to provide the ways and means for carrying on the Government, had passed an act to continue in force the present revenue laws for one month; and the President, seeing fit to differ with them, upon mere grounds of expediency, had returned that bill to the House which originated it, with his objections. Then the question arose, In whom was vested the right to carry out the revenue measures of the Government?—in the President, or in the Representatives of the people? The issue was not between the Congress of the United States and the President: it was between the President, who had proved recreant to every principle of truth, honor, and morality, and that abused constituency who had placed him in office. It was well that ours was a law-loving, law-abiding people: it was well that the constitutional and legal security thrown around him was strengthened by the peaceful disposition of the people. In other countries a far different spectacle would be presented.

This was another instance of the overwhelming strides of Executive power. If the proud eagle of American liberty should ever sink, it would be cloven down by the sword of the Executive. When the veto power was introduced, our forefathers did not look to Rome, but to the English Government, where the use of the veto was rare. What should Congress now do? Vote millions, when the President refuses to allow a cent to be raised? No; but let the people know that the President has annulled the revenue laws, disbanded the army and navy, and left the Government to shift for itself.

He contended that the whole object of the President looked to the succession; and he asked if the honest Democrats of the country were willing to surrender up all their principles merely for the sake of making John Tyler President a second term. It was but lately that the President had found out that the preservation of the compromise was an indispensable condition to the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. In the Virginia Legislature—in the Henrico letter—in all the former declarations of the President, no such condition was annexed. This repeal of the distribution was one of the hard conditions on which the Democrats would give their support, and which the power of the President compelled him to accept.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 1.

The Tariff.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented to the Senate the proceedings of a mass meeting of the citizens of Pittsburg and its vicinity, held on the 22d ultimo, in favor of a protective tariff. Mr. B. said that, from the names appended to the call for this meeting, (numbering, as they did, about fourteen hundred,) as well as from the names of its officers, and those who addressed it, there was no doubt that the meeting was what it purported to be, "without distinction of party." He would also say that, from his knowledge of the individuals who had composed this meeting, he believed they were men of as much intelligence, respectability, and moral worth, as any similar number which could be convened in any portion of the United States. The resolutions which they had adopted were all decidedly in favor of a protective tariff.

Mr. B. said he would take this occasion to remark, that since he had been in public life, there never had been so propitious a moment as the present for adjusting the tariff question upon a permanent and satisfactory basis. If the hopes of the country upon this subject were destined to defeat, it was now rendered manifest that it would be solely because of its forced and unnatural connection with the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. The revenue necessary to meet the expenses of the Government, and gradually to extinguish the existing public debt, would require the imposition of duties sufficiently high to afford all the incidental protection to manufactures which they require. In the assessment of these duties, whilst revenue should be his main object, he would discriminate—and especially would he discriminate in favor of such manufactures as were essentially necessary to render us independent of foreign nations in time of war. He concurred entirely with General Jackson in his celebrated message to Congress of the 16th January, 1838, in relation to the South Carolina controversy,—that it would not be proper to provide that “the same rate of duty shall be imposed upon the protected articles that shall be imposed upon the unprotected; which, moreover, would be severely oppressive to the poor, and, in time of war, would add greatly to its rigors.” No civilized nation upon the face of the earth had ever adopted a uniform horizontal scale of duties, upon all articles, whether of great or small bulk or value, or whether their importation were prejudicial or beneficial to the country. And whilst he would not consent to raise one cent more of revenue than was necessary for an economical expenditure of the Government, he would discriminate, moderately and judiciously, in favor of all the great interests of the country, whether they were agricultural, mechanical, commercial, or manufacturing.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 1.

The Veto Message on the Provisional Tariff.

Mr. RHETT commenced by expressing his surprise at the doctrines avowed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS,) and the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GRANGER,) which he looked upon as subversive of the constitution. The latter gentleman, in speaking of the veto and its consequences, said, Let trouble and desolation sweep over the land, and see who would stand it best. He had watched the course of the debate, and heard the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. LANE) still further developing the course of policy expected from the dominant party. That gentleman went on to say that the people of this country, under the exercise of the veto power, were laboring under the most intolerable tyranny. The gentleman further said that, though the President had vetoed the provisional tariff bill, another bill containing the same proviso with regard to the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands would be sent to him.

Let us meet this question (said Mr. R.) fairly. He trusted that there would be no gagging. They had come to the point when it was important that they should understand each other. He wanted his people to know how our system of Government was to be carried out, that they might be prepared for any emergency.

The gentleman from Tennessee had said that this veto was the result of a bargain between the Democratic party and the Executive. As a member of that party, he took upon himself to deny the charge; and he defied any man to show the slightest foundation for it. He knew that there were gentlemen here who were familiar with such bargains. From the year 1824, when the Presidential chair was reached through a bargain, and certain prospects were held out as a consideration for it, to this time, there had been several; and he was not surprised that gentlemen should charge against their political opponents what had been practised by their own parties. Had they not heard in the Congress of the United States a distinct proposition to bargain away the rights of the people? and that one mighty bill of corruption was made to pass another. Who did not know that the proviso to the distribution bill, which the President insisted on retaining, was the condition on which that bill was passed? Did not the gentleman from Kentucky throw out the emphatic declaration, that if you did not take his measures, he would not take yours? He did not, therefore, wonder that gentlemen, who carried their measures by such a system, should turn round and impugn their opponents for the same thing. But he declared that he never heard that a single member of the Democratic party had any communication with the President as to what he should do, and what they would do. On the contrary, every thing they had said to the President had been on that floor. We said to him, If you propose measures that we think right, we shall approve them; and if you propose measures that we think wrong, we shall condemn them. Every man on that floor knew what the Democratic party would do.

Mr. R. then took occasion to express the strongest disapprobation of the language which gentlemen had indulged in in reference to the President. Imputations had been made against him unworthy of the House and of the persons who uttered them; and all for the exercise of an undoubted right to discharge his duty according to the dictates of his own conscience. Mr. R. referred to the high stations he had filled, with so much honor to himself, the remembrance of which ought to have shielded him from such assaults. He remembered, when a distinguished Senator from his native State, he stood in opposition to the Force bill; and he, as a Carolinian, could not but feel grateful to him for the part he took on that occasion. He was a party to the compromise bill; and was it surprising that he should consider himself bound to carry it out in good faith?

2d Sess.]

The Provisional Tariff.

[JULY, 1842.]

He was the pride of his country, and was, moreover, a Virginian—a name never coupled with dishonor; and, to hear such unworthy imputations cast upon him, was what he must protest against. He was no follower of John Tyler; all who knew him knew that he had but little to do with the President, and that nothing more had ever passed between them than those acts of courtesy which he should always show to the man whom the people placed in the Executive chair; but it was his duty to do him justice; and to judge of him as he himself would be judged.

Mr. BARNARD took up in review the objections which the President had stated in his Message; and said he had read the Message again and again, to find out what the President meant; but he had not been able to do so; and he had serious doubts whether the President himself could explain what he meant. It was deemed necessary, as the President supposed, to establish, by legislative enactment, rules and regulations for assessing duties to be levied by imposts after the 30th of June; and having discovered this to be the object of the bill, the President declared it as his opinion that such an enactment was unnecessary, and that it would be better not to do that which was unnecessary, at the expense of the compromise act. Would it then be believed, and would not the world hear with astonishment, that in the bill there was not even the faintest allusion to the establishment of rules and regulations for the collection of duties according to the home valuation, and, consequently, that there was no such violation of the compromise act?

He also took up the objections of the President as they related to the principle of distribution; and he denied the truth of the position of the President that the proviso of the land law was suspended, it being the distribution only that was suspended. He alluded to the period at which this veto had been sent in. It was a period when importers might question the legality of the imposition of duties, and when they might refuse to pay, on the ground that no duty existed;—a period when collectors might seize the goods of importers, and when the courts might become embarrassed with the fearful amount of litigation which might ensue. And the exercise of the veto power, under such circumstances, had been undertaken by the President, and justified by some gentlemen on this floor.

SATURDAY, July 2.

The Provisional Tariff.

The SPEAKER announced, as the unfinished business, the Message of the President returning the provisional tariff bill, with his objections.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, said, in treating this question he should confine himself to certain public questions, and then address himself to those who had preceded him in debate, when he should take occasion to express the deep indignation and scorn of the unfair, unmanly, and ungenerous manner in which the Executive had been treated on this occasion. In doing so, he had not one personal feeling to gratify; but he should treat the subject with candor and fairness, and award justice where justice was due. In the first place, he should call the attention of the House to the act of 1833, commonly called the compromise act, because it was part and parcel of the subject he was treating, and because he entertained different opinions with regard to the meaning and intent of that law from those expressed by gentlemen on this floor; and, in some measure, he differed with the President himself in his construction of it. The view that he entertained of it was, that it was the great bond of peace to this Union; that to disturb or violate it, was an outrage that deserved the indignation of the world; and that those who believed that the preservation of that bond of union was essential to the peace and harmony of the country, were bound by every principle of honor and of patriotism to adhere to it.

He would now (Mr. S. said) proceed to the consideration of another part of the subject, which was the act of September, 1841, called the distribution act. What did that act say? with a view to preserve the character of this Legislature; with a view to preserve the faith pledged in this compromise inviolate, it was provided in that act, that whenever it should be found necessary to raise the duties beyond 20 per cent., the distribution should cease. Then there were two acts of solemn legislation on which the faith of the Legislature was equally pledged—the compromise act, passed under the circumstances he had adverted to; and the distribution act, passed with that solemn and express reservation for the purpose of preserving the faith pledged in the first. It was conceded on all hands that, without that proviso, the last-named act never could have passed the Senate; and it was also conceded that, without it, it could not have received the sanction of the President; and yet they saw gentlemen, after having got these measures, seeking to violate the solemn conditions on which they obtained them.

They had heard gentlemen, who were in favor of distribution, say to the manufacturing interests, that "unless you hold on to the distribution, you shall get no protection." He would ask gentlemen if there was any principle of honor or morality that would justify such an outrageous violation of the most solemn pledges ever entered into by man. Under the circumstances he had explained, this distribution bill was passed through this and the other House, and sent to the President for his signature. Mr. S. here adverted to the "race-horse speed" with which the measure was hurried through; and observed that, notwithstanding the plausible reasons given by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means for this hurried legislation, when sent to the Senate, it was suffered to remain on the table for several days, in order, as he supposed, that it might be passed at a period so near the 30th June, that the President would feel himself under the necessity of sanctioning it. The bill then went to the President under circumstances which induced a belief that the President was placed in such a situation as compelled him to sign it, and thus violate the faith he had pledged in the compromise act, as well as commit an act contrary to his known and recorded opinions. This, however, like many other attempts that had been made to head Captain Tyler, failed, and he returned the bill with his veto. What were the grounds on which his objections were placed? Mr. S. here went into a recapitulation of the reasons given by the President, in his veto Message, for returning the bill to the House in which it originated, explaining and commenting on them as he went on.

In relation to the distribution act, Mr. S. said that the President, who had been arraigned here as in favor of unqualified distribution, had expressly declared that he would go for it only so far as that it should not interfere with the compromise act. In 1841, when the distribution act was presented to him for his signature, he did not hesitate to give his assent to it; though he saw in the condition of the treasury good reasons for withholding it, yet he gave his assent to it, because it contained a proviso that the distribution was to be arrested the moment the duties should be raised above twenty per cent. Now, when he was called upon to give his assent to a bill involving a breach of the compromise act, and a breach of the distribution act, he would ask gentlemen if he was not under a high moral obligation to reject it, which he could not well have disregarded.

MONDAY, JUNE 4.

The Veto of the Provisional Tariff.

The House then resumed the debate on the President's veto of the provisional tariff.

Mr. HUMPHREY said if there was nothing in the objection that the proceeds of the public lands ought of right, and of duty, to have gone to the States; if there was nothing in the objection that the President ought not to have vetoed the bill on grounds of expediency only; the other question which remained to be considered was, Was this such a bill as ought to have been vetoed? He maintained that this was such a bill; and, if there ever was a measure which a statesman and patriot was bound to arrest, this was one. Mr. H. referred to the condition of the country under which this bill was passed; to the clamor of the public creditors; the difficulty in negotiating a loan; and the falling off of the revenue. He also noticed the estimates of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and of the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the amount of revenue required for the service of the Government, for its ordinary expenses and for the public debt, for the present year. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had introduced a bill for the purpose of raising twenty-seven millions of dollars, on an estimate of seventy-nine millions of imports; while the Secretary of the Treasury estimated the imports at ninety millions. But Mr. H. ventured to predict that this amount of revenue could not be raised, on account of the extent to which smuggling would be carried on, on the north-western frontier. Free trade would then prevail, in earnest—which would be a very fine thing, to be sure, for Buffalo; but what would it be for New York!—what would it be for Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Charleston? Would the Atlantic seaboard consent to be hermetically sealed, while free trade was pouring its riches into the north-west? He would warn gentlemen that their system would destroy the very subject of taxation itself, producing a spirit that would soon lead to some other mode of raising a revenue. If we cannot get along by the present means of raising revenue, and our expenditure is to be twenty-seven millions—what, then, is to be the result? If we do wisely, we should curtail our expenditures, take back the proceeds of the public lands, and collect a revenue by a system of duties laid solely for that object. What was the other alternative? A system of internal duties; and he would put it to gentlemen whether they would be willing to take direct taxation rather than give up distribution? Where would this system fall heaviest? Not on us, but on that rich country whose resources gentlemen so much boast of. If the system which gentlemen were so wedded to, should, in the end, destroy foreign commerce, dry up the sources of public revenue, and drive us to a system of direct taxation—as he verily believed it would—when that time came, the burden would fall on them. The question then was, of returning to the treasury the proceeds of the public lands, or of direct taxation? Can we blame the President, then, when—seeing the finances of the country embarrassed, and public credit prostrated—he takes the only measure in his power to relieve the one and restore the other? If the dominant party would take his advice, (and he would not pretend that he had a right to advise them,) they would meet an inevitable state of things by a wise and manly course. Here Mr. H. laid down the policy which he deemed best calculated for the interests of the country. The people were with the President in the acts which were so severely censured. They do not (said Mr. H.) distrust your patriotism or your talents; but they believe that your system is not calculated for the benefit of the country.

2d Sess.]

The Tariff.

[JULY, 1842.]

The question was then taken, "Shall this bill pass, notwithstanding the objections of the President?" and decided in the negative—there not being a majority of two-thirds—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, L. W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Appleton, Arnold, Ayer, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, M. Brown, J. Brown, Burnell, William Butler, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Casey, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, James Cooper, Cowen, Garrett Davis, Deberry, John Edwards, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, A. L. Foster, Gamble, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, P. G. Goode, Graham, Granger, Green, Hall, Halsted, Howard, Hudson, Hunt, J. R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, W. W. Irwin, James, John P. Kennedy, King, Lane, Linn, McKennan, Thomas F. Marshall, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Matlocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Meriwether, Mitchell, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Owsley, Pearce, Pendleton, Pope, Powell, Ramsay, Benjamin Randall, A. Randall, Randolph, Ridgway, Rodney, Wm. Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Shepperd, Slade, Truman Smith, Sollers, Sprigg, Stanly, Stokeley, Stratton, Alexander H. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Summers, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, R. W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trumbull, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Warren, Washington, Edward D. White, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and John Young—114.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Arrington, Atherton, Bidlack, Black, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Burke, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, P. C. Caldwell, John Campbell, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, M. A. Cooper, Cravens, Cushing, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Doan, Doig, Eastman, Egbert, Ferris, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, T. F. Foster, Gerry, Gilmer, Wm. O. Goode, Gordon, Gwin, Habersham, Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubard, Hunter, C. J. Ingersoll, Jack, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Andrew Kennedy, Lewis, Littlefield, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Malory, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, J. T. Mason, Mathews, Medill, Miller, Newhard, Patridge, Payne, Pickens, Plumer, Read, Reding, Rencher, Reynolds, Rhett, Riggs, Rogers, Roosevelt, Sanford, Saunders, Shaw, Shields, William Smith, Snyder, Steenrod, Sumter, Jacob Thompson, Van Buren, Ward, Waterson, Weller, Westbrook, Joseph L. White, James W. Williams, Wise, and Wood—97.

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 7.

The Exchequer Bill.

Mr. TALLMADGE said he rose for the purpose of giving notice that, on Monday next, he would move to postpone the general orders, for the purpose of taking up the bill proposing to modify the several acts establishing the Treasury Department, commonly called the "exchequer bill." He gave this notice then, in the hope that gentlemen would be prepared to take the bill up at that time. He thought it was pertinent to say that the bill had been postponed for a long time, for no other reason than that there were matters before the Senate of a more pressing character. At the time the bill was introduced, the several resolutions of the late Senator from Kentucky (Mr. OLAY) were occupying the attention of the Senate. It was the wish on the part of all not to interfere with those resolutions. Since that time, the loan bill, the apportionment bill, the army and navy bills, and a variety of other matters, of pressing necessity and urgency, have taken up the time of the Senate. He determined that it was not proper to move in this bill while those matters, which were deemed of a more immediate and pressing character, were pending. He believed that there was now no measure for the relief of the country, which more pressing required the consideration of this body, than the exchequer bill. He would therefore give notice that, on Monday, he would in good faith move to take up this bill, and press action until an expression of the opinion of the Senate was had upon it.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 7.

The Tariff.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. McKENNA in the chair,) and proceeded with the consideration of the bill to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws, imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON, after a few preliminary remarks, said that he should take this opportunity to apprise the committee that, at the first moment allowed him, he should offer a resolution calling for a Select Committee for the purpose of taking into consideration the present interests of the country, and to report a bill providing for giving relief both to the General and State Governments. If the House should grant him that committee, he should not offer any amendment to the bill under consideration; but, if it should refuse to do so, he should bring forward his proposition in the most formal and distinct manner, as an amendment to the bill, before it was disposed of. He would say to gentlemen of every party here, that all efforts would be vain and fruitless to keep this question from bold and free inquiry. To attempt to hide it, and exclude it from the public gaze and public consideration, would be vain and nugatory. They might as well attempt to stifle the hoarse voice of Boreas, or bid the mighty Mississippi cease to flow on, as it would forever. He regarded the question as one broader and deeper than any one of those which divided the different parties of the country. If gentlemen were anxious, at this early period, to record their names against it, he was as anxious to give them the opportunity.

Mr. J., in the course of his remarks, gave an outline of the plan he intended to propose, viz:

JULY, 1842.]

Memorial.

[27th Cong.]

that Government stocks should be issued, bearing a particular interest; and that these stocks should be given to the States, (as well to those indebted as to those out of debt,) to an amount not, perhaps, sufficient to give them ample relief, but sufficient, with the aid of their own resources, to enable them to meet their engagements, and re-establish their credit.

The States not indebted would have the interest of the stocks given them, as also the principal, when finally redeemed, to apply to such objects as they deemed most for their advantage; so that both the indebted and non-indebted States would be put on a footing of perfect equality: the public lands to be pledged for the redemption of the principal and interest of the stocks so issued.

As a further part of his plan, Mr. J. would propose a tariff laid for the purpose of giving adequate protection to domestic manufactures. He thought that a calm and deliberate examination would be sufficient to induce any statesman to believe that his plan was at once simple, and, in its consequences, benign and salutary. He would not discuss it, but would say, in advance, that the question of constitutionality would hardly be raised by any party. Mr. J. said that his plan, so far from being a novel one, had the benefit of several precedents in the history of the Government to recommend it: and he then referred to the assumption by the Federal Government of the revolutionary debts of the States; and to the treaties of 1783 and 1794, in which provision was made for enabling individual creditors in England to recover debts from individuals in this country. He also referred to the assumption by Congress, a few years ago, of the Holland debt due by the corporate cities of the District of Columbia. Mr. J. then continued his argument in favor of his plan of assumption up to the expiration of his hour.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, July 11.

Mexico.

Mr. PRESTON offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if it be not inconsistent with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate the recent correspondence between the Republic of Mexico and this Government in relation to Texas.

He would ask the consent of the Senate to enter upon the consideration of the resolution this morning, inasmuch as the subject is one of deep national interest. It calls for information which may demand the immediate attention of this body.

He was sure a majority of the Senators present had seen, in the public papers this morning, the translation of a letter addressed by the Secretary of Foreign Relations of the Republic of Mexico to the Secretary of State of the United States, but published at Mexico before it had left that country for the United States.

This extraordinary letter, he felt constrained to say, was calculated to excite great anxiety in this country. It appeared to him there was an obvious necessity, under the circumstances, for Congress to be placed in possession of full information on the subject—at least so far as the Executive may judge is compatible with the public interest to make the communication required. It is desirable that Congress should know, as speedily as practicable, what has taken place between the constituted authorities of both countries.

He would beg leave to read a single paragraph towards the conclusion, for the purpose of showing the character and temper of the letter to which he had alluded. After detailing what the Mexican Secretary of State supposes to have been the conduct of the United States Government with regard to Texas, the writer proceeds to make these remarks:

"Such conduct the Mexican Government cannot comprehend; and although animated with a sincere desire that the relations now happily existing between this Republic and the United States may not suffer the least alteration, it feels bound, in frankness to repeat, in the most formal manner, its former protest against the tolerance before mentioned, a continuance of which it will regard as a positive act of hostility against this Republic, and will regulate its conduct as justice, its own interests, and the national dignity may demand."

Now, it must be obvious to every Senator, that the force of the sentence consists in the implied threat. It amounts to this—that a continuation of the condition of things complained of will be considered as authorizing hostilities.

A declaration of this nature, made in a manner so formal and official, presented, in his opinion, a matter for the gravest consideration. He trusted—indeed, he had no doubt—that the Government of the United States had answered this communication in a manner becoming its own dignity, and in that temper of forbearance which should ever characterize the conduct of a powerful nation dealing with one like Mexico. But, while he trusted that this Government had answered Mr. Bocanegra's letter with forbearance, he felt satisfied it had been done with a just regard to our own dignity, and with that firmness which the occasion required.

The question was then taken on the resolution, and it was adopted.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 12.

Memorial.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from James Reeside, by his attorney in fact, Mr. —. Mr. B. said Mr. Reeside was well known throughout the United States as the "land admiral," from his extensive transactions with the Post Office Department. It is represented in the memorial that he furnished money to the department at different times; and, after a failure to have his accounts adjusted at the department, it was finally agreed that they should be settled by bringing a suit; which was done. The trial commenced in October, 1841, and ended on the 6th December following—having occupied a period of six weeks. And the result of the trial was a verdict entered in his favor for $186,496 06. A motion for a new trial succeeded, and the claim was affirmed. He asks Congress to pay the amount thus found due to him—stating, at the same time, that there were $50,000 clearly due to him besides; and that eleven of the jury thought so. The memorial was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

2D Sess.]

Correspondence in relation to Texas.

[JULY, 1842.]

THURSDAY, July 14.

Correspondence in relation to Texas.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a Message from the President of the United States, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 11th instant, transmitting the recent correspondence between the Republic of Mexico and this Government, in relation to Texas.

The correspondence was of an interesting and important character, and very voluminous, having occupied nearly two hours in the reading. Mr. Webster's letter of instruction of 8th of July, 1842, to Mr. Waddy Thompson, our Minister at Mexico, in reply to the first letter of M. de Bocanegra, (already published,) covers the whole ground of Mexican outrages on the citizens and commerce of the United States. Its tone may be inferred from the following extract from it, covering one point only of the letter of M. de Bocanegra, viz:

"M. de Bocanegra declares, in conclusion, that his Government finds itself under the necessity of protesting solemnly against the aggressions which the citizens of the States are reiterating upon the Mexican territory; and of declaring, in a positive manner, that it will consider as a violation of the treaty of amity, the toleration of that course of conduct, which he alleges inflicts on the Mexican Republic the injuries and inconveniences of war.

"The President exceedingly regrets both the sentiment and the manner of this declaration. But it can admit of but one answer. The Mexican Government appears to require that which could not be granted, in whatever language or whatever tone requested.

"The Government of the United States is a Government of law. The Chief Executive Magistrate, as well as the functionaries in every other department, is restrained and guided by the constitution and the laws of the land. Neither the constitution nor the law of the land, nor principles known to the usages of modern States, authorize him to interdict lawful trade between the United States and Texas; or to prevent, or attempt to prevent, individuals from leaving the United States for Texas or any other foreign country. If such individuals enter into the service of Texas, or any other foreign State, the Government of the United States no longer holds over them the shield of its protection. They must stand or fall in their newly assumed character, and according to the fortunes which may betide it. But the Government of the United States cannot be called upon to prevent their emigration; and, it must be added, that the constitution, public treaties, and the laws, oblige the President to regard Texas as an independent State, and its territory as no part of the territory of Mexico. Every provision of law—every principle of neutral obligation—will be sedulously enforced in relation to Mexico, as in relation to other powers, and to the same extent, and with the same integrity of purpose. All this belongs to the constitutional power and duty of the Government, and it will be all fulfilled. But the continuance of amity with Mexico cannot be purchased at any higher rate. If the peace of the two countries is to be disturbed, the responsibility will devolve on Mexico. She must be answerable for consequences. The United States, let it be again repeated, desire peace. It must be with infinite pain that they should find themselves in hostile relations with any of the new Governments on this continent. But their Government is regulated, limited, full of the spirit of liberty, but surrounded, nevertheless, with just restraints; and, greatly and fervently as it desires peace with all States—and especially with its more immediate neighbors—yet no fear of a different state of things can be allowed to interrupt its course of equal and exact justice to all nations, nor to jostle it out of the constitutional orbit in which it revolves.

"I am, sir, &c.,

"DANIEL WEBSTER."

The following letter, comprising a part of the instructions to our Minister at Mexico, is in answer to the second letter of complaint and defiance of M. de Bocanegra.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 18, 1842.

SIR: After writing to you on the 8th instant, I received, through the same channel as the former, M. de Bocanegra's second letter, and, at the same time, your despatch of the 6th of June, and your private letter of the 21st. This last letter of M. de Bocanegra was written, as you will see, before it was possible for him to expect an answer to his first; which answer is now forwarded, and shows the groundless nature of the complaints of Mexico. The letter itself is highly exceptionable and offensive. It imputes violations of honor and good faith to the Government of the United States, not only in the most unjust, but in the most indecorous manner.

You have not spoken of it in terms too strong in your circular to the members of the diplomatic corps.

On the receipt of this, you will write a note to M. Bocanegra, in which you will say that the Secretary of State of the United States, on the 9th of July, received his letter of the 27th of May; that the President of the United States considers the language and tone of that letter derogatory to the character of the United States, and highly offensive, as it imputes to the Government a direct breach of faith; and that he directs that no other answer be given to it than the declaration that the conduct of the Government of the United States, in regard to the war between

JULY, 1842.]

The Tariff.

[27th Case.]

Mexico and Texas, having been always hitherto governed by a strict and impartial regard to its neutral obligations, will not be changed or altered, in any respect, or in any degree. If, for this, the Government of Mexico shall see fit to change the relations at present existing between the two countries, the responsibility remains with herself.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
DANIEL WEBSTER.

To WADDY THOMPSON, Esq.,
Envoy Extraordinary, &c., to Mexico.

The Message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

SATURDAY, July 16.

Case of Samuel Swartwout.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Senate took up for consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make any arrangement or compromise with any of the sureties on bonds given to the United States by Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the customs for the port of New York.

Mr. W. explained that the bill merely authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to compound with the sureties of Swartwout, which would have the effect to bring $25,000 into the treasury, which would be lost to the Government if the bill did not prevail.

The bill was then reported back to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 16.

The Tariff.

The question came up for the engrossment of the bill for a third reading.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and resulted in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Appleton, Arnold, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botta, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Thomas J. Campbell, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, S. N. Clarke, Jas. Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Cushing, G. Davis, John Edwards, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, A. Lawrence, Foster, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Patrick G. Goode, Graham, Granger, Green, Hall, Halsted, Howard, Hudson, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, Wm. W. Irwin, James, Wm. C. Johnson, Isaac D. Jones, John P. Kennedy, Lane, Linn, McKennan, Mason, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Owseley, Parmenter, Pearce, Pendleton, Pope, Powell, Ramsay, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Randolph, Ridgway, Rodney, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Shepperd, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Sollers, Sprigg, Stanly, Stokeley, Stratton, Alexander H. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Summers, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Washington, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Joseph L. Williams, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—116.

NAYS.—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Beeson, Black, Black, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, C. Brown, Burke, S. E. Butler, Wm. Butler, Wm. O. Butler, G. W. Caldwell, P. C. Caldwell, J. Campbell, W. B. Campbell, Caruthers, Cary, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Deberry, Doan, Doig, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Egbert, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Thomas F. Foster, Gamble, Gerry, Gilmer, William O. Goode, Gordon, Gustine, Gwin, Habersham, Harris, Hastings, Hay, Holmes, Hopkins, Hosck, Houston, Hubard, Hunter, C. J. Ingersoll, Jack, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Andrew Kennedy, King, Lewis, Littlefield, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKee, Mallory, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, John Thomson Mason, Mathews, Medill, Meriwether, Miller, Mitchell, Newhard, Partridge, Payne, Pickens, Plumer, Read, Reding, Rencher, Rhett, Riggs, Rogers, Roosevelt, Sanford, Saunders, Shaw, Shields, William Smith, Snyder, Steenrod, Sumter, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Van Buren, Ward, Warren, Watterson, Weller, James W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wood—111.

The House decided that the bill should have its third reading "now."

The question then recurred on the passage of the bill; on which the yeas and nays were called for, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Appleton, Arnold, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botta, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Thomas J. Campbell, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Cushing, Garrett Davis, John Edwards, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, A. Lawrence, Foster, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Patrick G. Goode, Graham, Granger, Green, Hall, Halsted, Howard, Hudson, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, William W. Irwin, James, William Coet Johnson, Isaac D. Jones, John P. Kennedy, Lane, Linn, McKennan, Thomas F. Marshall, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Owseley, Parmenter, Pearce, Pendleton, Pope, Powell, Ramsay, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Randolph, Ridgway, Rodney, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Shepperd, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Sollers, Sprigg, Stanly, Stokeley, Stratton, Alexander H. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Summers, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Washington, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Joseph L. Williams, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—116.

NAYS.—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Beeson, Black, Black, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William Butler, William O. Butler, Green W.

2d Sess.]

Repeal of the Bankrupt Law.

[JULY, 1842.]

Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Caruthers, Cary, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Deberry, Dem, Doig, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Egbert, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Thomas F. Foster, Gamble, Gerry, Gilmer, William O. Goode, Gordon, Gustine, Gwin, Habersham, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubard, Hunter, C. J. Ingersoll, Jack, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Andrew Kennedy, King, Lewis, Littlefield, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Mallory, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, John Thomson Mason, Mathews, Medill, Meriwether, Miller, Mitchell, Newhard, Patridge, Payne, Pickens, Plumer, Read, Reding, Rencher, Reynolds, Rhett, Riggs, Rogers, Roosevelt, Sanford, Saunders, Shaw, Shields, Wm. Smith, Snyder, Steenrod, Sumter, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Van Buren, Ward, Warren, Watterson, Weller, James W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wood—112.

Mr. J. COOPER moved a reconsideration, and on that he asked the previous question; which was sustained by the House, and the reconsideration was negatived.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, July 18.

The Great Tariff Bill.

A message was received from the House, transmitting the bill to provide revenues from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes. The bill was read twice, and,

On motion of Mr. EVANS, referred to the Committee on Finance, and the bill ordered to be printed.

Repeal of the Bankrupt Law.

Mr. BENTON made his promised motion asking leave to introduce a bill to repeal the bankrupt act of 1841, and supported his motion in a speech of near two hours. His motion was to repeal the bill for unconstitutionality, leaving it in force for completing cases now depending under the limitations which would free it from unconstitutionality. The points of unconstitutionality on which he particularly dwelt were: 1. The discharge from debts without the consent of creditors. 2. The infringement of the State insolvent laws. 3. The abolition of liens under the State laws. He undertook to show that the act was framed upon the English insolvent debtors act of the 1st of George IV., and read many sections from that to prove that our bankrupt act was taken from it; and that our act was, consequently, not a bankrupt system, but the English insolvent act, perverted to an abolition of debts. He gave a close and severe examination to the arguments in favor of the bill, especially Mr. Webster's; and disputed them both, on reason and authority. He said their object was an abolition of debts, and so avowed; and read extracts from Mr. Webster's speech of 1840 to show it. That, to get at this abolition of debts, it was necessary to establish two main positions: first, that insolvency and bankruptcy were the same—thereby gaining for Congress jurisdiction over insolvencies, under the pretext of the bankrupt power; secondly, to establish the unlimited power of Congress over the whole question, subject only to local uniformity; and by virtue of that unlimited power, a right to discharge the debt without the consent of the creditors. Mr. B. followed the arguments of the friends of the bill to the civil law, the Scottish law, and the English law, and showed that insolvency and bankruptcy were everywhere distinct; that, under our system, insolvencies belonged to the States, and bankruptcies to the General Government; that one discharged the person on surrender of property, the other discharged the debt with the consent of a majority of creditors in number and value. And he averred there was not a bankrupt system on earth, except our act of 1841, which undertook to discharge the debt without the consent of the creditors. He denied the validity of such discharges, and said that if he were a judge, he would pay no more attention to them than to a chapter from Gulliver's Travels. He reviewed the doctrine of the cessio bonorum, and showed that it was nothing but our insolvent law; that it was introduced by Julius Cæsar, to mitigate the hard fate of debtors in Rome, by releasing their persons on the surrender of their property, and to save the commonwealth from the seditions and conspiracies which were founded upon the sufferings of the debtor classes, and which had so convulsed the State, from the secession of the people when they retired to the Mons Sacer, to the time of the great conspiracy of Catiline. He showed that the cessio of the civil law had been wrongly quoted, and that the law of all Europe and of the whole world was against our act; that in England four-fifths of the creditors in number and value, with a judicial certificate of integrity, were necessary to discharge a bankrupt of his debts; that in France it was the same; that in our act of 1800, the consent of two-thirds, and the same certificate were required; and that the civil law was still more strict. But it is impossible, in this brief notice, even to state all the points of this speech.

Mr. BERRIEN referred to the joint rule which requires the consent of two-thirds of the Senate, in cases of application for leave to introduce a bill to effect an object decided against in the same session. He had listened with great attention to the arguments just enforced by the Senator from Missouri; but had failed to discover in them any thing that had not been urged, and fully discussed and considered, when the bankrupt bill was on its passage. The same arguments were also repeatedly urged during the discussions on the subject when the bankrupt question was before the last Congress. After all this, the law as it now stands, has been solemnly sanctioned; and he could therefore see no new grounds for encouraging a re-agitation not likely to effect any thing practical. Even if the present session had not been so far advanced, he thought the Senate would at once perceive that its time ought not to be thrown away on discussions so recently and so amply considered and decided upon. He hoped, therefore, the leave requested would not be granted.

JULY, 1842.]

Pension Laws.

[37TH CASE.]

The question was then taken on Mr. BEN-TON's motion, and the vote, by yeas and nays, was as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan,
Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, Graham, King, Linn,
McRoberts, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut,
Sprague, Sturgeon, Walker, Wilcox, Woodbury,
Wright, and Young—21.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate,
Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans,
Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Merrick,
Miller, Morehead, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana,
White, and Woodbridge—21.

So, two-thirds not voting in the affirmative, leave to introduce the bill was not granted.

TUESDAY, July 19.

Pension Laws.

House bill No. 165, entitled "An act for the relief of Sarah Bealy, widow of William Bealy, deceased, and, previous, thereto, widow of Doctor Henry Adams," was taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GRAHAM thought, as there was a general law in preparation which would embrace this case, it would be well perhaps to withhold the present bill.

Mr. BATES pointed out that the bill had been so nearly matured, and so many bills of a similar nature, resting solely on the same principle, had been passed this session, that to delay the present claim would be an invidious distinction, and might prove ultimately unjust, as the general bill on the subject might not be adopted when it came up.

Mr. LINN asked if the principle on which the bill was founded, was considered by the Committee on Pensions a settled question. If it was not clearly recognized by the pension law, he thought a very troublesome precedent might be established; and he was not prepared to vote for creating a new class of cases.

A general discussion ensued on the subject;
those in favor of the bill before the Senate contending that Mrs. Bealy's case was exactly similar to cases admitted and acted favorably upon by Congress hitherto; and that therefore it would be an unjust exception to delay or place in jeopardy this meritorious claim.
The general bill in preparation, it was contended, would be proceeded with at the convenience of Congress, and would not be affected by the passage of this special bill. Those who supported this view of the subject were Messrs.
BATES, HUNTINGTON, and SIMMONS.

On the other hand, it was contended that it was always better, whenever Congress could do it, to legislate by general principles, than by special cases, in which appeals were made to personal feelings and sympathies. If the principle was right, it should embrace all cases of the kind: if not right and proper on general grounds, there could be no knowing how to act on special cases, without great partiality or injustice to those excluded. Messrs. GRAHAM and BUCHANAN supported this view of the subject.

The danger of opening a new door to claims on the pension list was ably urged by Messrs.
WRIGHT and CALHOUN. They contended that no such construction should be given to the law of 1838, as that it was intended to extend to cases of this kind.

It appeared that the permanent pension law of 1838 was intended to be for the benefit of widows of revolutionary soldiers, married at the time of the revolutionary war; in consideration of the hardships they endured, or the services they rendered by taking care of those soldiers and their families, while their own time was taken up in the service of the country.

The pension law of 1838 was intended to extend the benefits of the pension list to widows married to revolutionary soldiers after the revolutionary war, but prior to 1794; on the ground that those who married those veterans at an advanced age were entitled to their pensions, in consideration of the care and attention necessarily bestowed upon their declining years.

The recent practice of Congress had been to extend the benefits of this law to widows of those revolutionary soldiers claiming under the law of 1838, to cases in which those widows married again.

Mrs. Bealy's was one of the latter class, and it was urged upon the two grounds—first, her case being originally one coming strictly within the provisions of the law of 1838; and, next, as being grounded on a principle, with regard to subsequent marriage, fully sanctioned by precedent in the action of Congress heretofore.

Mr. CALHOUN showed that enormous evils had grown up out of small beginnings. When he was at the head of the War Department the pension system was urged with assurances that the ultimate cost would not exceed $100,000.
The very largest conjecture was $300,000.
Yet, in the first year that it went into operation, the demands upon that fund exceeded two millions of dollars. So it was with the law of 1838. It was said there were but few cases, and, in all, they would not exceed a few thousand. Yet, now, they were running up to hundreds of thousands of dollars; and if this new class of cases were added, there would be no knowing where the system would end.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and read a third time; and, the yeas and nays being

[Sens.]

Bankrupt Law.

[JULY, 1842]

led on its passage, it was passed, by a vote yeas 21, nays 14.

THURSDAY, July 21.

Letter of General Harrison.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a petition from Madison county, Virginia, in favor of free trade, and against a tariff. Mr. C. said the petition was received here during his absence from the city, and was forwarded to him at his residence, and was only returned yesterday evening.

Mr. C. called the attention of the Senate to a few moments to the letter of General Harrison, at Zanesville, appended to one of the resolutions referred to in the petition. He wished the Secretary to read the letter, and for members to give it an attentive hearing. The letter was in support of the compromise act.

The Secretary then read the resolution and letter as follows :

Resolved, That when the late Wm. H. Harrison was elected to the Presidency, under the solemn pledge "that he would never revive the tariff, but, on the contrary, would support the compromise act, and would never consent to its being altered or repealed," we had the strongest assurance that the promise of man could afford, that our country would be freed from that onerous system—at least during the four years of his Presidency; and those of us who sustained his election upon the faith of those pledges, and co-operated with his party under the confident expectation that they would be fully redeemed, cannot but regard with feelings of profound astonishment and regret the utter repudiation of those pledges, by the majority of the party since his death.

"ZANESVILLE, Nov. 2, 1836.

"GENTLEMEN : I had the honor, this moment, to receive your communication of yesterday. I regret that my remarks of yesterday were misunderstood in relation to the tariff system. What I meant to convey was, that I had been a warm advocate of that system upon its first adoption; that I still believed in the benefits it had conferred upon the country; but I certainly never had, nor ever would have, any idea of reviving it. What I said was, that I would not agree to the repeal as it now stands. In other words, I am for supporting the compromise act, and never will agree to its being altered or repealed.

"In relation to the internal improvement system, I refer you for my sentiments to my letter to the Hon. Sherrod Williams.

"WILLIAM H. HARRISON.

Messrs. DOSTLER, TAYLOR, and others."

Mr. CALHOUN observed that the Senate had now, in that letter, in the most express and solemn form, the declaration of General Harrison that he never would agree to change or repeal the compromise act. Whatever doubt there may be as to the course he would have pursued in reference to a National Bank, there can be none now as to his course in reference to the compromise act. As far, at least, as the question of tariff and adherence to the compromise act is concerned, the death of General Harrison has presented to his supporters no impediment that would not exist were he living. Were he now alive, he would have acted as Mr. Tyler has acted; and, in consistency with his own declared principles, he would be bound to act as Mr. Tyler is bound to act. The party now in power supported General Harrison throughout the Presidential canvass, on the grounds of his acknowledged principles. Here he has placed them beyond doubt on the vital question of tariff and the compromise act; and he (Mr. CALHOUN) would submit it to the gentlemen on the other side, whether they do not stand pledged, by the terms of this letter, to the support of the compromise act; and whether that pledge would not be grossly and palpably violated by the House bill now before the Committee on Finance. There is in that bill a provision which is virtually a repeal of the compromise act. With what consistency can that provision be supported by those who stand pledged to General Harrison's principles upon the subject, so unequivocally expressed in the letter just read?

He moved to lay the petitions and accompanying documents on the table, and that they be printed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN denied that there was any thing in General Harrison's letter inconsistent with the course which Mr. CLAY and his friends had always pursued with respect to the compromise act. He went at much length into the subject.

Mr. CALHOUN replied with great animation.

An exciting debate arose, which occupied the attention of the Senate for upwards of two hours.

The petitions and papers were laid on the table, and the question of printing was referred to the Committee on Printing.

The Tariff.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, reported back to the Senate with numerous amendments, the tariff bill from the House; which was ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 21.

Bankrupt Law.

Mr. ROOSEVELT resumed his speech on the extension of the bankrupt law to banking incorporations. His object, he said, was to procure an expression of opinion from all sides of the House on this very important question—very important as to a leading interest of the country; and he proceeded to show why the extension of the bankrupt law was just and constitutional.

What, he asked, was the true character of the debtor corporation, under our institutions? As the stockholder was not made liable, what was the real liability? Why, if the bankrupt law were extended to these associations, in the exigency of its application, it would consist, in nine cases out of ten, of a body of promissory notes held by the corporation, against a number of individuals, consisting mainly of the officers and friends of the institution, or of the friends of its officers. And was there any thing in the constitution to exempt that class from liability? Why should the debtors to these institutions be permitted to roam at large, and defy any interference, while the debtors of individuals were to be held liable? He should think this consideration would satisfy the House that the law should be extended to these incorporations. But they had a duty to discharge, besides passing a bankrupt law. The constitution declared that Congress, and Congress only, should have the power—and the object could only be accomplished by the exercise of that power—to regulate the value of the money of the United States. How were they to do this? Were they to say that they could do it by affixing a uniform stamp on their issues? That doctrine might have done in the dark or middle ages, but it would not do now. Money meant every species of money—not merely gold, silver, and copper, but paper also. If, then, it was the duty of Congress to regulate money; was it not its duty to prevent the exercise of a power elsewhere, which, in effect, destroys the regulation of the standard of value, so far as its pecuniary value was concerned? Could it be supposed that the framers of the constitution, every line of which was pregnant with foresight, intended that they should be contented with a mere form of words? Could it be imagined that those wise men intended that there should be such a state of things as was now found to exist—one standard in one State, and a widely different one in another? and even a variation on the opposite sides of a river of from 1 to 50 per cent. in the value of the dollar, so called? No; they intended the power given to Congress to be carried out in some way or other.

JULY, 1842.]

Bankrupt Law.

[27TH CONG.]

He then proceeded to point out exercises of power under the constitution, which would justify the enactment which he advocated.

Mr. R. referred to another provision in the constitution which was violated by the irregularities of the banking system, and that was, that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts. The expansions and contractions of the circulating medium—contracts being made when the circulation was high, and enforced when it was low—operated as a perfect violation of that provision in the constitution. Mr. R. went on to show that Congress was not performing its duty when it neglected to provide against such a state of things; and that it was not (as bound to do by the constitution) regulating the value of the money of the United States, nor the commerce of the United States, while it suffered such disorders in the currency to prevail throughout the land. Mr. R. next went on to show the injurious effects that the expansions and contractions of the banks had on the manufacturing interests of the country, and that while the manufacturers were vainly seeking a remedy through a high tariff, the only way to cure the evil was to apply the bankrupt system to the banks, and thus put it out of their power to cause those fluctuations which have proved so injurious to the manufacturing interest.

Anxious to take the sense of the House on this question, he had prepared a resolution as a substitute for that of the Judiciary Committee, and he would now submit it to the House. He had submitted it to several members of both political parties, who now agreed with him in the propriety of subjecting moneyed corporations to the provisions of the bankrupt system; and he hoped that the question would be taken on it at once. Mr. R. then read the following resolution as a substitute, by way of amendment, to the resolution of the Judiciary Committee:

Resolved, That the report be recommitted, with instructions to the Committee on the Judiciary to prepare a bill, to take effect within a reasonable time from the passage of it into a law, containing a uniform system of bankruptcy, applicable to moneyed corporations, to be reported to Congress at its next session.

Mr. R., after a few more remarks, concluded by moving the previous question.

Mr. BARNARD moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. ROOSEVELT said that, as this would be a test question, he would call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were accordingly ordered; and, on taking the question, it resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Arnold, Babcock, Barnard, Bates, Black, Blair, Boardman, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Sampson H. Butler, William Butler, Calhoun, John Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, James Cooper, Cross, Deberry, Fillmore, Gamble, Gentry, Giddings, Gilmer, Granger, Houston, Howard, Joseph B. Ingersoll, James, Isaac D. Jones, John P. Kennedy, King, Lewis, Linn, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Moore, Morgan, Morrow, Osborne, Oriskany, Pope, Powell, Ramsay, Randall, Ridgway, Roche, W. Russell, J. M. Russell, Truman Smith, Alexander H. H. Stuart, Summers, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trumbull, Warren, Washington, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Christopher H. Williams, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—74.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landolf W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arrington, Atherton, Bidlack, Birdseye, Borden, Boyd, Brewster, Bronson, Aaron V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, William B. Campbell, Carey, Casey, Clifford, Mart A. Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Cushing, Garrett Davis, Richard D. Davis, Dean, Doan, Doig, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Egbert, Fessenden, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, A. L. Frazier, Gerry, Goggin, Patrick G. Goode, William O. Goode, Gordan, Graham, Gustine, Harris, Hays, Hopkins, Houck, Hudson, Charles J. Ingersoll, William W.

2d Sess.]

The Bankrupt Law.

[JULY, 1842.]

Irwin, Wm. Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, Keim, Littlefield, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, Samson Mason, Mathews, Medill, Miller, Mitchell, Morris, Newhard, Parmenter, Patridge, Pendleton, Plumer, Read, Reding, Rencher, Reynolds, Riggs, Rogers, Roosevelt, Sanford, Saunders, Shaw, Shepperd, Shilde, Snyder, Sprigg, Stanly, Steenrod, Stokeley, Sweney, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Turney, Van Buren, Wallace, Ward, Weller, James W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Wise—108.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The previous question on Mr. ROOSEVELT's motion having been seconded by the House, and the main question ordered—

The yeas and nays on the main question were called for by several, and ordered.

The SPEAKER said the main question would be on the adoption of the report and resolution of the Committee on the Judiciary, the previous question cutting off the instructions.

Mr. ARNOLD moved to lay the report and resolution on the table; which question was decided in the negative—yeas 77, nays 108.

Mr. FILLMORE hoped that one hour would be appropriated to the reception of reports from committees which would not cause debate.

After some opposition and debate, in which Messrs. W. C. JOHNSON, ARNOLD, and POPE took part, the suggestion was assented to, and committees were called on for reports.

Sugar Duty.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, a resolution reported by him from the Committee of Ways and Means was adopted, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain the quantity of saccharine matter in different kinds of sugar, with a view to the more proper adjustment of the duty thereon.

Cumberland Railroad.

Mr. F. also reported, from the Committee of Ways and Means, a bill "making an appropriation for the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and for certain harbors:" referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

General Appropriation Bill.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for such officers as were not provided for in the general appropriation bill; and also for certain incidental expenses of the departments: referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Foreign Exchange.

Mr. S. MASON, from the same committee, reported a bill, which had been passed by the Senate, fixing the value of the pound sterling. At his suggestion, the bill was now considered, and passed.

[It fixes the value of a pound at $4 84.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 28.

The Bankrupt Law.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring that it was inexpedient to include banks and other corporations within the operation of the general bankrupt law. The several motions to lay on the table, recommit, &c., having hitherto failed, the question now recurred upon the adoption of the resolution of the committee, declaring that it was inexpedient to include corporations within the operation of such a law. The House refused to adopt the resolution, by a vote of 53 to 118, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Babcock, Barnard, Barton, Botts, Sampson H. Butler, William Butler, Caruthers, Childs, Chittenden, Cross, Deberry, Everett, Thomas F. Foster, Gamble, Giddings, Goggin, Graham, Gustine, Houston, Hunter, James, King, Linn, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Meriwether, Morgan, Morrow, Osborne, Owaley, Payne, Pickens, Pope, Powell, Alexander Randall, Rhett, Ridgway, Rodney, Saltonstall, Truman Smith, John T. Stuart, Summers, Sumter, Taliaferro, Richard W. Thompson, Toland, Tomlinson, Trumbull, Warren, Joseph L. White, Christopher H. Williams, and Yorke—53.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Appleton, Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Baker, Bidlack, Birdseye, Black, Boardman, Borden, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Bronson, Aaron V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Casey, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, Clifford, Clinton, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Cushing, Daniel, Garrett Davis, Richard D. Davis, Dean, Doig, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Egbert, Fessenden, Fillmore, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Gentry, Gerry, Patrick G. Goode, Granger, Gwin, Hall, Halsted, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Hopkins, Houck, Charles J. Ingersoll, J. R. Ingersoll, W. W. Irwin, Cave Johnson, Keim, John P. Kennedy, Lane, Littlefield, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, Samson Mason, John T. Mason, Mathiot, Mathews, Miller, Mitchell, Morris, Newhard, Parmenter, Patridge, Pendleton, Plumer, Ramsay, Benjamin Randall, Read, Reding, Reynolds, Riggs, Roosevelt, James M. Russell, Sanford, Saunders, Shepperd, Snyder, Stanly, Steenrod, Stokeley, Sweney, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Turney, Underwood, Van Buren, Ward, Waterson, James W. Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—118.

Mr. ROOSEVELT said that the House having, in effect, decided that it was inexpedient to include corporations, he would move to recommit the report, with instructions to report a bill.

The SPEAKER decided the motion to be out of order.

After some conversation between Messrs. ARNOLD, BARNARD, ROOSEVELT, and the SPEAKER, on a question of order—

Mr. ROOSEVELT said he would move a reconsideration of the vote just taken, and explain the object he wished to attain. Some months since, the House passed a resolution, instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the expediency of including corporations in the operations of the bankrupt law. The committee reported it to be inexpedient. The House now decided to reject the report of the Judiciary Committee; and, in doing so, virtually declared that a bill should be brought in. He moved to reconsider the vote, in order that the committee might be instructed to bring in a bill; and called the previous question on the motion.

JULY, 1842.]

The present Tariff Laws.

[27TH CONG.]

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON suggested to his friend from New York (Mr. ROOSEVELT) to withdraw his motion to reconsider, and bring the question before the House on an appeal from the decision of the Chair, declaring it out of order to move a recommitment of the report, with instructions to bring in a bill.

Mr. ROOSEVELT having complied with this request, and appealed from the Speaker's decision—

Mr. STANLY, observing that he considered the whole effort but an electioneering movement, made a motion that the appeal be laid on the table.

This motion was carried—ayes 91, noes 52.

The Present Tariff Laws.

Mr. BARNARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, asked leave to make a report in answer to the resolution of the House, referring to that committee the circulars issued from the Treasury Department to collectors of the customs, in relation to the manner of collecting duties on imports. He desired that the report be laid on the table and printed, and moved the previous question on the motion.

He asked the House to receive the bill which he had been instructed to report from the Judiciary Committee, so that it could be printed. He sent the bill to the table, and it was read by the Clerk. It was entitled "A bill to supply a temporary defect or failure in the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports." The Clerk read the bill through, as follows:

1. That upon all goods and merchandise which have been imported into the United States since the 30th day of June last, or shall be imported between that day and the day when any act which may be passed at the present session of Congress, imposing duties on imports shall become a law, and go into operation, and which goods, wares, and merchandise, would have been subject to any duty upon their importation, by laws then existing, if they had been imported at any time between the 1st and 30th day of June last, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on such as would have been subject by such laws, to a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem, or more, a duty or tax of 20 per cent. ad valorem; and on such as would have been subject, by such laws, to a duty of less than 20 per cent. ad valorem, a duty or tax in every case equal to the duty to which they would have been subject by such laws.

2. That all laws existing and in force on the 1st day of June, imposing duties on imports, and providing for the collection of such duties, and all provisions in such laws, or any of them, in regard to the payment of duties in cash, or the allowance of credits in regard to the keeping of goods in public stores, in regard to appraisements, and the duty of appraisers, collectors, and other officers, in regard to discriminations, in regard to drawbacks, in regard to pains, penalties, and forfeitures, and in regard to all other matters and things embraced in such laws and provisions, shall, so far as the same are or may be applicable, and can be applied to this act, as an act for imposing and collecting a duty, or tax, on imported goods, wares, and merchandise, be deemed, and taken to be, and shall be in force for the collection of the duty or tax imposed by this act, as fully and effectually as if every regulation, restriction, penalty, forfeiture, provision, clause, matter, and thing in the laws aforesaid, were inserted in, and re-enacted by, this act; but the same shall not be deemed to be revived and in force, by any thing in this act contained, for any other purpose, and to any other effect whatever.

3. That in all cases of goods, wares, and merchandise, on which a duty or tax is imposed by this act, and upon which, on their importation, duties have been or shall be paid, under laws supposed to be in force for the imposition and collection of duties as imports, since the 30th of June last, and which payments of duties have been or shall be made under protest, it shall be lawful for the respective collectors, or other officers of the customs having to do matter in charge, (retaining so much of such duties paid as aforesaid under protest, as will satisfy the duty or tax imposed by this act,) to remit and pay over the excess, if any, to the person or persons claiming and entitled thereto.

Mr. BARNARD moved the reference of the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON thought it would be better to pass the bill immediately, unless some gentleman desired to debate it. He, therefore, moved the engrossment of the bill.

The SPEAKER informed the gentleman from Tennessee that, being an appropriation bill, or a bill levying taxes, it must necessarily go to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON suggested that it was a bill to legalize duties already levied.

The House then referred the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ADAMS asked if the report would be printed with the bill.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said, if it was but the report of a minority of the committee, he should object.

Mr. SAUNDERS begged to make an explanatory statement; and, having done so, he was followed by Messrs. ROOSEVELT, BARNARD, and MAXWELL, who stated the position in which the matter stood in the standing committee which appeared to be this: The committee consists of nine members, a majority of whom Mr. SAUNDERS understood to be opposed to the conclusions, at least, of the report; but the meeting which adopted the report consisted of six members only, a majority of whom (though a minority of the committee) gave it their sanction; and thus the chairman was justified in making the report.

2d Sess.]

Enlistments (Black and White) and the Hooe Case.

[JULY, 1842.]

The previous question, which Mr. BARNARD had moved, was then sustained by the House; and the printing was ordered by yeas and nays, by a majority of 93 to 64.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, July 25.

The Tariff Bill.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the special order was taken up, which was the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the House bill No. 472, "to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes."

Mr. E., leaving the details of the bill and the amendments for discussion as they should come up in their order, proceeded with an exposition of the general principles and necessity for the measure.

Mr. E. spoke for more than two hours; and, in the course of his remarks, dwelt particularly on the exigencies of the Government, the exhausted state of the treasury, the requirement of from twenty-six to twenty-seven millions of dollars to meet the ordinary and extraordinary expenditures, and the impracticability of meeting the demand in any other way but by a revenue from customs. He insisted that, from the beginning of this Government under the present constitution, commerce has uniformly met those demands, and was now as well able to meet them as at any former period. The customs, he maintained, had for the last half century done more than this. That branch of revenue had met the expenditures, and redeemed the country from debt. He went into details in proof of this; and, estimating the increased consumption of increased population, he treated as unfounded all apprehensions that the dutiable imports were not perfectly competent to bear a revenue of twenty-six or twenty-seven millions of dollars. He contrasted the plans proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Representatives, and the Finance Committee of the Senate; and showed that, although they differed in many respects as to details, they all came nearly to the same conclusion, that it was practicable to raise between twenty-six and twenty-seven millions, without trenching on the disputed ground of protection, for the sake of protection. He admitted there was a great difficulty, in making discrimination, in ascertaining the precise point where incidental protection changes into direct protection; but he believed the present bill, as proposed to be amended by the Finance Committee, would keep that point more steadily in view than any other plan which could be matured at this late period of the session; and would, in no material instance, depart from the general principle of revenue for the sake of revenue, with such protection only as that object would sanction in a wise discrimination.

The demands of the year will be from twenty-six to twenty-seven millions of dollars. The receipts it was impossible to estimate, with any degree of precision. The customs, during the first half of the year, were scarcely eight millions; and, for various reasons, it might be doubted if they would be more for the second half, unless this bill was speedily passed. The passage of this bill would, however, remove all doubts of the Government being sustained, and the public credit maintained. The reliance on its adoption had already restored confidence, as evinced in the improved rates of treasury notes and Government stock. Once the bill became a law, there would be no difficulty in obtaining whatever loan the present demands on the treasury might require, or the growing exigencies (till the revenue came in) might call for.

He defended the clause repealing the proviso of the distribution act, which restores to the treasury the land fund in the event of duties exceeding 20 per cent.; and contended that the shock which the withholding of that fund from the States would give to the State credits directly, would be felt indirectly by the General Government with equal severity. The increased embarrassments of the States would be reflected on the General Government, which could much better spare that fund than the States could do without it. It was not, however, a subject, the discussion of which he wished to anticipate, or which he felt any disposition to enter upon at all; believing that it was so fully understood by the whole country, that to argue further upon it was a mere waste of time.

Mr. ARCHER suggested that, as the first amendment which proposed a reduction of from five cents to three and a half cents on bagging, was one in which the Senators from Kentucky, not now in their places, felt some interest; and as the hour was too late to proceed with any general discussion, it would be best to postpone the further consideration of the bill till to-morrow, and take up the navy appropriation bill with the House amendments, awaiting the decision of the Senate.

It was then agreed to postpone the further consideration of the bill till to-morrow.

FRIDAY, July 29.

Enlistments (Black and White) and the Hooe Case.

The bill to regulate enlistments in the naval service of the United States came up in its order, as in Committee of the Whole, on amendments from the Committee on Naval Affairs, including enlistments in the marine corps. The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CALHOUN said, if he heard the bill correctly read, it allowed of the enlistment of all free persons, without distinction of color. He asked the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) whether it was intended to allow of the enlistment of free negroes and mulattoes?

JULY, 1842.]

Enlistments (Black and White) and the Hooe Case.

[27TH CONG.]

Mr. BAYARD replied, that the bill was not intended to encourage the enlistment of such as the Senator from South Carolina alluded to. It left the laws in that respect as they now stood—that is, left the discretion to the proper department. He presumed that the Government were not going to order the enlistment of negroes.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked, that the Senators would all remember the celebrated case of Hooe, about which so much noise was made in the midst of the last Presidential campaign. A favorable opportunity was now offered to correct the evil of enlisting negroes and mulattoes in the service of the United States. He asked the chairman on Naval Affairs to amend the bill, so as to except negroes and mulattoes from enlistment, save for the purposes of cooks, servants, and stewards. He hoped the bill would be so altered as to read "free white men," except for the objects indicated.

Mr. BAYARD suggested that the Senator from South Carolina would accomplish the purpose he desired, by moving his amendment in the form indicated by him. He (Mr. B.) did not wish to be understood as accepting the amendment. He, however, desired that a vote of the Senate be taken upon it.

Mr. CALHOUN moved an amendment to the effect that white men only should be enlisted, except for cooks, servants, and stewards, for which offices negroes or mulattoes might be employed. He demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment, which were ordered.

Mr. C. said they would all remember the Hooe case. From what transpired with reference to that case, the fact was obvious that it was wrong to bring negroes into the service of the United States, and place them in contact with the white man. It was wrong to bring those who had to sustain the honor and glory of the country down to the footing of the negro race—to be degraded by being mingled and mixed up with that inferior race.

Mr. BAYARD said the case of Hooe, which the Senator alluded to, was a case of testimony altogether, which the department had full power to regulate; or it might be regulated by statute, if necessary. He would only say that, during the Revolutionary war, there were several in the service of the country, who served with great advantage to it, and proved themselves to be excellent seamen, and brave and gallant men.

He was not, therefore, disposed to introduce an exception, which would deprive the Government of the service of these men, if it should be deemed hereafter necessary. So far as the Hooe case was concerned, he would repeat, that it was simply a case of admissibility of testimony, which the regulations of the department could reach, or which might be regulated by statute.

Mr. CALHOUN said there was a deep prejudice in every part of the Union, and in the South particularly, which makes a discrimination and distinction between the two races, and which ought to be respected. He was understood to say that the Southern States had long since taken measures to prevent the introduction of negroes into the sea service. He spoke of the delicate interests of the South with reference to this question, and of the circumstances which had transpired growing out of the policy of Great Britain, which rendered the exclusion of negroes from the service as one of the utmost importance. And, although he was willing to admit that we have had in the service good black sailors, yet it was of more importance to respect the feelings of the white sailors, and to prevent their degradation, than to retain those negroes, however well qualified to perform marine service. At all events, some respect ought to be had to a great portion of the Union, which was extremely sensitive upon the subject.

Mr. TAPPAN could see no reason for adopting the amendment. He was not aware that the employment of negroes in the public service had ever proved injurious to it. Then, why not leave the matter as it had stood heretofore? He saw no necessity for a change of the law in this respect. But, on the other hand, much injury might result to the service. It might be impossible to man our vessels of war in sudden emergencies, or in some peculiar cases, unless officers were allowed the discretion to employ negroes or mulattoes. Our national vessels might be in a portion of the country where white seamen could not be procured, and necessity might require the employment of black. But he conceived, if the law was left as it now stood, that negroes and mulattoes would not be engaged if it could be avoided. No evil had resulted so far, and no evil was likely to result.

Mr. PHILIPS had his fears that the incorporation of the amendment in the bill might prove detrimental to the public service. During the late war, the class now proposed to be excluded from the navy had proved to be of great service. He would mention one instance. In 1814, when McDonough fitted out the fleet on Lake Champlain, he found it extremely difficult to procure white seamen; and, on the occasion of his splendid victory, the greater portion of the sailors under his command were black. If a war should again occur, it would be doubtless necessary, in fitting out our fleets, to resort to the course pursued at that time, in this particular; and he had no sort of doubt that the result of the action on the lakes would have been entirely different from what it was, if the employment of a motley and speckled crew had been prohibited. We were indebted for this victory to the practice of introducing negroes on board of our armed ships. He thought that, if the amendment should prevail, it would injure the service, without inducing a corresponding benefit. It was doubtless true that the department would prefer white men; but, if they could not be procured, he could see no reason why the practice of the Government, as it had been from the beginning, should not be continued; and he saw no reason why the service should suffer from the prejudices of a portion of the people of our country. If there should be any difficulty as to the competency of the colored sailors for witnesses, it would be a subject to be settled by the department, or by Congress; and it had no connection whatever with the amendment now before the Senate.

2d Sess.]

The Tariff Bill.

[JULY, 1842.]

Mr. CALHOUN was understood to say that the introduction of blacks into the service might have occasioned an indisposition on the part of white sailors (who felt themselves degraded by an association with negroes) to enter the service, both during the war and at the present time. The very reason given, then, for their employment—the scarcity of white sailors—might have occasioned the necessity for it. It was the natural consequence. He said that, in some portions of the country, negroes were excluded from employment,—white labor being preferred; and, should nothing be done to prevent the blacks from entering the navy, they would seek that kind of employment: and thus would you throw upon the negro race the protection of the national rights and the defence of the national honor. He did hope that so important an arm of the national service would not only be placed in the keeping of freemen, but those bearing our own complexion—having the glory, and honor, and interests of the country at heart.

Mr. AROHER remarked that it appeared to him that this was a small matter; and he trusted that it would not be magnified into a great one. A small number of blacks only would be excluded by the amendment; and, for that reason, as well as with a view to indulge the Senator from South Carolina, he would give to it his support.

Mr. BENTON would only say that arms, whether on land or water, ought to be borne by the white race only. This was the first time he ever heard that the black race carried arms. He was opposed to it, and was decidedly in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN.)

Mr. YOUNG said this was a question whether or not they would introduce into the navy, as a part of the material of the navy, negroes and colored persons.

The amendment of Mr. CALHOUN prohibiting the enlistment of negroes in the naval and marine service, except as servants, stewards, and cooks, was adopted on yeas and nays, by the following vote, viz:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bagby, Barrow, Bayard, Benton, Berrien, Calhoun, Conrad, Cuthbert, Fulton, Graham, King, Linn, Mangum, Preston, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Walker, Wilcox, Woodbury, and Young—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bates, Choate, Clayton, Crafts, Dayton, Evans, Miller, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tappan, White, Williams, and Woodbridge—16.

VOL. XIV.—80

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendments of the Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. PRESTON moved an amendment prohibiting the enlistment of negroes in the army; which was agreed to.

SATURDAY, July 30.

The Tariff Bill.

Mr. EVANS having called for the resumption of the unfinished business of yesterday—

The bill "to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes," was taken up, as in Committee of the Whole; the question pending being on Mr. CALHOUN's modified amendment to the Finance Committee's amendment, which was to change the duty on cotton-bagging from 5 cents to 3½ cents per square yard; Mr. CALHOUN's first proposition being to substitute 2 cents for 8½, but modified subsequently to a proposition to make the duty on cotton-bagging, or other imported substitute, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. SEVIER said much had been said about protection. The whole of this bill, from beginning to end, was a bill for protection; and revenue was but a secondary object. A great number of articles included in the bill were taxed to prohibition; and this bagging was one of them. In regard to protection, he (Mr. S.) had but one word to say. He abominated the principle in any shape—he cared not whether it were called direct or incidental. What did they mean by incidental protection? If it were that protection which was derived from taxes laid for revenue, be it so; but he was averse to it, even in this shape. He was opposed to protection, either direct or indirect, considered as protection per se. He was averse to being taxed for the benefit of his neighbors. It was not right. It was not according to the command which says, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's goods." There was no honesty in it. It was taking from the pockets of one, to put into the pockets of another. They might just as well take what he had by force, as by this particular legislation.

This being a bill, then, for protection as he conceived, and not for revenue, he could not give it his support.

Mr. BENTON would avail himself of the present motion, to state the principles on which he should give his vote on the different items in the bill. He was for a revenue tariff; for the Government needed revenue, and must have it. But in raising the revenue which the Government needed, he would discriminate between luxuries and necessities—between articles made, or not made, at home; and would so distribute the imposition of duties, as to afford incidental protection to home industry. This industry divides itself into three great branches: agriculture, manufactures, and commerce.

These branches of industry rank in relative importance, in the order named. Agriculture, which furnishes the means of subsistence to man and to beast, ranks first. Manufactures, which fashion and prepare the products of agriculture and crude materials for the use of man, stands second. And commerce, which exchanges the superfluities of nations, and promotes civilization, stands third. They are all three great interests; but they have their relative and their degrees of importance; and, in extending the incidental protection which the levy of needful revenue would confer, he would be governed by their relative importance, and would go highest for that which was most important. He would go highest for the agricultural interest; that is to say, would lay the highest revenue duty on the foreign imports which came into competition with the products of our own agriculture. Now, what was a revenue duty? This was a question of some latitude, and susceptible of various answers, if answered in the abstract;—but very simple, if confined to facts. The answer to the question only requires two points to be established, namely: the amount of revenue required, and the amount of the dutiable articles which are to raise it. These points established, and the rate of duty results of itself; and, in the present case, would give us an average duty of about 80 per cent. on the value. The amount of revenue needed for the Government is stated by the committees at about twenty-seven millions—not the thirteen millions mentioned before the election. The amount of dutiable articles, after deducting re-exportsations and free articles, is estimated at about ninety millions. Thirty per cent. on this amount would give twenty-seven millions—the amount required; and the whole to be taken from the customs, if the lands are not restored to their destination. If the lands are restored, the rate of the duty will be less. Mr. B. would still hope to see the land revenue restored, and the rate of duty proportionably reduced; but, for the present, he would follow the committees, and assume about 80 per centum to be the rate of duty which the wants of the treasury required. This was the average: the actual duty would be above that rate in some instances—below it in others. The bill before the Senate rose as high as 100 or 200 per centum on some articles. He (Mr. B.) could not admit such duties to be revenue duties. He could not conceive of a revenue duty, the maximum of which should exceed, or materially exceed, 80 per centum. Thirty-three and a third was the one-third part of the cost of the article; and a tax of one-third must be admitted to be a high tax. Above that, the duty might defeat its own object, by diminishing consumption, or inducing smuggling. Thirty-three and a third per centum, he would then assume as a maximum revenue duty, and as high as he could go in any case. These were his principles; and now for the application. The article in question is an agricultural article; it classes with agricultural articles, and belongs to the agricultural interest; for though the bagging and the rope pass through a factory, yet the factory and the hemp-field are side by side; and the factory works exclusively in the domestic hemp. It is not a case of some of those manufactures which are called domestic, while they work up a foreign material—foreign wool, or hides for example, washed with foreign soap, greased with foreign oil, dyed with foreign ingredients, and worked by foreign hands, (in some instances) and yet called domestic. The cotton-bag and rope-factory is not of that kind. It is all American; and though the factories may be few, yet the farmers who supply them with hemp are numerous; it is therefore an agricultural interest: and in his view entitled to the highest incidental protection which is consistent with a revenue duty. Scotch bagging is its foreign rival; and if this duty was upon the value, he would say at once, let it be 33½ per cent. But it is not on the value, but on the yard; and here some difficulty arises. How many cents per yard will be the equivalent of 33½? and the answer to this question requires us to know the cost of the foreign article. Here, as a matter of course, we have different prices quoted, and truly; for the same article must have different prices in different years, and even in the same year, under different circumstances. The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) quotes a purchase made by an importing merchant of the South in 1841, at 4 and 5 pence sterling. This is equivalent to 8 and 10 cents. On the other hand, the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CORTRENDEN) gives us quotations for ten years; and they are from 6½ pence to 7½ pence; that is to say, from 12½ to 15 cents. Both quotations are authentic; but that of the Senator from Kentucky must predominate; for he gives the prices for a series of years, while the Senator from South Carolina only gives the price in the case of a single purchase. About 18 or 14 cents may then be assumed as the average, or usual cost of the article in Dundee and Inverness, whence it comes. Thirty-three and a third per centum would be very near 3 cents on the yard, if the running and finished yard were the same. But the yard for duty is the square yard; and this is 4, or 6, or 8 inches narrower than the other. Then a duty of 6 cents gives more than 33½ per centum on the value; and, without pretending to precise accuracy, it is clear that 3½ cents—the duty proposed in the amendment—comes nearest to the duty desired. It is a case in which precision is unattainable—in which, in fact, what was the precise equivalent at one time would not be so at another; and believing 3½ cents on the square yard to be near about—to be as near as well could be attained—to the 33½ per centum on the value, he should vote for it. Mr. B. said that revenue was his object, and protection the incident. He had shown the principle on which he arrived at an average of 80 per

2d Sess.]

The Tariff Bill.

[August, 1842.]

centum as necessary for revenue, and shown that there were cases in which he would go a little above it. He had now to take another view of it, and to show the amount of the incidental protection which it would afford. And here he had to appear paradoxical! for he would say that a revenue duty of 80 per cent. on the value of the imported article, was a protection of 60 per cent. on the home-made article! He supported this proposition by showing that, without any duty upon it, there was a charge of 80 per cent upon the foreign cost, before it could leave the importer's hands. This amount was thus made up: costs and expenses of importation $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; importer's profit, $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; cash payments and home valuations, 10 per cent. This was 80 per cent. added to the foreign cost, without duty, and before it leaves the importer's hands. It was, therefore, an addition of that amount to the cost of the article, and, consequently, a protection to that amount to the home-made article. Add the duty to this, and it is 60 per cent. protection. It was a great protection—enough for any interest—as much as the community should bear—as much as a wise policy should demand. Make it higher, and the duty will be a bone of contention, and the sport of political conflicts, until it is reduced, or broken down. Get a prohibitory duty, or a high direct protective duty, and you only bring on a contest in which right and strength will eventually prevail—the right of the mass to pay no more than the wants of the Government require; the strength of the millions who consume, and who, in the long run, will defeat the units who tax for inordinate profit. A revenue duty rising as high as $88\frac{1}{2}$ per centum on some articles, less on others, with the expenses of importation, and the importer's profits, is a great protection; and wise manufacturers should be contented with it, and withdraw their interests from the field of politics, and avoid the fate of political parties. Mr. B. intended these remarks to be general, and to explain the principles on which he should give all his votes in the progress of this bill.

Mr. BATES said there was one point that ought, at this stage of the debate, to be better understood than it seemed to be at present; and that is, what constitutes a revenue bill. The Senator from Mississippi says the duty of 5 cents on cotton-bagging will check or prevent the importation of it, and therefore that this duty is not for revenue, but for protection. The Senator from New Hampshire says that a much less general average of duty than this bill provides will produce more revenue, and therefore the bill is a bill for protection, and not for revenue. The Senator from South Carolina maintains that 20 per cent. is the true revenue standard. Now, with all deference, he said it seemed to him that this is taking a narrow view of the subject—the view which a mere tenant at will, or sufferance, or for a year only, would take, who only looked to see how much he could gather up and carry off from a plantation or farm during his brief possession of it, without any regard to its future condition or permanent improvement.

The Secretary of the Treasury—whose province it is, and in whom I have full confidence—sits down to devise the ways and means of carrying on the Government—not as a politician, but as a wise statesman; not during his official term merely, but for the permanent supplies of the treasury. He will come to the conclusion that the supplies ought to be derived from the customs—for this all-sufficient reason, among others: that about one-half the duties, in such case, will be paid by foreign producers, in return for what we have been obliged to pay, in the same way, as the tobacco-planters, wheat-growers, &c., can abundantly satisfy him.

In the next place, he will see that the customs must depend upon the imports, and the imports upon the ability of the people to pay. A nation, in the long run, can only import what it pays for; and what it can pay for, it will import. This is the only limit to consumption. The tendency of nations is uniformly, as it is of individuals in their expenditures, to go to the extent of their means—often beyond.

MONDAY, August 1.

The Tariff Bill.

The bill "to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes," was taken up, as in Committee of the Whole; the question pending being on Mr. BUCHANAN's motion of Saturday, to strike out the twenty-seventh section of the bill, which reads as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the proviso to the sixth section of the act entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights," approved September 4th, 1841, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. BUCHANAN said it was not his purpose to enter into the general discussion upon this interminable tariff question. He had frequently, on former occasions, had the opportunity of presenting his general views upon that subject to the Senate; and he should, therefore, waive all argument upon that topic, and proceed, as he had promised, very briefly to urge such considerations as he thought should induce the Senate to vote in favor of the amendment which he had proposed. The land distribution bill of September 4, 1841, enjoined the principle that, if duties should at any time be imposed on imports exceeding 20 per cent. ad valorem, the distribution of the land fund among the States should be suspended. The proposition contained in the twenty-seventh section of this bill was, that the distribution of the land fund should be continued, notwithstanding the interests of the country imperatively required that duties should be imposed exceeding 20 per cent. And the simple question, therefore, arising upon his amendment, was, whether it was wise and politic to distribute the land fund, and, at the same time, impose these additional duties on imports. He would appeal most solemnly to the Senate to say, whether it was wise and proper that the treasury should continue in a state of insolvency; that the great domestic interests of the country should continue without that incidental protection which a revenue bill would afford; and this, for the sake of retaining this miserable land bill. That was the question, and the only question.

He understood that the whole sum distributable of the public land fund, for the first half of this year, was but $380,000; the share of Pennsylvania, then, would be about $38,000, and no more. And for the sake of this comparatively miserable pittance, were they going to continue the treasury in a state of bankruptcy, and to deprive all the domestic interests of the country of that incidental protection which a reasonable tariff would afford? He put it in the alternative, because he was justified in placing the question in that position. He was the last man in this country who would agree to legislate with a view to accommodate the opinions of the executive officer of the Government, no matter how well known they might be; but this was not the case here. The present President of the United States had declared, in a solemn and official form, that he would not, under any circumstances, approve a bill which raised the duties on imports above 20 per cent., and at the same time continued the distribution of the public lands.

The CHAIR considered it out of order to allude, in debate, to what the opinions of the Executive were.

The Treasury (said Mr. B.) is insolvent; and shall we suffer the national faith to be violated, for the purpose of retaining that clause relating to, and preserving the existence of, the land bill? The present income of the country was about one-half of the expenditure; and, in addition to that, they were indebted between twenty and thirty millions of dollars. If, then, the slightest suspicion could rest upon the question, ought they not to abandon the clause at once, and permit the land fund to return to the common treasury? What would be thought of an individual who acted in the manner in which this Government seemed disposed to act? Suppose a private individual were indebted twenty millions, and, having an income sufficient only to pay one-half of his expenditure, should refuse to accept an income, unless he were permitted to give away that which was justly due to his creditors: he would undoubtedly be deserving of the severest censure. And ought not this great country whose character is beyond all price—a country, the first in the world which had paid off a large national debt—to hold the preservation of her national faith of far greater consequence than the relinquishment of a pitiful sum derived from the public lands? That was the question.

Again: he would say a single word on the subject of domestic manufactures. He was in favor, most decidedly, of affording them incidental protection to the full amount, and no more, which would enable them to stand a fair competition with similar establishments in Europe. The manufacturing establishments in this country, erected at vast expense, affording employment to a great number of individuals, ought not to be suffered to go down. Every one must perceive that the increased demand, consequent upon such a procedure, would materially enhance the price of the goods, and would be as injurious to the consumer as to the manufacturer.

The return of the land fund, however, was absolutely requisite, in order to prevent a resort to direct taxation. The time would come—and he would undertake to say it was not far distant—when they would not be able to raise from imports all that was desired—at least, upon articles that did not receive incidental protection. And then what would be the condition of the manufacturers? When that time came, the contest would be between incidental protection and direct taxation. The hour would then arrive when the manufactures of the country must be prostrated; because, he would undertake to say, the idea of direct taxation could never be realized in practice in this country. The people of this country would never submit to the visits of the exciseman, sent to inquire into their private affairs, in order to raise taxes to support the Government, in a time of profound peace.

The time had been, he knew when the manufacturers desired the distribution of the land fund for the express purpose of compelling the Government to raise more revenue, that there might be more protection. That desire might exist with some of them, for aught he knew, at present; but the period when such a desire was general had passed away, and a new era was approaching. The land fund was a secure fund in peace and in war; at any time, and under all circumstances, they could borrow, if necessary, $50,000,000 upon the pledge of the public lands, in order to meet any sudden emergency. And why, then, should the manufacturing interests, and those Senators who were interested in their favor, cling with the grasp of death to the distribution?

He trusted he had never attempted to play the demagogue on that floor; nor could he, he trusted, by any possibility, be brought to do so now. He would say this, however: if you restore the land fund, you may take the tax off tea and coffee; whereas, if the land fund continues to go to the States, you must impose a tax upon tea and coffee. The inference was irresistible—one or the other must be done. He (Mr. BUCHANAN) had procured a return, last fall, of the tea and coffee imported during the year 1840. It amounted to $11,875,869 worth. In the year 1839, it was $10,788,509. It was fair to infer, then, that the tax upon tea and coffee would amount to two millions and a quarter of dollars. The land fund, if we should be prosperous, a year or two hence, it was supposed would amount to about three millions. Now, (continued Mr. B.) if you will withhold the land fund from the States, we will take off this tax of two millions and a quarter from the people of this country; and the question must inevitably be decided between the one alternative and the other. Strike out the twenty-seventh section of this bill, and I shall immediately move to make tea and coffee free articles.

2d Sess.]

The Tariff Bill.

[August, 1842.]

Let us examine the matter for a single moment. Though not an old man, I can remember the time when those were considered articles of luxury. But now their use is universal; every man, woman, and child uses them: the poorest man in the country uses as much as the rich—ay, more, perhaps; or, being deprived of luxuries more expensive, he indulges the more in those within his reach. There is no article that you can conceive of, except bread, the tax upon which will operate so much like a poll-tax, as the articles of tea and coffee. The cottager in Indiana uses as much coffee as John Jacob Astor, the richest capitalist in America, and consequently pays as much duty upon that article as is paid by the wealthiest; and, therefore, I say that tax is more like a poll-tax than any other. Well, now, if this tax could be restored—(and let me be understood on this, as well as all other subjects; call it a tax, because we cannot produce this article, or any thing similar to it; if we could, admit the effect would be, as in all cases, to reduce the price;—) we cannot, by any protection, make the article one of home production. And what is the effect of this? The land and goes to the States in their sovereign capacity, to relieve the capitalist from taxation, to relieve the property-holders from direct taxation, for the support of the State Government. And to enable you to make this distribution, you levy a poll-tax upon the whole country. As regards the article of sugar, the case is different. It is as much a necessary of life as tea or coffee; but we have a large interest in its manufacture in Louisiana—an interest which I would never abandon, because it is connected with agriculture. We must, however, levy a duty on sugar, or else we must destroy its culture. But there is no such reason for laying a duty upon tea and coffee; there is no reason that can be imagined, which is not in favor of relieving tea and coffee from taxation, provided we can do it, and that the interests of the country be not hazarded by a deficiency of revenue. I would do it, without a moment's hesitation. But if you retain the land fund for the benefit of the States, it will be impossible for you to remove this burden from the people.

Under these circumstances, I appeal to gentlemen to relinquish that fund; it may not be necessary to do so for any great length of time. Let gentlemen wait for a short time, and they may afterwards take the land fund, after having relieved the country from its embarrassed and impoverished condition.

Mr. CHITTENDEN observed, that he was sure the Senator from Pennsylvania had not been influenced by any demagogical motive to allude to the taxation of tea and coffee. He supposed he had taken these articles for illustration, and was persuaded, if they were not proposed to be taxed in this bill, the Senator would find other articles to be taxed for his illustrations; and could thus go through them all, till nothing was left for revenue. Such would be the effect of pursuing this line of argument. It might be said of any article of general consumption as well as tea and coffee—give up distribution, and to that extent you save the necessity of taxing articles of consumption.

If the Senator contends that this bill ought to be fashioned exactly to meet the Executive wishes expressed in his veto of the little tariff bill, it amounts to this: that the object of legislation is to look to—is to conform to Executive dictation, to secure his sanction of legislative action.

If this land fund is as paltry as the Senator says it is, why does he hold on to it so tenaciously for revenue, when, in doing so, he endangers the resources of the treasury, the honor of the country, and the credit and stability of the Government? He asks why do the friends of distribution hold on to it: they ask him, in their turn, why does he, and why do his friends, hang on to it with such desperate tenacity? As it is such a "petty, paltry fund," is it worth while to disappoint the hopes and expectations of so large a majority of the States and the people, who look to it not so much for the amount, as for the establishment of a great principle for which they have so long contended?

But the true question at issue was, whether the right of taxation should remain with the representative body, or be entirely controlled by the Executive. It was a question between national legislative will, and the will of one man.

If the Senator is so averse to the defeat of this great measure of revenue, to redound so much to the honor and credit of the Government, and to affect so beneficially the industry and prosperity of the country, why does he hold on so tenaciously to this "petty fund," and take up the Executive veto on the little tariff bill, to incite and invite the defeat of this measure also?

Mr. TALLMADGE observed that the principle now recognized by all was, that such a revenue bill should be passed as would give an amount of income necessary to an economical administration of the Government, and, at the same time, afford incidental protection to the industry of the country.

As to the question at issue—that of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands—his sentiments heretofore were well known; and he should only now say, that his opinions had undergone no change.

He believed the only measure of the last session which had been so carried out as to give relief to the country, was the bankrupt law.

Now, it was urged that this revenue bill, in its present form, cannot become a law. He would say that no intimation of what may be the action of another branch of the Government should ever have any effect on him. Gentlemen had taken up the veto on the little tariff bill, and inferred from it that this bill is to share the same fate as that temporary measure. He inferred no such thing. Suppose any former President—General Washington, for instance—had thought fit to veto a bill; and suppose another bill of immensely superior consequence, and involving vastly more important interests, were to be sent to him; and suppose it contained no constitutional impediment: would not General Washington say, Let the will of the people take effect, and this bill become a law?

What is the great objection to the 27th section, as now introduced into this revenue bill? Gentlemen say it violates the compromise act. But was it not contemplated, at the time the compromise act was on its passage, that the proceeds of the public lands were to be no part of the revenue of the Government? Had not the land bill then passed both Houses of Congress, and been sent to the Executive for sanction—a bill taking the land fund from the treasury, and giving it to the States?

The Senator from Pennsylvania asks, Why stand upon this miserable pittance, and, by doing so, defeat the bill? But did not the gentlemen opposite adhere to the gratuity of lands to the new States? Was it not the understanding that it was part of the compact that the old States were to receive their portion of the distribution? The right to the 500,000 acres to each new State, which was in part the consideration for this distribution, is now to be considered a vested right, while the right of the old States to the distribution is to be violated.

If this revenue bill—this distribution—and some measure to regulate the currency, could be passed, the prosperity of the country might be looked to with certainty.

Mr. ABERNETHY, having given full expression to his opinions as to the measure of distribution, last session, should not now go at large into the subject. It was, however, necessary to say something in reference to the vote which he should now feel bound to give.

He had seen an open attempt made on the part of the Executive to defeat legislative action, by putting a veto on a question of the most mature and deliberate legislation, on a ground which the President himself admits is a mere question of expediency.

There had been four great Whig measures of public interest passed by Congress in this Administration, and the Executive had vetoed three of them.

Upon a mere question of expediency, to veto a revenue bill like this would be a stretch of Executive power never attempted by the most arbitrary princes of that country upon whose institutions those of this country had been modelled. Never, in the mother country, had an instance been known of a bill of supply being vetoed—not even by the Tudors.

He would say, if the alternative were put, let this Government go into dissolution, sooner than he would, by his act, suffer any individual to put a bridle upon the legislative body, and, by a motion of the finger, control the action of the whole Government.

If there were men of any party ready to succumb to such dictation, and to go home made by their own act slaves, he would not be found among such men. If it was necessary, he would not only say perish commerce, perish credit, but let the Government fall to pieces, and the Union be dissolved, sooner than he should sanction, by his act, any measure which would abrogate the independence of the people's representatives.

Mr. LINN said, the gentlemen themselves acknowledge that they have placed the Government in the midst of a revolution. It is falling to pieces in their hands. Its credit at home and abroad is destroyed. The treasury is bankrupt. The country is disgraced by their incapacity; and now they threaten, as a necessary consequence of their own folly, the breaking up of the Government, and the dissolution of the Union. And all this is to happen because their own President will not let them invade the constitution, and violate the plighted faith of a solemn compact. The gentlemen shall have no excuse for leaving the Government to perish for want of sustenance and support. If they break up Congress, and go home, without doing their duty, they must take the responsibility on themselves. He now gave them warning that he and his friends were ready to sit in their places, day in and day out, night in and night out, on both day and night, till all necessary, wholesome, and constitutional measures were adopted for the rescue of the Government from the degradation into which the gentlemen had plunged it. He and his friends would not consent to adjourn while the Government was in such a condition. If the gentlemen chose to do it, they must take the responsibility.

Mr. WALKER said he deplored the sentiments which had been expressed by gentlemen on the other side. Had it come to this, that the Government must be left destitute of means, because a portion of the two Houses of Congress conflict in their opinions with the President, in relation to a party measure? He hoped the honorable Senator, who had made such declarations to-day, would sleep upon what he had said—think on them, and present them to his patriotic feelings—think of his bleeding country,—ere he resolved to carry out his measures.

2d Sess.]

The Tariff Bill.

[August, 1842.]

The Senator from Virginia (Mr. ARCHER) had said that this act of the President would have brought an English monarch to the block; and that there was no instance in the history of that Government of a veto upon a bill of supplies. What was this bill? Not a bill of supplies, but a bill to withhold supplies—to withhold the legitimate revenue of the Government, (the land fund,) which even the Senator (Mr. ARCHER) admits ought to go into the treasury. He concluded by expressing the hope that Senators on the other side would reconsider the determinations they had expressed in relation to this measure, and not permit the country to be ruined because of their differences with Mr. Tyler.

Mr. BAGBY then obtained the floor, but gave way to

Mr. SKYLER, on whose motion the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, August 2.

The Tariff Bill.

The bill "to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes," was taken up, as in Committee of the Whole; the question pending being on Mr. BUCHANAN'S motion.

Mr. BAGBY said he should endeavor to show that there existed no difference between the power to distribute the proceeds of the public lands, and the power to distribute any other revenue from the public treasury; in fact, that no difference existed between this measure of distribution, and that of assumption, which now is consigned to a temporary sleep. He argued that to distribute $8,000,000 to the States, which was derived from the sales of the public lands, required an equal exercise of the power as the distribution of $3,000,000 to the States, which was derived from the customs. Whence came the right to distribute the public revenue? He knew no clause in the constitution which asserted it, and he deemed it to have been denied to the Federal Government by that sacred instrument. The act was certainly a violation of the constitution.

Mr. BERRIEN did not rise to enter into the discussion of the question now at issue, but merely to state the reasons which influenced him in the vote he should give. He had considered the time for carrying out the measure of distribution inexpedient when the question was under consideration at the last session; but when the bill was so modified as to remove his objections, he voted for it with pleasure.

It has now been found necessary to go beyond the tariff of 20 per cent. contemplated by the proviso of the land bill. The condition of the Government is such, that it is agreed on all hands there must be a revenue considerably exceeding that rate of duty. The statement of the chairman of the Finance Committee shows that even the amount of revenue proposed to be supplied by this bill will not, for two or three years, be enough to keep the treasury from some embarrassment.

During these few years of embarrassment, he should be disposed to consider the same expediency which actuated him to advocate the proviso of the distribution act still existing, for the continuance of that proviso till the treasury shall be in a condition to do without the proceeds of the public lands. He should therefore have been glad, had he felt himself in a position to take part in advancing this bill, to have offered an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, the object of which would have been to suspend the distribution bill till the 30th of June, 1844. Some such arrangement as this would have afforded a neutral ground upon which all parties could meet. It would besides have these advantages: it would enable the land fund to be applied to the use of the Government at a time it would most need it; it would admit of an appeal being made to the people, which would decide the question of distribution; another Congress, fresh from the people, would, at the end of the term approaching the 30th of June, 1844, have an opportunity of further acting on the proviso, and either repealing it altogether, or further extending the suspension. But, beyond all these considerations, there would be the important one, that this much desired and indispensable measure of providing adequate revenue could be adopted when properly amended, in the harmonious spirit which, but for this question of distribution, all feel desirous of imparting relief to the treasury.

But he was admonished, by what had already occurred, that all efforts were now unavailing to improve or amend this bill. The determination so strongly expressed by those who have the control of the bill in the Senate to reject all amendments, no matter of what character or necessity; the undisguised purpose of carrying through the bill in the identical form in which it came from the House; the inexorable rejection of every amendment recommended by the Finance Committee,—seemed to be the result of a foregone conclusion, in obedience to some iron rule from which they were not to attempt to extricate themselves, no matter what might be the improvement offered, or the merits of any particular case of amendment. All alike—whether of prime necessity or organic importance—it was evident must bow to this iron rule. The action of the majority on these amendments had manifested a determination, on the part of the Senate, to reject any and every amendment. If he understood the nature of the votes the other day, (Saturday,) the understanding of those who have the control of the bill was to pass it without amendment, to avoid the necessity of returning it to the other House. While this understanding prevails, it would be perfectly unavailing for him to offer the amendment which he had spoken of.

He did not agree with those who thought, should this bill fail, Congress ought to adjourn, and do nothing for the relief of the Government. It was their duty to provide the means of carrying on the Government; and he trusted they would not neglect that duty.

Mr. WOODBURY said he asked only two or three minutes of the attention of the Senate to what he considered the chief question involved in this motion. As to this, he differed from those who had preceded him.

The section proposed to be stricken out did, in fact, make a new distribution bill. This was the great objection to it in the tariff and in this crisis. The old bill passed last September, and which the President then approved, authorized a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands only in case a low and moderate duty, not above twenty per cent., would yield revenue enough to pay all our expenditures, and leave a surplus of what was collected from the lands. But this section authorizes the distribution when there is no surplus, with twenty per cent. duties. It authorizes it even in these embarrassed times—if there is no surplus without imposing at least thirty-six per cent. duties on an average, and fifty, eighty, a hundred, and a hundred and forty per cent. on several specific articles.

The Executive might, therefore, under his views of this question, as heretofore explained on our public records, and so might several Senators, assent to such a bill as that of the last session; but not to such a new, and materially new, distribution bill as this section seeks to introduce.

On this side of the House there is no wish, in connection with this revenue bill, to disturb the terms and substance of the distribution act of the last session. It is you, on your side, who now disturb that act. It is you who unsettle and change every thing, and introduce new embarrassments; and why? Not, I hope, to incommode the treasury, nor even to harass another department of the Government. But the tendency of this section clearly is to endanger the success of the whole revenue bill, as a financial measure. The provision is also out of place here. It is a section not in accordance with the professed object of the tariff—to fill the treasury; but is obviously to help to empty it.

There is another grave question connected with this section, repealing a vital proviso in the former distribution act. If we can hastily and lightly repeal that proviso in such a legislative compromise, we may, ere long, see all the other important provisions in that distribution repealed. When war comes, the proviso giving back the proceeds to the treasury may also be repealed, because the States may then be as needy as now. So the provisos as to extra per cent. to the new States, as to the use of the share in this District, the 2 per cent. funds to some States, and numerous others, may all, in succession, be prostrated. Let us pause, then. Had we not better defer this grave measure of the 27th section, making, in several respects, an entirely new distribution, to a future occasion, and a separate bill, and strike it out of this tariff? It is no part of the tariff, legitimately. Let it stand alone, and on its own merits. Let not the whole tariff be exposed, as many anticipate, to a new veto and loss, merely to make the experiment of introducing a new distribution on new principles, and in a new condition of our fiscal affairs. And let nobody rail at the President for this jeopardy to the measure. It is jeopardy, caused by us—caused deliberately—caused by us unnecessarily. For what this is persisted in, the country must decide. On this side of the House, we wash our hands of it. We want a proper tariff passed, and in a proper tariff form, and not mixed up with other controversies; and, in fine, such as will yield a suitable revenue for the crisis. Let those who refuse this, take warning as to the responsibility; for none of us can go home with honor, unless we first fairly legislate for the occasion, and not patch up some impotent, temporary measure, unworthy the emergency and the true interests of the country.

Mr. WRIGHT said he desired, before the question was taken upon this amendment, to say a few words to the Senate; and it was simply on account of the position in which the Senator from Virginia had placed the question yesterday, that he was induced to trouble the Senate with any remarks. The Senator, if he (Mr. W.) properly understood the purport of his argument, assumed that the section relating to the distribution must be retained in the bill, or it could not become a law. This might be so; he (Mr. W.) was unable to say whether it was or not. But he could not, in conscience, vote for the bill if every other item were precisely what he desired, provided that section was retained in it. He did not believe he had a constitutional right to vote a tax in this form, for distribution among the States; and no man could question that this would be the effect of the bill. The Senator considered it a point of expediency. He (Mr. W.) considered it not only a question of principle, but of constitutional right. Although he would be compelled to differ from some of his most esteemed friends, politically speaking, yet he would be compelled to vote against the bill, unless the motion to expunge the 27th section prevailed. The bill could be passed, doubtless, by a majority of both Houses; but the doubt as to its becoming a law rested not here, but elsewhere, and would be determined by the fate of the motion now under consideration. He had no desire to violate the rules of debate; but he believed he had a right to assume that, if this section be stricken out by the voice of the Senate, the bill would meet with no obstruction to its becoming a law.

2d Sess.]

The Tariff Bill.

[August, 1842.]

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on Mr. BUCHANAN's motion to strike out the 37th section of the bill, and resulted in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Preston, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—23

NAYS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—26.

And the Senate, at a quarter to 6 o'clock, adjourned.

THURSDAY, August 4.

The Tariff Bill.

Mr. BENTON proposed an amendment, to put a stamp duty on the issue, and an annual tax on the circulation, of paper currency; and supported his proposition by an elaborate speech, of which we cannot give even an outline in this brief report; merely stating that Mr. B. declared his first object to be to raise revenue from an article which was able to pay, and ought to pay; and his next object was, to contribute to regulate the paper currency. He was certain Congress had constitutional power enough to regulate the paper currency, and had nothing to do but to exercise that power. A bankrupt act against banks—a stamp duty on the issue of all paper currency—and an annual tax upon its circulation—would accomplish the object, and free the country from the curse of depreciated paper on any day that Congress chose. The following was his amendment:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That from and after the last day of December, in the year 1842, there shall be laid and collected, throughout the United States, their Territories, and the District of Columbia, a stamp duty on the issue, and an annual tax on the circulation, of all paper-currency as follows: a stamp duty of thirty cents on each piece of paper constituting such currency, and an annual tax of twenty-five cents on the same for each year it is continued in circulation.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That every description of notes, orders, checks, or certificates, promising or ordering the payment of money or other things, and put into circulation by corporations, corporate bodies, bodies politic, individuals, or companies, which shall be transferable by delivery, without the written endorsement of each passer thereof, and without being subject to the laws which apply to inland bills of exchange, shall be deemed to be paper-currency within the meaning of this act; and shall be subject to the stamp duty and to the annual tax hereby imposed.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That every corporation, corporate body, body-politic, individual, or company, which shall issue paper-currency of the foregoing description, shall have the same stamped, and pay the duty thereon before the same is issued or reissued after the taking effect of this act; and for that purpose shall apply to the United States marshal for the district within which such issue is intended to be made, who shall forthwith stamp the same, and collect the duty thereon, according to the regulations and instructions which he shall receive from the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe the forms, marks, inscriptions, and colors, to be used for said stamps, and shall furnish the dies and machinery therefor to the respective marshals, with the necessary books for keeping the proper accounts; and for defraying the expenses of purchasing the said dies, machinery, and books, the sum of three thousand dollars, out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That a fine of five thousand dollars shall be imposed on the officers severally of each corporation, and a fine of fifty thousand dollars on each corporation, corporate body, body-politic, individual, or company, which shall issue or reissue any paper-currency, without being stamped, and the duty paid, as aforesaid: Provided, That any officer who proves his dissent to such issue, and vote against it, shall not be subject to such fine; and all contracts, loans, or payments made by the corporations, corporate bodies, bodies-politic, individuals, or companies, made in paper-currency not stamped as aforesaid, or founded on such currency as a consideration, shall be null and void, and of no effect or validity in any court whatever.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That every corporation, corporate body, body-politic, individual, or company, which shall issue paper-currency of the foregoing description, shall make to the Secretary of the Treasury quarterly average returns of the number of notes or pieces of paper-currency so issued by them; from which quarterly average returns shall be made an annual average, which shall be deemed and held to be the number of notes or pieces of paper-currency kept in circulation by each party during the year, and on which the tax shall be collected; and said returns shall be made according to the forms prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and a double tax, and a fine of fifty thousand dollars, shall be incurred by the party failing to make such returns.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the annual taxes so ascertained to be due from the issuers of paper-currency, to be forthwith collected by the United States marshals, and duly accounted for, and paid over by them.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the sum of five per cent. shall be allowed to the marshals on the amounts collected by them on stamps, and 2½ per cent. shall be allowed to them on their tax collections under this act; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause such bonds and sureties to be taken from the said marshals as he shall deem necessary to insure the faithful performance of their duties under this act.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That all double taxes incurred under this act for a default in not making returns of the circulation, shall be computed by the marshal of the district and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury according to the reputed capital employed, or circulation issued, by the delinquent party; and all fines under this act shall be recoverable by action of debt, and shall be divided between the informer, the marshal of the district, and the district attorney of the United States prosecuting the same, in equal proportions.

August, 1842.]

The Tariff Bill.

[27th CONG.]

Mr. BENTON further observed, that he was very certain, in a matter of such length and complexity, Senators were not prepared to vote upon it. He had not shown it even to more than one or two of his own friends. His object at present was to have it placed upon the journal; and he knew of no way to accomplish that, but by calling for the yeas and nays. If the Chair said it could be done without that, he would not ask the yeas and nays.

The CHAIR remarked that there were two ways in which it would go upon the journal—by the yeas and nays being taken, or a general wish expressed to that effect.

The yeas and nays were then ordered; and the question resulted in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Linn, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, and Walker—7.

NAYS.—Messrs. Archer, Bagby, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Huntington, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—27.

FRIDAY, August 5.

The Tariff Bill.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the revenue bill was taken up and read a third time. The question being, "Shall this bill pass?"

Mr. CALHOUN rose, and said that the tariff bill of 1828 was justly called a bill of abominations. But, bad as it was, this is infinitely worse. The average of duties by this bill on the necessities of life will be 10 per cent. greater than was the average of the tariff bill of 1828. There were other differences. He might point to the harshness of this bill; its more immediate operation—going into effect on its passage, instead of giving three months, as the law of 1828 did. He might also point to the inequality of duties, and their injurious operation. There were two other important considerations: the setting aside of the compromise act, and the violation of the solemn pledge given in the distribution act—that if duties exceed 20 per cent., the land fund shall be restored to the treasury.

He pointed out the prosperous impulse which the industry of the country had received under the reduction of duties, resulting from the operation of the compromise act, notwithstanding the various impediments arising from bank expansions and contractions, and other counteracting operations. This bill was a return, in the face of all these evidences of the advantages of comparatively free trade—of the iniquity of the prohibitory system—to the protective system; and that, too, in the most odious form.

He pointed out what might easily have been the relief to the treasury from the land fund—what might have been the relief from retrenchment of expenditures—had not the policy and determination of the party now in power been to increase expenditures, and thereby to create a necessity for passing this bill for protection, and to create a debt which will require a national bank to manage it.

He pointed out the difference between a revenue tariff and a protective tariff. Revenue is friendly to importation; protection is hostile to it. He showed how glaring were the fallacies of all arguments in favor of duties for protection—how absurd as a source of revenue.

In laying duties, there are two points which will give the same amount of revenue—a maximum point for revenue, and a minimum point for revenue. If the maximum is transcended, importations are diminished and revenue diminished. If the minimum is reduced, the reverse takes place. Every increase of duty above the maximum for revenue, is a tax exclusively for protection, and, consequently, antagonist to revenue.

The complaint of the manufacturers is, that prices are too low. To raise prices, they ask for monopolies. They might as well ask for leave to plunder. What right has Congress to give them this aid—this charity—this right to levy a bounty for themselves, at the expense of the consumer? Is this right found in the constitution? But, if such a thing could constitutionally be done, is not Congress bound first to inquire whether what the claimants of protection state is true or not? Has it been ascertained that prices are too low to sustain manufacturers, or that the protection demanded is at all necessary? Instead of making these inquiries, the manufacturers have been asked how much duties they wish for; and not a question has been asked on the other side: thus allowing Government to be made the instrument in the hands of one branch of the community, for transferring money into its pockets from the pockets of the other branch of the community. Such propositions have ever had their advocates and their arguments, as they now have.

The real competition is, not with foreigners, but with our own community; it is between one branch of home industry and another. Cut off exports, and there will be no imports; neither would there be foreign competition nor home competition. It is asked that all the exchange which brings in imports shall be taxed for the protection of manufacturers. The exports from the soil of this country cannot be estimated at less than 100 millions of dollars—proceeding from the labor and cultivation of the soil, going abroad, and reproducing itself in imports. Here is a branch of industry, ten to one greater than that from manufactures. But protection is hostile to imports, and consequently to exports; then it is hostile to the industry of the ten, and fallaciously and fatally friendly to the one. He was not hostile to manufacturers. He was no enemy—he was an enlightened friend, unwilling to see a course pursued, which must reflect back injuriously on the manufacturer.

2d Sess.]

The Tariff Bill.

[August, 1842.]

He proved that the effects of protection were to run through in four years, and then prove such a fallacy as to cause a fresh cry for increased protection; and that the end of the necessity for stimulants could no more be reached than the end of the drunkard's thirst for brandy. It is in vain for him to promise that this bottle shall be the last. When he drinks it, he is more clamorous than before for another last bottle; and so on, till he destroys himself.

Mr. O. entered into many details to show the fallacy of protection. But arguing on the mass of productions, and the effect of this bill on agricultural industry, was not so easily understood as taking a single item, and showing the effect on it. He would, therefore, select cotton as an illustration.

This bill, by prohibiting, to a certain extent, imports, diminishes exports; the cotton-grower's production must be diminished, to meet his diminished demand for exportation. As he diminishes production, he must economize. To effect this, he must restrict and lessen his expenditures outside of his plantation. He must raise his own necessities of life, and spend less upon the productions of manufactures. Thus the great law of retributive justice comes down upon the heads of the manufacturers, who are the cause of all this cramping of home industry from mistaken and selfish views. There will be no part of the community so disappointed as the manufacturers themselves. They will destroy their own market. Part of it will be irretrievably destroyed. This he further illustrated, by pointing out the effects of such a policy in withering up the growing consumption for the great staple of the country, resulting from the foreign demand.

He showed that other great agricultural interests would suffer alike—such as the tobacco interest, the navigating interest, and the sugar and grain-growing interests.

He would say to the opposite gentlemen—encourage the foreign commerce of the country; leave the home commerce to itself, and it will flourish more successfully without any stimulants, than it ever can by protective duties. It is only the country which can export in competition with all the world, that can outstrip other nations in prosperity. Was not the struggle of every other enlightened nation to throw off those fetters which are now to be riveted on the producing interests of this country by this bill?

You must encourage a sound currency and low taxes, you must encourage your foreign commerce. Young as you are as a nation, you are full grown in your manufactures. You must have a foreign market for the products of your soil, or you cannot give sustenance to your manufactures.

Mr. O. illustrated this in a novel and striking manner.

The party in power was a high and influential party. Among other things in its system of policy, a high tariff was pronounced a blessing on the country. Acting up to this policy, what cared they how extravagant were expenditures, when every expenditure added to the tariff? What cared they for wastefulness, when every waste added to the tariff? What cared they for running in debt and borrowing, when that debt and that borrowing added to the tariff?

Why had he raised his voice on this occasion? Not that he hoped to stop the progress of this bill; for he knew that, if the voice of an angel called for its arrest, it would not be arrested. But he raised his voice for the dissemination of great truths, which, he knew, must ultimately prevail.

Mr. BENTON followed the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) and spoke about an hour against the bill. He commenced with vindicating the tariff act of 1828 from the charge made against it by the Senator from South Carolina, that this act produced the surplus revenue which had done so much mischief in the country. Mr. B. admitted the mischief; but said that the surplus arose from the lands, not the customs: and was the result of receiving paper money for lands, until the specie circular reduced their sales. In support of this opinion, he read the following table of the receipts from lands and customs, from 1828 to 1837:

Years.	Customs.	Lands.
1828	$23,205,523	$1,018,308
1829	22,681,465	1,617,175
1830	21,922,891	2,329,856
1831	24,214,441	3,210,815
1832	28,465,237	3,623,381
1833	29,632,508	3,947,622
1834	16,214,957	4,857,610
1835	19,891,310	14,757,600
1836	23,409,940	24,877,179
1837	11,169,290	6,776,236

Mr. B. said the act of 1828 had its faults; but not that of producing the surplus, which took place after the compromise of 1833, and resulted from the lands, as the table showed. He said, also, there was an excuse for it with those who were determined upon the payment of the public debt, then amounting to 70 millions, and was paid off in 1835. Mr. B. said that payment of the debt was a great object with many of those who voted for the act of 1828—not for the mere name of it, but for the substantial advantage of reducing duties when it was paid. This reduction General Jackson proposed to make, and to make it upon the principle of discriminating between luxuries and necessities, and giving incidental protection to home industry. He was for incidental protection, resulting from a fair revenue duty; and read an extract from the address of the Republican convention in Virginia, in March, 1839, as containing what he believed to be the old principles of the Democratic party, found in the act of 1789, and in subsequent revenue acts:

"Nor is the tariff question finally adjusted; for it must be recollected that the compromise act expires in 1842, and before that period arrives, its provisions must be revised and resettled. It may happen, if a wise policy prevails, that our manufacturing brethren of the North and West will be content with such incidental protection as will be afforded by duties laid to supply the constitutional wants of the Government. But it is impossible to foresee what direction may be given to that subject by wily politicians, and the importunate demands of interested petitioners."

Mr. B. took up the concluding words of this extract, and said, what the able men who signed it could not foresee, was now revealed to us. The wily politicians and the interested petitioners had produced the monstrous bill before them, and the monstrous manner in which it was passed. This called from Mr. B. a severe examination of the bill, with a contrast between the promises and the performances of the gentlemen who had got possession of the Government. He displayed the character of the bill, being for protection direct, and not for revenue, and also for being political, in producing a certain effect upon the President. He classed its series under three heads—intrinsic iniquities—conjunction with the lands—and the mode of its passage. He explored each of these heads, and on the latter was vehement and emphatic in denouncing it as passed out of doors, and no amendment allowed in the Senate, or chance given for it to get back to the House, that they might correct what they found to be wrong. He treated it as a violation of the constitution to pass laws in this way—out of doors; and declared that he and his friends had never controlled any one's vote in caucus. He said they met in caucus; but it was to decide upon the conduct of business, and not to govern any Senator's vote. He said ten States on this floor had been deprived of their legislative authority, in making this tax bill of 54 pages; and that, by a vote out of doors—the vote which decided that no amendment should be made to the bill, and even that the eighteen amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance should be rejected by the votes of the committee themselves!

Mr. B. said that the design in preventing amendments must be for one of two purposes: either to send the bill to the President as it was, to produce some political effect from his action upon it; or to prevent the House of Representatives from retouching or amending their own work. In either event, he treated the conduct of the majority as factious and unconstitutional. But we have no space nor time for further notice of his speech in this running report. He concluded by saying that, after this bill was passed, (if it did pass,) the United States would sit for the picture of taxation, which had been drawn in the Edinburgh Review some years ago. Mr. B. read the extract as follows; stating that we had one thing to add, which was not found in the English picture—and that was salt. Salt was free in England! it was heavily and unequally taxed here. In all the rest, the pictures were pretty much alike. He showed an English paper containing Sir Robert Peel's late tariff, and said that our bill was longer than his, and had a drag at section at the end of it, to catch all that was forgotten, and put 20 per cent. upon it. The following was the extract:

"Taxes upon every article which enters into the mouth, or covers the back, or is placed under the foot. Taxes upon every thing which is pleasant to see, hear, feel, smell, or taste. Taxes upon warmth, light, and locomotion. Taxes on every thing on earth, and the waters under the earth: on every thing that comes from abroad, or is grown at home. Taxes on the raw material; taxes on every fresh value that is added to it by the industry of man. Taxes on the sauce which pampers a man's appetite, and the drug that restores him to health; on the ermine which decorates the judge, and the rope which hangs the criminal; on the brass nails of the coffin, and the ribbons of the bride. At bed or board, levant or couchant, we must pay. The school-boy whips his taxed top, the beardless youth manages his taxed horse with a taxed bridle, on a taxed road. The dying Englishman pours his medicine which has paid 7 per centum, into a spoon that has paid 15 per centum; flings himself back upon his chintz bed which has paid 22 per centum; makes his will on an £8 stamp, and expires in the arms of an apothecary who has paid a licence of £100 for the privilege of putting him to death. His whole property is then immediately taxed from 2 to 10 per centum. Besides the probate, large fees are demanded for burying him in the chancel; his virtues are handed down to posterity on taxed marble; and he is then gathered to his fathers, to be taxed no more."

The question recurring on the passage of the bill, Mr. BUCHANAN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. EVANS then rose and addressed the Senate. He had hoped that this bill would have been suffered to proceed, without adverting to the past controversies of parties. He, himself, had abstained from such allusions, and would continue to do so. He should not have risen now, had it not been necessary for him, in the briefest possible manner, to answer a few remarks made by the Senators from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) and Missouri, (Mr. BEXFORD.) They had asked where were those retrenchments and reductions which had been promised by the party now in power, when it was in the pursuit of power? He (Mr. E.) would have expected that they would at least wait till the books for one year had been made up. When the books shall have been made up, he would assure the gentlemen that they would find that considerable retrenchments had been made—considerable reductions in every department of the Government. The party in power had had to pay off arrearages left by their predecessors; and to provide for their debts. The charges made against the party now in power had been repeatedly refuted. But, as one of the most popular writers of the present day had said, there is nothing so tenacious of life as popular errors. Kill them here to-day, and you meet them to-morrow, a hundred miles off, as full of life and vigor as if they never had been killed.

[2d Sess.]

The Tariff Bill.

[August, 1842.]

Mr. E. entered into details of the appropriations of the late Administration to be met by this Administration, and also details of the revenue left to meet their appropriations.

Five millions of treasury notes, and 18 or 14 millions of revenue, were all that the late Administration left to meet their 20 millions of appropriations and outstanding debt and arrearages; and because the party now in power have had to raise means to meet these demands on the treasury, they are denounced as promoting extravagance, to raise tariff for protection.

The Senator from Missouri talked of this new imposition of twenty-seven millions of dollars. It is but a revision of the tariff, adding not more than seven millions of dollars to the taxation derived from duties on imports. Much is gained by the correction of frauds, which the Senator from New Hampshire, while Secretary of the Treasury, could not induce his Congress to correct.

All he (Mr. E.) asked, was revenue enough to pay the debts left by the late Administration, and pay all expenditures for the ordinary purposes of the Government. Give him the same revenue, and the same capital to expend, which that Administration had had, and he would engage to have surplus enough to distribute the proceeds of the lands for the benefit of the States, without feeling any inconvenience.

He would not enter into crimination or recrimination; for he considered such a course out of place on an occasion like this.

When the gentlemen opposite were asked what they would propose for the support of the Government, and relief of the treasury from its present embarrassments, the Senator from South Carolina replied that, when expenditures were brought down to the minimum, and the land fund was restored to the treasury, he would tell what he would do.

Mr. E. adverted, somewhat in detail, to the arguments of the Senator from South Carolina, and to those of the Senator from Missouri, denying that greater prosperity existed now, than did previous to the passage of the compromise act.

He stated that the duties were now lower than they ever had been; yet no increase of importations had taken place. Instead of increased prosperity, every thing was going down. There is no bank now; no high taxes; plenty of money was to be had in the large cities, if there was any business to call for it; but it was lying idle. What evidence was all this of the blessing of low taxes? During 1833, '34, '35, '36, '37 the prices were high, and the country was prosperous; but these were not times of low duties. The average of duties was higher during those years, than that of the present tariff bill; for the reduction under the compromise act was very inconsiderable until the last two years.

He did not see how a nation could be injured by having a balance in its favor between its exports and its imports, to be paid in gold and silver. It was just as it is between two laborers: when the labor of one is counted against the labor of the other, if a balance is due to one, it is fair it should be paid in specie, that he may have it to meet his debts and his taxes. When a balance is received by a nation in gold and silver, if it occurs according to the natural operations of trade, it must be an advantage—or he should read his books of political economy again.

Such tables as had been quoted showed nothing definitely. They only showed the quantity of business done, but did not show whether that business was done at a loss or gain.

The Senator from South Carolina had said that the amount of the annual exports of the country was one hundred millions. But the productions of the country were two thousand millions; and out of this two thousand millions, one hundred millions only are exported; leaving nineteen hundred millions to be consumed at home. Yet the whole prosperity of the country is said to be dependent on this one hundred millions of exports. The Senator imagines that the interests involved in those one hundred millions are ten to one, compared with the manufactures. If the Senator calculates all the artisans, artists, merchants, farmers, laborers, and consumers dependent on the manufacturers, he will find his estimate of ten to one ought to be reversed.

The Senator thinks prices may be very low, and wages very high. Such a thing may be within the limits of possibility, but not of probability. He, on the contrary, thought if there was a reduction of prices, the very first thing to feel the reduction was wages. He adverted to the distress prevailing in England, in proof of this.

The great test of the prosperity of a country was, in his mind, the high price of wages. What is to keep up the price of wages but high prices? But now a new doctrine is broached—that low prices and low wages are a blessing, and that our products may be exported. What was the use of sending our products abroad at low prices? Why send any thing abroad that can be consumed at home on more remunerating terms? Why should we suppose that, while we consume nineteen hundred millions of our products at home, we are to go to destruction because our exports of one hundred millions are not kept up?

If he read the signs of the times aright, he came to a different conclusion from that at which the Senator has arrived, when he asserts that nations are throwing off their trammels on trade. He (Mr. E.) believed the reverse; he believed that the majority of nations were adopting the protective system, and becoming their own manufacturers.

August, 1842.]

Naval Schools.

[27th Con.

Mr. WOODBURY said that the Senator from Maine had been pleased to notice him by some personal allusions, which demanded a brief reply.

Mr. W. had said nothing whatever, as had been represented, of any natural rate of duty. But what he, in fact, did say, was, that the rate of 20 per cent. had been expressly agreed on in the compromise act as a just and sufficiently high rate on imports; that the opinions of such distinguished statesmen as were engaged in the compromise, and had then, as well as since, approved it, (and for whose conduct there had recently been claimed great glory,) were entitled to much respect; that several nations abroad had fixed on a rate below, or no higher than 20 per cent.; and that this was quite a high proportion of taxation on that kind of property, compared with what was usually imposed in this country on other property.

Was not this fair reasoning? And had the force of it been met by a single argument?

Why, sir, one fact is demonstrative of its correctness. Computing, as many have, the whole property in the Union at four thousand millions of dollars,—a tax of 20 per cent. on all that, would yield eight hundred millions; whereas not over seventy or eighty millions of taxes, of all kinds, will be collected yearly in the United States, even if this bill passes. That is not one-tenth so much as you would impose on imports by a rate of only 20 per cent.

Is that not irrefutable evidence that 20 per cent. is quite high enough, and even too high, for a fair proportion of taxation on imports alone?

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. WRIGHT made a few remarks—the latter stating his anxiety to see the vote taken, as some excuse for postponing to another occasion a few inquiries he had to make of the chairman of the Finance Committee.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill; and it was passed as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—25.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, Graham, King, Linn, McRoberts, Preston, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—23.

The Senate then adjourned.

MONDAY, August 8.

Naval Schools.

Senate bill providing for the establishment of schools of instruction in the naval service of the United States was next taken up.

Mr. WILLIAMS was in favor of the system of a school for the naval service; but he was apprehensive that this attempt to establish five schools would fail. When officers of the navy are appointed to those schools, they are taken from the regular service; and a necessity is created for filling their places. The pay of officers for one school would be $34,000; if three schools are established, the pay of officers will be $72,000. This would be a considerable increase of expense. He apprehended, when the experiment was tried in five schools, there would be a failure. He thought one school would be found more successful.

Mr. ARCHER said the subject had been under consideration from the beginning of the session. It was notorious that it has been one matter of surprise, that, while the United States had taken such pains to benefit the service of the country by a military academy, no exertion had been made to establish a corresponding naval academy. He pointed out that, by the proposition of the bill, there would be no additional expense but that of $5,000 for furniture and the pay of teachers; as there would be no additional pay for officers, rations, or location. He explained the reason for selecting vacant forts for the location of these schools. He could imagine no plan so free from expense, and so acceptable to the country and the Government.

The bill was then read a third time; and on the question of its passage—

Mr. ALLEN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. KING suggested the propriety, by general consent, of altering the bill so as to authorize an experiment to be made on one school only.

Mr. ARCHER explained, that there would be greater expense and danger of failing in attempting one school, than in trying the number proposed by the bill.

Mr. ALLEN said he had no doubt but that naval schools might have benefits attending them; but if now established, he feared they would, like West Point, degenerate. The West Point academy had become a nursery for wealthy young men, who obtained their education at the public expense, and then entered on the practice of law or the pursuit of some other profession. If these schools could be confined to the sons of poor widows, or of officers who have fallen in the service of their country, he might approve of them; but he feared they would become mere places where public men would get their own relations and friends educated at the public expense.

2d Sess.]

Naval Schools.

[August, 1848.]

He estimated that 3 out of 4 of the young men educated at West Point retired from that place to practise law, or to enter some profession. He regarded service on board of a ship as the best school to which the young men of the navy could go. At present, they entered at the age of 13 or 14, and had every facility to acquire experience of all kinds. In their long life—travelling every quarter of the globe—they were afforded opportunities to acquire information upon all subjects. He did not oppose the bill before the Senate on account of any opposition to the navy or army service; but because the institutions to be created would degenerate, and become, like West Point, a place of patronage, where the sons of the rich, and those able to educate them, would obtain commissions, instead of those of humbler, but equally worthy parentage. He expressed it as his opinion that the academy at West Point should be remodelled, if not entirely dispensed with.

Mr. ARCHER observed, that the objection of the Senator from Ohio was to any school at all, as well as to the five schools proposed. He was sure the Senator from South Carolina could not be opposed to any naval school for this Government. At 14 years of age, a young man can go into the navy as midshipman. How far can he be qualified to make an able officer at that age? An efficient naval officer should be well instructed in many things, besides the mere working of a ship. Very often the highest questions of diplomacy are necessarily referred to the officers of the navy. He had always thought it an opprobrium to this Government that it had gone to no expense, and had made no adequate effort to provide efficient officers trained from their youth for the service. All who, with him, attached importance to the real value of the naval service, would unite with him in sustaining this bill.

Mr. KING had none of the fears entertained by the Senator from Ohio. He should prefer an experiment of one school at first; but, if he could not get the bill modified to that extent, he would vote for the bill, even as it is. There were professors on board ships already for the instruction of midshipmen. Would it not be of great importance to midshipmen not on duty, to have these schools to resort to, for completing their education?

Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut, objected to the whole system of forming Government hot-beds for stimulating one class of individuals to rise at the expense of the public, above the natural talents, enterprise, and ability of other individuals. It is raising up a barrier against the latter, and shutting them out from the fruits of honorable ambition, which ought to be left open to the sons of every citizen, and not confined to a favored few.

Mr. BUCHANAN remarked, that he should not have said a word upon this bill but for the fact that the yeas and nays had been called. Inasmuch, however, as he had determined to vote against it, and did not wish to be considered hostile to the navy, or to education, he would say a few words in explanation of his vote. He thought that we were a nation of magnificent ideas; but, unfortunately, we had not the money to carry them out. This bill contained about as splendid a scheme as was ever before Congress. If it was confined to the establishment of one school only, he would not oppose it. But what did it propose? To transfer five of our fortifications from the superintendence of the War Department to that of the Navy Department, which hereafter was to have exclusive control over them. Thus five of our military fortifications, erected at great expense, for the protection of our people, were to be put in the possession of the Navy Department. And why? Five schools were to be established: to teach whom? At present there were 490 midshipmen, each of whom was required to serve three years on ship before he could be examined. Therefore, the number who could be in those schools at once amounted to 108. At this time of the day, when we were reducing all our expenditures, and it had been determined that no more midshipmen should be appointed, he could not vote for such a measure as this.

But it has been said that this measure would cost but little. [Mr. ARCHER. I said it would be a saving.] Yes, that would save money to the Government! This was the way in which all these schemes were insinuated into favor. Let us see what it will cost. The Secretary of the Navy is to have an appropriation of $2,000, to fit out the five fortifications for the purposes of naval schools. Now, does any one suppose that $400 each would be sufficient to place these fortifications in a proper condition for schools? Four hundred dollars to convert into schools fortifications erected at the expense of millions!

But the Secretary is also authorized to appoint as many teachers of foreign languages as he may think fit, at $800 per annum, and two rations per day. How many officers are you creating by this authority? You know not. There is no limit put upon the Secretary. His power is unlimited, and language is general. Again: $1,000 is to be appropriated to the purchase of a model steam-engine for each of the five schools. Here is $5,000 for the use of model engines—to teach what? To teach the boys, who should know their use and application. To be used where? At the fortifications, instead of on the ships where they are applied, and their power brought into play. In addition to these items, the bill proposes to appropriate $5,000 for the purchase of necessary furniture and for contingent expenses.

He admitted that the navy had covered itself with glory, and that its officers were intelligent men. He was willing to give them proper instruction; and had the Secretary proposed to establish one, instead of five schools, he would not have determined to vote against the bill.

August, 1842.]

The Tariff Veto.

[27TH CONG.]

At present, however, when Congress was reducing all the expenses of the Government, and when the midshipmen would be reduced, he could not consent to any such proposition as the one before the Senate. This scheme was but the foundation for a larger establishment. West Point Academy was started upon a much less appropriation. Get these fortifications into the power of the Secretary of the Navy, and, ere long, there will be a magnificent establishment, and the Secretary soon clothed with the power to send whom he pleases to these schools, to be educated by the Government.

Mr. CALHOUN thought if one central school was established, in which all the forces intended to be scattered on several institutions were concentrated, it would be vastly better than making this scheme of several schools.

Mr. ARCHER moved a reconsideration of the vote ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

The motion was agreed to; and the vote was reconsidered.

TUESDAY, August 9.

Naval Schools.

The bill to provide for the establishment of naval schools was taken up as the unfinished business of yesterday, under the special order.

The question was taken on striking out the word "five;" and it was stricken out.

Mr. CALHOUN was of opinion there should be only one school; and that should be somewhere on the Chesapeake Bay. He would move to fill the blank with "one."

Mr. ARCHER asked the Senator from South Carolina to include the location on the Chesapeake Bay.

Several suggestions were made by different Senators, as to location; which resulted in its being fixed at some fortification at or near Fort Monroe: this amendment was adopted.

The question was then put, "Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?"

Mr. WOODBURY stated that the first and indispensable point with a young officer was, whether he could bear the exposure and roll of the ocean. If he could not, all expense in educating him for the service was lost. Hence the first order long had been, and should continue to be, an order to sea. After that experiment, if the constitution and tastes of the individual proved suitable, it was not only proper to give him aid by literary and scientific instruction on shipboard, but, when off duty, on shore. The deck of the vessel, however, was the best school-house or academy to begin with; and there to mingle explanations and reading with actual experiment. Even on shore, the teaching should be rather to occupy suitably his leisure hours, and advance him in his naval pursuits, than to give him land habits or land tastes. The naval officer should be a sailor—an informed, intelligent, moral, and intellectual sailor, if you please; but still a son of the ocean, and dedicated, heart and soul, for life, to all its arduous duties—great exposure and high responsibilities. In truth, his true home is on the mountain wave.

Mr. W. had no great objection to changing a receiving ship (the usual place for instruction) to a fort or barracks, or other suitable building connected with some naval station; though, in some respects, a vessel had advantages for illustrations of nautical terms, and for forming nautical tastes and habits. A vessel should be used for short experimental cruises frequently, even if the school was on shore. But he entertained a decided opinion that the whole establishment should be under naval officers, naval discipline, and the jurisdiction of some naval station. And so far from admitting to the school any not officers, or officers before having seen sea-service, he felt confident that abuses would creep in, and the whole scheme prove abortive, if either of these courses was tolerated. Such, in a few words, were his general views on this topic. Assured as he was that this school would be conducted on the principles he approved, his vote would be given for the bill.

The question was then taken, and resulted in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Choate, Clayton, Crafts, Dyer, Evans, King, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, and Young—22.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Smith of Connecticut, and Woodbridge—5.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, August 9.

The Tariff Veto.

The SPEAKER announced "A Message from the President of the United States;" and he handed it to the Clerk, who read the following MESSAGE.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

It is with unfeigned regret that I find myself under the necessity of returning to the House of Representatives, with my objections, a bill entitled "An act to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes." Nothing can be more painful to any individual called upon to perform the chief executive duties under our limited constitution, than to be constrained to withhold his assent from an important measure adopted by the Legislature. Yet he would neither fulfil the high purposes of his station, nor consult the true interests or the solemn will of the people—the common constituents of both branches of the Government—by yielding his well-considered, most deeply fixed, and repeatedly declared opinions, on matters of great public concernment, to those of a co-ordinate department, without requesting that department seriously to re-examine the subject of their difference. The exercise of some independence of judgment in regard to all acts of legislation, is plainly implied in the responsibility of approving them. At all times a duty, it becomes a peculiarly solemn and impressive one when the subjects passed upon by Congress happen to involve, as in the present instance, the most momentous issues; to affect variously the various parts of a great country; and to have given rise, in all quarters, to such a conflict of opinions as to render it impossible to conjecture, with any certainty, on which side the majority really is. Surely, if the pause for reflection, intended by the wise authors of the constitution, by referring the subject back to Congress for reconsideration, be ever expedient and necessary, it is in precisely such a case as the present.

2d SESS.]

The Tariff Veto.

[August, 1842.]

On the subject of distributing the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, in the existing state of the finances, it has been my duty to make known my settled convictions on various occasions during the present session of Congress. At the opening of the extra session, upwards of twelve months ago, sharing fully in the general hope of returning prosperity and credit, I recommended such a distribution; but that recommendation was even then expressly coupled with the condition that the duties on imports should not exceed the rate of 20 per cent. provided by the compromise act of 1833. These hopes were not a little encouraged, and these views strengthened, by the report of Mr. Ewing, then Secretary of the Treasury, which was shortly thereafter laid before Congress, in which he recommended the imposition of duties at the rate of 20 per cent. ad valorem on all free articles, with specified exceptions; and stated, "if this measure be adopted, there will be received into the treasury from customs, in the last quarter of the present year (1841), $5,300,000; in all of the year of 1842, about $22,500,000; and in the year 1843, after the final reduction under the act of March 2, 1833, about $30,800,000;" and adds, "it is believed that, after the heavy expenditures required by the public service in the present year shall have been provided for, the revenue which will accrue from that, or a nearly approximate rate of duty, will be sufficient to defray the expenses of the Government, and leave a surplus to be annually applied to the gradual payment of the national debt, leaving the proceeds of the public lands to be disposed of as Congress shall see fit." I was most happy that Congress, at the time, seemed entirely to concur in the recommendations of the Executive; and, anticipating the correctness of the Secretary's conclusions, and in view of an actual surplus, passed the distribution act of the 4th September last, wisely limiting its operation to two conditions—having reference, both of them, to a possible state of the treasury, different from that which had been anticipated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and to the paramount necessities of the public service. It ordained that if, at any time during the existence of that act, there should be an imposition of duties on imports inconsistent with the provisions of the act of 2d March, 1833, and beyond the rate of duties fixed by that act, (to wit, 30 per cent. on the value of such imports, or any of them,) then the distribution should be suspended, and should continue so suspended, until that cause should be removed. By a previous clause it had, in a like spirit of wise and cautious patriotism, provided for another case, (in which all are even now agreed,) that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands should be used for the defence of the country. It was enacted that the act should continue and be in force until otherwise provided by law, unless the United States should become involved in war with any foreign power; in which event, from the commencement of hostilities, the act should be suspended until the cessation of hostilities.

Not long after the opening of the present session of Congress, the unprecedented and extraordinary difficulties that have recently embarrassed the finances of the country, began to assume a serious aspect. It soon became quite evident, that the hopes under which the act of 4th September was passed, and which alone justified it in the eyes either of Congress who imposed, or of the Executive who approved, the first of the two conditions just recited, were not destined to be fulfilled. Under the pressure, therefore, of the embarrassments which had thus unexpectedly arisen, it appeared to me that the course to be pursued had been clearly marked out for the Government by that act itself. The condition contemplated in it, as requiring a suspension of its operation, had occurred. It became necessary, in the opinions of all, to raise the rate of duties upon imports above 20 per cent.; and with a view both to provide available means to meet present exigencies, and to lay the foundation for a successful negotiation of a loan, I felt it incumbent upon me to urge upon Congress to raise the duties accordingly, imposing them in a spirit of wise discrimination, for the two-fold object of affording ample revenue for the Government, and incidental protection for the various branches of domestic industry. I also pressed, in the most emphatic, but respectful language I could employ, the necessity of making the land sales available to the treasury, as the basis of public credit. I did not think that I could stand excused, much less justified, before the people of the United States, nor could I reconcile it to myself, to recommend the imposition of additional taxes upon them, without, at the same time, urging the employment of all the legitimate means of the Government towards satisfying its wants. These opinions were communicated in advance of any definitive action of Congress on the subject either of the tariff or land sales, under a high sense of public duty, and in compliance with an express injunction of the constitution; so that if a collision (extremely to be deprecated as such collisions always are) has seemingly arisen between the Executive and Legislative branches of the Government, it has assuredly not been owing to any capricious interference, or to any want of a plain and frank declaration of opinion, on the part of the former. Congress differed in its views with those of the Executive, as it had undoubtedly a right to do; and passed a bill virtually for a time repealing the proviso of the act of the 4th September, 1841. The bill was returned to the House in which it originated, with my objections to its becoming a law. With a view to prevent, if possible, an open disagreement of opinion on a point so important, I took occasion to declare, that I regarded it as an indispensable prerequisite to an increase of duties above 20 per cent., that the act of the 4th September should remain unrepealed in its provisions. My reasons for that opinion were elaborately set forth in the message which accompanied the return of the bill—which no constitutional majority appears to have been found for passing into a law.

August, 1842.]

The Tariff Veto.

[27th CONG.]

The bill which is now before me proposes, in its 27th section, the total repeal of one of the provisions in the act of September; and, while it increases the duties above 20 per cent., directs an unconditional distribution of the land proceeds. I am therefore subjected a second time, in the period of a few days, to the necessity of either giving my approval to a measure which, in my deliberate judgment, is in conflict with great public interests; or of returning it to the House in which it originated, with my objections. With all my anxiety for the passage of a law which would replenish an exhausted treasury, and furnish a sound and healthy encouragement to mechanical industry, I cannot consent to do so at the sacrifice of the peace and harmony of the country, and the clearest convictions of public duty.

For some of the reasons which have brought me to this conclusion, I refer to my previous messages to Congress, and briefly subjoin the following:—

1. The bill unites two subjects, which, so far from having any affinity to one another, are wholly incongruous in their character. It is both a revenue and an appropriation bill. It thus imposes on the Executive, in the first place, the necessity of either approving that which he would reject, or rejecting that which he might otherwise approve. This is a species of constraint to which the judgment of the Executive ought not, in my opinion, to be subjected. But that is not my only objection to the act in its present form. The union of subjects wholly dissimilar in their character in the same bill, if it grew into practice, would not fail to lead to consequences destructive of all wise and conscientious legislation. Various measures, each agreeable only to a small minority, might, by being thus united, (and the more, the greater chance of success,) lead to the passing of laws, of which no single provision could, if standing alone, command a majority in its favor.

2. While the treasury is in a state of extreme embarrassment, requiring every dollar which it can make available; and when the Government has not only to lay additional taxes, but to borrow money to meet pressing demands; the bill proposes to give away a fruitful source of revenue—which is the same thing as raising money by loan and taxation—not to meet the wants of the Government, but for distribution: a proceeding which I must regard as highly impolitic, if not unconstitutional.

A brief review of the present condition of the public finances will serve to illustrate the true condition of the treasury, and exhibit its actual necessities. On the 5th of August, (Friday last,) there was in the treasury, in round numbers, $2,150,000 Necessary to be retained to meet trust funds $360,000

Interest on public debt due in October	80,000
To redeem treasury notes and pay the interest	100,000
Land distribution, under the act of the 4th September, 1841	640,000
	<hr/>
	1,180,000
Leaving an available amount of	970,000

The Navy Department had drawn requisitions on the treasury, at that time, to meet debts actually due; among which are bills under protest for $1,414,000—thus leaving an actual deficit of $444,000.

There was on hand about $100,000 of unissued treasury notes, assisted by the accruing revenue, (amounting to about $150,000 per week, exclusive of receipts on unpaid bonds,) to meet requisitions for the army, and the demands for the civil list.

The withdrawal of the sum of $640,000, to be distributed among the States, as soon as the statements and accounts can be made up and completed, by virtue of the provisions of the act of the 4th September last, (of which nearly a moiety goes to a few States, and only about $383,000 is to be divided among all the States,) while it adds materially to the embarrassments of the treasury, affords to the States no decided relief.

No immediate relief from this state of things is anticipated, unless (what must most deeply be deplored) the Government could be reconciled to the negotiations of loans already authorized by law, at a rate of discount ruinous in itself, and calculated most seriously to affect the public credit. So great is the depression of trade, that even if the present bill were to become a law, and prove to be productive, some time would elapse before sufficient supplies would flow into the treasury; while, in the mean time, its embarrassments would be continually augmented by the semi-annual distributions of the land proceeds.

Indeed, there is but too much ground to apprehend that, even if this bill were permitted to become a law—alienating, as it does, the proceeds of the land sales—an actual deficit in the treasury would occur, which would more than probably involve the necessity of a resort to direct taxation.

Let it be also remarked, that $5,600,000 of the public debt becomes redeemable in about two years and a half, which, at any sacrifice, must be met: while the treasury is always liable to demands for the payment of outstanding treasury notes. Such is the gloomy picture which our financial department now presents, and which calls for the exercise of a rigid economy in the public expenditures, and the rendering available of all the means within the control of the Government. I most respectfully submit, whether this is a time to give away the proceeds of the land sales, when the public hands constitute a fund which, of all others, may be made most useful in sustaining the public credit. Can the Government be generous and manifest to others, when every dollar it can command is necessary to supply its own wants? And if Congress would not hesitate to suffer the provisions of the act of 4th September last to remain unrepaid, in case the country was involved in war, is not the necessity for such a course now just as imperative as it would be then?

3. A third objection remains to be urged, which would be sufficient, in itself, to induce me to return the bill to the House with my objections. By uniting two subjects so incongruous as tariff and distribution, it inevitably makes the fate of the one dependent upon that of the other, in future contests of party. Can any thing be more fatal to the merchant or manufacturer than such an alliance? What they most of all require is a system of moderate duties, so arranged as to withdraw the tariff question, as far as possible, completely from the arena of political contention. Their chief want is permanency and stability. Such an increase of the tariff I believe to be necessary, in order to meet the economical expenditures of Government. Such an increase, made in the spirit of moderation and judicious discrimination, would, I have no doubt, be entirely satisfactory to the American people. In the way of accomplishing a measure so salutary, and so imperatively demanded by every public interest, the legislative department will meet with a cordial co-operation on the part of the Executive. This is all that the manufacturer can desire, and it would be a burden readily borne by the people. But I cannot too earnestly repeat, that, in order to be beneficial, it must be permanent; and in order to be permanent, it must command general acquiescence. But can such permanency be justly hoped for, if the tariff question be coupled with that of distribution—as to which a serious conflict of opinion exists among the States and the people; which enlists in its support a bare majority—if, indeed, there be a majority—of the two Houses of Congress? What permanency or stability can attach to a measure which, warring upon itself, gives away a fruitful source of revenue at the moment it proposes a large increase of taxes on the people? Is the manufacturer prepared to stake himself and his interests upon such an issue?

2d Sess.]

The Tariff Veto.

[August, 1842.]

I know that it is urged (but most erroneously, in my opinion) that instability is just as apt to be produced by retaining the public lands as a source of revenue, as from any other cause; and this is ascribed to a constant fluctuation, as it is said, in the amount of sales. If there be any thing in this objection, it equally applies to every imposition of duties on imports. The amount of revenue annually derived from duties is constantly liable to change. The regulations of foreign Governments, the varying productiveness of other countries, periods of excitement in trade, and a great variety of other circumstances, are constantly arising to affect the state of commerce, foreign and domestic, and, of consequence, the revenue levied upon it. The sales of the public domain in ordinary times are regulated by fixed laws, which have their basis in a demand increasing only in the ratio of the increase of population. In recurring to the statistics connected with this subject, it will be perceived that, for a period of ten years preceding 1834, the average amount of land sales did not exceed $2,000,000.

For the increase which took place in 1834-'5 and '5, we are to look to that peculiar condition of the country which grew out of one of the most extraordinary excitements in business and speculation that have ever occurred in the history of commerce and currency. It was the fruit of a wild spirit of adventure, engendered by a vicious system of credits, under the evils of which the country is still laboring, and which it is fondly hoped will not soon recur. Considering the vast amount of investments made by private individuals in the public lands during those three years, and which quailed $13,000,000, (equal to more than 20 years' purchase,) taking the average of sales of the preceding years, it may be safely asserted that the result of the public land sales can hold out nothing to alarm the manufacturer with the idea of instability in the revenues, and consequently in the course of the Government.

Under what appears to me, therefore, the soundest considerations of public policy, and in view of the interests of every branch of domestic industry, I return you the bill, with these my objections to its becoming a law.

I take occasion emphatically to repeat my anxious desire to co-operate with Congress in the passing of a law which, while it shall assist in supplying the wants of the treasury, and re-establish public credit, shall afford to the manufacturing interests of the country all the incidental protection they require.

After all, the effect of what I do is substantially to call on Congress to reconsider the subject. If, on such reconsideration, a majority of two-thirds of both Houses should be in favor of the measure, it will become a law, notwithstanding my objections. In a case of clear and manifest error on the part of the President, the presumption of the constitution is, that such majorities will be found. Should they be so found in this case, having conscientiously discharged my own duty, I shall cheerfully acquiesce in the result.

JOHN TYLER.

WASHINGTON, August 9th, 1842.

The Message having been read through—

Mr. FILLMORE obtained the floor. He said he regarded the question presented in the Message as one of too much importance to be considered until the Message could be printed, and a copy placed in the hands of each member. He hoped the House would agree to the motion he should make; which was, that the Message of the President be entered on the journal, as prescribed by the constitution; that it be printed, and that its consideration be postponed until to-morrow. Upon this motion, he moved the previous question.

The previous question was then sustained, and Mr. FILLMORE's motion adopted.

WEDNESDAY, August 10.

The Tariff Veto.

The SPEAKER announced the special order to be the reconsideration of the tariff bill, returned yesterday with the objections of the President.

Mr. ADAMS, who had the floor, made, in the commencement of his remarks, some observations, which were lost to the reporter, before order was sufficiently restored: they were understood, however, to be expressions of his regret at the collision which had taken place between the Executive and Legislative branches of the Government. He was understood, further, to express it as his opinion, that if the President had yielded up his opinions to the majority in Congress, and signed the bill, every thing would have been forgotten and forgiven him—every thing that had taken place before, and which had caused that state of distress in which the country was at present involved, and in which he feared it was destined long to continue, would have been remedied. Peace, prosperity, credit, and honor, would have taken the place of all these distresses which now hang over the country. The mere reconciliation of the two branches of the Legislature with the Executive would, of itself, have been hailed with joy; and that reconciliation would have been the harbinger of joyous and prosperous times to the country. Sir, (said Mr. A.,) that hope has been blasted; and now, by the paper before the House, the Executive and Legislative branches of the Government are placed in a state of civil war, and for which there was, in his opinion, no remedy, but that remedy which the people must take in their own hands. War, he said, was declared; and he admitted now, that on the part of the Executive himself, there was no retreat without disgrace; and he held that this and the other House of Congress could not retreat, without being disgraced also. The position was taken on both sides; the issue was given and accepted; and now, there was nothing left but an appeal to the God of battles—which might God, in his infinite mercy, prevent. (Laughter.)

The issue was complete; and now, though not concurring in the sentiments of his colleague, (Mr. CUSHING,) that it was the destiny of this Congress to accomplish the prostration of the Government of the country, he concurred with him in the result; and the question now was, on whom the responsibility would rest. His colleague had already laid this responsibility on Congress—meaning thereby the majority of the two Houses. They were told yesterday by another gentleman, that, although he did not concur in the imputation thrown on Congress by his colleague, and that, from an esprit du corps, when the question should come to issue, he would be found with the House and with Congress, yet they would find it a difficult task to put it on the shoulders where it belonged, and cast it from themselves. Assuming that there was nothing further to take place on this subject between the Executive and the Legislature—which, as he said before, could not take place without disgrace on one side or the other—he wished to submit a few observations of inquiry as to where the responsibility should fall.

He should not have to enter into the details of the comparison which would be necessary for the people of this country to institute between the proceedings of the Congress of the United States, and the proceedings of the Executive, since he had been in the Executive chair. He would simply allude to the points which it would be necessary to discuss, in comparing the acts and proceedings of the Legislative body since the commencement of the present Administration, and of the action of the Executive in regard to them. In referring to the acts of Congress, it was with very great satisfaction that he had been able to say that a very great portion of the rancor of party spirit, which they had witnessed, had nothing to do with the proceedings of Congress; that some of the most important acts of the Congress of the United States had had very little of party in them; and that the party styling themselves Democratic, contributed as much as the majority to those acts, which he should now endeavor to enumerate.

[Mr. A. proceeded to consider the various measures which had been before Congress at this and the extra session, and concluded as follows:—]

He had not come to an examination of the reasons assigned by the President in his Message. He was about to come to it; for, coming from the source it did, and containing such a multitude of reasons, he (Mr. A.) thought respect was due to it, (Laughter,) if they did not treat it with the utmost degree of gratitude. (Renewed laughter.) He would, therefore, conclude by moving that the Message containing the reasons of the President for his vetoing this bill, be referred to a Select Committee, with instructions to report to the House upon it. The committee he should prefer to see rather large—at least as large as any standing committee: he would go beyond that number, and name thirteen; it was the good old number of the original States of this Union. He would make it twenty-six—the number of all the States of the Union—but he was apprehensive that number would be too large—at least so large as to make it probable that there might be a good deal of delay in obtaining a report. He should, therefore, make a motion that this Message be referred to a Select Committee of thirteen members, with instructions to report upon it to the House.

Mr. FOSTER wished to understand whether the Speaker had decided to entertain the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to refer?

The SPEAKER said the motion was entertained.

Mr. FOSTER said then he appealed from that decision, and he relied on the provision of the constitution.

The constitution plainly pointed out what should be their proceedings on the return of the bill with the President's veto; and the Chair could entertain no motion which gave it a different direction than the constitution prescribed. The constitution prescribed the form of proceeding; and, therefore, with good reason, the rules of the House had not, amongst their provisions, any thing to contravene the constitution. He maintained, therefore, that the Chair could not entertain the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts; but, in the language of the constitution, the House must "proceed to reconsider" and determine on the passage of this bill.

The SPEAKER, in further explanation, said, if a motion to arrest debate by the previous question were made, it would be in order. And again: was the House bound to consider the bill, without an adjournment or other motions, which were always in order under the ordinary rules of proceeding? And would not a motion to refer to a Select Committee, or to a Committee of the Whole, be just as much the action of that body upon it, as if they sat on it here?

20 SEAS.]

The Tariff Veto.

[August, 1842.]

Mr. CUSHING said the question was, "Will the House pass this bill, notwithstanding the objections of the President?" and that, as he understood it, was the issue. But what had his colleague moved? The disposition of a thing not before the House—the Message, which the constitution had disposed of, by putting it on the journal; and that was his objection to the ruling of the Chair. While the question on the passage of the bill was pending, it was out of order to take up the Message which was yesterday entered upon the journal, and refer it to a committee. The question was, "Will the House pass this bill?" and the Message was not in the possession of the House, except as a matter of history, to be commented upon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD thought if the House would listen to a little common sense, they would see that the reference of the Message was a constitutional and correct proceeding. He then contended that, if the Executive should return a bill, with the information that certain facts had been discovered, of which Congress had no knowledge when the bill was passed, the House would appoint a committee to ascertain the truth of the statement, and to examine the facts. The Message certainly alleges no discovery of facts, but it contains reasons and matters of opinion; and if they could investigate matters of fact, they could assuredly inquire into matters of opinion, and report on reasoning as well as on facts.

Mr. ADAMS modified his motion, so as to refer the bill, as well as the Message, to a Select Committee.

Mr. WISE took the same line of argument as Mr. CUSHING, relying on the language of the constitution. He asked the Speaker, if to "reconsider" was, in a parliamentary sense, synonymous with the verb to refer, or to commit. The parliamentary law of this House was the constitution, which prescribed the mode of proceeding; but, by its reference to a committee of thirteen, a majority of seven could refuse to report, and thereby indefinitely postpone; which the House had no power to do.

Were gentlemen uneasy lest their weakness should be exposed? Did they desire to drive us to the last day of the session before the question of reconsideration could be taken up, when most of the members would be retiring, in the expectation that the subject was buried? What was the design?—what the aim and object of the motion? He could not discover it. The object of reference, in all cases except such as this, was alteration or amendment. Did the gentleman propose that this bill should be amended? Was that the object of his motion for commitment? No, sir; neither he, nor any man in that House, would undertake to assert that the committee might report an amendment to the bill. What then? Would they refer the President's objections to the Select Committee, with a view to being advised by that committee whether the bill should be reconsidered? That would not be a reconsideration of the bill, as directed by the constitution. Nor would the House be any nearer to a decision after the committee had made their report, than they were already. The gentleman from Kentucky complained that they should be called on to vote immediately, and (as the gentleman considered) blindfold, upon this bill—ay, blindfold. The gentleman feared he would be forced to vote blindfold upon a subject which they had been considering for eight months. Why, this very bill had been actually, sub judice, before Congress for the last three or four months. Would the gentleman admit that he was voting blindfold—that he had not considered the bill?

Mr. FILLMORE said he believed it was agreeable to the practice of Congress to refer all Messages of the President to a committee. But it was contended that this was an exception to the general rule; and upon what ground was that exception urged? Because the constitution requires us to reconsider the bill. He (Mr. F.) did not conceive that the injunction of the constitution was so peremptory. They might debate the bill from day to day, and there was no time specified within which the final vote must be taken. This matter was one of the gravest importance, and one which, it seemed to him, above all others, deserved the serious consideration of a committee. They were bound as well to consider the reasons assigned by the President for rejecting the bill, as they were to reconsider the bill itself.

It was proposed to refer this Message of the President to a large committee, at the head of which would be placed the Father of the House, and a man who once filled the high station of President. Could the friends of the Executive object to this disposition of it? Could they object to a scrutiny of the Message before the country? But it was objected that this committee might not report at all. Certainly, this objection had no weight at all, when it was remembered that the Message only would be referred, and that the bill would still lie on the table.

Mr. F. concluded by moving to lay the appeal on the table; which motion was carried in the affirmative.

The previous question was then put and carried, and the main question ordered to be now put.

Mr. ATHERTON appealed from the decision of the Speaker, that the second of the previous question brought the House to a direct vote on the motion to refer to a Select Committee. He maintained that the previous question cut off the motion to refer, and brought the House to a direct vote upon the reconsideration of the bill and its passage, notwithstanding the objections of the President.

The decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. COOPER, of Georgia, raised a similar point of order; but was also overruled.

The question was then taken on the adoption of Mr. ADAMS's motion to refer the Message of the President to a Select Committee of 18, and carried in the affirmative, as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Appleton, Arnold, Ayer, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, William Butler, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Casey, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, G. Davis, Jno. Edwards, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, A. L. Foster, Gamble, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Granger, Green, Hall, Halsted, Howard, Hudson, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, James, John P. Kennedy, King, Lane, Linn, McKennan, Thomas F. Marshall, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Moore, Morgan, Morrow, Owsley, Pearce, Pendleton, Powell, Ramsey, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Ridgway, Rodney, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Shepperd, Slade, Sollers, Stanly, Stratton, Alexander H. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Summers, Tallafarro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Wallace, Warren, Washington, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—108.

NAYS.—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Beeson, Bidlack, Black, Bowne, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, John Campbell, Cary, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Colquitt, Mark A. Cooper, Cushing, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Doan, Doig, John C. Edwards, Egbert, John G. Floyd, Thomas F. Foster, Gilmer, William O. Goode, Gordon, Gustine, Gwin, Habersham, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Houston, Hubbard, Hunter, Charles J. Ingersoll, William W. Irwin, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Lewis, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Mitchell, Newhard, Parmenter, Plumer, Proffit, Reding, Reynolds, Riggs, Rogers, Roosevelt, Sanford, Saunders, Shields, Snyder, Steenrod, Sumter, Sweeney, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Van Buren, Ward, Watterson, Weller, James W. Williams, Wise, and Wood—84.

Mr. COOPER, of Pennsylvania, then moved that the bill be, for the present, laid upon the table.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON raised a point of order, whether the motion could be received. He contended that the first question now to be taken was on the passage of the bill, and no motion to lay it on the table could be entertained in order.

The SPEAKER overruled the point of order, and was sustained by the House.

Mr. ATHERTON inquired whether, in case the bill be now laid on the table, it would not require a vote of two-thirds to take it up?

The SPEAKER said no, a majority might take it up.

Mr. GILMER inquired whether, in the event that the bill was laid on the table, it would not be in order to introduce another revenue bill?

The SPEAKER said it would, provided the bill proposed to be introduced was dissimilar from that returned by the President with his objections.

Mr. GILMER remarked that he should certainly not wish to bring in such a bill as that which had been vetoed.

The question was then taken upon laying the bill upon the table, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 97, noes 78.

THURSDAY, August 11.

The Select Committee on the Veto.

The following gentlemen compose the Select Committee of thirteen to which the President's Message, returning, with his objections, the tariff bill, has been referred: Messrs. ADAMS of Massachusetts, MORROW of Ohio, GRANGER of New York, TRUMAN SMITH of Connecticut, BOTTS of Virginia, PEACOCK of Maryland, RAYNER of North Carolina, JAMES COOPER of Pennsylvania, T. J. CAMPBELL of Tennessee, GILMER of Virginia, W. W. IRWIN of Pennsylvania, ROOSEVELT of New York, and C. J. INGERSOLL of Pennsylvania.

Judicial Circuit Bill.

Mr. BARNARD moved that the House take up on its third reading, the bill to amend the act entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled an act to amend the judicial system of the United States."

The Clerk read the bill a third time, and the question came up on its passage.

Mr. JONES, of Virginia, said he had an amendment which he wished to submit to the bill; and for that purpose he moved to recommit it, with instructions to amend the bill as follows:

That, hereafter, the eastern and western districts of Pennsylvania, and the district of Michigan, shall constitute the third circuit;

The districts of Maryland, Delaware, and New Jersey shall constitute the fourth circuit;

The districts of Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina shall constitute the fifth circuit;

The districts of Georgia and Alabama shall constitute the sixth circuit;

The districts of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri shall constitute the seventh circuit;

The districts of Kentucky, East and West Tennessee, and Arkansas shall constitute the eighth circuit; and

The eastern district of Louisiana and the district of Mississippi shall constitute the ninth circuit.

He said he would remark to the House that his object was to avoid what appeared to him to be the greatest possible injustice to the State which he had the honor in part to represent, and to one of the judges of their circuit courts. The object which it was desirable to accomplish, he believed, would be accomplished by his amendment. The advantages of the judicial system would be extended to every part of the Union, and the labor would be equitably distributed amongst the judges; and in the last

2d Sess.]

Judicial Circuit Bill.

[August, 1842.]

place, as far as was practicable, they would consult the convenience of those on whom those duties would fall. He was aware that gentlemen who had not turned their attention to this subject, would not be able to act understandingly, and to pass upon the amendment which he had deemed it his duty this morning to present, without some time for consideration. He had, therefore, thought it better that the whole subject should be recommitted, whereby an opportunity would be afforded to those who felt an interest in the subject to direct their attention to it, and to judge of the advantages of the scheme which he now proposed. It would be seen that it did injustice to the judge of one circuit; and he proposed so to amend, as in the first place to add to the 4th judicial circuit the State of New Jersey, in the place of the State of Virginia, as the present bill proposes. The present bill proposes entirely to abolish the 5th judicial circuit of Virginia and North Carolina—a circuit, too, which, upon an examination, would be found to be the third, in point of business, in the Union. The business of that circuit, according to a report of 1838-'39, caused a heavier docket than any other circuit in the United States, save two. It would be found, too, that the population of that circuit, which this bill proposed to abolish, was little short of 2,000,000 persons. And it was a circuit, too, highly commercial, and skirting many hundred miles of seaboard, which gave rise to many hundred admiralty cases. There was no one element which constituted a circuit, which the circuit which this bill proposes to abolish did not possess in a degree as great as any other, save two. If population were a necessary element, that circuit had a population little short of two millions; if business were a necessary ingredient, that circuit was the third in the Union; if several hundred miles of seaboard, giving rise to admiralty cases, were an ingredient, then this circuit had that necessary ingredient; and there was no ingredient which applied to any other, that did not apply to this in a greater degree than any other, save two, as he was prepared to show by the petition of the judge on whose application the subject had been brought before the Congress of the United States. It was proposed then to abolish the fifth judicial circuit, and to create a circuit eight hundred miles from the place where the fifth circuit now exists; and the consequence would be, that the judge now residing in that fifth circuit must be transferred from that circuit, which it was proposed to abolish, to that which it was proposed to create, at the sacrifice of all the social ties which bind him, and which have been going on through life—and a transfer from a climate which they knew to be salubrious, to the pestilential atmosphere of New Orleans and Mobile; presenting the alternative of great risk or resignation, which he hoped was not the object of any gentleman. He could not believe that such motives influenced any gentleman of that body; he would not suppose it, because it would be to suppose that gentlemen were aiming a deadly blow at the independence of the judiciary itself. He could not, therefore, believe it. But such would be the consequences; and if those consequences could be avoided by an equalization of the duties among the judges, which the law devolved upon them, he believed it to be their duty so to equalize the duties amongst those whose duties they were consulting, and at the same time, as far as practicable, the convenience of those judges upon whom the law had cast those duties.

He had already presented to the House the consequences which were to result from the passage of this bill; and the question naturally presented itself to their consideration, whether those consequences might not be averted. He had shown that the circuit was large in territorial extent; that it was large in population, and in its business. He had endeavored, also, to point out to the House the result to the individual whose business it was to perform those duties; and now, if by any arrangement of the circuit, they could accomplish the objects desired, without subjecting any portion of the country, or the judges, to inconvenience, it was desirable that such an object should be accomplished. His amendment, if adopted, would add New Jersey to the 4th circuit, instead of Virginia, as the bill now proposed to place it; and to that amendment he should suppose there would be no objection. That arrangement would be more convenient, and the labor to the judges would be less.

He proposed, in the next place, that the eastern and western districts of Pennsylvania, and the district of Michigan, should be the 3d circuit, instead of including New Jersey in that circuit; which would cause but little, if any, additional duties. He proposed that the 5th circuit should be South Carolina, North Carolina, and Virginia—thus adding South Carolina to the 5th circuit, and adding, of course, very considerably to the duties which the judge would have to perform. To this, however, he (the judge) could not object. It was proposed that Georgia and Alabama should be the 6th circuit—thus giving to Judge Wayne Alabama in the place of South Carolina. The 7th circuit he proposed should be Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri. The House would observe that Missouri was added in the place of Michigan; and he was sure this arrangement would meet the approbation of the judge. The 8th district he proposed should consist of Kentucky, eastern and western Tennessee, and Arkansas. Thus, Arkansas would be added to the 8th circuit, and Missouri taken from it. The only remaining district, then, would be the 9th, which he proposed should be composed of Louisiana and Mississippi—taking from the judge Alabama and Arkansas, and leaving to him but two States. To the proposition which he had thus made, he had heard no objection; and he now submitted it to the consideration of the House. It must be obvious to all, that this arrangement would lessen the duties of the 8th circuit, by distributing them among the other judges; and he was not aware that he could propose any change in a shape more desirable.

Mr. BARNARD said the object of this bill was very simple; whereas the object of the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Jones) was complicated. The necessity had arisen for some partial reorganization of the circuits of the United States, in consequence of the great increase of the business in the extreme southernmost district of the Union, where it had been found impossible that the judge assigned to that judicial circuit could perform its duties. It was physically impossible that the duties of that district could be performed by any one judge. There had been a failure of justice; and it became the Congress of the United States to apply a remedy. This bill had been proposed for the purpose of remedying that evil. In order to do that, without an increase of the number of judges of the United States, (which would itself be an evil, but scarcely less than the existing evils,) the remedy that was absolutely necessary was, to some extent, a reorganization of the circuits, which this bill proposed to do. In order to accomplish this, it was necessary to begin a little to the north—even as far as the 4th circuit; the judge of which (the Chief Justice) had only the States of Delaware and Maryland, and it was the lightest circuit in the United States. It was proposed, without injustice to the judge, to whom that circuit might be assigned under the provisions of this bill, to add to it the State of Virginia; and certainly there could be no objection to that as a public measure. It was certain the Chief Justice did not object, nor would he if he retained that circuit. Having Virginia away, then, from the 5th circuit, it would leave only North Carolina to that circuit; and the question arose, what was to be done with it? The gentleman from Virginia said the circuit was abolished; but surely the gentleman did not mean that any portion of the United States—certainly not that portion of the 5th circuit—was left out of the judicial system. No; but it was proposed to make the 5th circuit to consist of two States different from those of which it formerly consisted; and certainly, as a measure of justice, no one ought to object to that. The remaining State of the 5th circuit, as formerly constituted, was, by this bill, to be added to the 6th circuit—adding thereby no improper burden to the judge to whom it was assigned. Those were the alterations proposed to be made by this bill; they were exceedingly simple, and they accomplished the object in view, which was to extend the judicial system to every part of the Union. The bill also proposed that the judges should adopt amongst themselves the new circuits, at their next sitting. To whom the 5th circuit should fall was to be decided by themselves. Undoubtedly it would be contested between the judge who now resided in it, and the judge of the 6th circuit. The House well knew that the judge last appointed resided in the State of Virginia, and it might be necessary to move him to Alabama or Louisiana; and was this considered any hardship on any particular judge? or ought they to legislate for the convenience of any particular judge, when the judicial system was being extended to all the people of the United States? He (Mr. B.) apprehended if it were not to consult the convenience of this judge, now residing in Virginia, they would never have heard of this amendment and complaint.

He appealed to the House to say whether an amendment which would incur so much inconvenience and injustice should be adopted.

In order to bring the House to a direct vote upon the bill, he would do what the House would bear him witness he was not accustomed to do; and that was, to move the previous question.

The House sustained the call for the previous question; and the main question having been ordered to be now put—

Mr. J. W. JONES asked for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; which were taken, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Appleton, Arnold, Arrington, Aycrigh, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Bidlack, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botta, Briggs, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, William O. Butler, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Case, Chapman, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Cross, Garrett Davis, John Edwards, Fessenden, Fillmore, A. L. Foster, Gamble, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Patrick G. Goode, Graham, Granger, Green, Gwin, Habesham, Hall, Halsted, Houston, Howard, Hudson, Charles J. Ingersoll, Joseph R. Ingersoll, William W. Irwin, James, William Cost Johnson, John P. Kennedy, King, Lane, Linn, McKennan, Samuel Mason, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Mitchell, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Orsley, Pearce, Pendleton, Pope, Proffit, Ramsay, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Ridgway, Rodney, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Sanford, Saunders, Shields, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stratton, Alexander H. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Warren, Washington, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Christopher H. Williams, Augustus Young, and John Young—115.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Atherton, Barton, Beeson, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, Cary, Clifford, Clinton, Cole, Colquitt, Mark A. Cooper, Daniel, R. D. Davis, Dean, Doan, John C. Edwards, Egbert, John H. Floyd, William O. Goode, Gordon, Harris, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Hubard, Hunter, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Andrew Kennedy, Lewis, Littlefield, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Mallory, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, Mathews, Medill, Miller, Newhard, Plumer, Reding, Reynolds, Riggs, Rogers, Roosevelt, Snyder, Steenrod, Sweney,

D. SUMA.]

Reports on the Veto.

[August, 1842.]

urney, Van Buren, Watterson, Weller, James W. Williams, and Wood—68.

FRIDAY, August 12.

Several Senate bills were reported from different standing committees, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Assumption of State Debts.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON gave notice that he would, to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a bill to meet all the current and contingent liabilities of the Government, by raising revenue from imports, to benefit the growers of grain and tobacco, by countervailing and reciprocal duties on articles specified—to prevent abuses in the collection and disbursement of the revenue, by requiring the gross amount to be paid at once into the treasury, to be drawn out only by law—to prevent defalcations, by requiring purchasers of public lands, and importers of dutiable goods, to place the amount to be paid the Government in Government depositories, or in the treasury at once, to the credit of the Government, and to receive a receipt of payment from the receivers, upon presentation of the certificate of such deposit—to benefit the States, and increase the capital of the nation, by authorizing the issue, upon the faith of the Government, of two hundred millions of Government stock, of denominations of not less than one hundred, nor exceeding one thousand dollars; to be divided among the States, the Territories, and the District of Columbia, upon the basis of federal numbers—and to suspend the operation of the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands until the redemption of the stock by the Government.

Remedial Justice.

Mr. BARNARD wished to report, from the Judiciary Committee, the bill from the Senate to provide remedial justice in the courts of the United States."

Mr. J. G. FLOYD objected.

The bill was not reported.

MONDAY, August 15.

Assumption of State Debts.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON, pursuant to notice given a few days ago, asked permission to report a bill, entitled "A bill to meet all the current and contingent liabilities of the Government, by raising revenue from imports; to benefit the growers of grain and tobacco, by countervailing and reciprocal duties on articles specified; to prevent abuses in the collection and disbursement of the revenues, by requiring the gross amount to be paid at once into the treasury, to be drawn out only by law; to prevent defalcations, by requiring purchasers of public lands, and importers of dutiable goods, to place the amount to be paid the Government in Government depositories, or in the treasury at once, to the credit of the Government, and to receive a receipt of payment from the receivers upon presentation of the certificate of such deposit; to benefit the States and increase the capital of the nation, by authorizing the issue, upon the faith of the Government, of two hundred millions of Government stock, of denominations of not less than one hundred nor exceeding one thousand dollars, to be divided among the States, the Territories, and the District of Columbia, upon the basis of federal numbers; and to suspend the operation of the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands until the redemption of stock by the Government."

Mr. BARNARD objected.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of permitting him to offer a resolution in the following terms:

Resolved, That a Select Committee of — be appointed, with instructions to consider the propriety of reporting the following bill.

Mr. BARNARD objected to the introduction of the resolution.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend; which was negatived almost unanimously.

TUESDAY, August 16.

Reports on the Veto.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Select Committee appointed to take into consideration the reasons of the President for refusing his assent to the bill entitled "An act to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes," said he was instructed by the majority of the committee to make a report.

Mr. GILMER said he, also, had a report and a protest against the course of the majority of the committee.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL likewise signified his intention to make a report.

Mr. ADAMS said he desired to read his report himself.

He then read his report as follows:

The Select Committee, to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, returning to this House the act, which originated in it, "to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes," with his objections to it, with instructions to report thereon to the House, have attended to that service, and respectfully report:

The Message is the last of a series of Executive measures, the result of which has been to defeat and nullify the whole action of the legislative authority of this Union, upon the most important interests of the nation.

At the accession of the late President Harrison, by election of the people, to the executive chair, the finances, the revenue, and the credit of the country, were found in a condition so greatly disordered, and so languishing, that the first act of his administration was to call a special session of Congress, to provide a remedy for this distempered state of the great body politic. It was even then a disease of no sudden occurrence, and of no ordinary malignity. Four years before, the immediate predecessor of General Harrison had been constrained to resort to the same expedient—a special session of Congress; the result of which had only proved the first of a succession of palliatives, purchasing momentary relief at the expense of deeper-seated disease and aggravated symptoms, growing daily more intense through the whole four years of that administration. It had expended, from year to year, from $8,000,000 to $10,000,000 beyond its income; absorbing, in that period, nearly $10,000,000 pledged for deposits with the States, $8,000,000 of stock in the Bank of the United States, from $5,000,000 to $6,000,000 of trust funds, and as much treasury notes; and was sinking under the weight of its own improvidence and incompetency.

The sentence of a suffering people had commanded a change in the administration, and the contemporaneous elections throughout the Union had placed in both Houses of Congress majorities, the natural exponents of the principles which it was the will of the people should be substituted in the administration of their Government, instead of those which had brought the country to a condition of such wretchedness and shame. There was perfect harmony of principle between the chosen President of the people and this majority, thus constituted in both Houses of Congress; and the first act of his administration was, to call a special session of Congress, for their deliberation and action upon the measures indispensably necessary for relief to the public distress, and to retrieve the prosperity of the great community of the nation.

On the 31st day of May, 1841, within three months after the inauguration of President Harrison, the Congress assembled at his call. But the reins of the executive car were already in other hands. By an inscrutable decree of Providence, the chief of the people's choice, in harmony with whose principles the majorities of both Houses had been constituted, was laid low in death. The President who had called the meeting of Congress, was no longer the President when the Congress met. A successor to the office had assumed the title, with totally different principles, though professing the same at the time of his election, which, far from harmonizing, like those of his immediate predecessor, with the majority of both Houses of Congress, were soon disclosed in diametrical opposition to them.

The first development of this new and most unfortunate condition of the General Government was manifested, by the failure, once and again, of the first great measure intended by Congress to restore the credit of the country, by the establishment of a national bank—a failure caused exclusively by the operation of the veto power by the President. In the spirit of the Constitution of the United States, the executive is not only separated from the legislative power, but made dependent upon, and responsible to it. Until a very recent period of our history, all reference, in either House of Congress, to the opinions or wishes of the President, relating to any subject in deliberation before them, was regarded as an outrage upon the rights of the deliberative body, among the first of whose duties it is to spurn the influence of the dispenser of patronage and power. Until very recently, it was sufficient greatly to impair the influence of any member to be suspected of personal subservience to the Executive; and any allusion to his wishes, in debate, was deemed a departure not less from decency than from order. An anxious desire to accommodate the action of Congress to the opinions and wishes of Mr. Tyler had led to modifications of the first bill for the establishment of a national bank, presented to him for his approval, widely differing from the opinions entertained of their expediency by the majority of both Houses of Congress; but which failed to obtain that approval for the sake of which they had been reluctantly adopted. A second attempt ensued, under a sense of the indispensable necessity of a fiscal corporation to the revenues and credit of the nation, to prepare an act to which an informal intercourse and communication between a member of the House, charged with the duty of preparing the bill, and the President of the United States himself, might secure, by compliance with his opinions, a pledge in advance of his approval of the bill, when it should be presented to him. That pledge was obtained. The bill was presented to him in the very terms which he had prescribed as necessary to obtain his sanction, and it met the same fate with its predecessor; and it is remarkable, that the reasons assigned for the refusal to approve the second bill are in direct and immediate conflict with those which had been assigned for the refusal to sign the first.

Thus the measure first among those deemed by the Legislature of the Union indispensably necessary for the salvation of its highest interests, and for the restoration of its credit, its honor, its prosperity, was prostrated, defeated, annulled, by the weak and wavering obstinacy of one man, accidentally, and not by the will of the people, invested with that terrible power—as if prophetically described by one of his own chosen ministers, at this day, as “the right to deprive the people of self-government.”

The first consequence of this executive legislation was not only to prostrate the efforts of the Legislature itself, to relieve the people from their distress, to replenish the exhausted treasury, and call forth the resources of the country, to redress the public faith to the fulfilment of the national engagements, but to leave all the burdens and embarrassments of the public treasury, brought upon it by the improvidence of the preceding Administration, bearing upon the people with aggravated pressure. The fatal error of the preceding Administration had been an excess of expenditure beyond its income. That excess had been an average of eight millions of dollars a year, at least, during the four years of its existence. The practical system of its fiscal operations had been a continued increase of expenditures and diminution of revenues; and it left, as a bequest to its successor, no effective reduction of expenses, but a double reduction of revenue to the amount of millions, to occur, of course, by the mere lapse of time, unless averted, within fifteen months, by subsequent legislation.

2d Sess.]

Reports on the Veto.

[August, 1842.]

By the double exercise of the Presidential interdiction upon the two bills for establishing a national bank, this legislation was prevented. The excess of expenditures beyond the revenue continued and increased. The double reduction of revenue prescribed by the compromise of 1833, was suffered to take its full effect; no reduction of the expenditures had been prescribed; and in the course of eighteen months since the inauguration of President Harrison, an addition of at least fifteen millions to the enormous deficit already existing in the treasury at the close of the last Administration, is now charged upon the prevailing party in Congress, by those who had made it the law; while the exercise of the veto power alone disabled the Legislature itself from the power of applying the only remedy which it was within the competency of legislation itself to provide.

The great purpose for which the special session of Congress had been called was thus defeated by the exercise of the veto power. At the meeting of Congress, at the regular annual session, the majorities of both Houses, not yielding to the discouragement of disappointed hopes and baffled energies, undertook the task of raising, by impost duties, a revenue adequate to the necessities of the treasury, and to the fulfilment of the national obligations.

By the assiduous and unremitting labors of the committees of both Houses, charged with the duties of providing for the necessities of the revenue, and for the great manufacturing interests of the Northern, Central, and Western States, which must be so deeply affected by any adjustment of a tariff to raise exclusively a revenue adequate to the necessary expenses of the Government from duties on imports, a tariff bill, believed to be nearly, if not wholly, sufficient for that purpose, was elaborated and amply discussed, through a long series of weeks, in both branches of the Legislature. The process of gestation, through which alone such a complicated system could be organized, necessarily consumed many months of time; nor were the committees of the House exempted from severe reproach, which the purchased presses of the Executive Chief are even yet casting upon Congress, without rebuke or restraint from him. The delays were occasioned by the patient and unwearied investigation of the whole subject by the appropriate committees. As the period approached when the so-called compromise tariff was to be consummated, leaving the Government without any revenue tariff sanctioned by the law, the prudence of Congress, without precipitating their decision upon the permanent system which they fondly hoped to establish, provided and sent to the President a temporary expedient, limited in its operation to the space of one month; during which, to avoid, as they thought, the possibility of a collision with the apprehended antipathies of the President, they had suspended for the same month the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands; which, by a previous law, was to take effect the day after the expiration of the compromise. Not only was this most conciliatory measure contemptuously rejected, but, in total disregard of the avowed opinions of his own Secretary of the Treasury, concurring with those nearly unanimous of all the most eminent lawyers of the land, in solitary reliance upon the hesitating opinion of the Attorney-General, he has undertaken not only to levy taxes to the amount of millions upon the people, but to prescribe regulations for its collection, and for ascertaining the value of imported merchandise, which the law had, in express terms, reserved for the legislative action of Congress.

And now, to crown this system of continual and unrelenting exercise of executive legislation by the alternate gross abuse of constitutional power, and bold assumption of powers never vested in him by any law, we come to the veto message referred by the House to this committee.

A comparative review of the four several vetoes which, in the course of fifteen months, have suspended the legislation of this Union, combined with that amphibious production, the reasons for approving and signing a bill, and at the same time striking, by judicial construction, at its most important enactment, illustrated by contemporaneous effusions of temper and of sentiment divulged at convivial festivals, and obtruded upon the public eye by the fatal friendship of sycophant private correspondents, and stripped to its naked nature by the repeated and daring assumption both of legislative and of judicial power, would present anomalies of character and conduct rarely seen upon earth. Such an investigation, though strictly within the scope of the instructions embraced in the reference to this committee, would require a voluminous report, which the scantiness of time will not allow, and which may not be necessary for maturing the judgment of the House upon the document now before them.

The reasons assigned by the President for returning to the House of Representatives, with his objections, the bill to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties, and for other purposes, are preceded by a brief dissertation upon the painful sensations which any individual invested with the veto power must feel in exercising it upon important acts of the Legislature. The paragraph is worded with extreme caution, and with obvious intent to avoid the assertion, made in such broad and unqualified terms in the letter read at the Philadelphia Independence-day dinner party, that Congress can enact no law without the concurrence of the Executive. There is in this paper a studious effort to save any individual from the imputation of asserting the unqualified independence of the Executive upon the Legislature, and the impotence of Congress to enact any law without him. That assertion, made in so explicit and unqualified terms in the Philadelphia letter, is here virtually disclaimed and disavowed. The exercise of some independence of judgment, in regard to all acts of legislation, by any individual invested with the veto power, is here curtailed and narrowed down to the mere privilege of not yielding his well-considered, most deeply fixed, and repeatedly declared opinions on matters of great public concernment, to those of a co-ordinate department, without requesting that department seriously to re-examine the subject of their difference. The co-ordinate department to the Legislature is no longer the co-ordinate branch of the Legislature. The power of Congress to enact a law without the co-operation of any individual Executive, is conceded—not merely by unavoidable inference; for the closing paragraph of the message, recurring again to the same troublesome reminiscence, observes that, after all, the effect of what he does is substantially to call on Congress to reconsider the subject. If, on such reconsideration, a majority of two-thirds of both Houses should be in favor of this measure, it will become a law, notwithstanding his objections. The truism of this remark may, perhaps, be accounted for by the surmise that it was a new discovery, made since the writing of the Philadelphia dinner-party letter; and the modest presumption ascribed to the constitution, that the Executive can commit no error of opinion unless two-thirds of both branches of the Legislature are in conflict with him, is tempered by the amiable assurance that, in that event, he will cheerfully acquiesce in a result which would be precisely the same whether he should acquiesce in it or not. The aptitude of this hypothetical position may be estimated by the calculation of the chances that the contingency which it supposes is within the verge of possibility.

The reasons assigned by the President for his objections to this bill are further preceded by a narrative of his antecedent opinions and communications on the subject of distributing the proceeds of the sales of the public lands. He admits that, at the opening of the extra session, he recommended such a distribution, but he avers that this recommendation was expressly coupled with the condition that the duties on imports should not exceed the rate of twenty per cent., provided by the compromise act of 1833.

Who could imagine that, after this most emphatic coupling of the revenue from duties of import, with revenue from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, the first and paramount objection of the President to this bill should be, that it unites two subjects which, so far from having any affinity to one another, are wholly incongruous in their character; which two subjects are identically the same with those which he had coupled together in his recommendation to Congress at the extra session? If there was no affinity between the parties, why did he join them together? If the union was illegitimate, who was the administering priest of the unhallowed rites? It is objected to this bill, that it is both a revenue and an appropriation bill. What then? Is not the act of September 4, 1841, approved and signed by the President himself, both a revenue and an appropriation bill? Does it not enact that, in the event of an insufficiency of import duties, not exceeding twenty per centum ad valorem, to defray the current expenses of the Government, the proceeds of the sales of the lands shall be levied as part of the same revenue, and appropriated to the same purposes? The appropriation of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, to defray the ordinary expenditures of the Government, is believed to be a system of fiscal management unwise, impolitic, improvident, and unjust; and it is precisely for that reason that the bill now before the House provides that they shall not be so appropriated. The public lands are the noble and inappreciable inheritance of the whole nation. The sale of them to individuals is not a tax upon the purchaser, but an exchange of equivalents, scarcely more burdensome to the grantee than if he should receive it as a gratuitous donation. To appropriate the proceeds of the sales to defray the ordinary expenses of the Government, is to waste and destroy the property. This property is held by Congress in trust. Mr. Tyler speaks of the distribution as if it was giving away the property. It is precisely the reverse. It is restoring it to the owner. To appropriate the proceeds to defray the current expenditures, is to give it up to dissipation and waste. It is, in political economy, precisely the same as if an individual landholder should sell off, year after year, parcels of his estate, and consume its proceeds in the payment of his household expenses. The first principle of political economy necessary for a nation is to raise, by taxation, within the year, the whole sum required for the expenditures of that year. Every departure from this principle is a step in the path of national bankruptcy and ruin. The daily demands of the treasury must be supplied by the income derived from taxation by the year, and not by the dissipation of the common property.

The second reason of the President for objecting to the passage of this bill, is not more ponderous than the first. It is the destitute and embarrassed state of the treasury, and the impolicy, if not unconstitutionality, of giving away a fruitful source of revenue, which, if retained, may be seized by the Government, and applied to meet its daily wants. But the President had just told us that this fruitful source of revenue was a subject wholly dissimilar in its character from that of revenue raised by duties of import—so dissimilar, that the union of them formed in his mind an insurmountable objection to the passage of the bill. "I most respectfully submit (says the message) whether this is a time to give away the proceeds of the land sales, when the public lands constitute a fund which, of all others, may be made most useful in sustaining the public credit." And how could it be made thus useful? Precisely by giving them away. By giving them away forever! For, if the principle be once established, that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands shall be substituted in the place of revenue, by taxation, to defray the ordinary annual expenses of the National Government, never more will the people of any State in this Union have the benefit of one dollar from this richest of mines of inexhaustible wealth, bestowed upon them by their bountiful Creator, for the improvement of their own condition; but given away—yes, to the last cent, given away forever—to pumper the reckless extravagance of a Government forever preaching retrenchment and economy, and forever heaping million upon million of annual expenditures "to suckle armies and dry-nurse the land."

The committee submit to the House their unhesitating opinion, that the appropriation of any part of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands to the ordinary annual expenditures, would be the only effectual and irretrievable giving away of that great and inestimable inheritance of the American people; that, if once that growing and inexhaustible fund shall be doomed to form the whole or any part of the ways and means for the annual estimates of the receipts and expenditures of the National Government, the people may bid farewell—a long farewell—to every hope of ever receiving a dollar's useful improvement from that gift of God to them, thus cruelly and perditionally wrested from their hands.

Nineteen of the States of this Union, in the ardent—perhaps, in some cases, inconsiderately ardent—pursuit of the improvement of their own condition, have become involved—some of them heavily involved—in debt. The greatest portion of this debt has been contracted for the accomplishment of stupendous works, to expedite and facili-

D SESS.]

Reports on the Veto.

[August, 1842.]

the intercourse of travel and of trade between the remotest extremes of this great Republic, warming from year to year, with redoubling millions of population. It is no exaggerated estimate of the value of these works to say that, the saving of time, of labor, and of expense, to individual citizens of the Union, enjoying the benefit of these public works, more than repays, in every single ear, the whole cost of their construction.

But, while these immense benefits have been thus secured to the people, as a community of individuals, the States which authorized them have contracted a burden of liabilities heavier than they are able to bear. They need the assistance of a friendly and powerful hand; and where should they find it but in the sympathies of the National Government?—in their fidelity to the trust committed to their charge in this immense and almost boundless public domain? The application of the proceeds of the public lands to alleviate the burden of these debts pressing upon the people of almost all the States, is, if not the only, the most unexceptionable mode of extending the mighty arm of the Union to relieve the people of the States from the pressure of the burden bearing upon them—a relief consisting only of the distribution among them of their own property—a relief furnishing them the means of paying to the United States themselves so inconsiderable portion of the debts due from the States to them; so that, by one and the same operation, the people of the States will be relieved from the intolerable pressure of their debt, and the common treasury of the Union will receive back in payment of debt no small part of the same sums allotted to the States as their respective portions of the distribution.

The committee regret that the shortness of the time which they have allowed themselves for the preparation of this report constrains them to pass over numerous other considerations, amounting to the clearest demonstration, that the distribution among the States of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, will be infinitely more conducive to the ends of justice, and to the relief of the people from their embarrassments, than the devotion of the same funds to be swallowed up in the insatiable gulf of the ordinary annual expenses of the Federal Government; to perish, in the using, like the nine millions of the fourth instalment promised to the States, the seven or eight millions of stock in the Bank of the United States, and the five or six millions of Indian trust and navy pension funds—all sunk, during the Van Buren Administration, without leaving a wreck behind.

This review of the reasons of the President for objecting to the passage of the bill might be extended far more into detail, and all leading to the conclusion that they are feeble, inconsistent, and unsatisfactory. It remains only for the House to acknowledge, by yeas and nays, the question upon the final passage of the bill; and as the majority of the committee cannot indulge, even hypothetically, the absurd hope of a majority, either in this or the other House of Congress, competent to the enactment of the bill into a law, they leave the House to determine what further measure they may deem necessary and practicable, by the legislative authority, in the present calamitous condition of the country.

They perceive that the whole legislative power of the Union has been, for the last fifteen months, with regard to the action of Congress upon measures of vital importance, in a state of suspended animation, strangled by the few times repeated stricture of the executive cord. They observe that, under these unexampled obstructions to the exercise of their high and legitimate duties, they have hitherto preserved the most respectful forbearance towards the Executive chief; that while he has, time after time, annulled, by the mere act of his will, their commission from the people to enact laws for the common welfare, they have forborne even the expression of their resentment for these multiplied insults and injuries. They believed they had a high destiny to fulfil, by administering to the people, in the form of law, remedies for the sufferings which they had too long endured. The will of one man has frustrated all their labors, and prostrated all their powers. The majority of the committee believe that the case has occurred in the annals of our Union, contemplated by the founders of the constitution, by the grant to the House of Representatives of the power to impeach the President of the United States; but they are aware that the resort to that expedient might, in the present condition of public affairs, prove abortive. They see that the irreconcilable difference of opinion and of action between the legislative and executive departments of the Government is but sympathetic with the same discordant views and feelings among the people. To them alone the final issue of the struggle must be left. In the sorrow and mortification under the failure of all their labors to redeem the honor and prosperity of their country, it is a cheering consolation to them that the termination of their own official existence is at hand; that they are even now about to return to receive the sentence of their constituents upon themselves; that the legislative power of the Union, crippled and disabled as it may now be, is about to pass, renovated and revived by the will of the people, into other hands, upon whom will devolve the task of providing that remedy for the public distempers which their own honest and agonizing energies have in vain endeavored to supply.

The power of the present Congress to enact laws essential to the welfare of the people, has been struck with apoplexy by the Executive hand. Submission to his will, is the only condition upon which he will permit them to act. For the enactment of a measure earnestly recommended by himself, he forbids their action, unless coupled with a condition declared by himself to be on a subject so totally different, that he will not suffer them to be coupled in the same law. With that condition, Congress cannot comply. In this state of things he has assumed, as the committee fully believe, the exercise of the whole legislative power to himself, and is levying millions of money upon the people, without any authority of law. But the final decision of this question depends neither upon legislative nor executive, but upon judicial authority; nor can the final decision of the Supreme Court upon it be pronounced before the close of the present Congress. In the mean time, the abusive exercise of the constitutional power of the President to arrest the action of Congress upon measures vital to the welfare of the people, has wrought conviction upon the minds of a majority of the committee, that the veto power itself must be restrained and modified, by an amendment of the constitution itself; a resolution for which they accordingly here-with respectfully report.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.
JOHN M. BOTTS.
JAMES COOPER.
K. RAYNER.
THOMAS J. CAMPBELL.
TRUMAN SMITH.
F. GRANGER.
H. S. LANE.
JEREMIAH MORROW.
J. A. PEARCE.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of both Houses concurring therein,) That the following amendment of the Constitution of the United States, in the seventh section of the first article, be recommended to the Legislatures of the several States, which, on the adoption of the same by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall become part and parcel of the constitution.

Instead of the words "two-thirds," twice repeated in the second paragraph of the said seventh section, substitute, in both cases, the words "a majority of the whole number."

Mr. GILMER rose to present a report from a minority of the committee.

Mr. ADAMS was understood to inquire whether reports were made by the minority of the committee.

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. PROFFIT rose to a point of order. The gentleman from Virginia had the floor; and he objected, therefore, to any motion from the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER replied that the gentleman from Massachusetts had the floor.

Objections were made by several gentlemen, who alleged that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILMER) had been recognized by the Chair.

Mr. ADAMS, however, proceeded; and moved that the three reports be printed; and that the resolution which he had reported from the majority of the committee be made the special order for to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. RAYNER moved the previous question. [Murmurs of dissatisfaction.]

Mr. W. O. JOHNSON rose to a question of order; which was, that, according to the constitution, the first matter which the House would have to dispose of would be the bill now on the table; and, therefore, he submitted that the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ADAMS) was not in order, and ought not to have precedence over the bill itself.

The SPEAKER explained that he had not decided the motion to be carried, but as merely before the House.

Mr. GILMER (who still retained the floor) was loudly called upon to read his report, and he accordingly read the following:

Protest and Counter Report of THOMAS W. GILMER, one of the minority of the Select Committee on the objections of the President to a bill to provide revenue, &c.

The undersigned, a member of the Select Committee to whom the objections of the President to the bill entitled "A bill to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes," were referred, being unable to concur in the views of the majority of the committee, would assign some of the reasons which have influenced him in coming to a different conclusion. He cannot refrain from inquiring for what purposes this committee has been raised, and protesting against the unprecedented and extraordinary course which a majority of the House of Representatives have determined to pursue on this occasion—a course certainly opposed to all the established usages of our Government; and, as the undersigned believes, in conflict with the provisions of the constitution. The language of the constitution is as follows: "Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it; but, if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered; and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law."

The bill in question, having passed both Houses was sent to the President, by whom it was returned to the House of Representatives, where it originated. Instead of proceeding (as the constitution directs) "to reconsider it," the bill is laid on the table, and the President's objections are referred to a select committee. In ordinary parliamentary proceedings, where a bill has passed either House of Congress, and a motion is made to reconsider the same, pending such motion, the bill itself (having once passed) is not before that House for any general purpose, and can only be brought again within the power of the House by a reconsideration of the vote on its passage. A motion, therefore, to commit, to postpone, or to lay such bill on the table, could not attain its object, and therefore could not be made. In this case, the bill had passed both Houses, and could not again come under the action of either, except by the express provision of the constitution. That provision is mandatory and explicit. It prescribes the only legislative action which can take place on the President's objections and the bill. The House is directed "to enter the objections at large on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it," (the bill.) The question of reconsideration, therefore, is raised by the constitution. It is a reconsideration of the bill—not merely of the vote on its passage; it is the only question which is raised in reference to the bill, and it is one which the House is not at liberty to evade or suppress. The objections which the constitution requires the President, if he does not approve, to assign, do no more than suspend the bill, which, without them, would become a law; and which, notwithstanding them, may become a law, if, on the reconsideration, which is not only permitted, but prescribed, it is "approved by two-thirds." The constitution, therefore, clearly contemplates that when a bill is returned with objections by the President, it shall be subjected to the test of another vote. The importance attached to this requirement

2d Sess.]

Reports on the Veto.

[August, 1842.]

by the wise and patriotic framers of the constitution, may be inferred from the provision that "in all such cases, the votes in both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays." If the Federal Executive had been invested with an absolute, instead of a qualified veto, there would have been no necessity for these precautions, to insure a vote on the reconsideration. Congress are no more at liberty to fail or refuse to reconsider the bill returned with objections, than the President would be to decline to approve or return it with his objections. The bill cannot be altered, in any respect, by one or both Houses. The House to which it is returned is not at liberty to separate the objections from the bill. They are to be entered on its journal, and the bill—if two-thirds shall pass it—is to be sent, "together with the objections, to the other House." Before any bill can become a law, it must be "presented to the President." If he approve, it is a law. If he return it, he is bound to state his objections; and Congress are not permitted to convert the qualified power of the Executive to subject the bill to another direct vote on the yeas and nays, into an unqualified and absolute veto, as they may effectually do by refusing to proceed to the reconsideration, or by silently acquiescing in the President's objections without another vote. The objections of a President operate as a check on the unconstitutional or inconsiderate legislation of a mere majority in the first instance; and two-thirds, on the reconsideration, are as effectual a check on the veto.

Under the constitution, "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings;" but in this particular case, the constitution itself has determined the rule of proceeding. The question, then, is, whether that rule is paramount or inflexible; or whether, like ordinary rules, it can be modified, suspended, or abrogated. Does the reconsideration enjoined by the constitution give the House a more extensive power over the bill than it had under its own rules after its passage? It is not denied that the reconsideration involves the merits of the bill, as well as the force of the Executive objections; nor that deliberation and discussion are essential. It is maintained, however, that the action of the House is prescribed, and that it is limited to a single object—and that is the reconsideration of the bill as it passed both Houses, and as it was returned from the Executive with his objections. If it can be laid on the table, or postponed, or committed, it may be withdrawn from the reconsideration of the House by the vote of a mere majority. That same majority may refuse to take it up again, and thus prevent a vote on the reconsideration. In this instance, a majority have laid the bill on the table, and have refused to take it up. It depends on the will of that majority whether it shall be taken up and reconsidered at all. They have then claimed, and by force of numbers exercised, an authority which may altogether disregard and dispense with the positive requisition of the constitution. They have separated the bill from the objections. The former may, or it may not, be brought to a direct vote on its merits with the yeas and nays. It may be expedient for the bare majority of four, by which it originally passed, to permit this bill to slumber forever, under the indirect vote to lay on the table—a vote which does not involve the merits of the bill, nor meet the requisitions of the constitution. The power to lay on the table, is a power which can also commit to a select or standing committee, or to a committee of the whole, where the yeas and nays cannot be had, or which can postpone indefinitely beyond the session. The power assumed in these different modes is the same. It is the power to control the constitution by arbitrary rules, and by the party vote of a bare majority of one House of Congress. The message containing the President's objections has been referred to this committee. The power of the committee does not extend beyond the subject referred. Reasons or recommendations may be reported, in answer or in connection with the objections; but it is not competent for this, or any other committee, constitutionally to report any measure which will obstruct the reconsideration of the bill. The committee can, then, neither suggest nor accomplish any practical object of legislation, consistent with the constitution. They cannot report an original bill, or any amendment to the bill now on the table. They may recommend an impeachment or a censure of the President, but if this recommendation assumes the form of a resolution, the question in the House is on the report of the committee, and not on the bill. As two questions cannot be voted on at once, this question must either supersede the reconsideration of the bill, or it must interpose a new question, not contemplated by the constitution.

It is not maintained that the consideration enjoined by the constitution precludes discussion in any form; but that the reconsideration of the bill, with the objections, is imperative, and that it is not within the legitimate power of Congress, by any sort of parliamentary device, to avoid it, or to alter or modify the direct question presented by the constitution, by qualifying or connecting it with any other extraneous question. If it be true, then, that this committee can report no measure to the House affecting the bill which the House is required to reconsider, nothing remains which they can do, but to present, in the shape of a report, arguments which could be as well, if not better, presented in debate. This is the most innocent design which can be imputed to this movement. It is to embody in a more imposing form, and to present from a new point of attack, principles and prejudices which have always been hostile to the true spirit of the constitution. Under the specious pretext of defending Congress from what is imagined to be an attack on their constitutional rights, it is sought to strip the other departments of Government of powers which the constitution has confided to them; to remove every constitutional obstruction to the arbitrary will of Congress; to destroy the equilibrium of our well-considered system of government; and to assume unlimited jurisdiction, not only over the co-ordinate branches, but over the States and the people. Encouraged by the present embarrassed condition of the country and our public affairs, deriving fresh political hopes from the general gloom and despondency which their own proceedings have cast over the Union, it is attempted to extort from the sufferings of the people some sanction for principles of government which their judgment has never failed to repudiate. The history of our Government abounds in examples of conflicts between the several departments. It has sometimes happened that all the departments combined to overthrow the constitution, and, but for the intelligence of the people, and the controlling power of the suffrage, in restoring the supremacy of the Constitution over the Legislature, the Executive, and the Judiciary, such combinations must have been fatal to our institutions. While it is the privilege and the duty of every citizen to arraign either department of the Government, or any public officer, for infidelity to the constitution and the laws, it is neither wise, just, nor patriotic, for one of those departments to impair the confidence or the harmony which should subsist between the separate branches of the public service, by fomenting prejudices and discord. They are all agents of the people. Their duties are prescribed by a law which all acknowledge as supreme.

Without inquiring into the motives which induced the framers of the constitution to distribute the powers of our Government as they have done, and to confer the particular power in question on the Executive; and without reviewing the actual experience of the Government, as to what (from a supposed analogy, not at all obvious, to certain powers in other Governments) is commonly called the veto power, it is natural that the mind should approve or condemn the exercise of this power, according to its interests, opinions, or prejudices on the subject to which it is applied. This is true, not only as to this, but as to all other powers of Government. Zeal in the pursuit of some cherished object of interest or ambition induces some men not only to complain when they are thwarted by what they easily believe to be an improper exercise of power, but to make war on the established forms of government, and to seek, by revolution or radical change, what they cannot lawfully obtain. The disposition, which has been recently manifested to some extent, to disturb the well-adjusted checks of the constitution, by claiming powers for Congress which that instrument does not confer, or by denying to a co-ordinate branch of Government powers which it does confer, in order to establish a particular system of party policy, or to carry an election, must be regarded with deep regret and serious apprehension by the people—those whose province it is to judge, and who, free from the bias of mere party politics, can think and feel and act under the superior influences of patriotism. Our Government has survived the shock of many severe political contests, because hitherto these contests have involved only a difference of opinion as to the principles and policy of the Government, as organized. It has been deemed unwise, as well as dangerous, to exasperate local or general prejudices against the acknowledged forms of the Government, and to enlist the spirit of revolution as an auxiliary to the spirit of party.

It has been lately proposed to abolish the powers resulting to the Executive from the clause of the constitution already cited. There is no evidence of any disposition to second this purpose, either on the part of Congress itself, or on the part of the States. Despairing of any peaceful change, it is now proclaimed that this power is so dangerous to liberty as to justify an appeal to arms. This is urged by those who desire to secure the enactment of measures believed probably by a majority of the people of the United States, and certainly by the present Executive, to be either unconstitutional, or grossly inexpedient and injurious. To obtain the charter for a national bank, when there are few bold enough to believe that any prudent man would hazard his capital or his confidence under the charter, or still further to impoverish an already empty and indebted treasury, it is proposed to abolish, by amending the constitution, or by revolution, one of the checks by which the Executive Department is authorized to arrest the unconstitutional measures of Congress. A double innovation is meditated against the constitution, and violence is invoked to annul one of its Executive barriers, because it is an obstacle to the encroachments of the Legislature. If the veto power, as it is called, were abolished in the Executive, it would remain in the Judiciary; unconstitutional legislation might still be arrested there, and it would not be in the power of two-thirds to control the decisions of the Supreme Court. Hence it is, perhaps, that distrust has been recently so emphatically expressed as to the competency of that court to decide on questions which have unfortunately arisen as to the authority of the Government to collect any revenue since the 30th of June last. The objects of those who believe that certain measures of party policy are of more consequence than the present organization of our Government, can only be partially accomplished by abrogating the veto of the Executive. There remains, besides the veto of the Judiciary, the veto of the people. All the powers of our Government, into whatever hands they may be distributed, must be exercised under responsibility to the laws and to popular opinion. When a President returns a bill to either House of Congress, with his objections, he is responsible to the law, to all its penalties, and, like every Representative of a State or a district, he is responsible also to the people. These are the great checks of our system; and they are serving the most important end for which they have been established, when they restrain the licentious ambition which is chafed only by constitutions, by law, or by the popular will.

For the first time in the history of our institutions, they are exposed to a novel experiment. It is, nevertheless, one contemplated by the constitution. It is to be tried under very peculiar circumstances. It remains to be seen whether a Vice President, called, in the regular order of events, to the chief executive office, can administer the Government without a party pledged in advance to approve or to oppose his administration; or, in other words, whether the vigor and security of our Government abide in the constitution and laws, or in a mere party. With regard to the constitutional convictions of the present incumbent of the executive office, on some of the subjects to which they have been applied, it is undoubtedly true that they were known to those by whom he was nominated and elected to the second office of the Government, and by many of whom he is now bitterly denounced for being what they, in the election, proclaimed him to be. With regard to the exercise of the veto power in this instance, a recurrence to a few facts of public notoriety and recent date will enable an impartial public to decide.

Before the death of the late President, his proclamation had issued, convening Congress in extra session. The necessity for this was alleged to exist in the state of our finances. Congress assembled on the 31st of May, 1841. It has been in session, with the interval of rather more than two months, ever since. Various expedients were resorted to, during the extra session, to enable the Government to meet its engagements and defray its ordinary current expenses. Since that period, the pay of the army, the navy, and the civil list, has been frequently suspended, from the utter destitution of the treasury. Loans authorized by Congress have failed to be negotiated on any terms. Treasury notes of Government have depreciated, and been returned by the needy public creditor under protest. Every device to sustain the sinking credit of the Government, short of a direct tax, has failed; and this, at a period when our foreign relations were eminently precarious.

2d Sess.]

Reports on the Veto.

[August, 1842.]

The distribution of the proceeds of the public lands from the treasury of the United States to the treasury of the States, was among the earliest measures urged at the extra session. A loan for $12,000,000 had been authorized for the relief of the national treasury, but not negotiated, when a bill distributing the proceeds of the public lands passed both Houses of Congress, and, with the approbation of the Executive, became a law. It contained a clause, without which it could never have obtained either the legislative or the executive sanction, providing, in view of the embarrassed condition of the treasury, that, whenever the duties on any article of foreign importation exceeded 20 per cent., the distribution to the States should cease, and the proceeds of the lands should again be applied to pay the debts and defray the expenses of the Federal Government. A revenue bill also passed at the extra session, raising the duties on most articles which were free under the compromise of 1833 to 20 per cent. This bill was framed with the design to avoid any conflict with the 20 per cent. principle of the compromise of 1833, or with the 20 per cent. condition in the distribution act.

At the commencement of the present session, the President, in his annual message, apprised Congress that there would be a deficit in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1842, of $627,557 90. At a subsequent period of this session, he urged on Congress, in a special message, the inability of the treasury to meet the demand created against it by appropriations which Congress had made, the necessity of providing adequate means to sustain the Government by an increase of duties on imports, and every other means within their power. He also recommended the repeal of the distribution act, and a pledge of the land fund for the redemption of the public debt. Though less than half of the $12,000,000 loan authorized by the act of 1841 had been taken, and though Congress found itself under the necessity, at an early period of the session, of authorizing an issue of $5,000,000 of treasury notes, in addition to the loan of $12,000,000; yet no revenue bill was reported until the 3d day of June, 1842, after Congress had been in session six months, and when the country was looking anxiously for an adjournment. Congress had gone on meanwhile to appropriate many millions of dollars, which the Government did not possess, and which it could not obtain without the agency of the Legislative Department. The revenue bill was reported on the 3d of June, and taken up, for the first time, in Committee of the Whole, on the 8th of June.

The final reduction of duties to 20 per cent. under the compromise of 1833, was to take effect on the 30th of June; and then the distribution under the act of 1841 was to commence, provided the duties were not raised beyond 20 per cent. On the 7th of June, the Committee of Ways and Means, which had reported the revenue bill on the 3d, brought in what was called a provisional bill, the ostensible object of which was to provide for a temporary collection of duties, until time could be afforded for the passage of the general revenue bill. The necessity for some such measure was alleged to exist, on account of a doubt whether duties could be collected after the 30th of June, without additional legislation. The revenue bill provided for a general increase of duties beyond 20 per cent., and its passage would necessarily have enforced the suspending clause of the distribution act. The provisional bill reported on the 7th of June, contained no reference to this suspending clause of the distribution act. A second provisional bill was reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, with the same general objects as the first, which had been reported only two days before, and with a proviso repealing the suspending clause of the distribution act. The first provisional bill was never considered. The second was passed by the House on the 15th June, went to the Senate, returned with amendments, which were concurred in on the 25th of June, and was returned by the President, with objections, on the 29th of June. These objections were founded on the deplorable condition of the treasury, and on the expediency of adhering, under the circumstances, to the terms on which distribution had been authorized by the act of 1841. The revenue bill did not pass until the 5th of August. It was returned, with the President's objections, on the 9th.

These objections are now before the committee. They are substantially the same as those which accompanied the provisional bill the 29th of June. The revenue bill contained a clause most unequivocally repealing the suspension of the distribution act, which its own passage would have enforced; and thus it was, in effect, the enactment of a new distribution law, appended to the revenue bill.

Each House deliberately refused to strike out this clause, and persisted in associating, in ludicrous contrast, two measures—the one, an act to raise money for the support of Government by the imposition of taxes; the other to distribute the land revenues to the States. The majority of both Houses had proclaimed, with the concurrence of the President, in September 1841, that distribution should only be made when the duties were below 20 per cent. The majority of both Houses had again and again proclaimed, in 1842, the necessity of raising the duties above 20 per cent., and yet insisted on distributing the land fund, without regard to the conditions they themselves had so recently prescribed—without regard to the situation of the treasury—and without regard to the burdens which might be imposed on the people. They might have attempted to raise revenue from imposts, and to distribute the land fund, in separate bills. Then each measure would have rested on its own intrinsic merits. But they persisted in connecting them in one bill. The restriction in the distribution act of 1841 was designed to guard against increasing the burdens of taxation, to fill a vacuum which might be occasioned by distribution. The legislation of 1842 is designed to create a vacuum, that it may be filled by increased taxation. There is probably no precedent in the history of any Government, for the union, under such circumstances, of a revenue and an appropriation bill. As there was no necessity for such union apparent to the public, we are at liberty to infer that it resulted from a consciousness that one or both the measures could not have separately commanded a majority. The exigencies of the national treasury were supposed to furnish a favorable opportunity for Congress to extort terms on which alone the Government should be supplied with revenue to meet their own appropriations. It would have been as proper, under the circumstances, for Congress to annex a charter for a bank, or a fiscal agent, or a fiscal corporation, as a condition precedent to a revenue bill; and to raise an issue with the President or with their constituents, if such a bill had not received the Executive sanction.

August, 1842.]

Reports on the Veto.

[27th CON.

It is a great mistake to suppose that this is an issue between the majority of Congress and the President. There is an issue between this same majority in 1841 and 1842. The President abides by terms which this majority prescribed for themselves and the treasury in 1841, and they can prefer no accusation against him for adhering to their own position. He might, with more propriety, upbraid them for abandoning it. The issue is between this majority and the country. They who arraign the President for obstructing the will of Congress, should be well assured that Congress does not obstruct the will of the States and the people it represents. Congress is neither infallible nor irresponsible. If this were a question in which none felt any interest besides the President of the United States and the members of Congress, there might be some plausibility in the attempt to narrow the issue to them; but the subject of revenue is one in which those who pay, are apt to feel as deep an interest as those who levy taxes. Every citizen of the United States, moreover, feels a solicitude in the Government, and all that concerns it; in the fundamental principles on which it is based; in the measures which characterize its administration; in its justice, its faith, and its fame; and the judgment of no impartial man can be blinded or biased by the effort to conceal the true points of this issue, under cover of a petty political altercation between a party majority in Congress and the President.

Has the President either assumed a power which does not belong to his office, or has he abused a power which does belong to it? It has not been denied that the power in question exists under the constitution. Indeed, it has been proposed to abolish it by amendment. If it has been abused, it was done either corruptly and wantonly, or under an error of Executive judgment. If there is evidence of the least corruption in the President's conduct, he should be impeached. The power of impeachment has been confined to the House of Representatives. It is the duty, therefore, of the majority, who accuse the President, to arraign him under articles of impeachment before the Senate, if they believe him to be guilty of any impeachable offence. If he has neither assumed power, nor abused it corruptly, then the issue dwindles to a mere question—who is right as to a measure of policy? If the undersigned were allowed, by the circumstances which compel him to omit many considerations very proper to the subject, he would not despair of showing that, independent of all the extraneous prejudices and political feelings which the advocates of error on this occasion endeavor to bring to their aid, the mere opinion of the Executive in this case is right, and the mere opinion of Congress is wrong. The narrative of legislation on the subject of revenue, at the late extra session, and since December last, which has been given, will furnish the facts from which, without explanation or argument, the country will be enabled to judge whether the majority in Congress or the President have erred in matters of opinion. The occasion is both too novel and too grave to permit an argument on such minor questions, affecting the comparative taste or wisdom of the majority of Congress and the President. As the mere question of opinion, however, the President should not be condemned, without some charity by those who concurred with him so recently as September, 1841. If the charge preferred by this majority is understood, it involves no breach of the constitution, or of any law on the part of the President; but they accuse him of obstructing their will. The accusation implies either a general infallibility on the part of the accusers, or a particular exemption from error on this occasion; or it denies to the President the right and the responsibility of judging on a subject which Congress submitted to his judgment. They will find that there are two sides to this question. The Executive is a co-ordinate department of the Government. The President is under no obligation implicitly to approve every bill which the Legislature may pass. He is commanded either to approve, or, if he cannot approve, to return, with objections, all bills sent to him; and Congress are required to send to him all bills which they pass. It is alleged, however, as a complaint, that the President has thought proper to exercise his constitutional discretion, and withheld his approbation from other bills which Congress have passed. Still, the question of power and the question of duty on his part, and on the part of Congress, is the same in each instance. Can Congress excuse themselves for refusing to provide revenue for the Government, because the President did not approve either of the forms in which, at the extra session, they attempted to charter a Bank of the United States? Is the issue, which has been so solemnly proclaimed on this occasion, to embrace the long-agitated question of currency, besides that of revenue? Do the majority mean to declare that they will permit no revenue to be collected (or, in other words, that the Government shall cease) unless two conditions are submitted to: first, the charter of a bank in some form; and, second, the distribution of the land fund? If this be the object, then these questions should have been all connected in one bill. It has been deemed prudent, however, to connect only two of them. The questions of distributing the land fund, and of raising revenue for the support of Government, were united in such a manner as to leave it doubtful whether the majority of Congress considered themselves bound to provide revenue first for the States, or for the United States. Since they insisted on uniting them in a second bill, after a former bill had been vetoed on account of their union; and since it is now declared that Congress is disgraced if it recedes so far as to separate the question; and that the United States Government shall have no revenue, unless the land fund is distributed to the States, there can no longer be a doubt of the determination, either to bestow the ways and means of the Federal treasury on the State treasuries, or to starve the Government of the United States. The majority seem not only resolved on this, but they are resolved to accomplish their object only in one particular mode—and that is, by legislating on the two subjects in the same bill.

[2d Sess.]

Reports on the Veto.

[August, 1842.]

What, then, is the issue? It is not whether the power exercised by the President is a lawful power. Its existence is conceded by the proposition to abolish it. It is not whether that power has been corruptly abused. If this is believed, the majority are guilty of culpable neglect of duty in not impeaching. It is not whether the States shall have the land fund; it is not whether the United States shall have a revenue; but it is whether this Government shall have revenue, and the States shall have the land fund in a particular form of legislation, which Congress have resolved, at all hazards, to persevere in—a form of legislation resorted to, first, to coerce the votes of Congress, and persisted in to coerce the Executive by putting the treasury under duress.

As the majority of Congress seem to view this question, it is a mere parliamentary punctilio, on which some of them would rouse the country to arms. In other aspects, however, in which it will be viewed by those who, in this case, are more impartial arbiters than either this majority or the President, it is a question worthy of the most serious consideration. The Government has now no revenue. It is in debt; it is completely organized under the forms of the constitution; its Legislature, its Judiciary, its Executive, are at their posts; its army is in the field; its navy is on the sea; its representatives are honorably accredited by all foreign Governments as the representatives of foreign Governments are here. There is profound peace, and a general sense of security throughout the country. Our fields are teeming with abundant harvests. Industry and economy are gradually repairing the evils of extravagance and indolence, and, as they develop our great national resources, they are restoring a general confidence, which will revive prosperity, and teach us (for a time, at least) the danger of preferring again artificial wealth and delusive splendor to real independence and substantial comfort. With the means of individual happiness and national glory within our reach, the people of the United States may well ask why it is that the constitution has failed—why the laws are impotent—and why the Representatives of twenty-six States, and seventeen millions of people, are unable to provide revenue to save the Government from disgrace and dissolution. A majority of these Representatives have given the answer. It is because they do not choose to do what they have the power to do. They forget their duty to the country and the constitution, and remember only the imaginary resentments which they suppose to exist between themselves and the President of the United States. If these resentments were real, will the country tolerate a suspension of the entire Government until a political dispute is settled, by revolution or reason, between those who ought to feel on both sides a weight of official responsibility which permits no motive of ambition or animosity to inflict on their country the consequences of their passion? Whence can such resentments arise, unless from motives of ambition equally unworthy of a President and a legislator? If the majority in Congress wish to submit an issue to the country involving any policy of Government, any question of constitutional liberty or legislative expediency, let them not present it in the shape of a mere controversy between themselves and the President; let them invoke the judgment, and not merely the prejudices, of their countrymen to decide it.

It too often happens that a party attempts to prescribe law for the constitution, and to interpolate substantive restrictions or enlargements of the powers to be derived from the text. Necessity or expediency is always the pretext. The first necessity and the soundest expediency in a Government of a written constitution, is to preserve its organic law inviolate. That instrument may be as effectually changed (and the Government is changed with it) by this means, as by an amendment in the prescribed mode. The constitution is designed to furnish a permanent, uniform, and universal rule of government, while parties fluctuate and change with the caprices of passion or the convictions of judgment. These decisions of mere party are too apt to be regarded as authority; and hence the conflict which frequently occurs between them and the constitution itself. The undersigned has already expressed his conviction that the proceedings in this case are in conflict with the constitution. It is to be regretted that it is not the only evidence of a disposition, during the present Congress, to disregard the authority of that instrument, or to create unnecessary collisions between the Legislative and the Executive Departments. When a subject distinctly embraced in one bill has been the cause of the Executive objections to that bill, respect for the opinion of a co-ordinate department, or desire to avoid unnecessary collisions with it, would suggest the propriety of not immediately pressing that identical subject upon the consideration of the Executive, without some intimation of a change of opinion. The objections of the President to the provisional revenue bill, and the general revenue bill, are the same. They relate to the insertion of a clause directing distribution of the land fund without regard to the rates of duties on imports. The first bill was temporary in its duration, and comparatively unimportant in its objects. It was sent to the President in advance of the second, and only five days prior to the 30th of June, when it was alleged there would no longer be authority to collect revenue. It contained a clause in relation to the distribution of the land fund. It was vetoed on account of that clause. On the 5th of August, Congress passed the second or general revenue bill, containing a clause still more unequivocally authorizing distribution, notwithstanding the 20 per cent. restriction of the act of 1841. Whether the first of these bills was designed only to feel the way for the second, and to ascertain if the President could be brought to the dilemma, after objecting to that bill, of either vetoing a revenue bill, or submitting to the distribution clause, in order to obtain the means of carrying on the Government, or to re-enact, by the vote of a majority, a single principle which had been so recently vetoed, and which could not obtain the vote of two-thirds, it is a part of the history of these proceedings which may shed some light on our examination. The legislation of Congress, at the late extra session, on the subject of the bank and its various modifications, illustrates the same disposition. Two bills, under different titles, but both for the object of chartering a national bank, were successively passed, sent to the Executive, and were returned with objections. If, then, there has been a disposition on the part of the Executive to resist the action of Congress on certain subjects, there has certainly been a corresponding disposition on the part of Congress to attack, and to repeat the attacks, on the Executive.

August, 1842.]

Reports on the Veto.

[27TH CONG.]

Congress have appropriated the money required to carry on the Government. They have authorized the debts which are contracted. They alone, under the constitution, can furnish means of meeting their own appropriations. It is not in the power of the minority of Congress to legislate. All that the Executive can do is to convene Congress, should it adjourn without providing revenues to carry on the Government. It is hoped, however, that calmer consideration will inspire some motive of public duty stronger than any feelings of party resentment. The threats of violence which have been heard from quarters whence better counsels should have proceeded, will not disturb the repose nor provoke the dignity of a free and enlightened people.

THOMAS W. GILMER.

Mr. INGERSOLL read a report on behalf of himself and Mr. ROOSEVELT, two members of said committee, also in opposition to the majority report, as follows:

The undersigned, members of the Select Committee to whom the President's Message is referred, submit a brief and hasty protest against the elaborate report of the majority.

Free Government depends on constitutional checks; otherwise, democracy is despotism. Each House of Congress has an absolute negative upon the other. The American judiciary exercises power to annul laws. The Union and the States, respectively, in some instances, nullify each other's legislation; the sovereign arbiter, being the people, never yet, in more than fifty years of prosperous experience, failing to interpose their political omnipotence, peaceably, intelligibly, and for the general welfare. In addition to these fundamental principles, which are the conservative bases of our free institutions, the Constitution of the United States requires the Executive Magistrate, if he disapproves an act of Congress, to return it, with his objections, to its authors, and call upon them to reconsider, before it can become a law. There is no veto, as is too often supposed, either in the word or the spirit of the constitution; but mere authority for executive reference to legislative reconsideration. Unfounded resemblance has been ignorantly supposed between this American provision for deliberation to prevent errors of passion and precipitancy, and the absolute inhibition of the Roman, or the modern royal veto. There is no resemblance whatever between them. They are as unlike as free and absolute government; as unlike as the Polish veto, which allowed every member of a single branch legislature, without reason, to repudiate any of its proceedings by his single and solitary voice. Equally unfounded is it to suppose (as ignorance of their operations frequently does) that the monarchs of France and England are not absolute enough to use the veto. They use it every day; one of them, in the exclusive right of initiating all legislation—and both of them by the vaster means of executive influence. What has been passionately stigmatized as the one-man power in this country, is, in principle, the same thing as the separation of Congress into two bodies, to correct the errors of each other; though much less powerful, because the power of a majority, by a single vote in either House, is absolute, while that of the Executive is merely suspensive and subordinate. Had all the members of the House of Representatives voted on the tariff bill, it would have been either carried or lost by one vote—and that, the casting vote of the Speaker. There is much of one-man power in all free government.

The majorities in Congress in 1774, on all the essential points and principles of the declaration of rights, were but one, two, or three. All the great critical questions about men and measures, from 1774 to 1778, were decided by the vote of a single State, and that often by the vote of one individual. The Declaration of Independence itself was so carried. The English revolution of 1688 was determined by one or two votes in Parliament. The King of France was condemned to death by a very few votes. Jefferson was elected in place of Burr, after thirty-seven trials, by one vote. The expedition in 1745, from New England against Cape Breton, which gave peace to the world, was carried in the House of Representatives of Massachusetts by a single vote. Most of the acts of Congress in the memorable session of 1794, were carried by the casting vote of the Vice President. The vote of New York, which finally led to the convention for forming the present constitution, after the failure of the Virginia attempt, by which only the States were represented at Annapolis, was carried by one vote. The first Bank of the United States failed to be rechartered by the casting vote of the Vice President. The late bank of the United States was negatived, when first proposed, by the Speaker's casting vote. This instructive enumeration might be much enlarged, teaching that the responsibility of one man has often saved States and changed constitutions. Such salutary executive authority has been exercised from the outset of the American Government with marked approval by an intelligent people, wisely appreciating, in their chief representative, the inestimable value of a firm and judicious interposition of this conservative and indispensable relief. For the first time in the annals of the United States, this immediate emanation of the constitution is subjected, on the motion of an ex-President, (the chairman of this committee), to the obstruction of the mere technicalities of legislation. The constitution commands us to journalize the President's objections, and then vote on them. The House did so on his preliminary objections to a like bill, but sent him another. Had we power to do so? Were not the functions of the House exhausted by the previous proceeding? (As they reiterate upon the Executive a bill which he has returned, and the House cannot carry? No such attempt was ever made before. The undersigned feel it their imperious duty to protest against and resist it by the only means left to a minority, preventive of the unconstitutional acts of an angry majority, believing that the time is near at hand when they will themselves most regret, as all will condemn, the innovation.

The succession of the acting President to the Chief Magistracy was unavoidably followed by collisions between him and the party who selected and elected him, because he suffered himself to remain in the hands of their advisers, instead of his own. Those whose political sympathies the un-

2d Sess.]

Reports on the Veto.

[August, 1842.]

designed enjoy are in no respect answerable for this strife, which they have uniformly treated with moderation; adhering, however, to the faith of their own politics. We neither made nor aggravate the quarrel; but calmly and conscientiously, with all due respect to majorities inexorably ruling in both Houses, stand upon our rights, and maintain the even tenor of our way, relying upon the people to correct and restore whatever may be amiss, as they have been doing with alacrity ever since the disastrous commencement of the untoward legislation of sessions of Congress which have now endured for nearly twelve months of the last fifteen. All the elections since afford unquestionable proof that, if there is any wrong in the Federal Government, the constitutional means of restoring right are in full and active operation. While thus abiding their time, the minorities of the two Houses of Congress abide by the principle that the First Magistrate of a great people is entitled to respect, and even by opponents should be treated with decorum. We know no difference in language and feeling towards the President and those which we use toward each other in Congress. His not being personally present is, in our opinion, no reason for maligning his motives, traducing his character, or vilifying his administration. The most strenuous, inflexible, and successful opposition consists with the language and spirit of moderation; and if the people are the intelligent sovereignty supposed by our institutions, would be more popular than indignation, violence, and obloquy. The President has communicated his objections to an act of Congress, against which numbers so large in both Houses voted, as to prove, beyond doubt, that it is extremely objectionable; and which we, in common with every one of those large numbers, representing, as we have every reason to believe, the wishes of a large majority of the American people, conscientiously deem unwise, unjust, and, as many think, unconstitutional. The President's objections are contained in a respectful message, temperate in tone, persuasive in argument, and developing topics which we believe will meet with popular acceptance. Of the several messages of the same kind, drawn from Mr. Tyler by this Congress, candor and history will acknowledge, we think, that the last is the best, in all the merits of reason, diction, and temper. The constitution gives him the right which his conscience enjoins him to exercise. Allowing the Chief Magistrate, therefore, what every President is entitled to, and has enjoyed on such occasions—simply to speak and act for himself—the next step, according to the constitution and uniform practice, should have been forthwith to take the votes of the House of Representatives, which would undoubtedly have shown that the President is sustained by very nearly, if not quite, a majority.

The undersigned regret the novel and (as many conceive) unconstitutional innovation to which the President's objections are subjected—not for his account, but that of constitutional liberty and congressional propriety. We believe that he is perfectly right in insisting that the public lands shall not be withdrawn from the assets of the Federal Government, when, with all the elements of resource and abundance proffering their relief to Congress, it persists in reducing and degrading the country, for the first time, to the extremities of financial want and pecuniary distress. We go much further than the President. We think that, under such circumstances, to withhold the magnificent real estate of this Union from public mortgage, is an act of madness and suicide difficult to conceive of human passions. We have not a doubt that nine-tenths of the people of the United States strongly disapprove of it, and that a majority of those misrepresented by majorities in Congress, whatever their impressions might be as to the proper disposition of the public lands under ordinary circumstances, are anxious that, in the present emergency, they should be applied to restore the credit and relieve the crying wants of the Government. The objection is equally well taken to the monstrous misalliance of the lands and the impost in the same bill—pernicious to fair legislation and orderly Government. Armies and navies unpaid for months; disbanded and dismantled, not for want of revenue, but through party passion; Congress, without their own favourite compensation, putting fetters and vetoes on all the operations of Government, betray a spirit of petulant self-denial, the counterfeit of self-government. A member of this committee imprecates executive counteraction, by putting the whole country, stripped and scourged, to the torture of trial, who can longest bear the agonies of destitution—thus poisoning the very wells of public sentiment; arousing ruthless, revolutionary counteraction, if the people are not wiser than some of their Representatives. Party, an element and help of patriotism, may be prostituted to anarchical dissension. The undersigned trust that revolutionary views are not common in Congress, as we feel sure that they are not acceptable to the people.

It is not for this protest to enforce the Executive objections. Letting them speak for themselves, we vindicate constitutional rights, and deprecate wrongs by Congress. Without objecting to any censure or measure deemed proper by the frustrated majority—any appeal to the people—we should spare them this protest, but for the character, temper, and tendency of the counteraction inflicted—not so hurtfully on the Chief Magistrate, as on republican institutions. The present proceeding, with all its angry antecedents and violent results, is without example, without warrant, and of evil tendency.

The deplorable condition of the treasury of the United States is notorious; not only without money, but, as has been said, without law for raising it. The President's exposure of this penury is a humiliating truth, which unrelenting opposition wrings from him, to justify the repeated mis-called vetoes, also wrung from him by the same pertinacious opposition. A complicated scheme of (in many particulars) high-pressure impost, calculated to revive appeased dissension, and perpetuate unappeasable discontent, forced through Congress by inexorable legislation, carried by a majority of one vote if all had been present—of but four as it was—is returned by the President, with objections, for reconsideration. The House of Representatives, which ought to be thankful for the opportunity of it, turns upon him with indignant denunciation; he is threatened, and only threatened, with impeachment; and, by false analogy to the memorable affair of English ship-money, is told, contrary to the genius and the letter of our mild laws, that his head ought to be brought to the block. Discord is proclaimed as the order of the day. Conciliation is said to be disgraceful, and concession out of the question. The undersigned flatter themselves that these are but hasty ebullitions through the safety-valves of free government. When appeal to battle is menaced, we cannot believe that the battle of bloodshed or civil war is contemplated, but presume nothing worse than conflict by the ballot-box, not the cartridge-box. The columns of this capital and of the public press, albums, magazines, and various other repositories of the ardent temperament which betrays itself in such appeals, may excuse the suggestion that possibly they are intended neither for the cartridge-box nor the ballot-box, but merely for the band-box. During the nearly twelve months of irksome and inglorious session of this Congress, to the great annoyance of the community, appeals to passion have been much more common than to reason. By the eminent mover of this committee, none of the great subjects of deliberation have hardly been spoken of—banks, exchequer, finance, bankruptcy, tariff—upon any and all of which his wisdom and experience might have afforded edifying discourses; while all the minor topics of personal, party, and especially presidential exasperation, have never failed to be vexed with implacable and indefatigable agitation.

August, 1842.]

Reports on the Veto.

[27th Con.

It has been said, in the course of indignant harangues, that there is not only no money, but no law to raise it; and that the Chief Magistrate, like a profligate King of Great Britain, collects revenue without law. Party wish did, perhaps, beget mistaken impressions to that effect, to which mere professional opinion gave color. But mature consideration, and the true philosophy of interpretation, satisfy the undersigned, and they believe the most distinguished jurists of the country, that it is unfounded apprehension to think that Congress ever could have intended, by any act or omission, to leave Government without aliment for its subsistence. This important question will be settled by the Supreme Court of the United States, in whom the undersigned, with the great body of the American people, without distinction of party, repose confidence. The aspersion of that tribunal, inferred from English history, is not only unjust disparagement, but inaccurate historical recollection. Even the twelve judges of England never did, as has been said, unworthily submit to royal dictation; but many of them (although their tenure of office, salaries, and perhaps lives, depended on the King's pleasure) manfully resisted his rapacious will. In the United States, the public money—which the President is laudably anxious to raise by law, through the ordinary means—could not be employed in his profligate indulgences in war or other offensive application; and we trust that the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, in no way dependent on the Executive, whenever they come to the solemn adjudication of this vital question, will deal with it, as they did at their late session with another, which, probably, provoked the unjust imputation on their rectitude—treating this question of impost, as they did that of slavery, with integrity and independence. The undersigned hope they will come to the conclusion, which all lovers of their country must desire, that, instead of deserving capital punishment, the President is entitled to the thanks of dispassionate men for anxiously enforcing the law concerning imports. Nor will we omit this occasion, while vindicating that court, of expressing grateful acknowledgments to it for having, contrary to many pre-possessions, by independent judgment, sustained the most delicate provisions of our Union against the clamors and prejudices of negrophilism. Finally, the undersigned are assured, that whatever the court does, they will not leave (as has been strangely imagined they must) the determination of this great question of law to the arbitrament of juries. There is hardly a juror in the country who does not know that property, liberty, and order, are best preserved by maintaining that venerable jurisprudence which, in civil cases, leaves to juries only questions of fact, and refers to judges questions of law. The undersigned have no fear of the judiciary. They dread no veto or dictation from a President. They are not alarmed by crises of party. American republican annals are a continued series of formidable conjunctures, without detriment to the republic—antagonism without commotion—State and individual conflicts without civil war, or any unwholesome catastrophe. The charitable ballot-box is always at hand, with inestimable relief, to vent all passions. We are happy to find that a petulant committee—the offspring of indignation—proposes no fatal act, but its proceedings will go out in harmless explosion. Eloquent invective, angry denunciations, philippics of speech and print inflict no fatal blows on the solid bulwarks of this great empire, which advances steadily in greatness, increasing in population, production, and power, rejoicing in peace and plenty, with antagonist parties and ambitious individuals struggling for its honors with fierce but harmless re-crimination. Republican Government would be bereft of its rational attractions and manly support—the noble excitements of a free press, free speech, and universal suffrage; admirable substitutes for the stagnant tranquillity, frivolous recreations, and dreadful energy of despotism. Let the battlements of this Capitol continue to rock with salutary agitation. Our reliance is in the majestic strength and serenity of a sovereign people.

The undersigned cannot believe that Congress will adjourn without enacting a law for revenue. They will not afford the President so great a triumph. The public distemper is so easily remediable, that those in power never can answer to the community for longer failing to apply the remedy. The minority is not responsible, nor the President, nor even the Senate. The House of Representatives is exclusively the national purse-bearer. By the majority of that House should be annually replenished and arranged its receipts and issues, as the report of the majority of this committee argues. Most of the troubles experienced by the present and penultimate Administrations, including the overthrow of the latter, are attributable to supererogatory Executive efforts, beyond Executive duty, to repair disordered finances—disordered by ill-judged and calamitous acts of Congress. The people will hold the majority of the House of Representatives responsible for this their appropriate and chief office. It is disreputable to them that restoration so easy has been long deferred. No country in the world has such resources and facilities for revenue. One year's administration of such laws as Congress should enact, would draw from the inexhaustible means, the labor, the ingenuity, the commerce, the manufactures, and the public lands of the United States, superabundant income. But, as with the fatal distribution of surplus revenue among the States, distress and demoralization began, so are they continued by the same egregious impolicy; insisting on alms—giving a pittance of land sales to the States. The undersigned discern, with deep disapproval, that the report of the majority of this committee, in conformity with the votes of its chairman, strenuously argues distribution of the public lands to pay the debts of the States. This is not the occasion to develop the dangers of that much-condemned scheme. In preference for another, and much better, nearly all Congress coincide in opinion with the President and the people, viz:—that immediate relief would proceed from a moderate, discriminating, permanent tariff. Why is it not a law? Why may it not be at once? Who hinders it? Is party passion to prevail, or magnanimous patriotism? The undersigned will not doubt, even though perhaps doomed to disappointment.

2D SESS.]

The Vetoed Tariff.

[August, 1842.]

This mortal issue, if cast by Congress upon an injured, insulted, oppressed, and outraged people, may return, with dread responsibility, with deep damnation, to plague the inventors of such mischief. Those we act with are ready to go forth, and be tried by the country, in full confidence of popular justice. Others will determine for themselves, and for us too, as we are but a minority. The report of the majority proposes nothing but that the President be assailed, and the constitution assaulted; the President impeached without trial, the country dishonored in him for exercising, almost under Congressional duress, an unquestionable and much-cherished power, dear to a noble people, which it is the wildest dream of excited party to suppose that people will ever suffer to be stricken from the constitution. Meantime, what is to be done? Are Congress to call out more vetoes? Like barbarous nations, worshipping demoniac creatures of their own malignant imagining, are we all to be sacrificed to the evil genii of Discord and Despair? Are distraction and inaction to minister furious and dreadful redress? The undersigned rely on popular providence, which, in severer trials, has, with the smiles of Heaven, overruled whatever perils have beset our (till now) thoughtful and considerate country. No God of battles is invoked for our rescue. Deprecating such shocking profanation, we humbly trust that no battle or bloodshed, no civil war or massacre, is the only umpirage to determine for rational freemen the simple question whether they will support or repudiate the Government of their own creation. We do not despair. We do not fear that savage infatuation will cast away for future scorn the present admiration and refuge of the world.

C. J. INGERSOLL.
JAMES I. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. FILLMORE suggested the propriety of ordering the reports to be printed, and of the House proceeding to the consideration of the army bills.

The SPEAKER observed, that the gentleman from Massachusetts had a motion pending before the House in relation to the various reports that had just been laid before it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, rose to a point of order. The motion was to postpone the consideration of the reports and bill till to-morrow, and print them. That he understood to be the substance of the motion; and the consequence would be, that the bill, which was laid on the table, would have to follow the consideration of the reports; while the constitution required that the action should be on the bill.

The SPEAKER said he would remove the gentleman's objections, by referring to a decision he had already made—that it would be at all times in order to move to take up the bill. If the gentleman would make that motion now, and a majority sustained him, the bill would at once be brought before the House.

Mr. JOHNSON said he did not wish to throw any obstacles in the way of the business of the House, and that he would withdraw his point of order.

The question was then taken on Mr. ADAMS's motion, and carried.

WEDNESDAY, August 17.

The SPEAKER announced the regular business to be the special order made yesterday, viz: the reports and resolution of the committee on the veto message.

The Vetoed Tariff.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON said the House was bound by the constitution to consider the revenue bill, which had been vetoed, before any action could be had on the reports and resolution of the committee. Regarding this as a privileged question, he moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the vetoed bill, with the President's objections thereto.

The SPEAKER said the motion was in order.

Mr. ADAMS said the special order for 12 o'clock was the reports and resolution of the committee.

The SPEAKER replied that that would be the regular order of business if this motion should be voted down.

The yeas and nays were then taken on Mr. JOHNSON's motion, which was determined in the affirmative—yeas 123, nays 77.

After remarks from Mr. J.,

Mr. ARNOLD moved the previous question; which was seconded by the House.

The question recurring on the passage of the bill notwithstanding the President's objections, and the constitution requiring this question to be taken by yeas and nays, the vote was taken in that way, and resulted—yeas 91, nays 87, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Appleton, Arnold, Ayer, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Birdseye, Blair, Borden, Botts, Brookway, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Thomas J. Campbell, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Jas. Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Cushing, Garrett Davis, John Edwards, Everett, Fillmore, A. Lawrence Foster, Gentry, Goggin, Granger, Green, Hall, Halsted, Howard, Hudson, Joseph B. Ingersoll, William W.

August, 1842.]

The Vetoed Tariff.

[27th Cong.]

Irwin, James, William Cost Johnson, John P. Kennedy, Lane, Linn, McKennan, Thomas F. Marshall, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Owsley, Pearce, Pendleton, Pope, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Randolph, Ridgway, Rodney, William Russell, Saltonstall, Shepperd, Truman Smith, Solers, Sprigg, Stanly, Stratton, Alexander H. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Summers, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Washington, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Yorke—91.

YAYS.—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Beeson, Bidlack, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, Cary, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Colquitt, Mark A. Cooper, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Doan, Doig, John C. Edwards, Egbert, John G. Floyd, Gamble, Gerry, Gilmer, William O. Goode, Gordon, Gwin, Habersham, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Houck, Houston, Hubard, Hunter, Charles J. Ingersoll, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Lewis, Littlefield, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Mallory, John Thomson Mason, Matthews, Medill, Miller, Newhard, Payne, Plumer, Proffit, Read, Reding, Reynolds, Rhett, Riggs, Rogers, Roosevelt, Sanford, Saunders, Shaw, Shields, William Smith, Snyder, Steenrod, Sumter, Sweney, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Van Buren, Ward, Watterson, Weller, James W. Williams, Wise, and Wood—87.

So the bill was not passed, there not being the constitutional majority of two-thirds.

Mr. ADAMS moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the report and resolution of the select committee appointed to consider the President's message.

The SPEAKER said that that was the regular order of business; and directed the clerk to read the resolution at the conclusion of the committee's report; which was read as follows:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring therein, That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in the 7th section of the 1st article, be recommended to the Legislatures of the several States, which, on the adoption of the same by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall become part and parcel of the constitution:

"Instead of the words 'two-thirds,' twice repeated in the second paragraph of the said seventh section, substitute, in both cases, the words 'a majority of the whole number.'"

Mr. ADAMS observed that he was himself prepared to vote for that resolution at this time. He did not desire to take up the time of the House by debating it, and would merely observe that the alteration proposed in the constitution was as small as could be, to be any alteration at all. It proposed to substitute a majority of the whole number of the House and Senate, for a majority of two-thirds, for the passage of a bill after it had been returned by the President with his objections. The reasons for this change were briefly stated in the report of the majority. So far as related to himself, he had been, from the time the constitution was first adopted, opposed, in principle, to all amendments of that instrument. He had, in general, disapproved of them; and he did not know that he had ever voted, since he had been a member of the House, for any alterations proposed to that instrument. He had a general prejudice against any alterations of an instrument that he regarded in so solemn and so sacred a light. Unless evils arose of an intolerable nature, it was better for the people of the United States "to bear the ills they have, than to fly to others that they know not of." With regard to this particular provision of the constitution, he had always been in favor of it, from the time the constitution was adopted till very recently; but he could not stand the effect of repeated experience. His faith in the establishment of that principle as part of the constitution had been gradually shaken, till he was ready to vote for this alteration, as proposed in the report. He did not know one out of the whole number of vetoes (so called) that had been given since the establishment of this constitution, that it would not have operated better for the country, if the measures they prevented had become laws. He doubted whether it would not have been better for the nation if the power had not existed. As a part of the great system of checks and balances in the Government, he was still willing, for ease, to leave the people of the United States to experience the future exercise of that power, limited and modified as proposed in the resolution. When he spoke of experience, he need not go any farther than the Administration under which this power had been exercised much more frequently than under any other. The vetoes of President Jackson were all, in his opinion, among the most pernicious acts that could have been committed for the people of the United States and their highest interests.

After a few further remarks, Mr. A. took his seat, intimating his intention to reply, if he thought proper, to any thing that might be said in debate.

Mr. ROOSEVELT said that, at this late period of the session, when the people were looking for a speedy adjournment of Congress, and when appropriations like that before the House could not possibly pass, or, at least, could not become operative, he thought it was useless to waste the time of the House in further discussion. He thought the members here had no right to trifle with the wants of the people, who were expecting them to do something, or go home. Though it was a very unusual thing for him to move the previous question—and he thought it should not be resorted to except on special occasions—he felt it to be his duty to move it on the present occasion. He thought the present was one of those periods when the previous question might be resorted to with propriety. The House had this day taken a vote upon a bill passed by the two Houses and returned by the President with his objections, and the result was, a lean majority of four votes in favor of the bill—the same majority by which it was originally passed. Though the numbers for and against the bill had changed, the majority seemed to be stereotyped. It was with a conviction of the necessity of doing something, that he was induced to move the previous question.

2D SESS.]

The Tariff.

[August, 1842.]

The previous question was then sustained—ayes 85, noes 50.

Mr. BIDLACK moved to lay the report and the resolution on the table.

The yeas and nays were then taken—yeas 85, nays 102.

The SPEAKER then stated the question to be on the adoption of the report.

Mr. WISE asked to be excused from voting. He said the report charged the President with certain high crimes and misdemeanors; for which, if he were culpable, he ought to be impeached. But as it was the constitutional duty of the Senate to try articles of impeachment, he, (Mr. WISE,) as a member of this House, ought not to be called upon to vote upon them, this House having no power to try the President.

The House excused the gentleman.

The yeas and nays were then called; and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botta, Brockway, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Casey, Chittenden, John C. Clark, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Garrett Davis, Deberry, John Edwards, Fillmore, A. L. Foster, Gentry, Goggin, Graham, Granger, Green, Hall, Halsted, Howard, Hudson, James Irwin, James, John P. Kennedy, King, Lane, Linn, McKennan, Thomas F. Marshall, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Matlocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Mitchell, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Owaley, Pearce, Pendleton, Powell, Ramsay, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Ridgway, Rodney, J. M. Russell, Saltonstall, Shepperd, Slade, T. Smith, Sollers, Sprigg, Stanly, Stratton, John T. Stuart, Summers, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Warren, Washington, E. D. White, Joseph L. White, Thomas W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Yorke, and Augustus Young—100.

NAYS.—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Beeson, Bidlack, Bowne, C. Brown, Burke, Green W. Caldwell, P. C. Caldwell, John Campbell, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Colquitt, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Cushing, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dawson, Doan, Doig, John C. Edwards, Egbert, John G. Floyd, Gilmer, W. O. Goode, Gordon, Gustine, Gwin, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubard, Hunter, Charles J. Ingersoll, William W. Irwin, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Andrew Kennedy, Lewis, Littlefield, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Mallory, John Thompson Mason, Medill, Miller, Newhard, Parmenter, Payne, Plumer, Proffit, Read, Reding, Reynolds, Rhett, Riggs, Rogers, Roosevelt, Saunders, Shaw, Shields, Snyder, Steenrod, Sumter, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Van Buren, Ward, Watterson, Weller, James W. Williams, and Wood—80.

The next question was on the adoption of the resolution; on which the yeas and nays were taken, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, L. W. Andrews, S. J. Andrews, Appleton, Arnold, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botta, Brockway, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Casey, Chittenden, John C. Clark, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Garrett Davis, Deberry, John Edwards, Fillmore, A. L. Foster, Gentry, Giddings, Goggins, Patrick G. Goode, Graham, Granger, Green, Hall, Halsted, Howard, Hudson, James Irwin, James, John P. Kennedy, King, Lane, Linn, McKennan, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Maxwell, Maynard, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Owaley, Pearce, Pendleton, Powell, Ramsay, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Ridgway, Rodney, Wm. Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Shepperd, Slade, Sollers, Stanly, Stratton, John T. Stuart, Summers, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Warren, Washington, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Thomas W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Yorke, and Augustus Young—98.

NAYS.—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Bowne, Charles Brown, Burke, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, Cary, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Colquitt, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Cushing, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dawson, Doan, Doig, Egbert, Ferris, John G. Floyd, Gilmer, William G. Goode, Gordon, Gustine, Gwin, Habersham, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubard, Hunter, Charles J. Ingersoll, William W. Irwin, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Andrew Kennedy, Lewis, Littlefield, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Mallory, Thomas F. Marshall, John Thompson Mason, Mattock, Medill, Miller, Mitchell, Newhard, Parmenter, Payne, Plumer, Pope, Proffit, Read, Reding, Reynolds, Rhett, Riggs, Rogers, Roosevelt, Sanford, Saunders, Shaw, Shields, Snyder, Steenrod, Sumter, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Van Buren, Ward, Watterson, Weller, James W. Williams, Wise, and Wood—90.

THURSDAY, August 18.

The Tariff.

From the Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. FILLMORE reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to pass another revenue bill, the same as that which recently passed both Houses of Congress and has been returned by the President, with his objections, to this House, and, on reconsideration, lost for want of the constitutional majority, entitled "An act to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes," with the exception of the 27th

August, 1842.]

The Tariff.

[27th Cong.]

section of said bill, which repeals the proviso to the land distribution act; and so modified as to make tea imported from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and coffee, imported in American vessels, free from duty; and that the Committee of Ways and Means be, and they are hereby, instructed to report such a bill to this House with all convenient despatch.

Mr. F., after stating the objects of the resolution, observed that he had reported it as the organ of the Committee of Ways and Means, only for the purpose of testing the sense of the House on this subject, and of ascertaining whether it was practicable to pass another revenue measure at this session. Mr. F. then called for the previous question.

Mr. BORTS moved to lay the resolution on the table, and called for the yeas and nays.

The question was then taken on Mr. BORTS's motion to lay the resolution on the table, and rejected—yeas 75, nays 108.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered.

The yeas and nays on the main question, (being the adoption of the resolution,) having been called for, were ordered.

Mr. HAYS here called for a division of the resolution, so as to take the question on that part of it which declares that it is expedient to pass another revenue bill; and referred to the rule of the House he had just cited.

The SPEAKER decided the motion to be out of order, on the ground that, if the first division should be rejected, there would be no sense in the remainder.

Mr. HAYS appealed from the decision of the Chair; but, on taking the vote, it was sustained by the House.

The question on the adoption of the resolution was then put; and the Chair announced the vote to be as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Sherlock, J. Andrews, Appleton, Aycrigg, Baker, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Brockway, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Cowen, Cranston, Cushing, Garrett Davis, Richard D. Davis, John Edwards, Everett, Ferris, Fessenden, Gerry, Gliddings, P. G. Goode, Granger, Hall, Halsted, Howard, Hudson, Hunt, Charles J. Ingersoll, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, William W. Irwin, Keim, McKennan, T. F. Marshall, Samson Mason, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Newhard, Osborne, Parmenter, Pendleton, Plumer, Pope, Powell, Proffit, Ramsay, Benjamin Randall, Randolph, Read, Ridgway, Riggs, Rodney, Wm. Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Sanford, Blade, Truman Smith, Stratton, John T. Stuart, Toland, Tomlinson, Trumbull, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Ward, Westbrook, Edward D. White, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Yorke, and Augustus Young—86.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Landaff W. Andrews, Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Barton, Black, Botta, Boyd, Milton Brown, Burke, Wm. O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Thos. J. Campbell, Caruthers, Cary, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Colquitt, Mark A. Cooper, Cravens, Cross, Daniel, Dawson, Dean, Doan, John C. Edwards, Egbert, Fillmore, John G. Floyd, Gamble, Gentry, Gilmer, Goggin, William O. Goode, Gordon, Graham, Green, Gwin, Habersham, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubbard, Hunter, Wm. Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, John P. Kennedy, Andrew Kennedy, King, Lane, Levin, Linn, Littlefield, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Mallory, John Thomson Mason, Mathiot, Matthews, Medill, Miller, Mitchell, Owsley, Payne, Alexander Randall, Rayner, Redding, Reynolds, Rhett, Rogers, Roosevelt, Saunders, Shaw, Shepperd, Shields, William Smith, Sellers, Sprigg, Stanly, Steenrod, Alexander H. H. Stuart, Summers, Sumter, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Underwood, Warren, Washington, Waterson, Weller, Joseph L. White, J. W. Williams, C. H. Williams, Wise, and Wood—114.

FRIDAY, August 19.

The Tariff.

Mr. CHARLES J. INGERSOLL rose to offer a resolution from the Committee on the Judiciary, and, if any objections should be made, he would move for a suspension of the rules. The resolution provided for the introduction of the bill offered by him the other day, altered so as to take the duties of 1840; and also, with a limitation, added by himself, to two years.

Mr. BORTS and others objected to the resolution.

Mr. INGERSOLL inquired whether he could move to go into the Committee of the Whole without suspension; and, on being answered in the affirmative, submitted a motion to that effect.

Mr. INGERSOLL said that, if his motion prevailed, and the House went into Committee of the Whole, he should move to take up the bill introduced by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, to supply a temporary defect or failure in the law to collect revenues from imports; and that motion prevailing, he should then move to amend it by substituting the bill offered by him the other day, with the modifications he had just indicated.

Mr. O. J. INGERSOLL asked for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered, and resulted as follows:—yeas 98, nays 84.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated that, when the House was last in committee, the bill under consideration was the navy pension bill.

Mr. CHARLES J. INGERSOLL moved to lay aside that bill, that the committee might take up bill No. 547, (Mr. BARNARD's bill,) entitled "A bill to supply a temporary defect or failure in the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports."

The tellers then took the vote, and reported 91 in the affirmative, and 53 in the negative.

The bill was therefore taken up.

2d Sess.]

The Tariff.

[August, 1842.]

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL moved to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following as a substitute :

A BILL to provide revenue from imports.

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act, the same duties upon imports shall be levied, collected, and paid, under the same laws, rules, and regulations, which were levied, collected, and paid the 1st day of January, 1840, under the provisions of the act approved 2d March, 1833, entitled "An act to modify the act of 14th January, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports," except that the said duties shall be paid in cash: And provided, further, That in all cases where specific duties were imposed upon imports prior to the passage of the said act, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain the average rate of duty which was collected upon each of the said articles throughout the year 1840; and such average rate of duty shall hereafter be levied, collected, and paid, as a specific duty upon the importation of the said articles, in the same manner as if such respective specific duties were respectively imposed by this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, on the importation of all the articles made subject to a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem, under the provisions of the act entitled "An act relating to duties and drawbacks," approved September 11th, 1841, there shall hereafter be levied, collected, and paid, a duty of 30 per cent. ad valorem, except upon railroad iron, which shall be subject to the same rate of duty as bar or bolt iron, of similar manufacture, under the 1st section of this act; but nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to deprive any State or incorporated company, which shall have imported railroad iron prior to the 3d day of March next, of the benefits and advantages secured to them respectively by the proviso to the 5th section of the said act relating to the duties and drawbacks.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the law shall be in force for and during two years from the day of its becoming a law, and no longer.

The CHAIRMAN stated the question to be on striking out and inserting.

Mr. BARNARD said, before the motion was put, he supposed it would be in order to amend the original bill, with a view to perfect it. He had several amendments which he wished to offer.

The CHAIRMAN decided that such amendments would be first in order.

Mr. BARNARD moved to amend the second section, by adding a clause merely precautionary, to provide that nothing in that act contained shall be regarded as sanctioning at any time hereafter, or as authorizing, the application of that section to cases where a penalty may have been imposed by law. His amendment was in these words :

Nor shall any thing in this act contained be construed to inflict any fine, punishment, or forfeiture, for any act, omission, or occurrence whatever, on any person who was not liable to such fine, punishment, or forfeiture, by any law of the land existing at the time of such omission, occurrence, or forfeiture.

He apprehended there would be no objection to that amendment.

Mr. ADAMS wished the gentleman to explain the necessity for this amendment.

Mr. BARNARD said it would be recollected that this bill was reported from the Judiciary Committee, to supply the defect in the revenue laws, which expired by their own limitation on the 30th June. This bill proposed to reach imports which had been introduced into the country since the 1st of July, to extend to the time when some permanent revenue law should be enacted by Congress. It was retroactive in its operation. It went back beyond the date of its enactment, and reached transactions which had been already transacted. It proposed to lay a duty, or tax, as he supposed it to have existed on the 30th of June. Now, as an act of legislation affecting past transactions, he supposed it to be competent in Congress to pass it into a law. It was retroactive; but it affected civil, and not criminal transactions. The object of the second section was to revive the laws by which Congress had regulated the collection of duties on imports. In those laws there were a great variety of penalties; and it had occurred to him, after that section was drawn, (very full and explicit as it was,) that some one might make it retroactive as to the penalties and punishment to be inflicted by the laws it sought to revive. That he held to be unconstitutional; for the constitution prohibited the enactment of any ex post facto law. This, however, did not apply to civil transactions; though he agreed that its spirit had been observed as to civil transactions also, and such laws had not been allowed to touch any one to their injury. But he denied that any one would be injured by this act. What were the facts? Why, imports had been introduced into the country since the 1st day of July, by importers who could not land them on our shores, under existing laws, without a permit; and the act of 1833, known as the compromise act—though in his opinion, and the opinion of a majority of the Judiciary Committee, and many other persons, that law imposing duties had expired by its own limitation; so that, from the 30th of June there was no law for the collection of imports. Yet, that act of 1833 did give notice to all the world that duties should be imposed on imports, to take effect from and after the 30th June, at a rate not exceeding 20 per cent. It was the express direction of the act that there should be such an enactment of law; the only difficulty being, that the law could not execute itself, but required further legislation. Now, all this bill required was, that they should go back and reach past importations, and that the goods should be subjected to duty not exceeding 20 per cent. It proposed to supply an existing defect in the laws; and its not having been applied, did not, in his opinion, excuse the importer of goods from the payment of duties: they had introduced them, expecting to pay duties; and they did pay them to the amount of 20 per cent., though they paid them under protest, and they sold them with the duties added, to enhance the price to the purchaser. It was but an act of justice to the treasury that it should be so. And now, as to his amendment which he had introduced: it was intended to cut off the possibility of any fine, or punishment, or penalty, being inflicted by an ex post facto law, which, in his opinion, was clearly unconstitutional.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL here intimated that, instead of a substitute, he would modify his motion so as to make his bill an addition to the bill of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ADAMS said this bill, by its title, was a bill to supply a temporary defect or failure in the laws relating to the collection of revenue; and what was that defect? As he understood, on the 30th of June all the laws for the collection of revenue by duties on imports ceased and determined; and from that day no duties on imports could be collected by authority of law. The President, however, proceeded to levy taxes; and he had already said to that House that it presented a case precisely similar to that of "ship money" found in English history, when the King of England undertook to collect money from the people, for the purpose of building ships for the establishment of a navy. Under such a state of things, taxes had been levied on the people of the United States since the 30th of June. Now, the title of the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee of this House had not been contradicted by any member, that he knew of; and, without any protest, the bill had, so far, been before the House.

He objected to this bill, because he considered it ex post facto in its civil and criminal operation. The President was now levying money without law; and this bill was to go before the juries of the country, and the Supreme Court, in justification or excuse of his conduct. He referred to the fact, that the House had been charged with ignominious cowardice in declining to impeach the President; and remarked that it was always very safe to dare persons to do that which it was known they would not do.

The question would have to come before the Supreme Court. For his own part, he considered that there was no authority to levy duties. He referred to the fact, that eight out of twelve judges in England had decided in favor of the King, in a similar case, from necessity. Perhaps, (he argued,) the Supreme Court of the United States would decide in favor of the President from a like reason—from necessity—when there was no law. If, however, the Supreme Court should decide against the Government, it would become the duty of the Government to return the money paid in by the merchants, and to indemnify them. Then, it would become a question whether it was not a high crime on the part of the President to levy the duties collected by his officers. Then, too, he imagined, there would not be such talk about the want of courage to impeach.

He expressed it as his opinion that Congress should not pass any tariff law. The tariff question, he thought, was now on the best footing. There could not be found a majority in both Houses in favor of a better than that now in operation. The revenue got more from the present tariff, than it would from any which they could pass. Indeed, he was inclined to suspect that Southern gentlemen were in favor of cutting it down still lower. His colleague (Mr. CUSHING) had published a speech, in which the tariff was arrayed against distribution, and in favor of taking off the tax on tea and coffee. It was a very good speech for Lowell; but how would it do for Albemarle, Virginia; or Beaufort, South Carolina? He argued that the more you took out of the tariff bill from the tax on tea and coffee, the more it became a protective, and the less a revenue measure.

He referred to the doctrine held by the President on the subject of protection. The President declared himself opposed to protection directly, but was liberal enough toward incidental protection. Now, he argued, this doctrine was in conflict with a resolution passed by the House on the 12th December, 1838, one of a series of resolutions on the powers of Congress. It read:

"Resolved, That Congress has no power to do indirectly, what it cannot do directly."

Yet, the President says, though you cannot protect directly, you may do it indirectly—"incidentally."

He continued his remarks in opposition to the bill, basing his chief objection to it on the ground that it was an ex post facto criminal law.

Mr. McKENNA said he did not rise for the purpose of debating this question. It would be unpardonable in him to occupy the time at this late stage of the session, after the matter had been so fully discussed. Every gentleman ought, by this time, to have his mind made up, so as to enable him to vote satisfactorily. He rose merely to suggest that, under the present circumstances, in consideration of the necessary condition of the country, and the protracted period of the session, they ought to discontinue all further debate, and take the vote at once. [Agreed, agreed.] He implored the House to let the vote be taken, that they might return to their constituents without further delay. After deep consideration, for the sake of a bleeding and suffering country, he had brought his mind to submit to what, under other circumstances, he would lose his right arm before he would agree to submit to. Though distribution was a favorite measure of the Whig party, he would yield the point, and relinquish distribution, rather than fail to secure the passage of a bill which was so indispensably necessary to save the country from destruction. For the sake of reconcil-

2D Sess.]

The Tariff.

[August, 1842.]

tion, he was willing to go far. But while he would surrender this point, he could not be expected to surrender the principle of protection for the industry of the country—that he would insist upon. And with this view, he would move to substitute an amendment which he had prepared, in the place of the one moved by his colleague, to the bill introduced by the gentleman from New York. He was satisfied that it was a bill which would afford adequate revenue, and, at the same time, reasonable protection. He saw that some of the Southern gentlemen were disposed to come to the rescue; but he was not disposed to throw himself entirely in their arms. There was one feature in the bill which he could never consent to; and it was, the limitation of the law to two years' duration. If, during that time, the opponents of the Whig party should unfortunately gain the ascendancy—though he trusted in God it would not be the case, [a laugh,]—what would be the consequence? The law would be permitted to expire. There was all the difference in the world between repealing a law, and permitting it to expire.

The motion to substitute having been ruled out of order, Mr. McKENNAN moved that the committee rise.

The committee rose.

SATURDAY, August 20.

New Issue of Treasury Notes.

Mr. FILLMORE called the attention of the House to a communication which had been sent to the Committee of Ways and Means from the Treasury Department, which pointed out the necessities of the treasury, and recommended the issue of treasury notes to meet the demands created by the appropriation bills which the House had passed.

This communication should have been sent to the House, instead of the committee; and for the purpose of bringing it properly before the committee, he moved that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and that it be printed.

The communication was then ordered to be printed.

The House then adjourned.

MONDAY, August 22.

The Tariff.

Mr. COWEN offered a resolution, fixing 12 o'clock to-day for the termination of debate on Mr. BARNARD's bill to provide for a temporary defect or failure of the law relating to the collection of duties on imports; and on this he moved the previous question, which was sustained by the House. The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. COWEN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, which was agreed to; and Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL took the chair.

The CHAIRMAN stated the question to be on the amendment of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. BARNARD,) the effect of which was to prevent the infliction of any fine or punishment by an ex post facto law.

After some remarks by Messrs. ROOSEVELT, FILLMORE, GORDON, and EVERETT, the question recurred on Mr. INGERSOLL's amendment to strike out the original bill, and insert, as a substitute, the bill submitted by him,

On taking the question, it was rejected—ayes 88, noes not counted.

Various other amendments were offered and negatived.

Mr. McKENNAN then moved to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert as a substitute the bill that was passed by both Houses of Congress, and returned by the President with his objections, with the exception of the 27th section, respecting the proviso in the distribution act, and also with a modification exempting tea and coffee from duty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to amend the amendment, by inserting the 27th section of the old bill, repealing the proviso in the distribution act, so as to allow the distribution to go on.

Mr. CUSHING submitted that the amendment of Mr. UNDERWOOD was not in order on the following points:

1st. It was in violation of the following rule of the House, viz: "No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment."

2d. It was the very provision of the bill returned by the President, to which, and to which alone, he had objected, and which the House had reconsidered under the constitution, and rejected.

3d. It was a tack in the sense of parliamentary law, which by that law was held to be irregular, as infringing on the constitutional rights of the other branches of the Government.

The CHAIR overruled the point of order, deciding that there was no incongruity in the amendment, inasmuch as the House had, on a previous occasion, after a lengthy discussion, admitted the same principle in the revenue act, that passed both Houses, and was returned by the President with his objections.

Mr. BARNARD offered an amendment, suspending the operations of the distribution act until the 4th of March, 1845, and after which time the distribution act was to be revived; the land fund till the 4th March, 1845, to be set apart for the payment of outstanding treasury notes, and the redemption of the interest on the public debt. This amendment was rejected—ayes 88, noes not counted.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. McKENNAN, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert his entire bill.

Tellers were called for and ordered; and the

August, 1842.]

The Tariff.

[27th Cong.]

vote was 99 in the affirmative, and 67 in the negative.

Mr. McKENNAN moved that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House. The motion was agreed to, and the chairman reported accordingly.

Mr. FESSENDEN moved the previous question; which was sustained by the House.

The House concurred in the report of the Committee of the Whole—yeas 108, nays 99.

Mr. RABBITT wished to have a call of the House, but that not being in order, he moved to lay the bill on the table; and on that he demanded the yeas and nays, for the purpose of obtaining time. His object was, to have a full and distinct vote on the bill.

The question, however, was taken on the engrossment of the bill, by yeas and nays; and the Speaker announced the vote to be—yeas 100, nays 101, and that the bill was rejected.

[Clapping of hands, and cries of "Good," followed this announcement, which had been waited for with intense anxiety by every part of the House.]

The following are the yeas and nays on this vote, viz: yeas 101, nays 101; announced by the Speaker, under a mistake, to be—yeas 100, nays 101. [The mistake was corrected in a subsequent part of the proceedings.]

Mr. THOMPSON, of Indiana, moved the reconsideration of the vote just taken, and called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the above motion; and the roll having been called through, but before the vote was announced,

Mr. GWIN rose and said, he wished to know, before the vote was announced, whether the preceding vote on the engrossment of the bill had been announced correctly.

The SPEAKER said he had been informed by the Clerk that there was an error in the addition of the yeas and nays on the question alluded to, arising from the fact that one of the members who voted out of order was not counted.

The Clerk then read the list of yeas and nays over again; when

The SPEAKER announced the vote to be yeas 101, nays 101, as above, and voted himself in the negative.

So the bill was rejected on that vote.

The SPEAKER then stated the question to be on the motion for reconsideration of the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. THOMPSON,) the vote on which had just been taken, as above noticed; and announced the vote to be—yeas 106, nays 98.

So the reconsideration was ordered.

The question recurring on the engrossment of the bill,

Mr. YORKE moved the previous question, under the operation of which the question was taken; and the Speaker announced the vote to be—yeas 108, nays 102.

Mr. McKENNAN called for the question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RAYNER rose to ask if it was not necessary for the Chair to vote; and made the point of order that he was bound to do so, under the following rule:

"In all cases of election by the House, the Speaker shall vote; in other cases, he shall not, unless the House be equally divided, or unless his vote, if given to the minority, will make the division equal, and, in case of such equal division, the question shall be lost."

Mr. HOPKINS made some remarks in reference to the previous practice—not perfectly understood by the reporter.

Messrs. PROFFIT and FILLMORE made the point of order that the Chair could not vote after the vote had been announced.

The SPEAKER here read the rule, and made some remarks, which the reporter could not catch, owing to the great confusion prevailing—there being at least twenty members on the floor, all claiming to be heard.

Mr. BOTTS made the question of order whether the Chair was not bound to vote.

The SPEAKER was satisfied, from the rule just read, that he had a right to vote; and, to prevent any further difficulty on the subject, announced that he voted no, and that there was thus a tie vote—[defeating the bill.]

Mr. ANDREWS, of Kentucky, rose, and claimed the right to vote. He was in the bar, he said, when his name was called.

Here the question of order was raised whether Mr. ANDREWS could vote after the vote had been announced—some contending that, if the Speaker could vote after that announcement, Mr. ANDREWS also had the right; while others contended that the Speaker's vote was provided for under the rules, and that the only time he could vote was after the vote of the House was announced. Such, however, was the noise and confusion prevailing, that it is impossible to give the particulars of this part of the proceedings, in regular succession.

The SPEAKER decided that Mr. ANDREWS had a right to vote.

Mr. WISE insisted that the case was already decided, and referred to a case where the vote was precisely like the present—a majority of one, Speaker Polk voted in the negative; and by making the vote a tie, defeated the bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS referred to the vote in 1815, on the charter of the Bank of the United States, when Mr. Speaker Cheves, voting in the negative, made a tie vote, and thus defeated the bill.

Mr. McKENNAN said he would state the facts as he recollected them. After the vote was taken the Speaker announced it to be yeas 104, nays 102, and said the yeas had it.

He (Mr. McK.) then asked what was the next question? and

The SPEAKER replied that it would be on the passage of the bill.

2d SESS.]

The Tariff.

[August, 1842.]

Mr. McKENNAH said, that under this state of the case, he contended that the Speaker had no right to vote, and the gentleman from Kentucky had no right to vote.

Mr. GILMER said the question was, whether the Speaker had a right to announce that the vote was decided in the affirmative, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The Speaker was bound to announce the vote of the House, and then to give his vote.

Mr. EVERETT rose to a question of order; but there were so many claiming to be heard at the time, that the reporter could not hear what it was.

Order being restored—

Mr. GILMER read the rule, (given above,) and contended that the Speaker had no right to announce the decision of the question till after he had announced the vote to the House, and given his own vote.

The SPEAKER repeated his decision, that Mr. ANDREWS had a right to vote, and that gentleman's name being called, he voted aye.

Mr. STANLY then desired his name to be called; which was done, and he also voted aye.

The SPEAKER then announced the vote on engrossment to be as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Appleton, Ayer, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Briggs, Brockway, Charles Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cushing, G. Davis, Richard D. Davis, Jno. Edwards, Everett, Ferris, Fessenden, Fillmore, Gerry, Giddings, Patrick G. Goode, Gordon, Granger, Gustine, Hall, Halsted, Houck, Howard, Hudson, Hunt, Charles J. Ingersoll, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, William W. Irwin, Keim, John P. Kennedy, Robert McClellan, McKennan, Thomas F. Marshall, Samson Mason, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Newhard, Osborne, Parmenter, Pearce, Plumer, Proffit, Ramsay, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Randolph, Read, Ridgway, Riggs, Rodney, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Sanford, Slade, Truman Smith, Sollers, Stratton, John T. Stuart, Taliaferro, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Trumbull, Van Buren, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Ward, Edward D. White, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Yorke, and Augustus Young—105.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Black, Botts, Boyd, A. V. Brown, Milton Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Cary, Casey, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Colquitt, Mark A. Cooper, Cravens, Cross, Daniel, Dawson, Dean, Deberry, Doan, Doig, John C. Edwards, Egbert, John G. Floyd, A. L. Foster, Thomas F. Foster, Gamble, Gentry, Gilmer, Goggin, William O. Goode, Graham, Green, Gwin, Habersham, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houston, Hubard, Hunter, John W. Jones, Andrew Kennedy, King, Lane, Lewis, Linn, Littlefield, Abraham McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Mallory, John T. Mason, Mathiot, Mathews, Miller, Mitchell, Owaley, Payne, Rayner, Reding, Reynolds, Rhett, Rogers, Roosevelt, Saunders, Shaw, Shepperd, Shields, William Smith, Sprigg, Steenrod, Summers, Sumter, John B. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Underwood, Warren, Washington, Watterson, Weller, James W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, and Wood—102.

The question now coming up on the passage of the bill—

Mr. McKENNAH demanded the previous question, under the operation of which the bill was passed—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Appleton, Ayer, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Briggs, Brockway, Charles Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cushing, Garrett Davis, Richard D. Davis, John Edwards, Everett, Ferris, Fessenden, Fillmore, Gerry, Giddings, Patrick G. Goode, Gordon, Granger, Gustine, Hall, Halsted, Houck, Howard, Hudson, Hunt, Charles J. Ingersoll, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, William W. Irwin, Keim, John P. Kennedy, Robert McClellan, McKennan, Thomas F. Marshall, Samson Mason, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Newhard, Osborne, Parmenter, Pearce, Plumer, Pope, Powell, Proffit, Ramsay, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Randolph, Read, Ridgway, Riggs, Rodney, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Sanford, Slade, Truman Smith, Sollers, Stratton, John T. Stuart, Taliaferro, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Trumbull, Van Buren, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Ward, Edward D. White, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Yorke, and Augustus Young—105.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Black, Botts, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Cary, Casey, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Colquitt, Mark A. Cooper, Cravens, Cross, Daniel, Dawson, Dean, Deberry, Doan, Doig, John C. Edwards, Egbert, John G. Floyd, A. L. Foster, Thomas L. Foster, Gamble, Gentry, Gilmer, Goggin, William O. Goode, Graham, Green, Gwin, Habersham, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houston, Hubard, Hunter, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Andrew Kennedy, King, Lane, Lewis, Linn, Littlefield, Abraham McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Mallory, John Thomson Mason, Mathiot, Mathews, Medill, Miller, Mitchell, Owaley, Payne, Rayner, Reding, Reynolds, Rhett, Rogers, Roosevelt, Saunders, Shaw, Shepperd, Shields, William Smith, Sprigg, Steenrod, Summers, Sumter, John B. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Underwood, Warren, Washington, Watterson, Weller, James W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, and Wood—103.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. McKENNAH moved a reconsideration of the vote just taken—rejected without a count.

AUGUST, 1842.]

The Mandamus to the States.

[27TH CONG.]

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 23.

The Mandamus to the States.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to take up the House bill No. 210, entitled an act to regulate the taking of testimony in cases of contested elections, and for other purposes.

So the orders of the day were postponed, and the bill was taken up, as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said, the first two sections related to the manner of certifying the election of Representatives, in conformity with an existing law lately passed, prescribing the mode and manner of elections. The residue of the bill related to the evidence to be adduced in cases of contested elections.

The first part of the bill was to prescribe the evidence to be admitted as authentic, by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, on members presenting themselves for seats in that House. Mr. C. stated, at some length, his views in relation to the necessity of this measure.

The last section was to adjust a much contested point, as to the rights of the parties contesting an election to pay and expenses. This he explained by the reading of the 27th section of the bill, and commenting on its several provisions. He argued that this act was rendered imperatively necessary, in consequence of the law regulating elections by single districts. If there was any thing blamable, it was to be sought in that law, not in this. He was told gentlemen intended to contest this bill, and to denounce it as an outlawry of the States. If it pleased gentlemen to indulge themselves in hyperbolic denunciations, they were welcome to it, for him.

Mr. WALKER said, the first objection that he made to the bill, was, that it was a violation of the constitution, which assigned to each House of Congress the exclusive right to judge of, and determine upon, the qualification, election, and return of their own members. Congress was not, and could not be the proper judge of the return and qualification of members of the House of Representatives. The Senate had no right to prescribe to the House on what terms they should permit their members to take their seats in that House. The constitutionality of this law, and the power of Congress to pass it, would be tested by this consideration:—Suppose the members from a State which elects by general ticket, should present themselves, and produce their returns, duly certified by the Governor of the State, under the broad seal of the State: the House to which they are chosen must necessarily be the judge of their returns; because the constitution specifically declares that it shall be the sole and exclusive judge. And what do you propose by this bill? You propose to reject them under certain circumstances. Is not this, in effect, to outlaw them? The term is an expressive term; and it is directly applicable.

It is an outlawry, not merely of the members elect, but of the people who elect them. It is a clear and flagrant violation of the constitution. If the States must be disfranchised, (a matter surely which the Senate ought to deplore,) when the calamity comes, let it not be inflicted by the Senate. If the members of a State are to be expelled from the 28th Congress, let not the edict of expulsion come from the Senate; and, above all, in advance. If the catastrophe must take place, let the disfranchisement be inflicted by that tribunal to which the constitution has given exclusive jurisdiction in the matter—the House itself. And suppose the House choose to admit the members elected: what will your law be worth? Can you expel them? will your law drive them out? will it disorganize the House of Representatives? It will have no effect or operation whatever. It will be a nullity, and therefore unconstitutional; because every constitutional law can be enforced. This will be a mere brutum fulmen—of no more value than so much blank paper. But there were other matters connected with this bill, which rendered it highly inexpedient and improper. [Mr. WALKER here read and commented upon that portion of the bill in relation to the testimony.] Mere hearsay evidence—an inquiry into the political character and opinions of the voter—general and vague impressions as to his political opinions, were to be taken as evidence whether he voted for or against a particular candidate. Was not this a violation of the great fundamental principles of the common law? It was a settled rule of evidence in every court, that mere hearsay evidence cannot be received as testimony.

The bill was a violation of the constitution in another particular. It not merely authorized but it required and compelled certain officers under the State Government to perform certain duties, as if they were officers amenable to the power of the Federal Legislature. Upon this point, the supreme courts of the States, where the question had arisen, had decided (and the decision had been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States) that State officers—and particularly justices of the peace—could not be compelled to perform any act in obedience to the mandate of the Federal authorities. He denied that Congress had any right, under the constitution, to vest in justices of the peace, as this bill attempted to do, the power to fine and imprison.

Mr. WOODBURY said he would not, at this late day, have obtruded himself a moment on the indulgence of the Senate, had not the State which he, in part, represented, spoken most strongly on this subject. Its Legislature had, with great deliberation, pronounced the clause in the apportionment bill, directing the States to make single districts, both inexpedient and unconstitutional. In that, he had been fortified as to similar views, expressed on the same point, on a former occasion. He regretted that a prominent object in the bill now before us is to enforce that unwarrantable clause. It is, therefore, void. It seeks to carry into effect a mandate issued to a sovereign State, which you are unauthorized to issue, and to do it by disfranchising not only the State, but its people, if they have the firmness and independence to protect their own rights. Had the clause in the apportionment bill been only advisory, and been so treated by Congress, the present measure should not be resorted to. But this measure treats it as an order—a dictation; and now tries to impose penalties on State disobedience. In this way the States are to be considered as our servants, and we their masters.

2d Sess.]

The Mandamus to the States.

[August, 1842.]

I concede that Congress had power to make districts itself, if the States neglected their duty, and the elective franchise of the people were likely to be lost. But no such cause existed for its interference. And if there had, Congress should have finished its own business—carried out its own districting—and not have dictated to the States, that the latter should obey or perform what belonged to the former to do, in fear of pains and penalties under any omission. In that case, we should have witnessed no such outrages as have recently occurred amongst the friends of that law in Ohio, in attempting to defeat a districting under it.

Another palpable violation of the constitution in this measure, arises from its breach of the provision in the 5th section, that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Yet, by the first portion of the present bill, you are unwilling, and you refuse to leave the House of Representatives to judge of the elections and returns of its own members. On the contrary, you yourselves, in conjunction, undertake to judge for them. You invoke the President, also, to unite with you in judging for them.

Grant, then, that, after an organization, and after one or two sessions have nearly expired, the House may be allowed to admit the proper persons to their seats; yet you hereby direct for them who shall be admitted in the first instance, and in the choice of Speaker, and all officers, and in making rules; as well as, afterwards, in half the legislation of the whole Congress. On one occasion lately, I believe, the right of election of members was not settled till far into the second session. What power have you to order a defunct Clerk whom he shall permit to vote? What right to say he shall admit any members, when the constitution provides that the members shall settle the question for themselves?

Mr. WRIGHT said he had expressed his views somewhat at large on the subject of coercing the several States of this Union, when the apportionment bill was under discussion. But circumstances had since transpired, which strengthened his opinions, and went far to verify the predictions he then made. He alluded to the recent action of several States in reference to the apportionment act. He had undertaken to say, when that act was on its passage, that it would not, and could not, control the States in their elections of Representatives. For this declaration he was, at the time, designated as a nullifier. If his opinions on that subject entitled him to the appellation, several of the States had since declared themselves of the same opinion. They had virtually annulled that act; and so they would this, if it should become a law.

Mr. BERRIEN observed that, when the apportionment bill was before the Senate, he had stated his views so fully, that it would be unnecessary now to repeat arguments he then urged in vain, to induce some modification of those provisions he considered obnoxious to the States, and most inexpedient in themselves. He had not disputed the power of Congress to interfere in the manner pointed out in the constitution; but he had doubted, and still continued to doubt, exceedingly, the expediency of exercising that power. As the Senate was fully aware of his sentiments on the subject, he would not occupy further time than was necessary to move the following amendment, to come in at the end of the first section:

And provided further, (in substance,) That nothing in this section, or in the act therein referred to, shall be held to extend to the election of any person who shall be chosen a Representative to the 28th Congress in any State, in which, by the laws of such State, the election for Representatives to Congress is required to be made by general ticket, and where the election has been held, or may be held, in accordance with such State laws.

On this amendment he called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. CALHOUN said, without entering into the question whether the original law was a wise one, or whether this was a wise one, it was very well known to the Senate that, in four or five of the States, it was impossible to comply with them. He himself represented, in part, a State so situated that it was almost impossible they should adopt the law without occasioning much internal discord. Under the circumstances of the whole case, he did hope the Senate would pause, and not press upon the States an enactment of this kind, dangerous in its consequences, and, at the same time, of doubtful utility.

Mr. LINN said he was very glad the Senator from Georgia had introduced this amendment. It was but common justice to some of the weaker States. Can any thing be more unjust than the manner in which Missouri is to be treated? That State, in the regular course of its legalized policy, proceeded to the election of its members of Congress for the next Congress of the United States. The members thus elected will come to the seat of Government at the appointed time, to take their seats, as insured to them by the constitution. Are they to have the doors of the House of Repre-

August, 1842.]

The Tariff Bill.

[27th CONG.]

representatives shut in their face by the Clerk of a former Congress, because they are representatives of a whole State, and not of its fragments? Are they to be ejected thus unceremoniously by the Clerk of the House, in spite of the rights secured to them by the constitution? This, indeed, will be an exhibition of unconstitutional usurpation, growing out of the legislation of this Congress, extraordinary even for our remarkable above all preceding Congresses for its violation of constitutional rights. Well may sovereign States date from this Congress, as from a fatal epoch. It was not alone by a habeas corpus act that their sovereignty was paralyzed: now they are deprived of the very principle of representation.

Their right to a voice in the councils of the nation is to be decided by the fiat of a Clerk of the House of Representatives. This, indeed, is plunging deeply into the bowels of the system, to destroy all vitality, under the pretence of reaching an imagined morbid part. It is time for gentlemen to see that it is impossible for them to go on much longer in this way.

The amendment of Mr. B.'s was modified, and adopted with others, and the bill ordered to be engrossed.

THURSDAY, August 25.

The Tariff Bill.

The bill to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes, was taken up as in Committee of the Whole, with thirty-one amendments recommended by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EVANS hoped the Senate would proceed with the amendments in their regular order.

The CHAIR announced the first amendment to be, to change the expression "the day and year before mentioned," into "the passage of this act."

Mr. EVANS pointed out that there were several verbal amendments, to the same effect, throughout the bill, the question on which might be taken altogether.

These amendments were adopted.

The next amendment was to substitute four cents per square yard on cotton-bagging, or its substitute, imported, for five cents in the original bill.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the amendment by substituting "three" cents, for "four."

Mr. KING observed that the effect of the high duty proposed would be to exclude from this market every species of foreign cotton-bagging. This would then be a prohibitory duty. Now, he was willing that the bagging manufacturers of Kentucky and Missouri should have a fair protection, not detrimental to revenue, or to other industrial interests of the country. He was willing to let them enter the Southern market with every advantage against foreign competition. But he would not, for the purpose of merely giving a bounty to a few individuals, consent to lay an extravagant duty, calculated to cut off all foreign competition, and exclude altogether the foreign fabric. Mr. K. read from a table, which he held in his hand, many statistics to show the quality and price of the foreign fabric, contrasted with the domestic. He also read a statement, prepared by no unfriendly hand to protection, showing the comparative advantage of high and low rates of duty. His own experience satisfied him that, under a fair competition in prices, Kentucky bagging would always command a preference in the Southern market, as long as the usually good article from that State was produced. Last year, in consequence of rivalry, an inferior article was produced, and the interests of the Kentucky bagging manufacturers suffered; because they could not, as usual, command the preference in the market.

He stated that in the neighborhood of Louisville, the old mode of spinning and weaving by hand had been superseded by machinery on an extensive scale. The reduced price in the Southern market is the effect of this competition at home between machine labor and hand labor, and not from competition with the foreign article. The returns for 1839 show that the price of Scotch bagging at the place of manufacture was twelve and a half cents; of English bagging, thirteen cents; and of Russian, fourteen cents—the article being better than the Scotch or English. If to these be added the charges of importation, the foreign article cannot now, even if free of duty, compete with Kentucky bagging, manufactured by machinery, at a cost not exceeding two or three cents a yard, so long as the latter article maintains its quality, and thereby commands the market. Kentucky bagging, manufactured by machinery, can now be sold at ten cents a yard, and leave as much profit to the capitalist as fifteen or sixteen cents for the article manufactured by hand labor. It is evident that in a year or two the Kentucky manufacturers can, without any protection, command the whole market. But if, by mistaken legislation, a duty on the foreign article is imposed which will put competition out of the question, the cupidity of the manufacturers will be so stimulated, that the cotton planters, in self defence, will be driven to the necessity of adopting expedients which will ruin the Kentucky manufacturers.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that, judging by the statements so ably made by the Senator from Alabama, Kentucky bagging, by the improvements in machinery, can now be made and offered in the market for ten cents per yard. Hence, then, it was clear that even a duty of three cents per square yard on the foreign article would amount to a total prohibition, and would produce not one cent of revenue. He submitted to the Senate, if the Kentucky

2d Sess.]

The Tariff Bill.

[August, 1842.]

bagging can be made for 10 cents, and the foreign article cannot be made for less than 12½ cents, (to which the cost of import must be added)—whether it was reasonable to suppose that a single yard of the foreign article would be brought into market. Did not every one see that, instead of the sum estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury to be derived from bagging for revenue, there would not be one cent of revenue accruing to the treasury, even at three cents per square yard duty?

Mr. MOREHEAD had not changed his opinions, nor were they likely to be changed by the observations of the Senator from South Carolina, that three cents duty would be prohibitory, and produce no revenue; or of the Senator from Alabama, that he was willing to protect the home manufacturers, provided it could be done without interfering with revenue. He could tell both Senators they were mistaken; and that neither three cents nor five cents would give adequate protection to the Kentucky manufacturers.

The question was then taken on Mr. WALKER's motion to substitute 3 cents for 4, and negatived.

Mr. WALKER then moved to substitute 3½ cents per yard, and on this he called the yeas and nays.

The rate he now proposed was reported by the Finance Committee, when the bill was last before the Senate. It was the rate imposed by the act of 1832; and, under the compromise act, it continued to fall, till it reached 2 9-10 cents.

The yeas and nays were then ordered.

The question was taken on Mr. WALKER's amendment, to substitute 3½ cents for 4, and resulted in the affirmative—yeas 25, nays 22.

The amendment as amended was then adopted.

FRIDAY, August 26.

The Tariff Bill.

The bill to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes, was taken up, as in Committee of the Whole, for further consideration; the amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance having been disposed of yesterday.

Mr. MERRICK moved to insert at the end of the bill an additional section, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That whenever the President of the United States shall receive satisfactory evidence that the grain, flour, salted provisions, and unmanufactured tobacco, of the growth and production of the United States, exported from the United States, are admitted at a rate of duty not exceeding 25 per cent. ad valorem, into the several ports of any European state or kingdom, he shall make proclamation thereof to the people of the United States, and thenceforward the duties imposed by this act upon all articles the growth and produce of such state or kingdom so admitting such grain, flour, salted provisions, and manufactured tobacco, shall be reduced to the rate of 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. EVANS hoped the Senate would not consent to adopt an amendment, the effect of which would be to allow any—perhaps the most inconsiderable—state of Europe to make a tariff for this country, to be extended to all other nations with which it has treaties of commerce.

Mr. MERRICK denied that the amendment would have any such effect.

Mr. EVANS insisted that it would.

Mr. BENTON said the proposition of the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MERRICK) was a large one, involving great consequences, and reviving a principle as old as the Government. Our constitution contained two provisions on the subject of foreign commerce—one to lay duties on imports, for revenue; the other to regulate commerce with foreign nations. The former of these powers had been executed from the establishment of the Government; the latter had not been executed at all. Mr. Madison attempted it in 1793, in his celebrated resolutions of that day, which were defeated by the British interest. Mr. Jefferson recommended it in his report on foreign commerce, when he was Secretary of State; and, acting on their suggestions, and endeavoring to give an effect to an important clause in the constitution, he, (Mr. B.,) a few years ago, had digested an amendment framed on Mr. Madison's resolutions, and the study of the speeches and reports of that day, to establish the system of discrimination and reciprocity in trade with foreign nations: discriminating between nations, according to their treatment of our commerce, and reciprocity in the rates of dues. The principle of Mr. Madison's resolutions was, that a discrimination of 10 per cent. in the duties should be made in favor of the commerce of the nations which admitted our products on favorable terms; and that this principle, established by law, should be carried into effect by treaties. This was the principle of Mr. Madison's resolutions; and in the proposition which he offered a few years ago, this principle was sought to be established in the mode he proposed. His (Mr. B.'s) proposition was not successful, although better matured than the proposition now offered by the Senator from Maryland, or lately offered by the Senator from Ohio, (Mr. TAPPAN;) he said better matured, without arrogating any merit to himself, except the merit of copying a great master—for he only copied Mr. Madison. He was, of course, in favor of the general object of the amendment offered, but it was not in the appropriate form, and could not be appropriately framed and guarded in any extemporaneous movement in this closing scene upon the passage of a revenue or tariff bill. It was a large subject, requiring a separate consideration in itself: a consideration requiring a view of the whole existing commerce, both foreign and domestic, and of all our commercial treaties with foreign powers. A subject so large as this would require time for deliberation and for action; and we had time for neither now. It would also require a separate consideration, and could be adopted at any time, without being made a part of a tariff bill. It would do best in a bill by itself: he was, therefore, against doing any thing on the subject now, and taking it up by itself at the next session.

August, 1842.]

The Distribution Act.

[27th CONG.]

Mr. MERRICK modified his amendment, so as to limit its effect to reciprocity, by adding the following:

Unless, under the provisions of existing treaties, said reductions of duties will inure to the benefit of some other foreign country not making the reciprocal reduction in its ports; and, in all such cases, the President is hereby requested to take the earliest means of terminating the obligations of any such treaty so conflicting with these principles of reciprocity.

After a few remarks from Messrs. HUNTINGTON and WOODBURY,

The question was taken on Mr. MERRICK's amendment, and decided in the negative—yeas 6, nays 29.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 26.

The Distribution Act.

Mr. TRUMAN SMITH moved to take up bill No. 604; which was agreed to by a majority of 92 to 68, taken by tellers.

The Clerk then read the bill as follows:

A BILL to repeal the proviso to the 6th section of the act entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights," approved September 4, 1841.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the proviso to the 6th section of the act entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights," approved September 4th, 1841, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

After remarks by Messrs. ARNOLD, COOPER, and WISE,

Mr. ANDREWS, of Kentucky, moved that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House. The question was carried; and the committee rose and reported the bill.

Mr. ANDREWS, of Kentucky, moved the previous question on the engrossment of the bill, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. THOMPSON, of Indiana, who addressed the House at some length in reply to Mr. WISE; after which, he renewed the call for the previous question, under the operation of which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill was then passed—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, S. J. Andrews, Appleton, Ayer, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botta, Brockway, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, John C. Clark, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Garrett Davis, Deberry, John Edwards, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Patrick G. Goode, Graham, Granger, Green, Hall, Halsted, Howard, Hudson, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, William Cost Johnson, Isaac D. Jones, John P. Kennedy, Linn, McKenna, Thomas F. Marshall, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Mitchell, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Owsley, Pearce, Pope, Powell, Ramsay, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Ridgway, Rodney, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Shepperd, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Sollers, Sprigg, Sully, Stratton, Alexander H. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Summers, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Warren, Washington, Edward D. White, Thomas W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Yorks, and Augustus Young—104.

NAYS.—Messrs. Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Bidlack, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, S. H. Butler, Wm. O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, P. C. Caldwell, John Campbell, Cary, Casey, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Cushing, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dewart, Dean, Doig, John C. Edwards, Egbert, Ferris, John G. Floyd, Thomas F. Foster, Gamble, Gerry, Gilmer, William O. Goode, Gordon, Gustine, Gwin, Habersham, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubard, Hunter, C. J. Ingersoll, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Lewis, Littlefield, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, Malory, John Thomson Mason, Medill, Miller, Newhall, Oliver, Parmenter, Payne, Plumer, Proffit, Beding, Reynolds, Rhett, Riggs, Rogers, Saunders, Shaw, Shields, William Smith, Stearns, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Van Buren, Ward, Watterson, Wells, James W. Williams, Wise, and Wood—84.

Mr. ANDREWS, of Kentucky, moved a reconsideration of the vote just taken; but the motion was rejected.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, August 27.

The Distribution Act.

The bill which had passed the House repealing the 6th section of the distribution act, which suspends the operation of said act, when it shall be necessary to lay a higher rate of duty than 20 per cent. to support the Government, was taken up, and read the first time; and the question being, "Shall the bill be read the second time, with a view to reference?"

Messrs. WOODBURY and ALLEN objected.

The CHAIR said, objection being made, the bill cannot, under the rule, be read a second time to-day.

Mr. CRITTENDEN submitted whether it was not unusual to object to the reading of a bill

2d Sess.]

The Tariff Bill.

[August, 1842.]

with a view to reference, when the effect of it might be to defeat the bill.

Mr. ALLEN said if it was a matter of feeling and courtesy, he certainly would not interpose objections. But this was an important measure which had agitated the country for a long time, and he thought it his duty to endeavor, by all means in his power under the rule, to defeat it.

The Tariff Bill.

The Senate having, on motion of Mr. EVANS, taken up the bill to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes—the question pending being on ordering the amendments to be engrossed for a third reading,—

Mr. BUCHANAN said he owed it to his own peculiar position in relation to this bill, as well as to the importance of the interests which it involved, to address the Senate for a few minutes upon the subject under consideration. He had never felt himself placed in a more embarrassing position than that which he occupied at the present moment. In this situation he had anxiously endeavored to discover the path of duty; and having, as he believed, succeeded, he had determined to tread it, without fear of consequences.

Sir, (continued Mr. B.) the only alternatives now presented to the Senate, are whether we shall pass this bill, or leave the country in its present deplorable condition? Every substitute proposed for the bill has failed; and it is morally impossible that any other measure can now be introduced in its stead, with the least hope of success. The last hour of the session is rapidly approaching; and we must speedily resolve either to pass the present bill, or to do nothing.

In what I intend to say, I shall studiously refrain from arousing any political or personal feeling; but shall be content simply to place myself in that position before my own constituents and the country where I desire to stand.

Let us then, for a few moments, consider the two horns of the dilemma—the two alternatives presented to the Senate. If you shall adjourn without passing any bill, what will be the consequences? In the first place, you will then continue, and most probably perpetuate, the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the several States. This is inevitable, if you should not raise duties on imports above twenty per cent. Now, sir, whilst I freely accord to my Whig friends the utmost honesty of purpose in clinging to this distribution, they will allow me credit for an equal degree of sincerity, when I declare that, in my opinion, it is one of the most unwise—nay, dangerous—measures which has ever been adopted by Congress. I do not intend to go into the general question at present—having already, during the present session, fully presented my views upon the subject. Thus much, however, I shall declare—that, if we squander away our most magnificent inheritance of the public lands, it is my firm belief that we and our descendants will regret the deed to the latest posterity. Whilst we retain this glorious fund, purchased by the toils and blood of our revolutionary ancestors,—let foreign war come when it may; let our commerce be swept from the ocean by a superior naval power; and let there no longer be any revenue from customs,—still shall we have a never-failing resource in the revenue from the public lands to assure our independence and our safety. This consideration alone is sufficiently powerful to induce me to vote for almost any bill which would arrest this fatal distribution. I would consider almost any bill (and, in several particulars, I dislike this bill as much as any Senator on this floor) a triumph which shall restore the land fund to the treasury of the United States, and settle this agitating question. I introduce this subject, not for the purpose of exciting political debate, but for that of presenting myself in my true attitude before the people of the country.

Again: if we adjourn without passing any bill, what will be the condition in which we shall leave the treasury of our country? Why, sir, many of the ablest lawyers throughout the Union, as well as a large majority in both Houses of Congress, hold the opinion that there is now no law in existence under which any revenue can be collected. This is the almost universal opinion of the Whig party; and it is also the opinion of my friend from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) on whose judgment I am disposed to place great reliance. This, I confess, is not my opinion; but experience has taught me to distrust my own judgment, especially upon legal questions, when it comes in conflict with that of wiser and abler men. Should they prove to be right—if we adjourn without passing any bill, we shall fix a deep and disgraceful blot upon the character of the country, which time could not efface.

But, even suppose it should hereafter be decided that duties can be collected under existing laws: the consequences would be almost as appalling. Every dollar of duty which is now paid, is paid under protest; and, to say the least, it is extremely doubtful whether every cent of revenue that is now received at the custom-house must not eventually be refunded. The whole scanty and deficient revenue of the Government is now in litigation; and if we should adjourn without passing any bill, will continue to be in litigation; and no man knows what will be the result. This is the condition of the treasury of our country at the present moment. Now, sir, is this a condition that any man—any American citizen—any American patriot—can contemplate without feelings of shame, mortification, and sorrow?

And how stands our national credit at the present moment? In that abject posture to which our reckless course has reduced it. Sir, public credit is the very lifeblood of the nation. To restore it, we ought to make every sacrifice consistent with honor. We had ever maintained our credit unsullied, from the time when we sprung into existence as a nation, until the period when unfortunate dissensions arose between the dominant party and the President. Now, our treasury is insolvent; the public creditors have large demands against it, which it is unable to meet; the state of things is daily growing worse; and there is even danger that the operations of the Government may be wholly suspended: and yet we propose to adjourn, leaving the country in this fearful, this deplorable condition. Bad, indeed, must be the bill presented before me, if it be, as it is in this case, the only alternative for these evils, for which I should not vote. I confess I shrink from the responsibility of recording my vote against this bill, when its fate may, and most probably will, depend upon my single voice.

I have never, in the whole course of my life, read any publication with deeper feelings of mortification than an extract from an article in a London paper, which I have just seen in the National Intelligencer of Thursday last. In what estimation is the credit of this great and glorious Republic now held on the other side of the Atlantic? That proud and arrogant nation, to whom you have sent a special messenger to beg for a loan to supply your exhausted treasury, has received your message with contempt and scorn. The language of the article is so strong and so unjust, that I shall not repeat it in the American Senate. Your messenger is treated with contempt, when he presents himself before the British capitalist. He is told that the credit both of the States which compose the Union, and of the Union itself, is so low, that no money can be borrowed upon the pledged faith of the United States. In the public journals, capitalists are forewarned against him, and cautioned not to render themselves the dupes of our Government. And this in England! How mortifying to the honest pride of every true-hearted American!

Now, I maintain that the first duty of an American statesman is to make any honorable sacrifice of opinion which may be necessary to sustain the credit and character of his country. Without the passage of this very bill—for we can obtain no other—we shall be disgraced at home, and still more disgraced abroad. Without it, we descend from our lofty elevation, and tarnish that high character which it is our duty to maintain at every sacrifice.

But the worst has not yet arrived. If Congress should adjourn without passing any revenue bill, after having already appropriated twenty-four millions of dollars, in what condition will the Government itself be placed? It will be destitute of the means to meet your own appropriations; and it may not even be able to keep your navy afloat, or to pay the officers and soldiers of the army. We shall leave behind us a bankrupt treasury, and shall return home to meet a ruined people. With what joy such disastrous events would be hailed by the enemies of our free institutions throughout the world! whilst the friends of freedom in every land, who have been looking to our example as their star of hope amidst the gloom of despotism, would receive the dismal intelligence with the most melancholy forebodings.

Without adverting further to the condition in which we should leave the treasury and the Government of our country, let us take a hasty glance at the consequences to large classes of our best and most useful citizens. If you pass no bill, you will ruin a very large portion of all the mechanics and artisans throughout the country. These are not to be counted by hundreds or by thousands; but by hundreds of thousands; and for intelligence and devotion to country, they are not surpassed by any other class in the community. They earn their daily bread by the sweat of their face, and are justly entitled to our sympathy and kindness. Under the uniform twenty per cent. ad valorem duty of the compromise law, they must abandon their business, or be deprived of employment. I have been informed, from numerous and authentic sources, that sore distress already prevails among them, especially in our large Atlantic cities; and that their prospects for the next winter are terrible. The price of mechanical labor is much cheaper in Europe than in this country; and, therefore, if you impose no higher rate of duty upon the made-up article, than upon the material of which it is composed, you must destroy their business. Impose the same rate of duty upon foreign cloth and upon ready-made clothing—upon foreign leather and upon boots and shoes—and your tailors and shoemakers have no incidental protection whatever. And why? Because, notwithstanding your duty, their labor comes into equal and direct competition with the pauper labor of foreign countries, and we shall be supplied with ready-made clothing and with boots and shoes from abroad, at lower prices than they can by possibility be afforded at home. I might greatly extend this list of mechanics, by adverting to hatters, saddlers, and other tradesmen; but I forbear. Whatever, then, may be your duty upon the articles which these mechanics work up, you must discriminate by imposing a higher duty upon the article when prepared for use by the foreign mechanic, or you must deprive our own mechanics of employment. Such a result would be deprecated by every Senator upon this floor. The present bill makes the necessary discrimination.

I shall not now dwell upon the distress which would be produced throughout my own State among the laboring classes who have heretofore found employment at our numerous furnaces and forges, and in our coal-mines. From their habits of life, they are in a great degree

[2d Sess.]

The Tariff Bill.

[August, 1842.]

mitted for other employments; and even if this were not the case, there is no demand for their labor in any other pursuit. My heart sickens at the prospect of misery and distress which will visit them and their families throughout the approaching winter, if no bill should pass. But I have heretofore adverted to this subject more at large, and shall not farther pursue it at the present.

I have thus hastily sketched one side of the picture; and now let me hasten to the other. I admit, most cheerfully, that the bill is extravagant in the protection which it affords; and, in some instances, is altogether prohibitory. It is a bill of which I do not approve, and for which I would not vote, were it not for the present unparalleled condition of the existing law, the treasury, and the country. I had earnestly hoped that it might be modified and amended by the Senate in such a manner as to render it more acceptable; but in this I have been utterly disappointed. No reduction of duties whatever has been made upon any of the protected articles, with the exception of iron—an article in which Pennsylvania is deeply interested—and one cent per square yard on cotton-bagging. The duties upon hammered, rolled, and pig iron have been reduced considerably below the standard of the act of 1832; but of this I do not complain. I do not desire that any manufacture of Pennsylvania should be protected by a prohibitory duty. All I ask is that such incidental protection may be afforded as will enable the manufacturer to live. I ask no more, notwithstanding the annual value of iron and its manufactures alone, produced in that State, has been estimated, by those who understand the subject, at more than twenty-one millions of dollars—a greater amount than the whole value of cotton produced in any State of this Union. No Senator can suppose that I would patiently witness the sacrifice of such a vast interest in my native State. The duty on iron in bars is so far from being prohibitory, that in 1839, when it was nearly the same as it would be under the present bill, it alone yielded to the treasury more than two millions of dollars. I venture to predict that bar iron, under this bill, (should it become a law,) will yield a greater amount of revenue, in a fair proportion, than any other article in the whole catalogue. Sir, most of the other great interests of the country have received a great, and many of them a greater, protection than was afforded them under the act of 1832. If, therefore, I were to look at this bill in a sectional point of view; or if it were presented to me in any other aspect than as a means of saving the country from impending distress, I should most certainly vote against its engrossment.

Mr. CHOATE observed that it was not his intention to occupy more than ten minutes of the time of the Senate. He would briefly state the reasons which had brought him to the conclusion of voting for this bill. He felt rejoiced that, as a Whig and a politician, he could support this measure as a purely Whig measure. He could not hail it with the same exultation as if it were in its original shape; but such as it was, he took it as the best that could now be effected. It would do much, even now, at the eleventh hour, in its effects on the industry of the country; and as a measure of relief to the Government, to reanimate and reassure the Whig party.

He could not, however, exult with the Senator from Pennsylvania; for that which was a source of exultation with that Senator, was to him and his friends a great sacrifice. The Senator from Pennsylvania was consoled in voting for this bill, because it defeated the great Whig measure of distribution. But he (Mr. C.) derived consolation—not, indeed, from the same source, for no one could deplore more than he did the necessity of sacrificing distribution—but from the fact that, instead of the Whig party being defeated in two measures—purely Whig measures—it would succeed in carrying one, at least; and that one would have the effect of cheering many a drooping heart, and gladdening many a fireside, where misery and destitution now prevail. Rejoiced would he have been if both measures could have been achieved; but as it was no longer doubtful that to insist upon both was to defeat both, he was satisfied that true policy required the postponement of the one, for the sake of securing the blessings of the other. As it was come to a choice between them, it could be considered no detriment to the measure of distribution to say that its immediate consummation was less urgent than the measure now before the Senate. This is urgent and indispensable; it is an indispensable duty; the Government cannot exist without it; the languishing and prostrate industry of the country must perish, if it is not passed. It may not be every thing the country wishes for and wants; but it is something; and that something is important, and will effect much good. It is, besides, all that can, at this momentous crisis, be obtained; and these were reasons sufficient to influence him, and satisfy him that it was his duty to support it. All must see the importance of the crisis. A whole session of unexampled length had passed away, without any thing efficient having been done to accomplish the great and leading business of the session—the adjustment of the tariff.

This was the great work which the country expected at the hands of the Whig party. It had not been neglected, though delayed till a late period of the session, but even then, what had been done had been rendered nugatory by a power they could not control. The desire to carry two concurrent measures was said to be the cause of this failure. A different aspect of things was then presented. Things should be viewed as they really stood. The Government was in a state of destitution; there was no revenue, for the Whig party, which had the majority in Congress, believed there was no existing law for the collection of revenue; public credit was depressed and unavailable; the industrial classes were in danger of being reduced to utter destitution; and one great and beneficent measure could reanimate and reinvigorate them all. Who, then, could doubt that it was a duty to sacrifice much for the attainment of that great measure of relief? It was a measure due to the Government and to the country alike.

Mr. MERRICK, in reply to the appeal made to him by the Senator from Massachusetts, observed that, according to his understanding, that Senator took an erroneous view of the subject, and neglected to look at the other side of the picture, in which his (Mr. MERRICK's) constituents were represented. He had forgotten to consider them, in the deep sympathy and interest which he felt for the industry of his constituents. What is this bill? It is a bill to tax the interests of the agriculturists for the benefit of the manufacturers. This the agriculturists were willing to bear, if they had but their share of the benefits; but do not cast on them the necessity of swallowing the whole bitter draught, and refuse to share with them the sweets.

The CHAIR then put the question, "Shall the amendments be ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time?"—when the yeas and nays were called for, and ordered.

Mr. WRIGHT said he rose, not to make a speech, but to declare that he was about to record his vote in favor of this bill—a declaration which, it pained him to know, would carry disappointment and sorrow to the minds of many of his most respected and esteemed friends, both in and out of this hall. It had been his habit, as it had been his pleasure and pride, to act with his political friends; and he could not describe the reluctance under which he now found himself compelled to separate from them. Yet, after the most mature and anxious reflection, he had come to the conclusion that it was his duty to vote for this measure, because he assumed that this bill must pass in the form it now bears, or that no revenue law can pass at the present session. If he was correct in this assumption, then he could not avoid the conclusion he had announced; and he did not suppose there was a single member of either House of Congress who supposed for a moment that, if this bill be rejected upon this vote, any further attempt is to be made, at this session, to pass a revenue bill. The alternative presented, then, is this bill or none; and the deep and deliberate conviction of his mind was, that this bill should pass, bad and loaded with defects as he believed it to be, rather than that none should pass.

A collateral consideration had greatly troubled him in assenting to this conclusion. His first service in Congress was as a member of the Committee on Manufactures of the House of Representatives, during the session of 1827 and 1828, when he assisted to form, and voted for, the tariff bill of 1828, which has been so extensively denominated "the bill of abominations." He was then wholly without experience in legislation of this class and character; but his experience from that action had taught him the truth of the adage, that "men's evil deeds follow them." He became very soon convinced that he had committed a great error upon that occasion, and it was possible he was about to commit another as great now. It grieved him to know and feel that many friends within the reach of his voice, whose judgment he most highly respected, and whose good opinions were most valuable to him, would so look upon his present vote. He could not. The occasions appeared to him to be wholly dissimilar. The tariff of 1828 was avowedly passed for protection; and if considerations of revenue had any connection with it, they were only incidental to the main object of protection. There was no complaint of want at the treasury; no alleged necessity for increased revenues; and no blemish upon the public credit, so far as his recollections served him. Not so now, but precisely the reverse in all these respects. The treasury is empty; and almost daily the public creditors are turned away from it without payment. This very Congress has increased, and is daily increasing the public expenditures, and thus creating the necessity for increased revenues. And the public credit is not sinking, but sinking; so that loans, at high interest and at long time, cannot be negotiated at home or abroad, upon the declared reason that we have no revenues to meet the payment of the public liabilities.

These changes of circumstances constituted in his mind, the highest necessity for a revenue law, and forced upon him, under the most solemn sense of public duty, the course of action which he proposed to pursue. All he could ask of the friends who should differ from him, and believe him to be still in error, was that they would believe him to be governed by pure motives; and if in error, to be honestly so. He owed it to those friends, as well as to himself, to make another remark; which was, that the consequences of his action, if evil, should be visited upon himself, and upon himself alone; as no friend here or elsewhere, had interfered to bring him to the conclusion he had pronounced. Many very dear friends, whose judgments, upon almost all occasions, he valued more highly than his own, had kindly attempted to convince him he was in error—not one to urge him to give the vote.

After what had been said, and so well said, by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) upon the subject of distribution, and the condition of the treasury, and of the public credit, as connected with the passage of this bill, he should be required but briefly to allude to those topics, although upon them rested his action. It was known to the Senate that he had entertained deep feeling against the policy of distribution in any form, or for any purpose; and it certainly was a powerful and leading inducement with him to vote for this bill, that its effect was to be to arrest, and, he hoped, to eradicate forever, that policy. He begged to be believed in the assertion that, in speaking of distribution with the frankness and plainness which this occasion required, he did not design to utter one word which would wound the feelings of a single individual on any side of the House. He knew there were many as honestly and strongly friendly to the policy, as he was honestly and strongly opposed to it. It was his intention, upon all occasions, to award to others that credit for sincerity and purity of purpose, which he now asked from them; and he certainly now felt the heavy responsibility resting upon him too sensibly to entertain unkind feelings, or to give utterance to unkind words, towards any one.

2d Sess.]

The Tariff Bill.

[August, 1842.]

Mr. WOODBURY spoke in substance as follows:

Were we all pursuing one end by different modes, it would be proper, in this great exigency, to make mere form yield to substance. It would, sir, be manly and patriotic to relinquish any diversity of opinion about means—if all legal in themselves—in order to attain one important and common object. Nor would I, for one, in such a case, be behind either the Senator from New York, or the Senator from Pennsylvania, in such a public sacrifice.

But, unfortunately, that is not the condition of the momentous question before us. From the start, sir, it has been the deplorable policy of the friends of this bill to seek, not one end or object, but three: and those three involving principles of cardinal importance, rather than being different modes or means of subordinate consequence to attain a single purpose. Those three objects are, first, to procure revenue to discharge the ordinary obligations of the treasury, and rescue public credit from its present shameful depreciation; next, to give direct, high, and exclusive protection to manufactures; and, last, to assume, through distribution, a portion of the existing State debts. There is no use in circumlocution or concealment. These have all been—these are all now essential ends connected with the present measure. I shall not add—as to any of them—that they are bad ends in the opinion of their friends; though, in my own opinion, all are, in themselves, incompetent and illegitimate for the General Government to pursue, except the first. That is a paramount object on this embarrassing occasion; and, indeed, to procure revenue should be the only object in a bill entitled like this—“A bill to raise revenue.”

If it is also constitutional and expedient for us virtually to assume State debts to the extent of three or four millions, why is it not attempted in a separate, independent measure? Why this logrolling, and combination or bargaining, which unites in one bill heterogeneous and irrelevant subjects, and makes the success of one dependent on the success or failure of another? If you have a right to assume State debts, and have the means to spare for it in these distressed times, why not do it openly, and not under cover of a distribution of a surplus, when no surplus exists? So, if you have the right to give protection to one branch of industry, as a legitimate constitutional end under the powers of the Federal Government, and not merely as an incidental consequence of duties imposed for revenue, why not march manfully to such protection in a separate bill? Why not, as in France, expressly prohibit what comes from abroad, and competes with our manufactures, which it is deemed so important to cherish? Why not add, likewise, direct bounties in other cases, where found necessary to sustain them? That would at least be intelligible, aboveboard, and the country would see and understand what Congress was really doing; and that policy would not, as in this case, by an unnatural combination, embarrass, or endanger the only avowed object of this measure on its face—which is, to raise revenue. I do not impute this to any one as a designed wrong; but merely state facts, and complain of their bad tendency. This state of things, therefore, develops a case where gentlemen are not called on to yield up forms for substance, as most of us would cheerfully do in connection with either of the three great objects in the bill, if they stood alone. But it is a case where we are required to give up some one or two great ends, in order to secure another; and are thus obliged to examine and decide whether any end we obtain by the bill, is of sufficient magnitude to justify our voting for other parts of it which we dislike and oppose.

This is the conflict and embarrassment. The whole secret has been inadvertently disclosed in some of the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts. Manifestly, he deems the high protection in the bill to manufactures, of more importance than either distribution or revenue, or both combined. Hence, there is no wonder that he should vote for it, though he loses thereby the other desirable yet subordinate end of distribution; and lessens also, somewhat, the still other (yet, in his view, less vital) end of revenue. While, on the contrary, it is to be inferred that other gentlemen, who deem distribution and the partial assumption of State debts by it, paramount to all other considerations, either in a party or public view, will vote against the whole bill, because it suspends distribution.

An intermediate class of gentlemen—like the Senator from New York—deem the last effect of the bill, in relinquishing distribution, its greatest merit; and on that account alone are induced to vote for it, coupled with the consideration that it secures the collection of revenue, when now doubtful, and may be eminently useful to the manufacturing interest.

Now, sir, if I coincided in opinion with either of these classes, I should have voted with one of them, without explanation or delay at this late hour. But as I do not coincide with them, a minute or two more of the indulgence of the Senate is asked, to define my own position, and to show the reasons which are to me conclusive for still opposing the bill.

I place out of view entirely the consideration which seems to influence some—that we are likely to have no revenue if they vote against the bill; because the bill is destined to pass, if every Democrat in the Senate votes against it. This I have said and predicted from the outset. It secures a high and discriminating tariff for manufactures; and that alone is sufficient, with most of the majority in this body—the high-tariff party—to insure its triumph, whatever may be its violation of compromises, or its temporary effect on distribution. Next, it secures the rightful collection of revenue, when now it is, in their opinion, doubtful; and when the imperative duty has been devolved on them ever since last June, at once to provide for that contingency, if nothing else.

But why a Senator should vote for this bill who is hostile to a high and exclusive system of protection, and who is looking to revenue as the chief object that ought to be sought in a great exigency like this, of a bankrupt treasury and dishonored national credit, is to me inexplicable. I arraign the motives of no one, but look only to acts. You suspend by it distribution, I grant; and that is desirable. But how long suspend it? Only, as the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts proves, till he and his friends possess power enough to restore it. Distribution is not now renounced by them from a belief in its illegality or impolicy, or even from patriotism, or any moral heroism; any sublimity of public feeling and public principle, as we are invoked to believe; but from utter inability to retain it; and at the same time obtain either direct or incidental protection to manufactures above 20 per cent. duty. It is to be surrendered, then, as a mere bargain—a fair business transaction—a sheer quid pro quo; to get, instead of it, a system of protection deemed more valuable. But if it could be retained, and the high tariff be also obtained, would it not be? Have we not had ample evidence of that, in two successive vetoed bills; in attempts again to effect it by an amendment to this very bill in the Senate; and, lastly, by a new separate bill to restore the distribution, which reposes now under your eyes, sir, on your own table, and which hurriedly passed the other House on the heel of this, and is destined, I suppose, to accompany this to the other end of Pennsylvania avenue? No, sir. Some of us have lived a little too long to be hoodwinked into any belief that distribution is surrendered in this bill from any cause except painful necessity, for any length of time—even a single hour—beyond their ability to restore it. While a Whig majority exists in both Houses, the only obstacle—the only salvation—from the unnumbered evils connected with the partial assumption of State debts, through the distribution, is the firmness and independence of the Executive.

So much for that reason in favor of the bill. It is something, I admit; but, under all the circumstances, it is a forced, temporary, uncertain benefit, and for the continuance of which we are to depend on other measures and efforts than this.

But what are those Senators on this side of the House compelled to abandon in order to obtain that supposed equivalent? First, all our principles of free trade, and all our opposition to an unconstitutional system of direct protection to one class or section of country at the expense of others. We believe, conscientiously, that the direct protection of manufactures is a power not granted to the General Government, but retained to each State, to be used according to its own local interests and policy, and belongs to it as properly as the payment of its own debts. It is too late in the day, sir, now to pretend that this bill does not possess that direct and high protective character. What would a stranger have supposed, who, for the first time, entered our galleries to-day? Not that revenue was the topic of discussion—the consummation devoutly wished; but high protection, and nothing but high protection, with most of the speakers. What has been the whole argument of its friends to-day? What their impassioned appeals, but to save the manufacturers? What but to aid that class, and that alone, in the present embarrassments extending to all classes? We hear nothing of saving the farmers—nothing of helping the merchants; though all are distressed, and though the capital of the manufacturers (which the Senator from Rhode Island appeals to me as being three hundred millions) is doubtless so; but is, at the same time, but one-tenth of the three thousand millions which belong to the farmers. The Senator from Massachusetts asks, likewise, if the constitution itself was not adopted for protection? Yes. But, in God's name, and under its solemnity, let me ask, for protection to whom? To the farmer surely, and the merchant, as much as to the manufacturer. To the twelve or thirteen millions of people now connected with our agriculture certainly quite as much as to only the million and a half connected with manufactures. I go with the constitution for equal protection to the whole in their lawful pursuits, but for no exclusive or partial protection to either.

Mr. CRITTENDEN stated that he had with reluctance been driven to the conclusion of voting for this bill. He could not be accused of concurring the favor of the Executive, by conforming to his will; but he had deeply weighed the condition of the Government; and he could not bring himself to wound his country with a blow aimed at Mr. Tyler.

The considerations which had influenced him

2d Sess.]

The Tariff Bill.

[August, 1842.]

were—first, a deference to the decision of the House of Representatives; next, the condition of the country. He saw the whole country in a state of humiliation and distress—the manufactures ruined, the revenue suspended, the laboring industry of the country reduced to misery and destitution; and he asked himself, Can any thing be done to relieve this distress? Although we have a bad President—a mischievous President—yet we have a glorious country, and a glorious people; and the question is, What can we do to raise this country, and this people, from this dark mist of distress? It is not Mr. Tyler's country, or Mr. Tyler's Government; it is our country, and our Government: and, for its sake, we should come up proudly, and give our votes for its relief.

He denounced the President here, and would denounce him everywhere, in language as strong as respect for public decorum would warrant. He voted for this bill, with the intention of also voting for the bill on the table—for the repeal of the sixth clause of the distribution act. Both bills should go to the President. Let his veto No. 5 and his veto No. 6 come. Who cared for his vetoes? He (Mr. C.) cared nothing for them. His taste had become so reconciled to vetoes, that they did not now seem half so bitter to him as he once thought them. Let both bills go to the President, that he may have his wish gratified—of having the two measures separated. And let him give either, or both his veto. He could tell the Senator from New York that the President's acceptance of the one, and rejection of the other, would not uproot the tree of distribution. Its germ was alive, and could not be killed by suspended animation.

Mr. WHITE said, in yielding to the great manufacturing States, he felt that he was imposing upon them a pledge at no distant day to come up, in turn, to the rescue of the indebted States from their distress and degradation, by affording them the just relief to which they were entitled from the fulfilment of the distribution act. The Whig party would be rewarded with a reinvigorated confidence and support for the self-sacrifices they had made. Without the votes of the opposition, Congress would have to adjourn without giving any revenue to the Government. For this aid he thanked them. That Congress had the power and the capacity to protect the industrial interests of the country, he said he proved from the votes of his opponents. Listening to the voice of his constituents, he should vote for this bill.

Mr. CALHOUN said he felt it due to himself, and those he represented, that he should give his opinion on this bill, and the reasons that were alleged for its passage. The hour was late, and the time short, and he should be as brief as possible.

He would begin with premising that it was apparent a large portion of the party in power were much embarrassed in determining how they should vote on this bill. But, if he might be permitted to decide, he would say that, if they had some cause for mortification, (as they certainly had,) they had still greater for exultation. If one of their favorite measures was lost by its passage; another, and still greater and more important favorite would become a law, if appearances did not deceive. For his part, he regarded this bill (now, as he feared, on the eve of passage) as a measure more thoroughly for protection, and less for revenue, than any which had ever been submitted for the consideration of the Senate. It is the same, without material alteration, excepting the omission of the duty on tea and coffee, which recently passed this body, and fell under the veto of the Executive. That he had already shown, was, all things considered, the most onerous ever introduced into the Senate. What he now proposed was, to show that the burden proposed was more for protection, and less for revenue, than any preceding measure, not excepting the one vetoed.

An examination of this bill will show that there is not an article manufactured in the country, nor one which might come into competition with one that is, which is not subject to high protective duties. In the latter description may be placed linen, silks, worsted—which, though not articles manufactured in the country, are subject to as high duties as those that are, in order to give the home manufacturers of cotton and woollens the exclusive monopoly, if possible, of the market. To this may be added, that there is not a raw material scarcely, on which manufactures operate, or any material which is necessary to the process of manufacturing, which is not admitted duty free, or subject to a very light one. But this is not all. Most of the articles for which the exports of domestic manufactures are exchanged abroad, are subject to light duties; and the two principal ones (tea and coffee) for which they are chiefly exchanged, are admitted duty free. It is that, as he has stated, which makes the main difference between this and the vetoed bill. On the other hand, all the articles for which the agricultural products of the country, including provisions of every description, and the great staples of the country, are almost exclusively exchanged, are subject to high duties: such as wines, silks, worsted, cottons, linens, cutlery, hardware, woollens, and the other products of England and the continent. The bill, in short, is framed throughout with the greatest art and skill, to exempt, as far as possible, one branch of industry from all burdens and shackles, and to subject the other exclusively to them; and well may our political opponents raise their heads, amidst their many defeats, and exult at beholding a favorite measure—one, above all others, indispensable to their entire system of policy—about to be consummated, and that, unfortunately, by aid from our ranks. Who could have believed, but a few days since, that such an event would shortly occur?

It results from all that is stated, that this bill is so constructed as to give the greatest amount of protection, with the least of revenue, in proportion to the rates of the duties proposed, which all of the adroit skill of its authors could combine; and its result will be the least amount of revenue in proportion to the burden on the consumer. In that respect, there is no other bill ever passed to be compared to it; no, not that of 1816, nor 1824, nor 1828; nor even its immediate predecessor, the bill vetoed; for that fell far short, in consequence of the omission of the duty in this on tea and coffee. He hazarded little in saying that, if the duties it imposes on the protected articles were reduced two-thirds, they would yield a third more to the treasury; and that for every dollar this bill puts into the public coffers, it will put three at least into the pockets of the manufacturers, unless (what would be worse, and which, he believed, would prove to be the case) it should annihilate that amount and more of the productive industry of the country, to the general impoverishment of the community.

But our political friends who are about (unfortunately, as he believed) to give this bill their votes, endeavor to console us by telling us it is a mere provisional measure, intended to meet present exigencies; and that it will be repealed, or greatly modified, in a short time after we get into power. They doubtless think so; but will it be the case? Can they, on reflection, seriously believe that the necessity, which they plead in excuse for their votes, will be less than that it is now?

Do they really think that the manufacturers will be better able to bear a reduction of these high duties about to be imposed, as it is alleged, to save them, than they are now to do without them? If they do, they will be woefully mistaken. We have had a good deal of experience on the subject. The effect of high duties is not to decrease the necessity of continuing them, but the reverse—to increase the necessity of raising them still higher. This bill itself furnishes some striking evidence of the fact. Among the articles on which it imposes the highest rates of duty, is that of coarse cottons—rates not less than 100 per cent. on some descriptions; and they are the very articles so highly favored by the tariff of 1816, under the minimum duty, which the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CHITTENDEN) so kindly brought to his recollection in the course of his remarks. We were then told (as we now are of this bill) that it was a mere provisional measure to protect an infant manufacture, which, in a few years, would protect itself by its own intrinsic energy; and yet now, after more than a quarter of a century, the manufacturers of the same article come and ask a still higher duty, in proportion, than what they then did. Again: another favored article, at that period, was rolled iron: to protect which against the foreign, a duty of $80 per ton was laid on the imported; and now, also, its manufacturers come again, after so great a lapse of time, and ask a duty of $35 per ton; which is an ad valorem duty on the present cost greater than the rate per cent. in 1816—being not less than 100 per cent. He would add another item—that of cotton bagging and bale rope: on which the rate per cent. is much higher, as now proposed by this bill, than under the tariffs of 1824 or 1828; although we had then the same assurance as to it, as we have now as to this bill—that it was provisional, and that the home market would soon furnish a cheaper and better article. In fact, the whole bill, taken in connection with the declarations of its advocates—that the manufactures must go down unless these duties are imposed—forms a volume of evidence that the whole effects of all passed protection, from 1816 to this day, have been but to require still higher. It is, indeed, in the nature of the system, as he had proved when the vetoed bill was before the Senate, that every duty imposed had but the effect of requiring a still higher. The cry ever has been “more, more, more.” The more it has been supported, the more it required to be supported.

Those, then, of our political friends who intend to vote for this bill, deceive themselves, in supposing they are imposing a provisional or temporary burden. It is easy to put on the burden, but it will prove hard to take it off—as we have had ample experience. The exigency under which they, unfortunately, suppose they are compelled to vote for it, will be as great—nay, greater—against repealing or reducing the duties it imposes, hereafter, as it is now to impose them. Instead of being less dependent, the operatives, who live by the bounties it grants, will be more numerous, and more dependent; and, if to refuse to impose these duties now would subject them to starvation, as we are told,—to repeal or reduce them hereafter would more certainly be followed (and that to a greater extent) by the same effect. He would tell those who were about to take the fatal step, that they were about to do what could not be undone short of the extreme medicine of the constitution; unless the excess to which it is proposed to push the system should bring an empty treasury into conflict with protection, or the great advance of intelligence should teach the many that the whole scheme, with all its plausible catch-phrases, is but a device of the few to live on the products of their labor.

Such, at least, was his conception; and he believed he might say that of the many friends around him, and who, with him, are opposed to this bill. And what are the motives which are held out to us to give it our support? We are told by its friends and advocates that its passage would settle the question. They say the country needs repose; and that its business and its prosperity cannot be revived till it is attained. That may be admitted. But will the passage of this bill settle the question, and give repose? The very reverse. It will

2d Sess.]

The Tariff Bill.

[August, 1842.]

greatly increase the agitation. The principles involved in the controversy are so directly hostile, that the question can never be settled till one or the other shall permanently prevail. There is (and, in the nature of things, there can be) no compromise between those who hold that the power of levying duties was given only for the purpose of raising revenue for the support of the Government, and can constitutionally and honestly be exercised only for that purpose; and those who hold that, in laying duties for the wants of the Government, they may, at the same time, be laid for the purpose of taking money from one portion of the community, to give to another. The great struggle between these conflicting principles now is, which shall gain the permanent ascendancy. This bill, if it should pass, would, at least for the present, give it to the side of monopoly, and against the side of equal rights; and if that ascendancy should become permanent—if its passage should settle the question, as its advocates fondly hope, in vain will be our victories at this and the extra session for popular institutions. The popular party, of which we are members, must go down; and our opponents, with their policy, and the form of government to which it must necessarily lead, will rise permanently in the ascendant. Justice and equality—justice rigidly enforced, and equality between citizen and citizen, State and State, and one portion of the country and another, are essential elements of our system of government, and of the party to which we profess to belong; and no system of policy can be admitted, which shall permanently depart from them, without fatal consequences to both. Already, if we may judge from the declarations of the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. CHOATE,) and other advocates of this measure, the protective policy which this bill carries, so far, has made fearful changes for the worse in a large portion of the population of our country. According to their representations, the operatives engaged in manufactures which have been forced into existence by the system, depend for their bread on the passage of this bill. Is such a state of dependence on the movement of this Government consistent with the bold and independent spirit of freemen? Can a population be relied on to watch over and control its movements or resist its encroachments, when whether they shall live or starve depends on the change of two or three votes in this or the other House—and that, too, depending, perhaps, on no higher consideration than the calculation of political chances? That any portion of our population should be in so low and dependent a condition, excited his commiseration. If such are the blessings of the system—if it can so humble, in so short a time, the once proud, hardy, and independent yeomanry of New England,—he, for one, would infinitely rather see the portion of the Union where his lot is cast, impoverished by its exactions, but still retaining its erect and independent spirit, than wallowing in all the wealth it can bestow.

The portion of our party who have unfortunately separated from us on this measure, rest their support on different grounds. They plead, in the first place, the condition of the treasury as a justification of their vote. That it is bad; that the demands on it are urgent and great, and its means of meeting them small; that the public credit is prostrated; and that the agent, who has been idly sent abroad to negotiate the loan, has been treated with scorn, was, he apprehended, but too true; and to be lamented that it is true. But who are responsible? He, and the party of which he is a member, are not. We had no agency in the measures which have led to the present exhausted condition of the treasury. On the contrary, we have done all in our power to resist it. We saw the danger at the extra session; and raised then, and have continued ever since to raise, our warning voice against it. We opposed the withdrawal from the treasury of the revenue from the lands—resisted the creation of the debt; we called on those in power to retrench and economize in time: but all in vain. The last thing they thought of was the ways and means. It was the last at the extra session, as it is now the last at this. He stopped not to inquire whether this strange course was the effect of negligence or design on the part of those in power—designed to force, this their favorite measure of policy, through; and whether our political friends, who intend to vote for it, on the ground of the exigency of the treasury, are not, without intending it, but consummating that design.

But it may be said that we are bound to relieve the treasury, without inquiring into the fact, by whom, or in what manner its embarrassment was caused. That may be admitted; but surely, when we come to the question of remedy, if there be a difference of opinion, those who are responsible, who have caused the mischief, and not those who have warred against it, and opposed the measures that led to it, ought to yield. It is going too far on their part, after they have done the mischief to refuse to remedy it, unless we shall agree to join them in a measure as bad, to say the least, as the disease.

[Mr. C. proceeded to enumerate the various reasons that had been assigned in favor of the bill, and concluded as follows:]

Another, and a final reason remains to be stated,—that it would suspend the distribution act. He acknowledged its force. No one more strongly objected to that unconstitutional and dangerous measure than he did, or placed a higher estimate on the importance of expunging it from the statute-book; but, as bad as the measure is, he was not prepared to say that it was worse than this, or to get rid of it by substituting it in its place. But suppose them to be equally objectionable, there was this difference between them: it would be far easier to extricate ourselves from that, than from this. There was no comparison in the extent and the strength of the interests that would be enlisted in favor of this measure, compared with those in favor of distribution: while the whole of our party are united and zealous against that, the feebler measure, but unfortunately divided to a considerable extent, it would seem, in reference to this, the stronger. According to his opinion, the repeal of the distribution act by the next Congress, with the whole weight of our party and the Executive Department against it, was as certain as almost any future event; yet he was ready to make considerable sacrifice for immediate riddance from that odious measure, but nothing like as great as voting for this bill.

August, 1842.]

The Tariff Bill.

[27TH CONG.]

No one could more sincerely deplore that any portion of our political friends should bring themselves to support a measure to which he was so strongly opposed, and which he sincerely believed to be directly hostile to the principles of the party, and our free and popular institutions. He doubted not but that they had come to a wrong conclusion; but he did hope that they would retain the strong repugnance they express to a measure, which they think themselves under circumstances compelled to support, and will rally at an early period, not only in co-operation with the rest of the party, to free the country from its blighting effects, but will take the lead in its overthrow.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE observed that the bill before the Senate appeared to him to be fully as protective a measure as it did to the mind of the Senator from South Carolina. But that was no objection to him; on the contrary, it was its greatest recommendation. It went far to reconcile him to the sacrifice which his party had been constrained to make. He had risen merely to say, with regard to the vote he should give, as his friends went, so would he go.

The question was then taken on ordering the amendments to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time, on which the yeas and nays had been called and ordered; and it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Buchanan, Choate, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Huntington, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge, and Wright—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bagby, Benton, Berrien, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, King, Linn, Mangum, Merrick, Preston, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Woodbury, and Young—23.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

So the Senate, at 8 o'clock, adjourned.

MONDAY, August 29.

The Distribution Bill.

The bill from the House repealing the proviso to the 8th section of the distribution act, (and which suspended the operations of that act when the tariff of duties on imports shall have been raised above 20 per cent.) was taken up on the motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, who hoped the bill would be permitted to pass to-day by general consent.

The bill was then read the second time.

Mr. TAPPAN said every Senator knew that, if the bill passed, it could not meet the approbation of the Executive. The question presented in it was the same, precisely, which was presented in the tariff bill, and which caused the veto of that bill. The President gave his reasons for the veto of this proviso then; which were on the files of Senators. Unless the opinions of the Executive had changed on the subject, no man supposed, for a moment, that this bill would not receive a veto. To pass it under such circumstances showed insincerity and mockery in legislation, evidenced a tambling spirit towards the Executive, and was perfect child's play. If a majority of the Senate thought proper to pass the bill, he could only complain.

The bill was then considered as in Committee of the Whole; and there being no proposition to amend, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to a third reading.

The bill having been passed by informally, on the motion of Mr. LINN, owing to the thinness of the Senate, was subsequently taken up, and read the third time; and the question being, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. TAPPAN demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the question being put, the bill was passed as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bayard, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, Preston, Rives, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—19.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, August 29.

The Tariff.

A. Dickinson, Esq., Secretary of the Senate, appeared below the bar, with a message from the Senate, and announced that the Senate had passed a bill entitled "An act to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports," with amendments, in which they requested the concurrence of the House.

Mr. FILLMORE rose, and said he hoped the bill which had just been reported from the Senate,

2d Sess.]

The Protest.

[August, 1842.]

would be taken up at once, and disposed of. (Cries of "agreed.")

The bill having been taken up,

Mr. FILLMORE again rose and said that many of the amendments were merely verbal ones, and they could all be disposed of at once, except such as might be exempted at the request of any gentleman, who desire a specific vote on them. He hoped, therefore, that if there were any such amendment, gentlemen desiring a distinct vote upon it would point it out.

He then made some brief explanatory statements respecting some of the amendments; and concluded by moving the previous question.

Mr. LINN obtained a withdrawal of that motion, on a promise to renew it; and then made a statement of the motives which actuated him in the vote he was about to give. He renewed the motion for the previous question.

Mr. FILLMORE moved a concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

The motion for the previous question was then seconded.

The question was then taken on laying the bill and the amendments on the table, when the motion was negatived, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Black, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, Casey, Clinton, Clifford, Coles, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Daniel, Dean, John C. Edwards, Egbert, Gamble, Gilmer, Goggin, William O. Goode, Graham, Gwin, Habersham, Harris, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houston, Hubbard, Hunter, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, King, Lewis, Littlefield, Abraham McClellan, McKay, Mallory, John Thomson Mason, Mathews, Medill, Owsley, Payne, Rayner, Reding, Rhett, Reynolds, Saunders, Shaw, William Smith, Steenrod, Sumter, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Warren, Watterson, Weller, James W. Williams, and Wood—65.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Appleton, Ayer, Babbcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Bidlack, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Brockway, Milton Brown, Charles Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cushing, Garrett Davis, Richard D. Davis, Deberry, John Edwards, Everett, Ferri, Fessenden, Fillmore, John G. Floyd, Gentry, Gerry, Giddings, Patrick G. Goode, Gordon, Granger, Gustine, Hall, Halsted, Houck, Howard, Hudson, Hunt, Charles J. Ingersoll, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, William W. Irwin, William Ost Johnson, John P. Kennedy, Linn, Robert McClellan, McKennan, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Matlocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Mitchell, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Newhard, Oliver, Osborne, Parmenr, Pearce, Plumer, Pope, Powell, Proffit, Ramsay, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Randolph, Read, Ridgway, Riggs, Rodney, James M. Russell, William Russell, Saltonstall, Shepperd, Simonton, Wade, Truman Smith, Sollers, Sprigg, Stanly, Stratton, Alexander H. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Tallero, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Van Allen, Van Rensselaer, Ward, Washington, Edward

D. White, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Wise, Yorke, and Augustus Young—120.

And the question recurring on concurring in the amendments of the Senate—

They were read by the Clerk; and, no separate question having been asked, except on the 29th section, the amendments were concurred in en masse.

On the 29th section Mr. W. O. JOHNSON called for a separate question, and asked the yeas and nays; which were refused.

And the question being taken, the said amendment was concurred in.

So all the amendments were concurred in.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 30.

Reorganization of the Navy Department.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which had been referred the bill reorganizing the Navy Department, as amended by the House, reported that the committee had instructed him to recommend that the Senate concur in all the amendments of the House, except the one consolidating three of the bureaus into one, to be called the "bureau of construction, of equipment, and repairs." He said the committee was not opposed to consolidating the bureaus, but thought it unnecessary and improper to place at the head of the bureau alluded to a naval constructor. They, therefore, for the purpose of having the words "a naval constructor" stricken from the amendment of the House, propose that the amendment embracing those words be disagreed to, and that a committee of conference be appointed to effect that object.

The amendments were agreed to, as recommended by the committee; and a committee of conference, to consist of three, was appointed by the Chair.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 30.

The Protest.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the Message, in writing, from the President of the United States.

The reading of the Message having been concluded—

Mr. ADAMS said there seemed to be an expectation on the part of some gentlemen, that he should propose to the House some measure suitable to be adopted on the present occasion. Mr. A. knew of no reason for such an expectation, but the fact that he had been the mover of the resolution for the appointment of the committee which had made the report referred to in the Message; had been appointed by the Speaker chairman of the committee; and that the report against which the President of the United States had sent to the House such a multitude of protests, was written by him. So far as it had been so written, Mr. A. held himself responsible to the House, to the country, to the world, and to posterity; and, so far as he was the author of the report, he held himself responsible to the President also. The President should hear from him elsewhere than here on that subject.

August, 1842.]

The Protest.

[27th Cong.]

Mr. A. went on to say that it was because the report had been adopted by the House, and not because it had been written by him, that the President had sent such a bundle of protests; and, therefore, Mr. A. felt no necessity or obligation upon himself to propose what measures the House ought to adopt for the vindication of its own dignity and honor; and, perhaps, from considerations of delicacy, he was indeed the very last man in the House who should propose any measure under the circumstances.

If he understood the Message which had been read at the Clerk's table, it declared that the action of the House, in adopting the report of the Select Committee, was without precedent in our parliamentary history. Now it seemed that, on this occasion, the President's memory must have been, in some degree, treacherous. Another, and a very memorable case of the like kind had occurred, and one in which the President had himself taken an important part; and Mr. B. proposed to measure out to him the very same measure which he had meted out to the then President of the United States.

In 1834 the Senate had adopted certain resolutions, condemning the course of President Jackson in the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States to the State Banks. In consequence of this movement on the part of the Senate, President Jackson sent to that body a protest against the right of the Senate to express any opinion censuring his public course; and, what made the case then stronger than the present case, was, that the Senate constituted the jury by whom he was to be tried, should any impeachment be brought against him. The Senate, after a long, elaborate discussion of the whole matter, and the most eloquent and overpowering torrent of debate that ever was listened to in this country, adopted the three following resolutions:

"1. Resolved, That, while the Senate is, and ever will be, ready to receive from the President, all such messages and communications as the constitution and laws, and the usual course of business, authorize him to transmit to it; yet it cannot recognize any right in him to make a formal protest against votes and proceedings of the Senate, declaring such votes and proceedings to be illegal and unconstitutional, and requesting the Senate to enter such protest on its journal."

On this resolution the yeas and nays were taken; and it was adopted, by a vote of 27 to 16: and among the recorded votes in its favor, stood the name of John Tyler, now acting President of the United States, and Daniel Webster, now his Prime Minister.

The second resolution was as follows:

"2. Resolved, That the aforesaid protest is a breach of the privileges of the Senate, and that it be not entered on the journal."

The same vote, numerically, was given in favor of this resolution; and among the yeas stood the names of John Tyler, now acting President of the United States, and of Daniel Webster, now his Prime Minister.

The third resolution read as follows:

"3. Resolved, That the President of the United States has no right to send a protest to the Senate against any of its proceedings."

And in sanction of this resolution also, the record showed the names of the same John Tyler and Daniel Webster.

He read long extracts from Mr. Webster's speech, delivered in the Senate of the United States on the protest of President Jackson; and then said those were the views of the intellectual giant to which he had referred. He forbore to add any opinion of his own. He was willing to adopt the sentiments he had read as his; and he submitted to the House, for its adoption, the following resolutions, the three first of which were in the precise form, and in the precise language of those adopted by John Tyler himself:

Resolved, That whilst this House is, and ever will be, ready to receive from the President, all such messages and communications as the constitution and laws, and the usual course of public business, authorize him to transmit to it; yet it cannot recognize in him any right to make a formal protest against votes and proceedings of this House, declaring such votes and proceedings to be illegal and unconstitutional, and requesting the House to enter such protest on its journal.

Resolved, That the aforesaid protest is a breach of the privileges of this House; and that it be not entered on the journal.

Resolved, That the President of the United States has no right to send a protest to this House against any of its proceedings.

If this were the first time a protest had been sent by a President to Congress, he should content himself with offering these resolutions: but since the present President had given them his opinion of such a protest, he would add the following:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to return the message and protest to its author.

Inasmuch as he had only read resolutions which were adopted by John Tyler, and extracts from the speech of John Tyler's Prime Minister, without saying any thing for himself, except that he adopted those sentiments, he now moved the previous question.

Tellers were appointed on the motion for the previous question, and they reported 66 in the affirmative, and 48 in the negative—being less than a quorum.

The vote was then taken on seconding the

[2d Sess.]

Adjournment.

[August, 1842.]

call for the previous question, and it was carried in the affirmative.

Mr. PROFFIT moved to lay the resolutions on the table; which was negatived.

The main question was then ordered.

The first resolution being then in order,

Mr. WM. W. IRWIN moved to lay it on the table.

The SPEAKER decided the motion to be out of order; and

The resolution was then adopted—yeas 87, nays 46.

So the first resolution was adopted.

On the second resolution, which is in the following words:

Resolved, That the aforesaid protest is a breach of the privileges of this House, and that it be not entered on the journal.

The vote resulted—yeas 86, nays 48.

So the second resolution was adopted.

On the third resolution, which is in the following words:

Resolved, That the President of the United States has no right to send a protest to this House against any of its proceedings.

The vote resulted—yeas 86, nays 58.

So the third resolution was adopted.

The question recurring on the fourth resolution, which is in the following words:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to return the message and protest to its author:

Was then taken, and the vote stood as follows—yeas 62, nays 69.

So the fourth resolution was rejected.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 31.

Vote of Thanks to the President pro tem.

On motion of Mr. KING, (the President pro tem. not being in the chair,) it was

VOL. XIV.—34

Unanimously resolved, That the thanks of the Senate be presented to WILLIE P. MANGUM, for the ability and impartiality with which he has discharged his duties as President pro tem. of the Senate.

Adjournment.

A Message was received from the President, of an Executive character; and which, in that character, the Senate proceeded to consider with closed doors.

In a few minutes the doors were again opened; and

Mr. MANGUM rose and addressed the Senate, expressing the deep sense of gratitude he entertained for the uniform courtesy and kindness that body had extended to him whilst he had the honor of presiding over its deliberations during the protracted and excited session. After concluding, he adjourned the Senate sine die.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 31.

Adjournment.

Mr. CUSHING, from the Joint Committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses of Congress, having finished the business before them, were ready to adjourn, unless he had some further communications to make, reported that they had performed the duty assigned them, and had been answered by the President that he had no further communications to make to Congress.

On motion by Mr. ADAMS,

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate, informing them that the House, having finished the business before it, was ready to adjourn.

On motion by Mr. HOPKINS, the House adjourned sine die.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE IN SECRET SESSION.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 11.

Message from the President of the United States, transmitting the Treaty with Great Britain to the Senate of the United States.

To the Senate of the United States:

I have the satisfaction to communicate to the Senate the result of the negotiations recently had in this city with the British Minister special and extraordinary.

These results comprise—

1st. A treaty to settle and define the boundaries between the territories of the United States, and the possessions of her Britannic Majesty in North America, for the suppression of the African slave-trade, and the surrender of criminals fugitive from justice in certain cases.

2d. A correspondence on the subject of the interference of the colonial authorities of the British West Indies with American merchant vessels driven by stress of weather, or carried by violence, into the ports of those colonies.

3d. A correspondence upon the subject of the attack and destruction of the steamboat Caroline.

4th. A correspondence on the subject of impressment.

If this treaty shall receive the approbation of the Senate, it will terminate a difference respecting boundary which has long subsisted between the two Governments, has been the subject of several ineffectual attempts at settlement, and has sometimes led to great irritation, not without danger of disturbing the existing peace. Both the United States, and the States more immediately concerned, have entertained no doubt of the validity of the American title to all the territory which has been in dispute; but that title was controverted, and the Government of the United States had agreed to make the dispute a subject of arbitration. One arbitration had been actually had, but had failed to settle the controversy; and it was found, at the commencement of last year, that a correspondence had been in progress between the two Governments for a joint commission, with an ultimate reference to an umpire or arbitrator, with authority to make a final decision. That correspondence, however, had been retarded by various occurrences, and had come to no definite result when the special mission of Lord Ashburton was announced. This movement on the part of England afforded, in the judgment of the Executive, a favorable opportunity for making an attempt to settle this long-existing controversy by some agreement or treaty, without further reference to arbitration. It seemed entirely proper that, if this purpose were entertained, consultation should be had with the authorities of the States of Maine and Massachusetts. Letters, therefore, of which copies are herewith communicated, were addressed to the Governors of those States, suggesting that commissioners should be appointed by each of them, respectively, to repair to this city and confer with the authorities of this Government, on a line, by agreement or compromise, with its equivalents and compensations. This suggestion was met by both States in a spirit of candor and patriotism, and promptly complied with. Four commissioners on the part of Maine, and three on the part of Massachusetts (all persons of distinction and high character) were duly appointed and commissioned, and lost no time in presenting themselves at the seat of Government of the United States. These commissioners have been in correspondence with this Government during the period of the discussions; have enjoyed its confidence and freest communications; have aided the general object with their counsel and advice; and, in the end, have unanimously signified their assent to the line proposed in the treaty.

Ordinarily, it would be no easy task to reconcile and bring together such a variety of interests in a matter in itself difficult and perplexed; but the efforts of the Government in attempting to accomplish this desirable object, have been seconded and sustained by a spirit of accommodation and conciliation on the part of the States concerned, in which much of the success of these efforts is to be ascribed.

Connected with the settlement of the line of the North-eastern boundary, so far as it respects the States of Maine and Massachusetts, is the continuation of that line along the highlands to the north-westernmost head of Connecticut River. Which of the sources of that stream is entitled to this character, has been matter of controversy, and is of some interest to the State of New Hampshire. The King of the Netherlands decided the main branch to be the north-westernmost head of the Connecticut. This did not satisfy the claim of New Hampshire. The line agreed to in the present treaty follows the highlands to the head of Harts stream, and thence down that river, embracing the whole claim of New Hampshire, and establishing her title to 100,000 acres of territory more than she would have had by the decision of the King of the Netherlands.

By the treaty of 1783, the line is to proceed down the Connecticut River to the 45th degree of north latitude, and thence west, by that parallel, till it strikes the St. Lawrence. Recent examinations

2d Sess.]

The British Treaty—President's Message.

[August, 1842.]

having ascertained that the line heretofore received as the true line of latitude between those points was erroneous, and that the correction of this error would not only leave, on the British side, a considerable tract of territory heretofore supposed to belong to the States of Vermont and New York, but also Rouse's Point, the site of a military work of the United States; it has been regarded as an object of importance, not only to establish the rights and jurisdiction of those States up to the line to which they have been considered to extend, but also to comprehend Rouse's Point within the territory of the United States. The relinquishment by the British Government of all the territory south of the line heretofore considered to be the true line, has been obtained; and the consideration for this relinquishment is to enure, by the provisions of the treaty, to the States of Maine and Massachusetts.

The line of boundary, then, from the source of the St. Croix to the St. Lawrence, so far as Maine and Massachusetts is concerned, is fixed by their own consent, and for considerations satisfactory to them; the chief of these considerations being the privilege of transporting the lumber and agricultural products, grown and raised in Maine, on the waters of the St. John and its tributaries, down that river to the ocean, free from imposition or disability. The importance of this privilege, perpetual in its terms, to a country covered at present by pine forests of great value, and much of it capable hereafter of agricultural improvement, is not a matter upon which the opinion of intelligent men is likely to be divided.

So far as New Hampshire is concerned, the treaty secures all that she requires; and New York and Vermont are quieted to the extent of their claim and occupation. The difference which would be made in the northern boundary of these two States, by correcting the parallel of latitude, may be seen on Tanner's maps, (1836,) new atlas, maps Nos. 6 and 9.

From the intersection of the 45th degree of north latitude with the St. Lawrence, and along that river and the lakes to the water communication between Lake Huron and Lake Superior, the line was definitively agreed on by the commissioners of the two Governments, under the 6th article of the treaty of Ghent. But between this last-mentioned point and the Lake of the Woods, the commissioners acting under the 7th article of that treaty found several matters of disagreement, and therefore made no joint report to their respective Governments. The first of these was Sugar island, or St. George's island, lying in St. Mary's River, or the water communication between Lakes Huron and Superior. By the present treaty, this island is embraced in the territories of the United States. Both from soil and position, it is regarded as of much value.

Another matter of difference was the manner of extending the line from the point at which the commissioners arrived, north of Ile Royale, in Lake Superior, to the Lake of the Woods. The British commissioner insisted on proceeding to Fond du Lac, at the south western angle of the lake, and thence, by the river St. Louis, to the Rainy Lake. The American commissioner supposed the true course to be, to proceed by way of Dog River. Attempts were made to compromise this difference, but without success. The details of these proceedings are found at length in the printed separate reports of the commissioners.

From the imperfect knowledge of this remote country at the date of the treaty of peace, some of the descriptions of that treaty do not harmonize with its natural features, as now ascertained. "Long Lake" is nowhere to be found under that name. There is reason for supposing, however, that the sheet of water intended by that name is the estuary at the mouth of Pigeon River. The present treaty, therefore, adopts that estuary and river, and afterwards pursues the usual route, across the height of land by the various portages and small lakes, till the line reaches Rainy Lake, from which the commissioners agreed on the extension of it to its termination, in the north-west angle of the Lake of the Woods. The region of country on and near the shore of the lake, between Pigeon River on the north, and Fond du Lac and the river St. Louis on the south and west, considered valuable as a mineral region, is thus included within the United States. It embraces a territory of four millions of acres, northward of the claim set up by the British commissioner under the treaty of Ghent. From the height of land at the head of Pigeon River, westerly to the Rainy Lake, the country is understood to be of little value, being described by surveyors, and marked on the map, as a region of rock and water.

From the north-west angle of the Lake of the Woods, which is found to be in latitude 45 deg. 23 min. 55 sec. north, existing treaties require the line to be run due south to its intersection with the 45th parallel, and thence along that parallel to the Rocky mountains.

After sundry informal communications with the British minister upon the subject of the claims of the two countries to territory west of the Rocky Mountains, so little probability was found to exist of coming to any agreement on that subject at present, that it was not thought expedient to make it one of the subjects of formal negotiation, to be entered upon between this Government and the British minister, as part of his duties under his special mission.

By the treaty of 1783, the line of division along the rivers and lakes, from the place where the 45th parallel of north latitude strikes the St. Lawrence, to the outlet of Lake Superior, is invariably to be drawn through the middle of such waters, and not through the middle of their main channels. Such a line, if extended according to the literal terms of the treaty, would, it is obvious, occasionally intersect islands. The manner in which the commissioners of the two Governments dealt with this difficult subject may be seen in their reports. But where the line, thus following the middle of the river, or watercourse, did not meet with islands, yet it was liable sometimes to leave the only practicable navigable channel altogether on one side. The treaty made no provision for the common use of the waters by the citizens and subjects of both countries.

It has happened, therefore, in a few instances, that the use of the river, in particular places, would be greatly diminished, to one party or the other, if, in fact, there was not a choice in the use of channels and passages. Thus, at the Long Sault, in the St. Lawrence—a dangerous passage, practicable only for boats—the only safe run is between

August, 1842.]

The British Treaty—President's Message.

[27TH CONG.]

the Long Sault islands and Barnhart's island (all which belong to the United States) on one side, and the American shore on the other. On the other hand, by far the best passage for vessels of any depth of water, from Lake Erie into the Detroit river, is between Bois Blanc, a British island, and the Canadian shore. So again there are several channels or passages, of different degrees of facility and usefulness, between the several islands in the river St. Clair, at or near its entry into the lake of that name. In these three cases, the treaty provides that all the several passages and channels shall be free and open to the use of the citizens and subjects of both parties.

The treaty obligations subsisting between the two countries for the suppression of the African slave-trade, and the complaints made to this Government within the last three or four years, (many of them but too well founded,) of the visitation, seizure, and detention of American vessels on that coast by British cruisers, would not but form a delicate and highly important part of the negotiations which have now been held.

The early and prominent part which the Government of the United States has taken for the abolition of this unlawful and inhuman traffic, is well known. By the tenth article of the treaty of Ghent, it is declared that the traffic in slaves is irreconcilable with the principles of humanity and justice, and that both his Majesty and the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire abolition; and it is thereby agreed that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an object. The Government of the United States has, by law, declared the African slave-trade piracy; and, at its suggestion, other nations have made similar enactments. It has not been wanting in honest and zealous efforts, made in conformity with the wishes of the whole country, to accomplish the entire abolition of the traffic in slaves upon the African coast; but these efforts, and those of other countries directed to the same end, have proved, to a considerable degree, unsuccessful. Treaties are known to have been entered into some years ago between England and France, by which the former power, which usually maintains a large naval force on the African station, was authorized to seize, and bring in for adjudication, vessels found engaged in the slave-trade under the French flag.

It is known that, in December last, a treaty was signed in London by the representatives of England, France, Russia, Prussia, and Austria, having for its professed object a strong and united effort of the five powers to put an end to the traffic. This treaty was not officially communicated to the Government of the United States; but its provisions and stipulations are supposed to be accurately known to the public. It is understood to be not yet ratified on the part of France.

No application or request has been made to this Government to become a party to this treaty; but the course it might take in regard to it has excited no small degree of attention and discussion in Europe, as the principle upon which it is founded, and the stipulations which it contains, have caused warm animadversion and great political excitement.

In my message at the commencement of the present session of Congress, I endeavored to state the principles which this Government supports respecting the right of search and the immunity of flags. Desirous of maintaining those principles fully, at the same time that existing obligations should be fulfilled, I have thought it most consistent with the honor and dignity of the country that it should execute its own laws, and perform its own obligations, by its own means and its own power. The examination or visitation of the merchant vessels of one nation by the cruisers of another, for any purpose except those known and acknowledged by the law of nations, under whatever restraints or regulations it may take place, may lead to dangerous results. It is far better, by other means, to supersede any supposed necessity, or any motive, for such examination or visit. Interference with a merchant vessel by an armed cruiser is always a delicate proceeding, apt to touch the point of national honor, as well as to affect the interests of individuals. It has been thought, therefore, expedient, not only in accordance with the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent, but at the same time as removing all pretext on the part of others for violating the immunities of the American flag upon the sea, as they exist and are defined by the law of nations, to enter into the articles now submitted to the Senate.

The treaty which I now submit to you proposes no alteration, mitigation, or modification of the rules of the law of nations. It provides simply that each of the two Governments shall maintain, on the coast of Africa, a sufficient squadron to enforce, separately and respectively, the laws, rights, and obligations of the two countries for the suppression of the slave-trade.

Another consideration of great importance has recommended this mode of fulfilling the duties and obligations of the country. Our commerce along the western coast of Africa is extensive, and supposed to be increasing. There is reason to think that, in many cases, those engaged in it have met with interruptions and annoyances, caused by the jealousy and instigation of rivals, engaged in the same trade. Many complaints on this subject have reached the Government. A respectable naval force on the coast is the natural resort and security against further occurrences of this kind.

The surrender to justice of persons who, having committed high crimes, seek an asylum in the territories of a neighboring nation, would seem to be an act due to the cause of general justice, and properly belonging to the present state of civilization and intercourse. The British provinces of North America are separated from the States of the Union by a line of several thousand miles; and, along portions of this line, the amount of population on either side is quite considerable, while the passage of the boundary is always easy.

Offenders against the law, on the one side, transfer themselves to the other. Sometimes, with great difficulty, they are brought to justice; but very often they wholly escape. A consciousness of immunity from the power of avoiding justice in this way, instigates the unprincipled and reckless to the commission of offences; and the peace and good neighborhood of the border are consequently often disturbed.

In the case of offenders fleeing from Canada into the United States, the Governors of States are often applied to for their surrender; and questions of a very embarrassing nature arise from these applications. It has been thought highly important, therefore, to provide for the whole case, by a proper treaty stipulation. The article on the subject in the proposed treaty is carefully confined to such offences as all mankind agree to regard as heinous, and destructive to the security of life and property. In this careful and specific enumeration of crimes, the object has been to exclude all political offences, or criminal charges, arising from wars or intestine commotions. Treason, misprision of treason, libels, desertion from military service, and other offences of similar character, are excluded.

2D Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

And lest some unforeseen inconvenience or unexpected abuse should arise from the stipulation, rendering its continuance, in the opinion of one or both of the parties, not longer desirable, it is left in the power of either to put an end to it at will.

The destruction of the steamboat Caroline at Schlosser, four or five years ago, occasioned no small degree of excitement at the time, and became the subject of correspondence between the two Governments. That correspondence having been suspended for a considerable period, was renewed in the spring of the last year; but, no satisfactory result having been arrived at, it was thought proper, though the occurrence had ceased to be fresh and recent, not to omit attention to it on the present occasion. It has only been so far discussed, in the correspondence now submitted, as it was accomplished by a violation of the territory of the United States. The letter of the British minister, while he attempts to justify that violation upon the ground of a pressing and overruling necessity—admitting, nevertheless, that, even if justifiable, an apology was due for it, and accompanying this acknowledgment with assurances of the sacred regard of his Government for the inviolability of national territory—has seemed to me sufficient to warrant forbearance from any further remonstrance against what took place, as an aggression, on the soil and territory of the country.

On the subject of the interference of the British authorities in the West Indies, a confident hope is entertained that the correspondence which has taken place, showing the grounds taken by this Government, and the engagements entered into by the British minister, will be found such as to satisfy the just expectation of the people of the United States.

The impressment of seamen from merchant vessels of this country by British cruisers, although not practised in time of peace, (and, therefore, not at present a productive cause of difference and irritation,) has, nevertheless, hitherto been so prominent a topic of controversy, and is so likely to bring on renewed contentions at the first breaking out of a European war, that it has been thought the part of wisdom now to take it into serious and earnest consideration. The letter from the Secretary of State to the British minister explains the ground which the Government has assumed, and the principles which it means to uphold. For the defence of these grounds, and the maintenance of these principles, the most perfect reliance is placed on the intelligence of the American people, and on their firmness and patriotism in whatever touches the honor of the country, or its great and essential interests.

JOHN TYLER.

WASHINGTON, August 11, 1842.

Proceedings of the Senate.

The treaty to settle and define the boundaries between the territories of the United States, and the possessions of her Britannic Majesty in North America, for the final suppression of the African slave-trade, and for the giving up of criminals fugitive from justice, in certain cases, was read twice by unanimous consent.

On motion by Mr. RIVES,

Ordered, That the treaty, with the Message and accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and printed, in confidence, for the use of the Senate.

MONDAY, August 15.

Mr. RIVES, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred, on the 11th instant, the treaty with Great Britain, reported the same without amendment.

On motion of Mr. RIVES,

Ordered, That the said treaty be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Wednesday next, the 17th instant, at 1 o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, August 17.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the treaty with Great Britain; and, after debate,

On motion by Mr. RIVES,

Ordered, That it be postponed to, and made the order of the day for to-morrow, at half-past eleven o'clock.

SATURDAY, August 20.

Mr. RIVES submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring,) That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty to settle and define the boundaries between the territories of the United States and the possessions of her Britannic Majesty in North America, for the final suppression of the African slave-trade, and for the giving up of criminals fugitive from justice, in certain cases.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the said resolution.

On the question to agree thereto,

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 9.

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Calhoun, Choate, Clayton, Crafts, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dayton, Evans, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, King, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Rives, Sevier, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, White, Woodbridge, Woodbury, Wright, Young.

August, 1842.]

The British Treaty.

[37th Cons.]

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Conrad, Linn, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Williams.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay the said resolution before the President of the United States.

[The following speeches, on the British Treaty, were addressed to the Senate:]

Mr. Rives said that the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which the treaty had been referred, not having been able, from the shortness of the time allowed by the now advanced stage of the session, and the consequent necessity of early action on the subject, to make a formal and written report, it devolved on him, as the organ of the committee, to state the views and considerations by which the committee had been influenced, in recommending to the Senate to give the constitutional sanction of their "advice and consent" to its ratification. He begged leave to say, in the outset, that, in forming their judgment on the grave question submitted to them, the committee had felt themselves bound, by the most solemn of all obligations, to discard from their minds every consideration but such as appertained to the true interest and honor of their country. They had felt that it would be to betray the trust reposed in them by the Senate, and to show themselves unworthy of the confidence of the country, if they could, for a moment, permit themselves, in pursuit of party objects, or under the influence of personal or political prejudices, to turn aside from the national question, to inquire by whom the treaty had been negotiated, or whose name stood subscribed to it. They have looked to the treaty in itself, isolated from every invidious reference to persons or parties; and have pronounced upon its acceptance or rejection as, in their best judgment, the interest and honor of the nation demand.

The stipulations of the treaty embrace three distinct objects: an exact and permanent definition of the boundaries, where they had been the subject of doubt or dispute, between the territories of the United States, and the adjacent provinces of Great Britain; a plan of co-operation for the more effectual suppression of the slave-trade; and an agreement for mutual surrender, in certain cases, of criminals fugitive from justice. The first of these objects, from its intimate connection with the tranquillity of the frontier, and the peace of the two countries—on several occasions exposed to imminent hazard of interruption, from intrusions on the disputed territory, and the conflicting jurisdiction exercised over it—naturally occupies the foreground of the treaty.

The merits of the controversy respecting our North-eastern boundary, and the respective claims and arguments of the two parties, in regard to it, are too well known to the Senate, (said Mr. R.,) to require any recapitulation of them at my hands. A brief retrospect of the history of the controversy, however, may be necessary to enable the Senate to comprehend the position of the question at the moment when the negotiations which terminated in this treaty were entered upon.

The second article of the definitive treaty of peace of 1783, describes the North-eastern boundary of the United States as follows: "Beginning at the north-west angle of Nova Scotia, to wit: that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of the St. Croix River to the highlands; along the said highlands, which divides those rivers that empty themselves into the river of St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean, to the north-westernmost head of Connecticut River;" and then, pursuing the description of the boundaries of the United States around their whole territory, on the north, the west, and the south, it returns to the eastern boundary of Maine, in the following words: "East by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth, in the bay of Fundy, to its source, and from its source, directly north to the aforesaid highlands, which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic Ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence."

Nothing could afford a more striking evidence of the extremely defective knowledge of the geography of the country in question, which existed at the time of the signature of the treaty of peace, than the fact, that, in the very first year succeeding the conclusion of the treaty, a serious controversy arose between the high contracting parties as to which was the river St. Croix, here called for as a natural boundary between their adjacent possessions. There were three rivers, emptying themselves into Passamaquoddy Bay, a part of the Bay of Fundy, (as it was subsequently formally declared to be,*) each one of which, it seemed, had, some time or other, passed under the name of St. Croix. This territorial comedy of errors, like all other questions of disputed boundary, was, on several occasions, near producing tragical results, by embroiling the authorities and population adjacent to the controverted limits. The most eastern river was claimed by the United States as the true St. Croix—the western by Great Britain. Finally, after lowering over the peace of the frontier for ten years, this controversy was put in a train of amicable adjustment by the treaty of 1794 (commonly called Jay's treaty,) which provided for the appointment of joint commissioners to determine which was the river truly intended under the name of the St. Croix, in the treaty of peace. The commissioners met, and in 1798 closed their deliberations, by declaring an intermediate river, called Scoodic, to be the true St. Croix of the treaty; which has been, accordingly, ever since recognized and observed as the actual boundary of the United States in that quarter, and to that extent.

* By the fourth article of the Treaty of Ghent.

2D SESS.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

In a very short time after this portion of the North-eastern boundary was ascertained and established, new difficulties and uncertainties arose in following it out, according to the terms of the treaty of peace. The decision of these commissioners, under the treaty of 1794, in identifying the true river St. Croix, and in fixing its source, had established the terminus a quo, from which the boundary in question was to be run. But the terminus ad quem, to which it was to be continued—to wit: the highlands dividing the tributary waters of the St. Lawrence and the Atlantic, which lay due north from the source of the St. Croix—remained to be ascertained; and when they were ascertained, the north-westernmost head of the Connecticut River, (another terminus to which the boundary along the said highlands was to be continued,) were also to be identified and established. Both of these termini were supposed to be involved in doubt by the actual geography and physical conformation of the country. The highlands described in the treaty, were said to have no definite existence in nature; and the various sources of the Connecticut River, and their relative position, produced confusion in determining which was the true north-westernmost source referred to by the treaty of peace. For the “adjustment of these uncertainties,” by the agency of a joint commission formed on the model of that of Jay’s treaty in regard to the St. Croix River, a convention was concluded by Mr. Rufus King with Lord Hawkesbury, in May, 1803, under the instructions of Mr. Madison, then the Secretary of State. This convention received the unanimous advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, with the exception of its fifth article, relating to the North-western boundary between the Lake of the Woods and the Mississippi River, which, it was apprehended, might conflict with the territorial claims of the United States under the treaty for the purchase of Louisiana from France; which had been concluded twelve days previous to the convention with Lord Hawkesbury, but which fact was not known to either of the negotiators at the signature of the latter. The change thus made by the Senate not being acceded to by the British Government, the convention failed to take effect.

Thus stood the question with regard to the North-eastern boundary, without any new arrangement to obviate or adjust the uncertainties which had arisen, until the treaty of Ghent. By the fifth article of that treaty, it was agreed that two commissioners should be appointed—one by each party—to ascertain and determine where is the point of intersection, or angle called the north-west angle of Nova Scotia, formed by a line drawn due north from the source of the St. Croix to the highlands, as described in the treaty of peace; and also the north-westernmost head of Connecticut River; and to cause the entire boundary, from the source of the St. Croix to the river St. Lawrence, to be surveyed and marked, according to the provisions of the said treaty of peace; and if these commissioners should differ in opinion on the matters referred to them, then their differences were to be referred to some friendly sovereign or State, to be named for the purpose, whose decision should be final and conclusive on all the matters so referred. The commissioners appointed under the treaty of Ghent having radically differed in their views of the true boundary, a convention was entered into between the two Governments, in September, 1827, for carrying into effect the stipulated reference to some friendly sovereign; agreeing to proceed, in concert, to the choice of such friendly sovereign, and regulating various details connected with the arbitration. The King of the Netherlands was, by the concurrent act of the two Governments, subsequently chosen as the arbiter; and, in January, 1831, he pronounced his award—declaring, in effect, that neither the line claimed by the United States, to the north of the river St. John, nor that claimed by Great Britain, to the south of that river, fulfilled the description of the boundary contained in the treaty of peace; that the stipulations of the treaty were too vague and indeterminate to admit of satisfactory execution, when applied to the actual topography of the country; and that, therefore, “it will be suitable (il conviendra) to adopt as the boundary line of the two States” a line which shall be drawn from the source of the St. Croix till it intersect the river St. John, shall continue along that river to the mouth of the St. Francis; thence along the St. Francis to its south-westernmost head; and thence, by a due west course, to the line claimed by the United States.

This award of the King of the Netherlands, in proposing the adoption of a new boundary, was considered as a departure from the question submitted for his decision by the terms of the reference, and was held, therefore, not to be obligatory on the parties. The Senate of the United States, before whom the award was laid by the President for their advice on the subject, expressed an opinion unfavorable to its acceptance; and from that time down to the special mission of Lord Ashburton, a series of halting and abortive negotiations has been going on between the two Governments, terminating in nothing, and leaving this disturbing controversy as far as ever from settlement; the peace of the two countries, in the mean time, exposed to perpetual danger of interruption, by collisions on the debatable frontier.

Mr. R. said he had thus briefly retraced the history of this controversy, and exhibited the mutual proceedings of the two Governments in regard to it—not with any purpose of weakening or impugning the just title of the United States to the territory claimed by them as being within the limits established by the treaty of peace; on the contrary, he felt in his own mind a clear conviction of the justice and validity of the American claim, as resting on the terms of the treaty. He believed that the boundary claimed by the United States fulfilled the literal description contained in the treaty, and that it was the only boundary line which did fulfil that description. He had, therefore, heartily concurred in the resolution unanimously passed in this body, four years ago, affirming our conviction of the right of the United States under the treaty of peace; and such, he was authorized to say, was still the opinion entertained by every member of the committee. But, while this was the opinion of the committee and of the Senate, and, without doubt, of a large majority of the citizens of the United States who have investigated the subject, it is impossible for us, looking at the public and solemn acts of the nation through its recognized organs, now to stand uncompromisingly on the ground of right. We have admitted, over and over again, that the question is one open to doubt and controversy; and, as such, we have agreed to make it a subject of arbitration; and the opinion of the arbiter, however wanting in legal obligation, has yet been pronounced before the world against our claim.

After these various and repeated acts of the national authorities, acknowledging, in one form or another, the doubts and difficulties which stood in the way of the actual demarcation of the boundary in question, according to the provisions of the treaty of 1783, it seems to the committee too late in the day, consistently with a proper regard for the peace of nations and the opinions of the world, to plant ourselves now sternly and inflexibly on the ground of a clear, manifest, and incontrovertible right to the precise line of boundary we claim. If the honor of the country, as is now asserted, demanded that the summus jus of our claims, in regard to the disputed boundary, should have been rigorously insisted on in the late negotiation, then that honor has been long since irretrievably prostrated in the dust. It was sacrificed by the treaty of 1794, by the convention of 1808, by the Ghent negotiations in 1814, by the arbitration arrangement of 1827; it was betrayed by Washington, Jefferson, and Madison; trampled under foot by every successive administration that has been charged with the foreign relations of the country, from the peace of 1783 to the present day. How would even our hero President, the venerable Jackson—at whose lofty tone in the foreign intercourse of the nation the world stood surprised—how would he stand if tried by this new standard of diplomatic chivalry? During the period of his administration, repeated entries were made on the disputed territory by agents of the neighboring British provincial authorities, who arrested our citizens, seized their property, and transported both one and the other into a foreign jurisdiction. Did he summon the nation to arms for this hostile invasion of our territory?—as it assuredly was, if the principle now so cheaply put forward, of the incontrovertible justice and validity of our title to the boundary we claimed, be correct. No, sir; he knew that, however strong might be our conviction of the justice of our claim, that there were two sides to the question—the adversary claim resting on the grounds which we had, by the most solemn national acts, recognized to be fair topics of discussion; and that we could not justify ourselves to the moral sense of mankind, in rashly taking the decision of the question into our own hands.

It appears to the committee, therefore, in looking back to the public and solemn acts of the Government, and of its successive administrations, that the time has passed, if it ever existed, when we could be justified in making the precise line of boundary claimed by us the subject of a sine qua non negotiation, or of the ultima ratio of an assertion by force. Did a second arbitration, then, afford the prospect of a more satisfactory result? This expedient seems to be equally rejected by all parties—by the United States, by Great Britain, and by the State of Maine. If such an alternative should be contemplated by any one as preferable to the arrangement which has been made, it is fit to bear in mind the risk and uncertainty, as well as the inevitable delay and expense, incident to that mode of decision. We have already seen, in the instance of the arbitration by the King of the Netherlands, how much weight a tribunal of that sort is inclined to give to the argument of convenience, and a supposed intention on the part of the negotiators of the treaty of 1783, against the literal and positive terms employed by the instrument in its description of limits. Is there no danger, in the event of another arbitration, that a farther research into the public archives of Europe might bring to light some embarrassing (even though apocryphal) document, to throw a new shade of plausible doubt on the clearness of our title, in the view of a sovereign arbiter? Such a document has already been communicated to the committee; and I feel it (said Mr. R.) to be my duty to lay it before the Senate, that they may fully appreciate its bearings, and determine for themselves the weight and importance which belong to it.

I am far from intimating (said Mr. R.) that the documents discovered by Mr. Sparks, curious and well worthy of consideration as they undoubtedly are, are of weight sufficient to shake the title of the United States, founded on the positive language of the treaty of peace. But they could not fail, in the event of another reference, to give increased confidence and emphasis to the pretensions of Great Britain, and to exert a corresponding influence upon the mind of the arbiter. It is worth while, in this connection, to turn to what Lord Ashburton has said, in one of his

[2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

communications to Mr. Webster, when explaining his views of the position of the highlands described in the treaty :

"My inspection of the maps, and my examination of the documents," says his Lordship, "lead me to a very strong conviction that the highlands contemplated by the negotiators of the treaty were the only highlands then known to them—at the head of the Penobscot, Kennebec, and the rivers west of the St. Croix; and that they did not precisely know how the north line from the St. Croix would strike them; and if it were not my wish to shorten this discussion, I believe a very good argument might be drawn from the words of the treaty in proof of this. In the negotiations with Mr. Livingston, and afterwards with Mr. McLane, this view seemed to prevail; and, as you are aware, there were proposals to search for these highlands to the west, where alone, I believe, they will be found to answer perfectly the description of the treaty. If this question should unfortunately go to a further reference, I should by no means despair of finding some confirmation of this view of the case."

It is for the Senate to consider (added Mr. Rives) whether there would not be much risk of introducing new complications and embarrassments in this controversy, by leaving it open for another litigated reference; and if the British Government—strongly prepossessed, as its minister tells us it is, with the justice of its claims—would not find what it would naturally consider a persuasive "confirmation of its views of the case" in documents, such as those encountered by Mr. Sparks in his historical researches in the archives of France.

A map has been vauntingly paraded here, from Mr. Jefferson's collection, in the zeal of opposition, (without taking time to see what it was,) to confront and invalidate the map found by Mr. Sparks in the Foreign Office at Paris; but, the moment it is examined, it is found to sustain, by the most precise and remarkable correspondence in every feature, the map communicated by Mr. Sparks. The Senator who produced it, could see nothing but the microscopic dotted line running off in a north-easterly direction; but the moment other eyes were applied to it, there was found, in bold relief, a strong red line, indicating the limits of the United States according to the treaty of peace, and coinciding, minutely and exactly, with the boundary traced on the map of Mr. Sparks. That this red line, and not the hardly visible dotted line, was intended to represent the limits of the United States according to the treaty of peace, is conclusively shown by the circumstance, that the red line is drawn on the map all around the exterior boundary of the United States;—through the middle of the Northern Lakes, thence through the Long Lake and the Rainy Lake to the Lake of the Woods; and from the western extremity of the Lake of the Woods to the river Mississippi; and along that river, to the point where the boundary of the United States, according to the treaty of peace, leaves it; and thence, by its easterly course, to the mouth of the St. Mary's, on the Atlantic.

Here, then, is a most remarkable and unforeseen confirmation of the map of Mr. Sparks, and by another map of a most imposing character, and bearing very high marks of authenticity. It was printed and published in Paris in 1784, (the year after the conclusion of the peace,) by Lattre, graveur du Roi, (engraver of maps, &c., to the King.) It is formally entitled, on its face, a "map of the United States of America, according to the treaty of peace, 1783."—(Carte des Etats Unis de l'Amérique, suivant le traité de paix de 1783.) It is "dedicated and presented" (dediée et présentée) "to his Excellency Benjamin Franklin, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, near the court of France," and while Dr. Franklin yet remained in Paris; for he did not return to the United States till the spring of the year 1785. Is there not, then, the most plausible ground to argue that this map, professing to be one constructed "according to the treaty of peace of 1783," and being "dedicated and presented" to Dr. Franklin, the leading negotiator who concluded that treaty, and who yet remained in Paris while the map was published, was made out with his knowledge, and by his directions; and that, corresponding as it does identically with the map found by Mr. Sparks in the Archives of the Foreign Affairs in Paris, they both partake of the same presumptions in favor of their authenticity?

A question of disputed boundary between adjacent territories, now rapidly filling up with a hardy and enterprising population, is one attended with constant danger to the peace of the two nations. The acts of ill-advised individuals, of small detachments of troops, of subordinate local authorities, may, at any moment, bring on a conflict, in which the two countries would be committed to the stern issues of war, against their own deliberate policy and will. How near this catastrophe was being brought about three years ago, on the occasion of what was called the Aroostook war, I need not remind the Senate. For terminating this thorny and long-protracted controversy, so fraught with mischiefs and dangers to both countries, the failures of the past prove that the only expedient now left is the conventional establishment of a new and well-defined boundary line. All attempts to effect an arrangement of this kind hitherto have been rendered unavailing, by the impossibility of obtaining the assent of the States of Maine and Massachusetts—one of them claiming the rights of sovereignty and jurisdiction, as well as soil; the other an original and undivested interest in the soil of the disputed territory. Under the principles of our federative system, the national authority has been held incompetent, by means of a convention with a foreign power or otherwise, to change the boundaries, and, in effect, alienate a portion of the territory of one of the members of the Union, without its formal and stipulated assent. This fundamental obstacle, which, through so long a series of abortive negotiations, has continued to keep open an ancient and dangerous controversy with a foreign power, has at length, by a fortunate combination of circumstances, and happy reconciliation of jarring interests, been overcome. Both Maine and Massachusetts, through their several commissioners furnished with full powers for the purpose, have given their final assent to the new boundary line, separating their territory from that of the adjacent British provinces, which is proposed to be established by the treaty before us.

The Committee on Foreign Relations (said Mr. Rives) is clear in the opinion, that an arrangement so sanctioned, after the numberless perplexities and impediments which have heretofore and so long obstructed a satisfactory adjustment of the question, ought not to be lightly disturbed by the action of this body. On looking into the arrangement itself, they see nothing in it incompatible with the character of a fair, just, and reasonable compromise, under all the circumstances of difficulty and embarrassment which surrounded the subject.

In analyzing the details of this arrangement, it appears that seven-twelfths in quantity of the disputed territory have fallen to the share of Maine—in value, a far larger proportion. The lands allotted to Great Britain are, for the most part, barren and unproductive; deriving their chief (if not sole) importance from the more direct and convenient communication they afford between her provinces, and the greater breadth of border they give her on the St. Lawrence. These, indeed, are the essential objects she professed to have in view. On the other hand, the lands reserved to the State of Maine are, many of them, of great fertility, and all of them abound in fine timber. But their actual commercial value must depend, after all, on the facilities of a cheap transportation to convey their agricultural produce, and especially their heavy lumber, to market. Hence the free navigation of the St. John to the ocean is of vital importance to the upper parts of the State of Maine; and the stipulation to receive and treat their productions on a footing of equal favor with the produce of the colonies, enhances still farther the value of this grant. The free navigation of the St. John formed no part of the award of the King of the Netherlands; and in every practical view, therefore, the arrangement now proposed possesses marked advantages for the State of Maine over that of the award, which it is now attempted to exalt so much in the comparison. On this point, we have the highest possible evidence—the decision of the party most deeply interested—of Maine herself. It is apparent, from the correspondence before us, that Lord Ashburton was, at all times, ready to enter into an arrangement on the naked basis of the award of the King of the Netherlands, and that the commissioners of Maine were as steady and unwavering in their repugnance to it; and I am authorized explicitly to state the fact, that the three-fold option was distinctly presented to the commissioners—of the award, the arbitration, and the arrangement now before us. They deliberately elected the last; and most wisely and sagaciously, in my opinion, did they decide.

Looking at the arrangement as a national question, and as the interests of the Union at large are concerned, its advantages, in a sober and candid view of things, appear to the committee equally obvious. Will any gentleman hesitate to say that the important territorial concessions, and the quieting of contested boundaries all along the Northern frontier of the United States, from the head of Connecticut River to the western extremity of Lake Superior, including the surrender of the questionable British title to the ownership of by far the most important military position upon our whole frontier, (Rouse's Point,) are not cheaply purchased by the paltry sum to be paid to Maine and Massachusetts for their assent to the new boundary? Have honorable gentlemen, who find so much fault with this arrangement, forgotten that General Jackson was willing, and actually entered into an agreement, to pay to Maine and Massachusetts—not the pittance of three hundred thousand dollars—but an indemnity equivalent to a million and a quarter of dollars, if they would acquiesce in the award of the King of the Netherlands.

But it is said that the arrangement in question, by giving to Great Britain the narrow strip of wild and desolate land on the eastern side of the highlands, from the head waters of the St. Francis River to the Metjarmette portage, surrenders a line of military positions, which, at the same time, command Quebec and cover the State of Maine! But for this unlucky treaty, Mr. President, these important discoveries in military topography, I venture to say, would never have been made. We have had able and scientific reports, from time to time, on the defences of our inland frontier, from boards of officers, consisting of the first professional men in America, who are well acquainted with the country in question, and all its military attributes and relations. And yet, in not one of these reports have we had the remotest hint of these commanding military positions—facing, as they do, the St. Lawrence at points below Quebec, where nothing would be gained if you were to reach it, and on the other side looking down on a sterile region and boundless forests, where armies could neither be moved nor subsisted, and would, therefore, never attempt to penetrate!

No, sir: Great Britain obtains nothing by the new boundary agreed upon, but a more direct and convenient communication between her upper and lower provinces, and a strip of

2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

alternate rock and morass, which simply serves to eke out, by added space, her border along the St. Lawrence. And are these such boons that the national honor or safety forbids they should not be granted, for fair equivalents, to a neighboring power, in the compromise and adjustment of a disputed boundary, which has been the subject of controversy for half a century? We have always admitted that the boundary claimed by us was a most inconvenient one for Great Britain, by interrupting the communication between her provinces; and we have never been so churlish a neighbor as to insist on holding this advantage, against every proposition of compromise and mutual accommodation. I cannot divest myself of the consciousness that we are the stronger power on this continent, and I am not afraid to do what the spirit of good neighborhood and manly intercourse requires, when appealed to by a corresponding disposition; and it does seem to me that, while Great Britain is freely surrendering to us an invaluable military position—her title to which, if she chose to insist on it, is above all question—(I mean Rouse's Point)—a position which is pronounced, by the first military officers in our service, (in communications now before me,) to be the great strategic point on our Northern frontier—the key in our hands, to the Canadas; in theirs, to the heart of our own country; and, therefore, "above all price," either for attack or defence; it would be ungracious, indeed, and unworthy alike of our honor and our strength, if we were doggedly to refuse the slightest relaxation from the rigor of our claims, even for an obvious mutual convenience.

We come now (said Mr. Rives) to that portion of the treaty which relates to the suppression of the African slave-trade. There is no nation under the sun which has shown, through her whole history, more anxiety for the extinction of this odious and revolting traffic than the United States; and none have, therefore, a deeper interest, historical and political, in the consummation of the great work in which they led the way. Not to peak of the various and repeated acts of the legislatures of the several States, while they were yet colonies of Great Britain, to arrest and put an end to this cruel traffic—acts rendered inoperative by what my own State (Virginia) denounced at the time to be "an inhuman use of the royal negative," and which he specially set forth among the wrongs and grievances which impelled her to the establishment of an independent Government;—not to peak of acts of this sort, with which our ante-revolutionary history abounds,—it is sufficient to say that the Government of the Union, from the moment of its establishment under the existing constitution, has steadily devoted itself to the accomplishment of the same great object. While the Christian States of Europe still tolerated, and some of them even encouraged, this revolting commerce, the United States, first among the nations of the earth, pronounced its formal condemnation by law; and, following up this condemnation, as occasion required, with new penal sanctions, combined with active measures of surveillance and repression, they finally gave to the world the striking example of a crowning act of legislative energy, by which they affixed the brand of piracy to the slave-trade, declaring that any citizen of the United States found engaged in it, whether on board an American or foreign vessel, or any foreigner on board an American vessel, so employed, "should be adjudged a pirate, and suffer death as such."

Great Britain early embraced, and has till now perseveringly adhered to the opinion, that the mutual concession of a right of search, to be exercised by the armed cruisers of each party over the merchant vessels of the others, is the only effectual means of putting an end to this infamous traffic. The United States, on the other hand, unable to forget the serious wrongs they had so recently experienced from the abusive exercise of the right of search; jealous, above all things, of the immunity of their flag, and of the general freedom of the seas—the common and equal inheritance of all nations—have been unwilling to compromise these great interests, by entering into an arrangement involving so vital an innovation upon the established maritime code; especially as they believed other means were to be found, no less effectual, for the accomplishment of the common object of the suppression of the slave-trade. Great Britain, in the mean time, succeeded in making treaties with Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands, for the mutual right of search. And other European States having, from time to time, come into the same arrangement, the United States are now the only considerable maritime power that has continued to refuse its accession to a system which they could not but regard as compromising, in a high degree, the general freedom of the seas. It has thus, doubtless, happened that the American flag has been, in many instances, fraudulently used to cover vessels really belonging to States who are parties to the mutual grant of the right of search, from the exercise of that right; and, to prevent this evasion, the Government of Great Britain recently put forth a pretension of alarming extent, and which we have resisted, and must ever resist, as wholly unsustainable upon any just principle of public law; to wit, that her cruisers have the right to board and detain vessels sailing under the American flag, when they shall judge it proper to do so, to ascertain, by an examination of their papers, whether they are truly and bona fide American or not.

This was the state of things existing at the commencement of the present session of Congress, when the President laid before us the correspondence which had taken place on the subject of this new pretension between our Minister at London, and Lord Palmerston and

August, 1842.]

The British Treaty.

[27th CONG.]

Lord Aberdeen, successively her Majesty's Secretaries of State for Foreign Affairs. The message of the President, referring to the same pretension, held the following emphatic and unequivocal language:

"However desirous the United States may be for the suppression of the slave-trade, they cannot consent to interpolations into the maritime code, at the mere will and pleasure of other Governments. We deny the right of any such interpolation to any one or all the nations of the earth, without our consent. We claim to have a voice in all amendments or alterations of that code; and when we are given to understand, as in this instance, by a foreign Government, that its treaties with other nations cannot be executed without the establishment and enforcement of new principles of maritime police, to be applied without our consent, we must employ a language neither of equivocal import, nor susceptible of misconstruction. American citizens, prosecuting a lawful commerce in the African seas, under the flag of their country, are not responsible for the abuse or unlawful use of that flag by others, nor can they rightfully, on account of any such alleged abuse, be interrupted, molested, or detained, while on the ocean."

Here, then, is the answer of the American Government, in the highest and most authoritative form known to its official intercourse, to the pretension advanced on the part of Great Britain, in the discussion with our late Minister at London. It is an unequivocal negation of that pretension, in principle and in practice; and leaves nothing to be done which could announce in more emphatic terms our determined resistance to it.

The vital question of the independence of our flag being thus disposed of, by the prompt, unequivocal, and final answer of the American Government to this new pretension, other considerations of an important character present themselves to view. It is shown, by the correspondence just referred to, and other incontestable proofs, that the American flag has been extensively abused to cover this iniquitous traffic—sometimes by American citizens, notwithstanding the severity of our penal enactments; but more frequently by the subjects of other powers—by Spanish, Portuguese, or Brazilian slave-dealers, who assume the American colors to protect them from the right of search, to which they would be subject under their own national flags.

Seeing, then, that our flag has been shamelessly abused to cover an infamous traffic, which our laws were the first to denounce and pursue with adequate penalties—that it has been made a shelter to screen from the punishment due to their crimes the most profligate of the human race,—does not the national honor demand that we should give to the world an assurance of our determination to cleanse and preserve it from this horrible pollution? We have, upon considerations of the highest state policy, and from a jealous solicitude to maintain the freedom of the seas, refused to concede that mutual right of search which other nations have consented to yield, as an instrument for the suppression of the slave-trade. We have, with still stronger determination, and upon impregnable grounds of public law, declared our resistance to the new pretension of subjecting our flag to visitation and detention, for the alleged purpose of carrying into execution the agreements of other powers, to which we have refused to become a party. Under these circumstances, is it not due to the character of the American people, pledged by all their past history to the great cause of the final suppression of the African slave-trade, that, while rejecting the plans proposed by other Governments for this object, we should come forward with one of our own, which will afford a complete guarantee against the prostitution to which we have seen our flag so vilely exposed, and which will, at the same time, bring the most efficient means to the general extirpation of this odious traffic, without intrenching on the liberty of the seas and the established principles of maritime law!

Considerations and sentiments such as these, doubtless suggested the arrangement contained in the treaty. By that arrangement, it is stipulated that the two powers shall each maintain a squadron of not less than eighty guns on the coast of Africa, to enforce, separately and respectively, the laws and obligations of each country for the suppression of the slave-trade: the two squadrons to be perfectly independent of each other; but, at the same time, to act in concert and co-operation for the attainment of the common object, under such orders as shall, from time to time, be given by their respective Governments. And it is farther stipulated, that the two parties will unite in all becoming representations and remonstrances to any power within whose dominions markets for the purchase of African slaves may be still allowed to exist, to close such markets at once and forever. In virtue of this arrangement, (which is limited to five years, if either party shall wish then to terminate it,) each power will, separately and independently, exercise the necessary supervision and police over all vessels sailing under its own flag; neither being permitted to visit or search the vessels of the other; but the presence of the two squadrons, always on the alert, and acting in friendly concert, will afford, by their vigilant oversight, complete security against the use of the flag of either power to cover the prohibited traffic, and will, at the same time, give protection to the merchant vessels of each when necessary, from all unlawful interruption or molestation.

This arrangement is adapted to meet every exigency of the case, and reconciles the most vigorous measures for the suppression of the slave-trade, with a sacred regard for the independence and immunity of the national flag. It vindicates from all suspicion the sincerity of the United States; which their persevering and solitary opposition, for a long time, to the mutual concession of the right of search, for

2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

the more effective pursuit and detection of the traffic, exposed to injurious doubts and misconstruction. At the same time, it has the merit of a strict fidelity to American principles. It is, indeed, the identical plan which, when Lord Castlereagh was so earnestly insisting on a mutual right of search as the only effectual means for the suppression of the slave-trade, President Monroe caused to be presented, as the American contre-projet—which, however, did not prevent his Lordship from recurring to, and urgently pressing, again and again, his favorite right of search.

The incidental advantages attending this arrangement, in the support and protection which the presence of an American squadron will give to our growing commerce on the coast of Africa—a commerce susceptible of the most beneficial developments, through the civilized colonial settlements already established there—constitute an important additional recommendation of it. This consideration early attracted the attention of the proper department; and we see, from the report of the Secretary of the Navy at the commencement of the session, that he proposed to enlarge materially the number of vessels employed on the African station, as well in reference to this object, as for the suppression of the slave-trade. The extent of the squadron stipulated to be maintained there, is probably not greater than the Secretary would have deemed expedient in any event; and the expense will be amply paid in resulting benefits to the commerce of the country.

The last stipulation in the treaty which remains to be noticed, is that by which the parties agree mutually to surrender fugitives from justice, in certain cases. An arrangement of this sort between neighboring States, whose territories border on each other through an extended boundary—presenting to offenders great facilities of escape from one jurisdiction into the other—seems to be urgently demanded by the interests of peace, law, and social order. So just and proper is it in itself, that some writers of high authority on the law of nations have regarded it as a matter of absolute obligation, independently of treaty stipulations. The modern and better opinion, however, (considering how diversified, and often arbitrary, is the penal legislation of different countries,) is, that there is no obligation to surrender fugitives from the criminal justice of one country taking refuge in another, but in virtue of positive and precise compact. The want of some conventional arrangement of this sort between the United States and Great Britain, has been particularly felt in the States of the Union adjacent to the Canadas and other British possessions on the continent, where the prospect of the easy impunity gained by passing from one side to the other of the boundary line, has been found to operate as a great temptation and encouragement to crime. Several of those States have manifested an earnest desire for such a reciprocal arrangement between the two Governments. The stipulation in the treaty, it will be seen, is confined exclusively to crimes of an aggravated character against life or property—such as murder, robbery, piracy, and some two or three other enumerated offences, carefully premitting all political offences; and lest some unforeseen abuse or inconvenience should arise in the practical administration of the agreement, the right is reserved to either party to terminate it at will.

This article closes the circle of matters embraced by the treaty. There are other questions, of much interest to both countries, which have formed the subject of an important correspondence between the Secretary of State and the special minister of Great Britain. This correspondence has been laid before the Senate with the treaty, and must necessarily enter into their consideration in disposing of the treaty itself. It has, therefore, attracted the careful attention of the committee; and they have seen, with pleasure, that there has been an amicable and honorable understanding, or an important advance to such an understanding ultimately, on each of the questions which formed the topic of that correspondence.

Mr. CONRAD rose and said—

It was not my intention, Mr. President, to take any part in the debate on this treaty; but as I have come to the determination to vote against it, I feel bound to assign my reasons for that vote.

The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. CHOATE,) have vied with each other in eulogizing this treaty as a chef d'œuvre of diplomatic skill. I cannot perceive, however, in what respect it is so advantageous to the country.

It contains three principal stipulations: 1st. The first and most important is, that which fixes our North-eastern boundary. 2d. It obliges us to maintain a naval armament on the coast of Africa, to aid in the suppression of the slave-trade; and, lastly, it provides for the mutual surrender, in certain cases, of fugitives from justice.

In regard to the first of these provisions, I believe it is admitted, on all hands, that the line agreed upon falls far short of our pretensions, and is rather a compromise of the question than a settlement of it, according to our interpretation of the treaty of 1783. There probably never was a period, since the commencement of the controversy, when a compromise could not have been effected on as favorable terms.

The second stipulation, although in form a reciprocal engagement, is, in point of fact, a concession on our part. Great Britain already maintains, and would, in the absence of any such stipulation, continue to maintain on the coast of Africa a much larger naval force than

August, 1842.]

The British Treaty.

[27th Cong.]

she binds herself to do by this treaty. Permit me to observe, too, Mr. President, that, however willing I may be, by every proper means, to prevent the prostitution of our flag to this odious traffic, I would much have preferred that whatever we did on this subject should be our own spontaneous act, instead of appearing to have been extorted from us by Great Britain—by that country which, after having long usurped the police of the seas, has recently wheedled or intimidated one-half of Europe into an acknowledgment of this preposterous claim. I should have preferred to see our country maintain the proud attitude which France, encouraged by the firmness of our minister, has taken on this subject, and conceded nothing where nothing could rightfully be demanded.

The third provision is that which provides for the surrender of criminals in certain cases; in regard to which I shall only observe, that it is a provision at least as advantageous to Great Britain as to us, and cannot, therefore, be viewed as a stipulation in our favor.

This is the substance of the treaty. I cannot perceive in it those advantages that some gentlemen have professed to do. My objections to it, however, are not so much on account of what it does, as of what it does not contain.

Mr. President, there were three subjects of difference between this country and Great Britain, the prompt adjustment of which was deemed peculiarly urgent, as they all threatened hourly to disturb the harmony of the two countries—the settlement of our North-eastern boundary; the controversy growing out of the destruction of the Caroline; and, lastly, that arising out of the seizure and liberation of slaves belonging to citizens of the United States. When it was known that a special minister was to be deputed to this country, for the purpose of restoring and maintaining the harmony of the two countries, no one doubted that his mission embraced the settlement of all these questions, if none others. I confess, therefore, that when the treaty was read at your table, and I discovered that one, and not the least important of these questions, (I mean that relative to the seizure of our slaves,) was left precisely where it stood before the arrival of the British ambassador, I was equally surprised and disappointed. No less than five cases have already occurred, in which vessels bound from one port in the Union to another, by having slaves on board have been driven, either by stress of weather, or by the violence of the slaves themselves, into some one of the small islands in the Bahama channel; and, in every instance, the slaves have been violently taken from the possession of their owners, and set at liberty by the colonial authorities. In the two first cases, the British Government, after a protracted negotiation, indemnified the owners. The third case was that of the schooner "Enterprise," which occurred some six or seven years ago. Application was again made for indemnity; and what was the answer of the British Government? In substance, that this confiscation of American property was justified by a recent act of Parliament abolishing slavery in their West India possessions, and that thenceforward no indemnity was due our citizens for slaves thrown by unavoidable accidents upon their shores.

As soon as this decision of the British Government was made known to ours, the distinguished Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) introduced the following resolutions; which, on the 15th April, 1840, were unanimously adopted by this body:

"Resolved, That a ship or vessel on the high seas, in time of peace, engaged in a lawful voyage, is, according to the laws of nations, under the exclusive jurisdiction of the State to which her flag belongs; as much so, as if constituting a part of its own domain.

"Resolved, That if such ship or vessel should be forced by stress of weather, or other unavoidable cause, into the ports and under the jurisdiction of a friendly power, she and her cargo, and persons on board, with their property, and all the rights belonging to their personal relations, as established by the laws of the State to which they belong, would be placed under the protection which the laws of nations extend to the unfortunate under such circumstances.

"Resolved, That the brig Enterprise, which was forced unavoidably, by stress of weather, into Port Hamilton, Bermuda Island, while on a lawful voyage on the high seas, from one port of the Union to another, comes within the principles embraced in the foregoing resolutions; and that the seizure and detention of the negroes on board, by the local authorities of the island, was an act in violation of the laws of nations, and highly unjust to our citizens to whom they belong."

I well recollect the satisfaction with which the adoption of these resolutions was hailed by the Southern portion of this Union. The promptitude and unanimity with which they were adopted proved that the "still small voice" of patriotism could yet make itself heard amid the din of party strife, with which these halls perpetually resound. We flattered ourselves that Great Britain would now pause in her course of insolence and aggression; and that the petty functionaries of an insignificant island, almost in sight of our coast, would no longer beard the majesty of this republic.

More than two years ago, therefore, this body solemnly resolved, in substance, that the seizure and detention of slaves, under the circumstances of those on board the Enterprise, was an act of injustice to our citizens, a violation of the law of nations, and equivalent to an invasion of our territory. This resolution was adopted, after a protracted negotiation for redress had eventuated in a rejection of the demand. Two nations could not be brought nearer to a state of hostility by any act short of a positive declaration of war, than Great Britain and this country were by the adoption of these resolutions. In fact, this left but one to Sams.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

alternative—redress or war. Foreign nations had, therefore, the right to conclude (and I well recollect they did conclude) that the wrongs complained of would be redressed, or war would ensue. But what effect did those resolutions produce in the country against which they were fulminated? Scarcely had their thunder died away on the distant shores of Great Britain, when, as if in defiance of our threats, another outrage, precisely similar in character to the one complained of, is committed. The schooner Hermosa, bound on a voyage from Norfolk to New Orleans, with a number of slaves on board, is wrecked on one of the reefs in the Bahama channel. All the persons on board, including the slaves, are taken from the wreck by an English "wrecker," and carried to Nassau. As soon as they arrive there, a file of soldiers, wearing the British uniform, commanded by a British officer, march on board the wrecker, order the slaves ashore, and carry them before some petty magistrate; by whose supreme authority, and in spite of the remonstrances of the American consul, they are set at liberty. These facts being established by incontestable evidence, application for indemnity was made to the British Government, before any answer had been given to this application, the case of the "Creole" occurred.

So far as the claim to indemnity is concerned, the circumstances of this case were not so strong as those in the cases of the "Enterprise" and the "Hermosa;" for, in this case, the liberation of the slaves was not the act of the British Government, nor did it even occur within their jurisdiction. It occurred on the high seas, and was effected by the slaves themselves. The atrocities, however, with which it was attended, and the aid and protection afforded to the authors of them, justly excited public indignation, and momentarily roused our Government from its lethargy. An urgent demand for redress was made, enforced by a letter from the Secretary of State, containing an able exposition of the law of nations applicable to the question, and a complete refutation of the arguments by which the British ministry had, in the case of the "Enterprise," already referred to, attempted to justify the seizure of American property by a British statute. I appeal to you, Mr. President, whether, at that juncture, any one of the questions pending between this country and Great Britain was deemed more important, or more urgent in its character, than that growing out of these repeated outrages? So far as my own State is concerned, I can venture to say that it stood foremost in the catalogue of grievances of which we had a right to complain. The Legislatures of many of the States (and that of Louisiana among the rest) passed strong resolutions expressive of their sense of these outrages, and of their readiness to vindicate, by a resort to arms, the insulted honor of the country. The swelling tide of public indignation was only arrested by the announcement of the fact that Great Britain had deputed a special envoy to this country, charged with the settlement of this and all other differences between the two countries; and now we are called upon to ratify a treaty in which this subject is entirely pre-termitted! Why is this, sir? I do not think I exaggerate the magnitude of this question, when I affirm that, in whatever light we view it—whether we consider the mere pecuniary considerations connected with it, the interest felt by a large portion of the country in its decision, its exciting and irritating character, and, above all, the principles involved in it—it is by far more important than any of those embraced in the treaty.

And what is the reason assigned for this extraordinary omission? Why, that Lord Ashburton's powers did not embrace the settlement of this question. But why did they not embrace it? Has it not been pending for years? It is true, as Lord Ashburton says, that the case of the Creole was only known in England a few days before his departure for this country; but that of the Enterprise occurred many years ago; and the resolutions of this body, declaring it a violation of the law of nations, and equivalent to an invasion of our territory, were adopted more than two years prior to his departure. Besides, nothing would have been easier than to have enlarged his powers, had they been found insufficient. No, sir; the true reason for this casus omissus in the treaty is to be found in Lord Ashburton's letter. He there says: "There are certain great principles too deeply rooted in the consciences and sympathies of the people of Great Britain, for any minister to be able to overlook; and any engagement I might make in opposition to them would be instantly disavowed." In other words, the sympathies of British abolitionists must not be shocked by having any restraint put upon their humane efforts to excite our slaves to insurrection and bloodshed! Gentlemen refer us to this letter, as containing all that was necessary on this subject. It is true, Mr. President, that, as nothing was intended to be done, it was thought necessary, at least, to say something. But if it was intended to enter into any binding engagements on this subject, why was it done in the form of a letter? Why was it not inserted in the treaty? I have looked in vain, however, in this letter, for any thing which could be construed either into an apology for the past, or a pledge for the future. So far from admitting the truth of the unanswerable propositions contained in Mr. Webster's letter to him, Lord A. pronounces them to be startling; and so far from making any specific pledges, he expressly declares that, if he were to make any, they would be "instantly disavowed by his Government." It is true, he talks of transferring the negotiation on this point to London; but, at the very time when this correspondence was penned, Lord Ashburton and Mr. Webster both were well aware that a negotiation had already taken place at

August, 1842.]

The British Treaty.

[27th Conn.]

London, and that the British Government had adhered to their former decision.

I have already stated that application was made by our Government for indemnity for slaves captured on board the schooner Hermosa. I hold in my hand copies of the correspondence which took place on this subject between Mr. Everett, our minister at London, and Lord Aberdeen, the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Great Britain.

Here we find (continued Mr. C.) that, as late as the 20th May last, when Lord Ashburton was writing diplomatic notes about adjourning the settlement of this question to London, where "access could be had to all the authorities," the British Government had solemnly decided that "they would not, henceforward, entertain the question of compensation for slaves who may have acquired their liberty by passing under the jurisdiction of British laws;" and "that, slavery being now abolished throughout the British empire, there can be no well-founded claim on the part of any foreigner for compensation in respect to slaves who, under any circumstances whatever, may come into the British colonies." No, not even when the vessels containing them are driven there by tempest, like the Enterprise; by shipwreck, like the Hermosa; or by mutiny and murder, like the Creole. And this inhuman doctrine—this barbarous interpolation of the code of international law, which imposes a penalty upon misfortune, and holds out a premium to insurrection and murder, is promulgated at the very moment when the bloody tragedy recently enacted on board the Creole had demonstrated the fatal consequences to which it would inevitably lead.

[Mr. Rives here interrupted Mr. C., and observed that the letter of Lord Aberdeen was a mere reference to a prior decision given in the case of the Enterprise.]

It does refer (continued Mr. C.) to that decision; but it expressly adopts and confirms it; and the reference to a case which this body had already pronounced to have been a violation of our flag and of national law, only renders their rejection of our demand as offensive in form, as it was unjust in substance. Why, let me ask, was this letter, rejecting our demand, withheld from the public, when Mr. Webster's letter to Mr. Everett, instructing him to make that demand, and demonstrating its injustice, was paraded in every newspaper in the country, even before it had reached its destination? Why was the smooth, plausible, diplomatic note of Lord Ashburton, who was not authorized to negotiate on this subject, sent to this body along with this treaty; when not a word was said about the plain, unequivocal, peremptory answer of the British minister, about the extent of whose power there could be no dispute? How is it that, until yesterday, the very existence of such a correspondence was unknown to this body? Was it because it was feared that such a letter might prove an obstacle to the ratification of this treaty, and might revive anew those feelings of indignation which these outrages had excited, and which had only slumbered since this negotiation had been set on foot?

Mr. President, the moment that this answer of Lord Ashburton was known here, our Government should have made the settlement of this question a sine qua non; and, in case of refusal, have broken off the negotiation at once. Had this course been pursued, depend upon it, the powers of Lord Ashburton would have been found broad enough to cover the case, or have been speedily enlarged. Gentlemen tell us that, in that event, war would have been inevitable; and one would almost fancy that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs already heard the distant roar of British artillery. For my own part, I entertain no such fears. Embarrassed as she is in her finances, and encumbered with two Asiatic wars, England is not more anxious or better prepared for war than we are. She would never go to war for the sake of maintaining a principle which is only important to her as a means of annoying us, and which the voice of the civilized world would pronounce to be erroneous. Her boasted philanthropy is wonderfully sagacious, and always coincides with, and subserves her interests. But, even did I believe that we would be the inevitable consequence of a rejection of this treaty, I would not permit that belief to influence my decision. True, our finances are deranged, our treasury exhausted, and the administration of our affairs confided to hands that neither possess nor deserve the confidence of the country; but I would prefer to encounter war, under all these disadvantages, than to purchase an ignominious peace by the surrender of a principle of such vital importance. I would not permit any temporary difficulties to create permanent misfortunes. I would treat with Great Britain as I would treat with the weakest power in Christendom; I would treat with her now, as I would when our affairs are most prosperous. I would treat with her, with Tyler for our President, as I would with Washington or Jackson at the helm of Government. And, after all, if we ratify this treaty, will not there still remain sufficient cause for war? Did not this body, two years ago, solemnly declare that there was, when they pronounced the seizure of the slaves on board the Enterprise a violation of law and of the rights of our citizens, and equivalent to an invasion of our domain? Since those resolutions, the outrages of the Hermosa and the Creole have been superadded to that of the Enterprise. If there was cause for war then, is there not much greater cause now? If these resolutions be erroneous, repeal them. If the principles they contain be correct, preserve your consistency, and maintain them at whatever sacrifice. But do not ratify this treaty, and leave them in full force—a recorded sentence of self-condemnation.

[2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

Mr. BENTON said: I am opposed to the treaty on many grounds; and first, because it is not a settlement of all the questions in dispute between the two countries. We were led to believe, on the arrival of the special minister, that he came as a messenger of peace, and clothed with full powers to settle every thing; and believing this, his arrival was hailed with universal joy. But here is a disappointment—a great disappointment. On receiving the treaty and the papers which accompany it, we find that all the subjects in dispute have not been settled; that, in fact, only three out of seven are settled; and that the minister has returned to his country, leaving four of the contested subjects unadjusted. This is a disappointment; and the greater, because the papers communicated confirm the report that the minister came with full powers to settle every thing. The very first note of the American negotiator—and that in its very first sentence, confirms this belief, and leaves us to wonder how a mission that promised so much, has performed so little. Mr. Webster's first note runs thus: "Lord Ashburton having been charged by the Queen's Government with full powers to negotiate and settle all matters in discussion between the United States and England, and having, on his arrival at Washington, announced," &c., &c. Here is a declaration of full power to settle every thing; and yet, after this, only part is settled, and the minister has returned home. This is unexpected, and inconsistent. It contradicts the character of the mission, balks our hopes, and frustrates our policy. As a confederacy of States, our policy is to settle every thing, or nothing; and having received the minister for that purpose, this complete and universal settlement, or nothing, should have been the sine qua non of the American negotiator.

From the Message of the President which accompanies the treaty, we learn that the questions in discussion between the two countries were: 1. The Northern boundary. 2. The right of search in the African seas, and the suppression of the African slave-trade. 3. The surrender of fugitives from justice. 4. The title to the Columbia River. 5. Impressment. 6. The attack on the Caroline. 7. The case of the Creole, and of other American vessels which had shared the same fate. These are the subjects (seven in number) which the President enumerates, and which he informs us occupied the attention of the negotiators. He does not say whether these were all the subjects which occupied their attention. He does not tell us whether they discussed any others. He does not say whether the British negotiator opened the question of the State debts, and their assumption or guarantee by the Federal Government! or whether the American negotiator mentioned the point of the Canadian asylum for fugitive slaves, (of which twelve thousand have already gone there,) seduced by the honors and rewards which they receive, and by the protection which is extended to them. The Message is silent upon these further subjects of difference, if not of discussion, between the two countries; and, following the lead of the President, and confining ourselves (for the present) to the seven subjects of dispute named by him, and we find three of them provided for in the treaty—four of them not: and this constitutes a great objection to the treaty—an objection which is aggravated by the nature of the subjects settled, or not settled. For it so happens that, of the subjects in discussion, some were general, and affected the whole Union; others were local, and affected sections. Of these general subjects, those which Great Britain had most at heart are provided for; those which most concerned the United States are omitted: and of the three sections of the Union which had each its peculiar grievance, one section is quieted, and two are left as they were. This gives Great Britain an advantage over us as a nation: it gives one section of the Union an advantage over the two others, sectionally. This is all wrong, unjust, unwise, and impolitic. It is wrong to give a foreign power an advantage over us: it is wrong to give one section of the Union an advantage over the others. In their differences with foreign powers, the States should be kept united; their peculiar grievances should not be separately settled, so as to disunite their several complaints. This is a view of the objection which commends itself most gravely to the Senate. We are a confederacy of States, and a confederacy in which States classify themselves sectionally, and in which each section has its local feelings and its peculiar interests. We are classed in three sections; and each of these sections had a peculiar grievance against Great Britain; and here is a treaty to adjust the grievances of one, and but one, of these three sections. To all intents and purposes we have a separate treaty—a treaty between the Northern States and Great Britain; for it is a treaty in which the North is provided for, and the South and West left out. Virtually, it is a separate treaty with a part of the States; and this forms a grave objection to it in my eyes.

VOL. XIV.—35

Of the nine Northern States whose territories are coterminous with the dominions of her Britannic Majesty, six of them had questions of boundary, or of territory, to adjust: and all these are adjusted. The twelve Southern slaveholding States had a question in which they were all interested—that of the protection or liberation of fugitive slaves in Canada and the West Indies: this great question finds no place in the treaty, and is put off with phrases in an arranged correspondence. The whole great West takes a deep interest in the fate of the Columbia River, and demands the withdrawal of the British from it: this large subject finds no place in the treaty, nor even in the correspondence which took place between the negotiators. The South and the West must go to London with their complaints: the North has been accommodated here. The mission of peace has found its benevolence circumscribed by the metes and boundaries of the sectional divisions in the Union. The peace treaty is for one section: for the other two sections there is no peace. The non-slaveholding States coterminous with the British dominions are pacified and satisfied: the slaveholding and the Western States, remote from the British dominions, are to suffer and complain as heretofore. As a friend to the Union—a friend to justice—and as an inhabitant of the section which is both slaveholding and Western, I object to the treaty which makes this injurious distinction amongst the States.

The failure to settle all the matters in dispute between the two countries, aggravated as that failure is by the sectional and invidious distinction which it makes among the States, is a circumstance badly calculated to recommend the treaty to the indulgence or to the partiality of the Senate. What it does contain must be good indeed to overbalance so great an objection; but if, instead of being good, its contents are bad—if the sins of commission are to be added to those of omission, then there is no redeeming quality about it, and unqualified condemnation should be its fate. This I hold to be the case. I look upon the treaty to be about equally bad for what it contains, and for what it omits; and, under these two aspects, I shall proceed to give it the close and careful examination which the magnitude of the subject requires.

I have stated one general objection to the treaty—that of not settling all the questions in dispute. I pass over other general objections at present, for the purpose of getting at once to the consideration of its details. These other general objections are numerous and weighty; but I pass them over at present with a mere enumeration, to be attended to hereafter. I name them now, without stopping to dwell upon them. They are: That such a negotiation should have been committed to a sole negotiator, and one not subjected to the approval of the Senate, nor furnished with presidential instructions to limit and guide him, and the citizen of an interested State,—the assumption of this negotiator to treat the question of national boundaries, not as a question of rights under the treaty of independence, but as a matter of bargain and sale, or of grants and equivalents, in the hands of the negotiators; the omission of the American negotiator to keep minutes, or protocols, of his conferences and propositions;—the obscurity and mystery which rest upon the origin and progress of the different propositions;—the assumption of the American negotiator to act for the British negotiator, in presenting the British proposition for the Maine boundary as the American proposition; and the unjustifiable and unfounded arguments with which he pressed that proposition upon the commissioners of the State of Maine, until he succeeded in victimizing that deserted and doomed State;—the mixing up of incongruous subjects in the same treaty;—the irregular manner in which the ratification of the treaty has been forestalled by private consultations and conferences with Senators before it was submitted to the Senate;—the solemn and mysterious humbuggery by which Dr. Franklin has been made to play a part in ravishing this ratification from our alarms, and screening the negotiator from responsibility for his gratuitous sacrifices;—the awful apparition of the disinterred map discovered by Mr. Jared Sparks in Paris, with the red marks upon it, and which was showed about to Senators to alarm them into prompt action;—the impressive invocation to secrecy and despatch, lest the British should get wind of the aforesaid map and letter, and thereupon renounce the treaty; when it was perfectly clear, from Lord Ashburton's letter of the 11th of July, that the sagacious old gentleman had already scented out these secret papers, and was ready to claim the benefit of them if new negotiations commenced;—the war-cry which is raised if the treaty is not ratified—a cry which addresses itself to our fears, and not to our judgment, and which would make merchandise of national honor and national rights. I pass over all these additional general objections to the treaty for the present, intending to revert to them in good time, and proceed at once to the consideration of the treaty itself.

The northern boundary is the first subject in the treaty; and on this question, (abandoning all claims of right and title under the treaty of independence—with what propriety will hereafter be seen,) the negotiators proceeded to adjust this boundary upon the principle of compromise and accommodation, ceding and conceding, granting and compensating, until they brought it to the condition in which we find it in the treaty. Waiving, for the present, all remarks upon this assumption of power over our national boundaries, and this demolition of the work of our ancestors, who established these boundaries at the expense of so much blood and treasure, and for the wise purpose of covering their country by a proper frontier: waiving, for the present, all remarks upon this point, I proceed to state the grants and equivalents which were made on each side, and shall consider the value and importance of each. These are, on the side of the British—1. Sagor or St. George's island, in the State of Michigan, between the Lakes Huron and Superior. 2. Rouse's Point, and a strip of territory in the State of New York. 3. A strip of territory in the State of Vermont. 4. A hundred thousand acres of land in the State of New Hampshire. 5. The qualified navigation of the St. John River, within the British dominions. 6. The amount of money received by the British for timber cut and sold on the disputed territory. These are the grants and compensations on the part of the British. On the part of the United States, they are: 1. The important national boundary between the Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods, so necessary to the fur-

2D Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

trade and to the control of the Indians. 2. The four thousand one hundred and nineteen square miles of territory in the State of Maine, being the same and the whole that was awarded to Great Britain by the King of the Netherlands. 3. Eight hundred and ninety-three square miles in Maine, being so much over and above the award of the King of the Netherlands. 4. The establishment of the new boundary, on this side of the awarded line, from Lake Pohenagomook to Metjarquette pass, one hundred and ten miles in length, and wholly within the ancient and natural boundaries of Maine. 5. The surrender of the mountain boundary which covered the State of Maine, and commanded the road to Quebec, from the head of the St. Francis to the Metjarquette pass—say 150 miles in length—and being so much over and above the award of the King of the Netherlands. 6. The navigation of the St. John River within the State of Maine. 7. A right of way over the territory of Maine, to reach the river. 8. The sum of $300,000 to be paid to the States of Maine and Massachusetts for their loss of territory. 9. The sum of about $200,000 to be paid to the same States, to reimburse their expenses in protecting the disputed territory against Great Britain. 10. A naval alliance and co-operation with Great Britain for the suppression of the African slave-trade. 11. A diplomatic alliance with the same power, for remonstrating with nations against the slave-trade, and for closing the markets of the world against the traffic in slaves. 12. The delivery of fugitive criminals.

This is the list of the grants and equivalents—these the concessions on each side; the value of which I now proceed to examine, beginning with those on the part of Great Britain.

[Here Mr. B. went into an examination of the concessions.]

This completes my view of the grants and concessions made by Great Britain to the United States by this treaty. They are all of the same character—nothing for Great Britain to grant, trifles for us to receive, and better given up than retained; because undesirable to Great Britain in themselves, and facilitating, by their surrender, the grand object on Maine. Sugar Island in Michigan—Rouse's Point in New York—the ninety-mile strip in Vermont—the 100,000 acres in New Hampshire—though no more desirable to the British than the wooden horse was to the Trojans, are all yielded in a way to conciliate those States, and to leave Maine standing alone, to make head against the British designs upon her territory and boundaries. I say standing alone; for even her mother, the old Bay State, was purchased off from her defence by a pecuniary indemnity for her proprietary rights, and by the honor of furnishing the sole negotiator to meet the extraordinary British special mission. Every thing along the line, from the four millions of fine mineral land beyond Lake Superior to the long sheep-walk in Vermont, is promptly thrown up; and, from the alacrity with which these concessions (as they are called) are made, and from the anxiety of the sagacious negotiator to please the border States, it may be almost inferred that it was matter of regret that there was no fine mineral land—no sweet little island—no commanding point—no long narrow slip—no pretty little creeks—along the confines of Pennsylvania and Ohio, to be flung up to those two States, in the like gracious manner. In that event, the border States might have been unanimous; and not a chance for a vote against the treaty from the Lake of the Woods to Massachusetts Bay.

Such are the grants and concessions from Great Britain to the United States: few in number, small in value, nothing for her to yield, injurious to her to retain, and already ours as effectually without the treaty as with it. Except the restricted and compensated navigation of the lower St. John, all the rest was already ours—ours by the treaty of 1783, and by the fact that Great Britain wanted none of these alips, or islands, or points of land, with the incumbrance of their republican inhabitants, which she makes a merit of yielding to us. Not so with our grants to her. They are large and valuable—material for her to receive—dangerous and injurious for us to yield—and involving, not only territory, but natural boundaries; and admitting a foreign power within the limits which Nature herself and the treaty of '83 had prescribed for the frontier of an independent nation. And here I frankly accost the subject, and say that, if our negotiator, in forming a general treaty for all the States, and in settling all the subjects in dispute between the two countries, had yielded to the British Crown all that the award of the King of the Netherlands granted, I should have said not a word. But, in transcending that award, which he himself opposed as yielding too much—in giving up more now than the British Government demanded at the time of that award—in doing this, I find reasons for amazement and disapprobation. I am astonished at what I behold; and shall proceed to state the number and the magnitude of the sacrifices we have made; and demand, from the friends of the negotiator, the causes and the reasons for such extraordinary concessions.

[Here Mr. B. proceeded to examine the concessions in detail.]

Such is the catalogue, and such the comparative value of the grants and equivalents (as they are called by our negotiator) which are made by this treaty. It is a long and heavy list on the part of the United States—a short and a light one on the part of Great Britain. So far as the Maine boundary is concerned, I have no more to say; but the other parts of the treaty—what it contains—what it omits—the general objections to it—and the various questions

August, 1842.]

The British Treaty.

[27th CONG.]

which arise upon the correspondence,—all these demand attention, and I proceed to give it.

The suppression of the African slave-trade is the second subject included in the treaty; and here the regret renews itself at the absence of all the customary lights upon the origin and progress of treaty stipulations. No minutes of conference; no protocols; no draughts or counter-draughts; no diplomatic notes; not a word of any kind from one negotiator to the other. Nothing in relation to the subject, in the shape of negotiation, is communicated to us. Even the section of the correspondence entitled "Suppression of the slave-trade"—even this section professedly devoted to the subject, contains not a syllable upon it from the negotiators to each other, or to their Governments; but opens and closes with communications from American naval officers, evidently extracted from them by the American negotiator, to justify the forthcoming of preconceived and foregone conclusions. Never, since the art of writing was invented, could there have been a treaty of such magnitude negotiated with such total absence of necessary light upon the history of its formation. Lamenable as is this defect of light upon the formation of the treaty generally, it becomes particularly so at this point, where a stipulation new, delicate, and embarrassing, has been unexpectedly introduced, and falls upon us as abruptly as if it fell from the clouds. In the absence of all appropriate information from the negotiators themselves, I am driven to glean among the scanty paragraphs of the President's Message, and in the answers of the naval officers to the Secretary's inquiries. Though silent as to the origin and progress of the proposition for this novel alliance, they still show the important particular of the motives which caused it. The President says:

"The treaty obligations subsisting between the two countries for the suppression of the African slave-trade, and the complaints made to this Government within the last three or four years (many of them but too well founded) of the visitation, seizure, and detention of American vessels on that coast, by British cruisers, could not but form a delicate and highly important part of the negotiations which have now been held.

"It is known that in December last, a treaty was signed in London, by the representatives of England, France, Russia, Prussia, and Austria, having for its professed object a strong and united effort of the five powers to put an end to the traffic. This treaty was not officially communicated to the Government of the United States, but its provisions and stipulations are supposed to be accurately known to the public. It is understood to be not yet ratified on the part of France.

"No application or request has been made to this Government to become a party to this treaty; but the course it might take in regard to it, has excited no small degree of attention and discussion in Europe, as the principle upon which it is founded, and the stipulations which it contains, have caused warm animadversions and great political excitement.

"In my message at the commencement of the present session of Congress, I endeavored to state the principles which this Government supports respecting the right of search and the immunity of flags. Desirous of maintaining those principles fully, at the same time that existing obligations should be fulfilled, I have thought it most consistent with the honor and dignity of the country, that it should execute its own laws, and perform its own obligations, by its own means and its own power. The examination or visitation of the merchant vessels of one nation, by the cruisers of another, for any purpose, except those known and acknowledged by the law of nations, under whatever restraints or regulations it may take place, may lead to dangerous results. It is far better, by other means, to suppress any supposed necessity, or any motive, for such examination or visit. Interference with a merchant vessel by an armed cruiser, is always a delicate proceeding, apt to touch the point of national honor, as well as to affect the interests of individuals. It has been thought, therefore, expedient, not only in accordance with the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent, but at the same time as removing all pretext on the part of others for violating the immunities of the American flag upon the seas, as they exist and are defined by the laws of nations, to enter into the articles now submitted to the Senate."

The recitals in this paragraph are of momentous importance. They are conclusive to show that the stipulations into which we have entered, are the price which we have agreed to pay for the privilege of going unsearched upon the coast of Africa, and for the favor of not being officially required to join the quintuple alliance for the suppression of the slave-trade. The two first paragraphs are pregnant of these inferences: the concluding sentences of the last paragraph are conclusive of their truth. The first paragraph recites the fact of the seizure, detention, and visitation of our ships on the coast of Africa by British cruisers: the second ambiguously refers to the five powers alliance, and raises surmises of their designs, which it does not satisfy: the concluding sentences of the last paragraph are sufficiently explicit in the declaration that we join Great Britain to avoid a junction with the five powers! and that we search ourselves, to avoid being searched by the British cruisers! Studiously ambiguous, and profuse of phrases to deceive, while stinted of facts to inform, the Message still lets out enough to betray these hidden and momentous meanings. The treaty has not been officially communicated to our Government. But may it not have been unofficially? and if so, by whom? for what purpose? and what are its contents? Instead of answering these pertinent inquiries, so naturally suggested by the declaration of the non-official communication, the sentence obliquely off into the empty supposition that the contents are well known to the public! Why tell us this? why tell us what the public knows? We want to know what the Government knows—how it obtained its information—and what it is required to do. Instead of that, it tells us of the public: and

2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

then flies off to France, and informs us what we well knew before—that France had not signed. All this is foreign to the point. We want to know what concerns ourselves—whether the five powers are occupied with our affairs—and whether they have shown us their treaty—and for what purpose? The Message says: “No application has been made to the United States to become a party to this quintuple alliance, but . . . but . . . but . . . the course we may take is the subject of attention, and discussion, and warmth, and excitement in Europe!” But what all this tends to, and what is required of us to allay this excitement, the Message does not say. Instead of satisfying the curiosity which it excited as to the course of things in relation to us in Europe, it flies back to this continent—reverts to the President’s Message at the commencement of the session—denies the right of search—asserts the immunity of flags—and then most ominously declares that it is better to execute our own laws, and perform our own obligations; and do this by our own means, and by our own power. Why this declaration? Were others about to execute our laws, and perform our obligations, and to use means and powers upon us, not our own? Was this the state of the case? and, if so, why not tell us? Why this paltering and equivocation, unless to hide a damned conclusion which must be suffered, but cannot be told? The next sentence, however, approaches the point. “It is better to supersede the motive and supposed necessity for this delicate and dangerous search.” And, finally, in the last words of the last sentence, the fatal secret is let out—that the articles now before the Senate were entered into for the purpose of “removing all pretext on the part of others for violating the immunities of the American flag in the African seas!” This is the secret; and after this, it stands confessed that our naval and diplomatic alliance with Great Britain is the price which we pay for five years’ exemption from search, and for the favor of not being made a party to the quintuple alliance. The alliance with Great Britain is a substitute for these penalties: and a more ignominious purchase of exemption from outrage never disgraced the annals of an independent nation.

We will now see what is the price we have contracted to pay for these exemptions; and for that purpose I read the 8th and 9th articles of the treaty:

“ARTICLE VIII. The parties mutually stipulate that each shall prepare, equip, and maintain in service, on the coast of Africa, a sufficient and adequate squadron, or naval force of vessels, of suitable numbers and descriptions, to carry in all not less than eighty guns, to enforce separately and respectively the laws, rights, and obligations of each of the two countries, for the suppression of the slave-trade; the said squadrons to be independent of each other, but the two Governments stipulating, nevertheless, to give such orders to the officers commanding their respective forces, as shall enable them most effectually to act in concert and co-operation, upon mutual consultation, as exigencies may arise, for the attainment of the true objects of this article; copies of all such orders to be communicated by each Government to the other respectively.

“ARTICLE IX. Whereas, notwithstanding all efforts which may be made on the coast of Africa for suppressing of the slave-trade, the facilities for carrying on the traffic, and avoiding the vigilance of cruisers by the fraudulent use of flags, and other means, are so great, and the temptations for pursuing it, while a market can be found for slaves, so strong, as that the desired result may be long delayed, unless all markets be shut against the purchase of African negroes; the parties to this treaty agree that they will unite in all becoming representations and remonstrances with any and all powers within whose dominions such markets are allowed to exist; and that they will urge upon all such powers the propriety and duty of closing such markets effectually at once and forever.”

This is the price! naval and diplomatic alliance with Great Britain! And the eleventh article stipulates that the naval alliance is to continue for five years, and afterwards until one of the parties shall give notice for its cessation. Of course Great Britain will never give the notice. Of course, also, the American Administration which makes it, will never give the notice. The alliance is eternal, unless we break down the party which made it. And this is the course of all revolting and dangerous innovations. It is as temporary measures they are introduced. They are continued imperceptibly; and finally made permanent, and fastened irrevocably upon the country. This will be the case with this alliance, unless the elections of 1844 relieve us from the dominion of the party now in power. And now let us see the extent of the obligations we have incurred to purchase this exemption from search, and to be excused from signing the quintuple treaty. They are: First, to prepare, equip, and maintain in service on the coast of Africa, a squadron of “at least” eighty guns, to co-operate with a British squadron in suppressing the slave-trade. Secondly, to unite with Great Britain in diplomatic remonstrances and representations against the purchase of African negroes, with all the powers which still admit such purchases, and urging them to cease the practice, and to close the door against such purchases at once and forever. These are the obligations; and it is seen at once that they constitute an alliance—a double alliance—between the United States and Great Britain. The first sensation of an American in discovering this ominous conjunction, is that of astonishment, indignation, and shame. The farewell words of Washington rush to the mind. He warned us against entangling ourselves in foreign alliance; and here we are deeply entangled, and that with the very nation which, of all the others in the world, is the most to be dreaded. The consequences of this entanglement are beyond the reach of human foresight, or of mental divination. It is the commencement of involving our America, and with it the whole New World, in the systems and vortex of European politics. We begin with going to Africa to join Great Britain, Russia, Prussia, and Austria, (for France declines the favor,) in redressing the grievances of the Old World; after that, it is a natural step for these great powers to come over here to redress the wrongs of the New World. If this fatal policy is suffered to continue; if we go on to mix ourselves in the affairs of Europe; if we quit our own, to stand upon foreign ground; if we hitch our cock-boat to the grand navies of Europe, and tie on our little ministers behind the gorgeous representatives of mighty monarchs;—if we do this, then it is in vain that Providence isolated us, and that Washington warned us. We are doomed to foreign connections, and to foreign interference; and may expect to see the affairs of the two Americas, from Baffin's Bay to Cape Horn, regulated by the sovereign congresses of Vienna, St. Petersburg, and London; and the fleets and armies of Europe sent here to enforce their decrees.

Passing from the political consequences of this entanglement—consequences which no human foresight can reach—I come to the immediate and practical effects which lie within our view, and which display the enormous inexpediency of the measure. First: the expense in money—an item which would seem to be entitled to some regard in the present deplorable state of the treasury—in the present cry for retrenchment—and in the present heavy taxation upon the comforts and necessities of life. This expense for 80 guns will be about $750,000 per annum, exclusive of repairs and loss of lives. I speak of the whole expense, as part of the naval establishment of the United States, and not of the mere expense of working the ships after they have gone to sea. Nine thousand dollars per gun is about the expense of the establishment; 80 guns would be $720,000 per annum, which is $3,600,000 for five years. But the squadron is not limited to a maximum of 80 guns; that is the minimum limit: it is to be 80 guns "at the least." And if the party which granted these 80 shall continue in power, Great Britain may find it as easy to double the number, as it was to obtain the first eighty. Nor is the time limited to five years; it is only determinable after that period by giving notice; a notice not to be expected from those who made the treaty. At the least, then, the moneyed expense is to be $3,600,000; if the present party continues in power, it may double or treble that amount; and this, besides the cost of the ships. Such is the moneyed expense. In ships, the wear and tear of vessels must be great. We are to prepare, equip, and maintain in service, on a coast 4,000 miles from home, the adequate number of vessels to carry these 80 guns. It is not sufficient to send the number there; they must be kept up and maintained in service there; and this will require constant expenses to repair injuries, supply losses, and cover casualties. In the employment of men, and the waste of life and health, the expenditure must be large. Ten men and two officers to the gun, is the smallest estimate that can be admitted. This would require a complement of 960 men. Including all the necessary equipage of the ship, and above 1,000 persons will be constantly required. These are to be employed at a vast distance from home; on a savage coast; in a perilous service; on both sides of the equator; and in a climate which is death to the white race. This waste of men—this wear and tear of life and constitution—should stand for something in a Christian land, and in this age of roaming philanthropy; unless, indeed, in excess of love for the blacks, it is deemed meritorious to destroy the whites. The field of operations for this squadron is great; the term "coast of Africa," having an immense application in the vocabulary of the slave-trade. On the western coast of Africa, according to the replies of the naval officers Bell and Paine, the trade is carried on from Senegal to Cape Frio—a distance of 3,600 miles, following its windings, as the watching squadrons would have to go. But the track of the slavers between Africa and America has to be watched, as well as the immediate coast; and this embraces a space in the ocean of 35 degrees on each side of the equator, (say four thousand miles), and covering the American coast from Cuba to Rio Janeiro; so that the coast of Africa—the western coast alone—embraces a diagram of the ocean of near 4,000 miles every way, having the equator in the centre, and bounded east and west by the New and the Old World. This is for the western coast only: the eastern is nearly as large. The same naval officers say that a large trade in negroes is carried on in the Mahometan countries bordering on the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf, and in the Portuguese East India colonies; and, what is worthy to be told, it is also carried on in the British presidency of Bombay, and other British Asiatic possessions. It is true, the officers say the American slavers are not yet there; but go there they will, according to all the laws of trading and hunting, the moment they are disturbed, or the trade fails, on the western coast. Wherever the trade exists, the combined powers must follow it; for good is not to be done by halves, and philanthropy is not to be circumscribed by coasts and latitudes. Great is the field of enterprise which presents itself to the British-American squadrons; great, also, is the field of labor for their diplomatic restraints. Spain, Portugal, Brazil; Cuba, Porto Rico, and other American islands; the Mahometan, Portuguese, and British possessions in southern Asia;—all these will require the presence of the Anglo-American embassies. Great will be the expense of these embassies; for the ambassadors must not only be paid, but go loaded with costly presents when barbarians

2D SESS.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

are to be treated with. And here the treating is to be double—with the savage negro chiefs who tolerate the sale, and with Christian or Mahometan kings who tolerate the purchase. Even if no unlucky consequence supervenes, the expense of these embassies must still be great; but if our ministers chance to be assassinated by the negro chief, or insulted by the Christian or Mahometan king—what then? Shall we resent the injury, at a good loss of men and money? or shall we count the cost, and pocket the outrage? What if the Emperor of Brazil, boy as he is; or the Queen of Spain, child as she is; or the Queen of Portugal, lady as she is, should give our minister advice to return home, and free his own country from slaves before he went about to close the markets of the world against them? True, there is a difference between purchasing, and the purchased. The intellect can detect the difference. But still it is a case for a sarcasm, and for an insult; and the American minister who should go upon these expeditions, should look out for answers very different from what may be given to the representative of Great Britain. She, having liberated her own slaves, may stand up and speak. But how will it be with the American minister, when he commences rehearsing his remonstrance? This business of remonstrating is a delicate operation between individuals; more so when a sovereign is in the case; and becomes exceedingly critical when the remonstrant is about in the condition himself which he attacks in others. Among all the strange features in the comedy of errors which has ended in this treaty, that of sending American ministers abroad, to close the markets of the world against the slave-trade, is the most striking. Not content with the expenses, loss of life, and political entanglements of this alliance, we must electioneer for insults, and send ministers abroad to receive, pocket, and bring them home.

In what circumstances do we undertake all this fine work? What is our condition at home, while thus going abroad in search of employment? We raise 1,000 men for foreign service, while reducing our little army at home! We send ships to the coast of Africa, while dismounting our dragoons on the frontiers of Missouri and Arkansas! We protect Africa from slave-dealers, and abandon Florida to savage butchery! We send cannon, shot, shells, powder, lead, bombs, and balls, to Africa, while denying arms and ammunition to the young men who go to Florida! We give food, clothes, pay, to the men who go to Africa, and deny rations even to those who go to Florida! We cry out for retrenchment, and scatter $8,600,000 at one broad cast of the hand! We tax tea and coffee, and send the money to Africa! We are borrowing, and taxing, and striking paper money, and reducing expenses at home, when engaging in this new and vast expense for the defence of Africa! What madness and folly! Has Don Quixote come, to life, and placed himself at the head of our Government, and taken the negroes of Africa instead of the damsels of Spain, for the objects of his chivalrous protection?

One more view of this eighty-gun squadron, and I dismiss it from my speech.

I am no man to invoke our constitution on every petty occasion, and to eke out all arguments with a cry of violation of that sacred instrument. The Salaminian galley was only launched on great occasions. I am slow to cheapen our constitution by appealing to it in doubtful or frivolous circumstances. But it does seem to me that here there is room neither for doubt nor frivolity; and that the raising this squadron for the defence of Africa, and for the redress of moral evils in that remote region, is an act wholly without the pale of our constitution. To Congress alone it belongs to raise fleets—and that, for the defence of our own country: but here is a fleet to be raised, not by Congress, but by the President, the Senate, and the Queen of Great Britain; and this fleet for the defence, not of these confederated States, but of African tribes; and for the suppression, not of political, but of moral evils. It does seem to me that Congress itself could have no power to do this—still less the President, Senate, and Queen Victoria. To provide and maintain navies, is a power specially granted to Congress: it is a legislative power—and properly so; because, with us, the questions of war and peace, of fleets and armies, of loans and taxes, are all legislative powers, and peculiarly under the charge of the people's immediate representatives. It will not do to deceive ourselves by analogies to other governments. Ours is a government of limitations, and of separate departments. Each department must keep within its own sphere. It must not transcend its own limits—much less invade those of another. The treaty-making power is a distinct power, and its acts are the supreme law of the land. But it is not every thing which the President and Senate, and a foreign prince, or an Indian chief, may choose to insert in a treaty, that is this supreme law. Were it so, there would soon be no power in our country but that of the President and Senate, acting with some foreign kings, or with savage tribes. To gain this character of supreme law, or even of law at all, the subject-matter of the treaty must be within the competency of the treaty-making power: it must be a subject for treaty regulation, and not for legislative, judicial, or executive action. And this competency must be tried by our own constitution, and not by the constitutions or practices of European monarchs. What is fit matter for treaty regulation in one country, is not so in another; and in no country is the treaty-making power more limited and circumscribed than in our own. The mass of the powers of our Government are given to Congress; and whatever is given to Congress is taken away from all other powers. Now, apply these principles to the act in question. This treaty stipulates to prepare, equip, and maintain a squadron—to keep it up for five years, and afterwards, until the President of the United States, or the British Government, gives notice for it to be withdrawn—to employ it, in conjunction with a British squadron, for the defence of Africans, and for suppressing the moral evil of slave-taking; the squadron to be of eighty guns at the least. Now, the preparing, equipping, and maintaining in service this squadron, is a legislative act, specifically given by the constitution to Congress. Thus far, it is an invasion of the legislative department. All the rest is sheer usurpation, such as Congress itself could not make legal. Congress itself cannot create a squadron for five years; for the same, or another Congress, may repeal the law. It cannot make the continuance of the squadron dependent upon the will of the President, or of a foreign prince; but it must depend upon the will of Congress itself. It cannot raise fleets for objects foreign to the objects of the Union—as the defence of Africa; or for redressing moral wrongs—as the suppression of the African custom of selling one another; but the fleet must be raised for the defence of the Union, or of the rights and interests of its citizens abroad. Thus, the treaty stipulation for this squadron is, in its first step, an invasion of the legislative authority, and is void: in every subsequent step, it is sheer usurpation, and such as Congress could not legalize if it would. I wish to be understood; and what I mean to say is, that Congress itself cannot legalize this treaty!—that Congress itself cannot raise this squadron for five years, for this foreign object!

The constitution names this subject, and gives to Congress a certain degree of power over it: it was to prohibit the importation of slaves after the year 1808. That power has been exercised; it has been exhausted; and it is fair to infer that it was all that was intended to be granted. In a government of limited powers, when a certain quantum is given, it is all that is to be taken. In this case, the authority to prohibit the importation of slaves after a given period, was an authority obtained by compromise, and after much hesitation and difficulty in the convention. It was a long time before even this much, on a subject so differently viewed in different sections of the Union, could be agreed upon. After this, is it to be supposed that a clause could have been obtained to clothe Congress—to clothe the representatives of the people themselves, much less the President, Senate, and a foreign prince—with power to raise fleets for terms of years, to put down the slave-trade in Africa itself? Certainly not! No one that reads the Madison Papers on this head can suppose, for an instant, that this power ever would have been granted. Then how is it obtained? By assuming the illimitability, as well as the supremacy of the treaty-making power! by assuming that that power is as large here as it is in Great Britain!

by assuming that it may absorb the legislative power—that it may transcend the legislative power—that it may do what Congress can do, and what Congress cannot—that it may employ arms for the suppression of moral evils, and send the ships and armies of the United States quixoting through the world to redress the wrongs of the human race. As part of the treaty-making power, I, for one, deny the constitutionality of this squadron engagement; and shall vote against the ratification of this treaty. As part of the legislative power, I again deny its constitutionality; and shall vote against the appropriations to carry it into effect. I shall have two chances at the unconstitutional, dangerous, and improvident scheme; and shall make the best use of both. I will fight the appropriations annually, through so many of the five years they are to continue as I shall have to remain here.

But it is not so much on this floor, as in the other end of the Capitol, that these appropriations should be fought. That duty belongs especially to the immediate Representatives of the people. If they give up to these eighty guns, and five years, and this redress of moral wrongs in Africa, they give up every thing. The President and Senate, with a king or a savage that can sign a writing and call it a treaty, may send as many ships as they please, to as many countries as they please, for as many years as they please, and for any object that suits the pleasure or interest of the moment.

I proceed to the third subject and last article in the treaty—the article which stipulates for the mutual surrender of fugitive criminals.

This is a subject long since considered in our country, and on which we have the benefit both of wise opinions and of some experience. Mr. Jefferson explored the whole subject when he was Secretary of State under President Washington, and came to the conclusion that these surrenders could only be made under three limitations: 1. Between coterminous countries. 2. For high offences. 3. A special provision against political offenders. Under these limitations, as far back as the year 1793, Mr. Jefferson proposed to Great Britain and Spain (the only countries with which we held coterminous dominions, and only for their adjacent provinces) a mutual delivery of fugitive criminals. His proposition was in these words:

“Any person having committed murder of malice prepenze, not of the nature of treason, or forgery, within the United States or the Spanish provinces adjoining thereto, and fleeing from the justice of the country, shall be delivered up by the Government where he shall be found, to that from which he fled, whenever demanded by the same.”

This was the proposition of that great statesman: and how different from those which we find in this treaty! Instead of being confined to coterminous dominions, the jurisdiction of the country is taken for the theatre of the crime; and that includes, on the part of Great Britain, possessions all over the world, and every ship on every sea that sails under her flag. Instead of being confined to two offences of high degree—murder and forgery—one against life, the other against property—this article extends to seven offences; some of which may be incurred for a shilling's worth of property, and another of them without touching or injuring a human being. Instead of a special provision in favor of political offenders, the insurgent or rebel may be given up for murder, and then hanged and quartered for treason; and in the long catalogue of seven offences, a charge may be made, and an ex parte case established, against any political offender which the British Government shall choose to pursue.

To palliate this article, and render it more acceptable to us, we are informed that it is copied from the 27th article of Mr. Jay's treaty. That apology for it, even if exactly true, would be but a poor recommendation of it to the people of the United States. Mr. Jay's treaty was no favorite with the American people, and especially with that part of the people which constituted the Republican party. Least of all was this 27th article a favorite with them. It was under that article that the famous Jonathan Robbins, alias Thomas Nash, was surrendered—a surrender which contributed largely to the defeat of Mr. Adams, and the overthrow of the Federal party in 1800. The apology would be poor, if true: but it happens to be not exactly true. The article in the Webster treaty differs widely from the one in Jay's treaty—and all for the worse. The imitation is far worse than the original—about as much worse as modern Whiggery is worse than ancient Federalism. Here are the two articles; let us compare them:

MR. WEBSTER'S TREATY.

Article 10.

"It is agreed that the United States and her Britannic Majesty shall, upon mutual requisitions by them, or their ministers, officers, or authorities, respectively made, deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with the crime of murder, or assault with intent to commit murder, or piracy, or arson, or robbery, or forgery, or the utterance of forged papers committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum, or shall be found, within the territories of the other: provided, that this shall only be done upon such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, could justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the crime or offence had there been committed; and the respective judges and other magistrates shall have power, jurisdiction, and authority, upon complaint made under oath, to issue a warrant for the apprehension of the fugitive or person so charged, that he may be brought before such judges, or other magistrates, respectively, to the end that the evidence of criminality may be heard and considered; and if, on such hearing, the evidence be deemed sufficient to sustain the charge, it shall be the duty of the examining judge, or magistrate, to certify the same to the proper executive authority, that a warrant may issue for the surrender of such fugitive. The expense of such apprehension and delivery shall be borne and defrayed by the party who makes the requisition, and receives the fugitive."

MR. JAY'S TREATY.

Article 27.

"It is further agreed that his Majesty and the United States, on mutual requisitions by them, respectively, or by their respective ministers, or officers, authorized to make the same, will deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with murder, or forgery, committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum within any of the countries of the other: provided, that this shall only be done on such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the offence had there been committed. The expense of such apprehension and delivery shall be borne and defrayed by those who make the requisition, and receive the fugitive."

These are the two articles, and the difference between them is great and striking. First, the number of offences for which delivery of the offender is to be made, is much greater in the present treaty. Mr. Jay's article is limited to two offences—murder and forgery: the two proposed by Mr. Jefferson; but without his qualification to exclude political offences, and to confine the deliveries to offenders from coterminous dominions. The present treaty embraces these two, and five others; making seven in the whole. The five added offences are—assault, with intent to commit murder; piracy; robbery; arson; and the utterance of forged paper. These additional five offences, though high in name, might be very small in degree. Assault, with intent to murder, might be without touching or hurting any person; for, to lift a weapon at a person within striking distance, without striking, is an assault: to level a firearm at a person within carrying distance, and without firing, is an assault; and the offence being in the intent, is difficult of proof. Mr. Jefferson excluded it, and so did Mr. Jay's treaty; because the offence was too small and too equivocal to be made a matter of international arrangement. Piracy was excluded, because it was absurd to speak of a pirate's country. He has no country. He is hostis humani generis—the enemy of the human race; and is hung wherever he is caught. The robbery might be of a shilling's worth of bread; the arson, of burning a straw shed; the utterance of forged paper, might be the emission or passing of a counterfeit sixpence. All these were excluded from Jay's treaty, because of their possible insignificance, and the door they opened to abuse in harassing the innocent, and in multiplying the chances for getting hold of a political offender for some other offence, and then punishing him for his politics.

Striking as these differences are between the

August, 1842.]

The British Treaty.

[37TH CONG.]

present article and that of Mr. Jay's treaty; there is still more essential difference in another part; and a difference which nullifies the article in its only material bearing in our favor. It is this: Mr. Jay's treaty referred the delivery of the fugitive to the executive power. This treaty intervenes the Judiciary, and requires two decisions from a judge or magistrate before the Governor can act. This nullifies the treaty in all that relates to fugitive slaves guilty of crimes against their masters. In the eye of the British law, they have no master, and can commit no offence against such a person in asserting their liberty against him, even unto death. A slave may kill his master, if necessary to his escape. This is legal under British law; and, in the present state of abolition feeling throughout the British dominions, such killing would not only be considered fair, but in the highest degree meritorious and laudable. What chance for the recovery of such a slave under this treaty? Read it—the concluding part—after the word “committed,” and see what is the process to be gone through. Complaint is to be made to a British judge or justice. The fugitive is brought before this judge or justice, that the evidence of the criminality may be heard and considered—such evidence as would justify the apprehension, commitment, and trial of the party, if the offence had been committed there. If, upon this hearing, the evidence be deemed sufficient to sustain the charge, the judge or magistrate is to certify the fact to the executive authority; and then, and not until then, the surrender can be made. This is the process; and in all this the new treaty differs from Jay's. Under his treaty, the delivery was a ministerial act, referring itself to the authority of the Governor: under this treaty, it becomes a judicial act, referring itself to the discretion of the judge, who must twice decide against the slave (first, in issuing the warrant; and next, in trying it) before the Governor can order the surrender. Twice judicial discretion interposes a barrier, which cannot be forced; and behind which the slave, who has robbed or killed his master, may repose in safety. What evidence of criminality will satisfy the judge, when the act itself is no crime in his eyes, or under his laws, and when all his sympathies are on the side of the slave? What chance would there be for the judicial surrender of offending slaves in the British dominions, under this treaty, when the provisions of our own constitution, within the States of our own Union in relation to fugitive slaves, cannot be executed? We all know that a judicial trial is immunity to a slave pursued by his owner, in many of our own States. Can such trials be expected to result better for the owner in the British dominion, where the relation of master and slave is not admitted, and where abolitionism is the policy of the Government, the voice of the law, and the spirit of the people? Killing his master in defence of his liberty is no offence in the eye of British law or British people; and no slave will ever be given up for it.

[Mr. WINGATE here said, that counterfeiting American securities, or bank notes, was no offence in Canada; and the same question might arise there in relation to forgery.]

Mr. BENTON resumed. Better far to leave things as they are. Forgers are now given up in Canada, by Executive authority, when they fly to that province. This is done in the spirit of good neighborhood; and because all honest Governments have an interest in suppressing crimes, and repelling criminals. The Governor acts from a sense of propriety, and the dictates of decency and justice. Not so with the judge. He must go by the law; and when there is no law against the offence, he has nothing to justify him in delivering the offender.

Conventions for the mutual surrender of large offenders, where dominions are coterminous, might be proper. Limited, as proposed by Mr. Jefferson in 1793, and they might be beneficial in suppression of border crimes and the preservation of order and justice. But extended as this is to a long list of offenders—unrestricted as it is in the case of murder—applying to dominions in all parts of the world, and to ships in every sea,—it can be nothing but the source of individual annoyance and national recrimination. Besides, if we surrender to Great Britain, why not to Russia, Prussia, Austria, France, and all the countries of the world? If we give up the Irishman to England, why not the Pole to Russia, the Italian to Austria, the German to his prince; and so on throughout the catalogue of nations! Sir, the article is a pestiferous one; and as it is determinable upon notice, it will become the duty of the American people to elect a President who will give the notice, and so put an end to its existence.

Addressing itself to the natural feelings of the country, against high crimes and border offenders, and in favor of political liberty, the Message of the President communicating and recommending this treaty to us, carefully presents this article as conforming to our feelings in all these particulars. It is represented as applicable only to high crimes—to border offenders; and to offences not political. In all this, the Message is disingenuous and deceptive, and calculated to ravish from the ignorant and the thoughtless an applause to which the treaty is not entitled. It says:

“The surrender to justice of persons who, having committed high crimes, seek an asylum in the territories of a neighboring nation, would seem to be an act due to the cause of general justice, and properly belonging to the present state of civilization and intercourse. The British provinces of North America are separated from the States of the Union by a line of several thousand miles; and along portions of this line, the amount of population on either side is quite considerable, while the passage of the boundary is always easy.

D. SESS.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

"Offenders against the law on the one side transfer themselves to the other. Sometimes, with great difficulty, they are brought to justice; but very often they wholly escape. A consciousness of immunity, from the power of avoiding justice in this way, instigates the unprincipled and reckless to the commission of offences; and the peace and good neighborhood of the border are consequently often disturbed.

"In the case of offenders fleeing from Canada to the United States, the Governors of States are often applied to for their surrender; and questions of a very embarrassing nature arise on these applications. It has been thought highly important, therefore, to provide for the whole case by a proper treaty stipulation. The title on the subject, in the proposed treaty, is carefully confined to such offences as all mankind are to regard as heinous and destructive of the security of life and of property. In this careful and specific enumeration of crimes, the object has been to exclude all political offences, or criminal charges arising from wars or intestine commotions. Treason, misprision of treason, libels, desertion from military service, and other offences of a similar character, are excluded."

In these phrases the Message recommends the article to the Senate and the country; and nothing could be more fallacious and deceptive than such a recommendation. It confines the surrender to border offenders—Canadian fugitives; yet the treaty extends it to all persons committing offences under the "jurisdiction" of Great Britain—a term which includes all her territory throughout the world, and every ship or fort over which her flag waves. The Message confines the surrender to high crimes; yet we have seen that the treaty includes crimes which may be of low degree—low indeed! A hare or a partridge on a preserve; a loaf of bread to sustain life; a sixpenny counterfeit note passed; a shed burnt; a weapon lifted, without striking! The Message says all political crimes, all treasons, misprision of treason, libels, and desertions are excluded. The treaty shows that these offences are not excluded—that the limitations proposed by Mr. Jefferson are not inserted; and, consequently, under the head of murder, the insurgent, the rebel, and the traitor, who has shed blood, may be given up; and so of other offences. When once surrendered, he may be tried for any thing. The fate of Jonathan Robbins, alias Nash, is a good illustration of all this.* He was a British sailor—was guilty of mutiny, murder, and piracy, on the frigate Hermione—deserted to the United States—was demanded by the British minister as a murderer under Jay's treaty—given up as a murderer—then tried by a court-martial on board a man-of-war for mutiny, murder, desertion, and piracy—found guilty—executed—and his body hung in chains from the yard-arm of a man-of-war. And so it would be again. The man given up for one offence, would be tried for another; and in the number and insignificance of the offences for which he might be surrendered, there would be no difficulty in reaching any victim that a foreign Government chose to pursue. If this article had been in force in the time of the Irish rebellion; and Lord Edward Fitzgerald had escaped to the United States, after wounding, as he did, several of the myrmidons who arrested him, he might have been demanded as a fugitive from justice, for the assault with intent to kill; and then tried for treason, and hanged and quartered; and such will be the operation of the article if it continues.

The article is improper in itself; unequal in its operation; intended to give the British the right of demanding all fugitives, or emigrants from all parts of her dominions, and all her ships; intended to authorize their arrest for desertion for political offences, under the guise of reclaiming them for crimes; worth nothing to us on the two main points of fugitive slaves and forgers; and actually putting us in a worse condition than we were in without this agreement. Lord Ashburton says it cannot take effect in England without an act of Parliament to sanction it. I have not examined the question; but would suppose that if an act of Parliament were necessary in England to give it validity, an act of Congress would be equally necessary here for the same purpose. In that event, the Representatives of the people may yet save an immense emigrant population from the persecutions and annoyance to which political offenders as well as criminals, and the innocent as well as the guilty, may be subjected under this renewed and aggravated edition of one of the worst parts of Jay's treaty.

I have done with the consideration of this article; and with it, I have done with my detailed and special objections to the contents of the treaty. Other general objections I have to it, and so stated at the opening of my speech. Besides the leading general objection, that this treaty was not a settlement of all matters in dispute; that it settled what concerned Great Britain and the Northern States; and was, in fact, a virtual separate treaty with those States;—besides this objection, which I have stated at large, there were other general objections which I have barely named, and will now proceed to state more fully.

1. The employment of a sole negotiator in a business of such magnitude and variety, and one who had not been approved by the Senate for this purpose. The negotiations embraced

* "He (President Adams) considers an offence committed on board a public ship of war on the high seas, to have been committed within the jurisdiction of the nation to which the ship belongs. Nash is charged, it is understood, with piracy and murder on board the British frigate Hermione, on the high seas, and, consequently, within the jurisdiction of his Britannic Majesty; and, therefore, by the 9th article of the treaty of amity with Great Britain, Nash ought to be delivered up as requested by the British minister, provided such evidence of his criminality be produced as, by the laws of the United States, or of South Carolina, where the fugitive was, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had been committed within the United States."—(Mr. Pickens's letter to the British Minister, Mr. Liston, surrendering Robbins, alias Nash, by order of President Adams.)

August, 1842.]

The British Treaty.

[27th CONG.]

the most important concerns, and the most various—some peculiar to sectional divisions of the Union, as the boundary, to the North; the liberation and enticement of slaves, to the South; the Columbia River, to the West; and then to the Union in general, in the important questions of impressment, of search, and of the insult at Schlosser. Such varied and important interests required several commissioners on the part of the United States; and they specially approved by the Senate for this purpose. Never, in the annals of our history, was such a negotiation before committed to a single hand. In all previous administrations, Federal or Republican, where great questions were at stake, several ministers were appointed, and they taken from different parts of the Union, and from both political parties. Witness the three ministers in France (Marshall, Pinckney, and Gerry) in Mr. J. Adams's time; the two ministers to England (Mr. Rufus King and Mr. Monroe) in Mr. Jefferson's time; the five ministers to Ghent (Messrs. J. Q. Adams, Bayard, Olney, Russell, and Gallatin) in Mr. Madison's time; and numerous other instances, within the recollection of all. The present occasion was as important as any of these; for, besides embracing so many, and such various questions, it also involved, as we are constantly told, the great question of peace or war! If the British Government chose to confide its interests to a single negotiator, that was no rule for us. It is a monarchy; and concentration is its principle. We are a confederacy of Republics; and diffusion is our tendency. The monarchy and the monarchical Government is alone to be consulted in Great Britain. The State Governments, the political parties, the sectional divisions, are all to be considered here; and certainly there never was a time when an Administration was more bound to defer to the States, to the sections, and the parties. Having no State, no section, and no party to support it, it was little able to disregard the claims of justice, and the observances of propriety towards any. It is to no purpose to say, It is no matter: the Senate has the control; it can reject. This is idle. We know that treaties are confirmed, that not a single Senator would recommend; that various influences are brought to bear upon the ratification of a treaty; and that ratification is no test of its merits. No. The security is in precaution—in preventive remedies—in taking care to secure a safe treaty beforehand; and not in the rejection by the Senate afterwards. In this case, the employment of a single negotiator was unjustifiable. The occasion was great, and required several, both for safety and for satisfaction. The negotiation was here. Our country is full of able men. Two other negotiators might have been joined without delay, without trouble, and almost without expense. The British also had another negotiator here, (Mr. Fox;) a minister of whom I can say, without disparagement to any other, that, in the two and twenty years which I have sat in this Senate, and had occasion to know the foreign ministers, I have never known his superior for intelligence, dignity, attention to his business, fidelity to his own Government, and decorum to ours. Why not add Mr. Fox to Lord Ashburton, unless to prevent an associate being given to Mr. Webster? Was it arranged in London that the whole negotiation should be between two, and that these two should act without a witness, and without notes or minutes of their conferences? Be this as it may, the effect is the same; and all must condemn this solitary business between two ministers, when the occasion so imperiously demanded several.

2. The assumption of the Secretary negotiator to treat the boundaries of the republic established by the war of the Revolution, as matter of bargain and sale—of gifts and equivalents—in the hands of the negotiators. This was done, and in the whole extent of the boundary. In his very first letter to Lord Ashburton—in his brief note of the 17th of June, acknowledging the receipt of his Lordship's very first note, and in announcing his own authority to treat—our negotiator throws up the whole question of rights under the treaty of '83, declares for a conventional line, and invites a negotiation upon the basis of grants and equivalents—the very thing which he had condemned in the award. This is what he says in his note—bear him:

"Lord Ashburton having been charged by the Queen's Government with full powers to negotiate and settle all matters in discussion between the United States and England; and having, on his arrival at Washington, announced that, in relation to the question of the North-eastern boundary of the United States, he was authorized to treat for a conventional line, or line by agreement, on such terms and conditions, and with such mutual considerations and equivalents, as might be thought just and equitable; and that he was ready to enter upon a negotiation for such conventional line, so soon as this Government should say that it was authorized and ready on its part to commence such negotiation,—the undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States has now the honor to acquaint his Lordship by direction of the President, that the undersigned is ready, on behalf of the Government of the United States, and duly authorized to proceed to the consideration of such conventional line, or line by agreement; and will be happy to have an interview on that subject, at his Lordship's convenience."

[Mr. Webster to Lord Ashburton, June 11.]

To this most obliging proposition—which gave up the whole question!—the British minister very naturally and very promptly (i. e. on the same day) returned a note of acceptance, fully accepting what the Secretary offered. The note is in these terms:

"The undersigned, plenipotentiary of her Britannic Majesty in an extraordinary and special mission to the United States of America, has the honor of acknowledging, with much satisfaction, the communication received this day from Mr.

[In SENATE.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

Webster, Secretary of State of the United States, that he is ready, on behalf of the United States, and duly authorized, in relation to the question of the North-eastern boundary of the United States, to proceed to the consideration of a conventional line, or line by agreement, on such terms and conditions, and with such mutual considerations and equivalents, as might be thought just and equitable. And in reply to Mr. Webster's invitation to the undersigned to fix some time for their first conference upon this subject, he begs to propose to call on Mr. Webster, at the Department of State, to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, for this purpose, should that time be perfectly convenient to Mr. Webster."

[Lord Ashburton to Mr. Webster, June 17.]

Here is acceptance, quick and cordial, with a time and place named for the first conference. The Secretary agrees to the time and place mentioned; and immediately (to wit: on the same aforesaid 17th day of June) writes back to the British minister as follows:

"The Secretary of State will have great pleasure in seeing Lord Ashburton at twelve o'clock to-morrow, as proposed by him."

This was rapid work, and long will this day—THIS FRIDAY, JUNE 17, 1842—be remembered and noted in the annals of this confederacy. In the Roman calendar, it would have had a place among their unlucky days. Its memory would have been perpetuated by a black monument; and most appropriate it will be for us to mark all the new boundaries of Maine with black stones, and veil with black the statue of the god Terminus, degraded from the mountain which overlooked Quebec, to the humble valley which grows potatoes.

Let us mark this black Friday. On that day the question of national boundary was settled!—and settled by giving it up! and given up before the first conference! A conventional boundary was agreed to, in violation of the Senate's decision in the case of the awarded line, and in contradiction to the negotiator's recorded principles on that occasion. The King of the Netherlands awarded a conventional line: it was rejected, because it was conventional; and now two conventional lines—the same, and another far worse—are agreed upon; and agreed upon before the first conference, and by the negotiator who was potential in reverting President Jackson from accepting the first. The new boundaries thus agreed upon must be, and ought to be, repugnant and humiliating to the American feeling. But humiliation and repugnance are not all; danger and mischief follow in the rear. Five hundred miles of first-rate smuggling ground is added to the 1,500 miles of northern smuggling boundary which we already possessed. Passamaquoddy Bay is converted into a great naval station, for the scourge of our coast in time to come by British steamers. Halifax and Quebec are united, and a new military frontier created, in which Great Britain exults and Maine mourns.

3. The omission to keep protocols; and the mystery and doubt which hang over the origin and progress of the different propositions, and the degrees by which they ripened into their ultimate form. This neglect, or omission, as we have already seen, was total and invariable. It pervaded every part of the negotiation; and the correspondence which has been communicated to us—incomplete as it is, in leaving wholly unmentioned several subjects of the negotiation—has all the air of an after performance—the air of an arranged correspondence to justify foregone conclusions. All the main work seems to have been done tête-à-tête, without a witness to hear it, or pen to note it. Never, since diplomacy began, and the art of writing was invented, was a negotiation of such moment, or of any moment, so tracklessly conducted! At the same time, the occasion was one which required ample minutes to be taken, a faithful record to be kept, and explanations of every thing to be given. Sole negotiator—immense interests—various questions—half of them pretermitted, the others sacrificed. Surely such things required protocols—many protocols; yet we have not one; and the justificatory Message drawn up for the President, and signed by him without a verification of facts, is replete with unfounded suggestions and insidious recommendations, only calculated to impose on the ignorant. I present this omission to keep minutes of the conferences as a fatal objection to the treaty, and a departure from propriety not to be tolerated. We have a right to see the progress of a negotiation, and this is the first instance in which that right has been violated.

4. The assumption of the American negotiator to act for the British negotiator, in presenting the British proposition for the Maine boundary as the American proposition; and the unjustifiable and unfounded arguments with which he pressed that proposition upon the Maine commissioners, until he extorted from them a reluctant, painful, conditional acquiescence, which was immediately treated as an absolute consent. This is a most serious objection, and requires to be proved as soon as stated. So, here is the proof:

"GENTLEMEN: You have had an opportunity of reading Lord Ashburton's note to me of the 11th July. Since that date, I have had full and frequent conferences with him respecting the Eastern boundary, and believe I understand what is practicable to be done on that subject, so far as he is concerned. In these conferences, he has made no positive or binding proposition; though, perhaps, it would be more desirable, under present circumstances, that such proposition should proceed from the United States. I have reason to believe, however, that he would agree to a line of boundary between the United States and the British provinces of Canada and New Brunswick, such as is described in a paper accompanying this, (marked B.,) and identified by my signature.

"The line suggested, with the compensations and equivalents which have been stated, is now submitted for your consideration. That it is all which might have been hoped for, looking to the strength of the American claim, can hardly be said. But, as the settlement of a controversy of such duration is a matter of high importance; as equivalents of undoubted value are offered; as longer postponement and delay would lead to further inconvenience, and to the incurring of further expenses; and as no better occasion, or perhaps any other occasion, for settling the boundary by agreement, and on the principles of equivalents, is ever likely to present itself, the Government of the United States hopes that the commissioners of the two States will find it to be consistent with their duty to assent to the line proposed, and to the terms and conditions attending the proposition.

"The President has felt the deepest anxiety for an amicable settlement of the question in a manner honorable to the country, and such as should preserve the rights and interests of the States concerned. From the moment of the announcement of Lord Ashburton's mission, he has sedulously endeavored to pursue a course the most respectful towards the States, and the most useful to their interests, as well as the most becoming to the character and dignity of the Government. He will be happy if the result shall be such as shall satisfy Maine and Massachusetts, as well as the rest of the country. With these sentiments on the part of the President, and with the conviction that no more advantageous arrangement can be made, this subject is now referred to the grave deliberation of the commissioners."—Mr. Webster to the Maine commissioners, July 15.

This extract shows, in express terms, that the American Secretary of State presented the British proposition for the Maine boundary; that he not only presents it, but brings both the British and American Governments to bear upon Maine, to coerce her submission. The paper marked B, identified by the Secretary's signature, is evidently from the British legation; and is the precise writing, word for word, which now constitutes the first article of the treaty. The American Government is made to express its desire for the acceptance of the boundary designated in that paper; and then a train of the most extraordinary argument is addressed to Maine, in which the Secretary evidently speaks for Great Britain. First, he speaks of the equivalents which Maine is to receive, and declares them to be of undoubted value. What are they? The half of $800,000 for the two conventional lines and the two territorial losses! when President Jackson had proposed a million and a quarter of dollars (one million of acres of good land in Michigan) as a compensation to Maine for one of these lines and one of these losses only; and that offer had been spurned by the present negotiator. He now adds 110 miles of new boundary, and 572,000 acres of new territorial loss; reduces the equivalent from $1,250,000 to $150,000, and then presses it upon Maine as an equivalent of undoubted value. And this is all she gets; for the navigation of the St. John, due to Maine under the laws of nations, is balanced by navigation conferred, as well as received. The Secretary then goes on to threaten Maine with war, if she does not submit to his British proposition. He warns her that no better occasion—no other occasion—for settling the boundary by agreement, and for equivalents, is ever likely to happen; he tells her that no arrangement more advantageous can be made; and then submits the proposition, as a unit, without alteration or amendment, to the grave deliberation of the commissioners. Now, my first objection to all this, is a threat of war to coerce Maine; for what else can be understood from this last chance for settling by agreement, and for equivalents, and that no better arrangement can be had? What is this but saying to Maine, that if you do not accept this settlement of the boundary, it will be settled without agreement, and without equivalents, and in a more disadvantageous manner!—that is to say, it will be settled by war, and you will be flogged into submission. This is the plain import of the Secretary's language; and here we have the root and origin of that Walpole cry of war—that craven cry—which has been made to resound through the land. The same threat which was made to Maine, is made to us; and, like her commissioners, we are desired to take the proposition into our grave deliberation. The next objection I have to this threat is that it is false; for we all know that Great Britain not only agreed to better terms than these for us, but demanded them; and made it matter of remonstrance that we refused them. Speak of the King of the Netherlands' award. That award was infinitely better for us; and it was not only accepted by the British, but insisted upon; and its non-execution on our part was made a subject of remonstrance and complaint against us. After this, can any one believe that the "peace-mission" was sent out to make war upon us if we did not yield up near double as much as she then demanded? No, sir! there is no truth in this cry of war. It is only a phantom conjured up for the occasion. From Jackson and Van Buren the British would gladly have accepted the awarded boundary: the Federalists prevented it, and even refused a new negotiation. Now, the same Federalists have yielded double as much, and are thanking God that the British condescend to accept it. Such is Federalism: and the British well knew their time, and their men, when they selected the present moment to send their special mission; to double their demands, and to use arguments successfully, which would have been indignantly repelled when a Jackson or a Van Buren was at the head of the Government—or, rather, would never have been used to such Presidents. The conduct of our Secretary-negotiator is inexplicable. He rejects the award, because it dismembers Maine; votes against new negotiations with England; and announces himself ready to shoulder a musket and march to the highland boundary, and there fight his death for it. This was under Jackson's administration. He now becomes negotiator himself; gives up the highland boundary in the first

2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

note; gives up all that was awarded by the King of the Netherlands; gives up 110 miles on this side of that award; gives up the mountain barrier which covered Maine, and commanded the Halifax road to Quebec; gives $500,000 for Rouse's Point, which the King of the Netherlands gave us for nothing; becomes the agent of the British minister in presenting the new boundary to the Maine commissioners; and crowns all this inexplicable conduct by keeping no record of his proceedings, and using threats and menaces which no English gentleman would have used, and which were as false in fact as they were insolent in spirit. I say this conduct is inexplicable! I shall publish what I say, and defy the Secretary and his friends to explain his conduct.

This is sufficient to prove my assertion that the American negotiator became the champion of the British Government; that he offered the British proposition as the American proposition; that he brought both Governments to bear upon Maine, in order to force her to accept it; and that he used arguments to accomplish his purpose, which were unjustifiable and untrue. The proof in his own letter is sufficient; but the answer of the Maine commissioners seals it; and here is that answer:

"The undersigned, commissioners of the State of Maine on the subject of the North-eastern boundary, have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note, addressed to them under date of the 15th instant, with enclosures therein referred to. The proposition first submitted by the special minister of Great Britain, on the subject of the boundary, having been disagreed to; and the proposition made on the part of the United States, with the assent of the commissioners of Maine and Massachusetts, having been rejected as inadmissible, coupled with an expression of surprise that it should have been made; and Lord Ashburton, in the same communication, having intimated a preference for conference rather than correspondence, and having omitted in his note to make any new proposition, except a qualified withdrawal of a part of its former one; we learn from your note that you have had full and frequent conferences with him respecting the north-eastern boundary, and that you believe you understand what is practicable to be done on that subject, so far as he (Lord Ashburton) is concerned." We also learn that "in these conferences he has made no positive or binding proposition; thinking, perhaps, it would be more desirable, under present circumstances, that such a proposition should proceed from the side of the United States;" but that you have reason to believe that he would agree to a line of boundary such as is described in the paper accompanying your note, marked B., and also, that you entertain the conviction "that no more advantageous arrangement can be made;" and, with this conviction, you refer the subject to the grave deliberation of the commissioners.

"Regarding this as substantially a proposition on the part of the United States, with the knowledge and assent of Great Britain, and as the one most favorable to us which, under any circumstances, the latter Government would either offer or accept, the undersigned have not failed to bestow upon it the grave deliberation and consideration which its nature and importance, and their ever responsible position, demand.

"We are now given to understand that the Executive of the United States, representing the sovereignty of the Union, assents to the proposal, and that this department of the Government at least is anxious for its acceptance, as, in its view, most expedient for the general good.

"The commissioners of Massachusetts have already given their assent, on behalf of that Commonwealth.

"Considering, then, this proposition as involving the surrender of more territory than the avowed objects of England require; as removing our landmarks from the well-known and well-defined boundary of the treaty of 1783, on the crest of the highlands, besides insisting upon the line of the arbuter in its full extent, we feel bound to say, after the most careful consideration, that we cannot bring our minds to the conviction that the proposal is such as Maine had a right to expect.

"We are now called upon to consider the final proposition, made by or through the Government of the United States, for our consideration and acceptance. The line indicated may be shortly defined as the line recommended by the King of the Netherlands, and an addition thereto of a strip of land at the base of the highlands running to the source of the south-west branch of the St. John. The examination and consideration of all other lines, which might better meet our views and objects, have been precluded by the declaration, and other plenary evidence we have, that the line specified in your communication is the most advantageous that can be offered to us; and that no one of less extent—or yielding, in fact, less to the other party—can be deemed admissible. We are, therefore, brought to the single and simple consideration of the question whether we can, consistently with our views of our duty to the State we represent, accept the proposition submitted by you."—The Maine commissioners to Mr Webster, July 22.

5. The mixing up of incongruous matter in the treaty, and presenting the whole as a unit, to be ratified in toto under penalty of the loss of the whole, and war if any part of it was rejected. This is a serious objection to the treaty. Incongruities are not to be put into laws, whether they be the supreme or the subordinate law. The African alliance for five years, is an incongruity in a British treaty of permanent boundaries. The only reason for putting this temporary convention into a permanent treaty, is the very reason which should prevent its being put there; it is to fetter the Senate—to embarrass and coerce them—to make one part of the treaty carry another. I shall move to strike out this alliance article, as well for incongruity, as for its unconstitutionality, inexpediency, and gross impolicy.

6. The irregular manner in which the ratification of this treaty has been sought, by consultations with individual members, before it was submitted to the Senate. Here I tread upon delicate ground; and if I am wrong, this is the time and the place to correct me. I speak in the hearing of those who must know whether I am mistaken. I have reason to believe that the treaty has been privately submitted to Senators—their opinions obtained—the judgment of the body forestalled; and then sent here for the forms of ratification. [One Senator said he had not been consulted.] Mr. B. in continuation: Certainly not, as the Senator says so; and so of any other gentleman who will say the same. I interrogate no one. I have no right to interrogate any one. I do not pretend to say that all were consulted; that would have been unnecessary; and besides I know I was not consulted myself; and I know many others who were not. All that I intend to say is, that I have reason to think that this treaty has been ratified out of doors! and that this is a great irregularity, and bespeaks an undue solicitude for it on the part of its authors, arising from a consciousness of its indefensible character.

7. The want of instructions from the President to guide this negotiation. This is a glaring objection to the treaty. By the theory of our Government, the President is the head of the Executive Department, and must treat, through his agents and ministers, with foreign powers. He must tell them what to do, and should tell that in unequivocal language, that there may be no mistake about it. He must command and direct the negotiation; he must order what is done. This is the theory of our Government, and this has been its practice from the beginning of Washington's to the end of Mr. Van Buren's administration; and never was it more necessary than now. Being but one negotiator, and he not approved by the Senate for that purpose, and being from an interested State, it was the bounden duty of the President to have guided and directed every thing. He is the head of the Union, and should have attended to the interest of the whole Union; on the contrary, he abandons every thing to his Secretary, and this Secretary takes care of one section of the Union, and of his own State, and of Great Britain; and leaves the other two sections of the Union out of the treaty. The Northern States, coterminous with Canada, get their boundaries adjusted; Massachusetts gets money, which her sister States are to pay; and Great Britain takes two slices and all her military frontiers from the State of Maine! the S. and W. States are left as they were!—the natural result of a negotiation committed, without instructions, to a single negotiator; and that negotiator the man who declared he would not vote the money for defence which President Jackson required, even if the enemy was battering at the doors of the Capitol! and whose subserviency to British interests, has so often and so deplorably been manifested.

8. The fear of war. This Walpole argument is heavily pressed upon us, and we are constantly told that the alternatives lie between this treaty—the whole of it, just as it is—or war. This is a degrading argument, if true; and infamous if false! and false it is; and more than that, it is as shameless as it is unfounded! What! the peace mission come to make war! It is no such thing. It comes to take advantage of our deplorable condition—to take what it pleases, and to repulse the rest. Great Britain is in no condition to go to war with us, and every child knows it. But I do not limit myself to argument, and general considerations, to disprove this war argument. I refer to the fact which stamps it with untruth. Look to the notes of Sir Charles Vaughan and Mr. Bankhead, demanding the execution of the award, and declaring that its execution would remove every impediment to the harmony of the two countries. After that, and while holding these authentic declarations in our hands, are we to be told that the peace mission requires more than the award? requires one hundred and ten miles more of boundary? requires $500,000 for Rose's Point, which the award gave us without money! requires a naval and diplomatic alliance, which she dared not mention in the time of Jackson or Van Buren? requires the surrender of "rebels" under the name of criminals! and puts the South and West at defiance, while conciliating the non-slaveholding States! and gives us war, if we do not consent to all this degradation, insult, and outrage? Are we to be told this? No, sir; no! There is no danger of war; but this treaty will make a war, if it is ratified. It gives up all our advantages; leaves us with great questions unsettled; increases the audacity of the British; weakens and degrades us; and leaves us no alternative but war to save the Columbia, to prevent imprisonment, to resist search, to repel Schlosser invasions, and to avoid a San Domingo insurrection in the South, excited from London, from Canada, and from Nassau.

9. I conclude this head of general objections with the notice of an exhibition on this floor, preceded by private and impressive revelations to Senators without, which the honor of the contrivers would require to be kept where they attempted to place it—in the depths of everlasting oblivion; but which the honor of the Senate requires to be exposed to broad daylight. The Secretary of State has sent us, under the most awful injunctions of secrecy, certain letters from Mr. Jared Sparks, in Paris, covering a certain disinterred map, marked with certain red lines, said to be drawn by Dr. Franklin when minister in France, and by which the highlands which divide the Penobscot waters from the St. John are shown to be the boundary between the United States and Great Britain, instead of the highlands which divide the waters of the St. Lawrence from those of the Atlantic Ocean. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, by his position, was made the interpreter of the Secretary on this occasion. He unfolded the whole to us, with all the invocations to secrecy and to

2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

despatch in our work, which the Secretary had impetrated of him; and, as a reason for this despatch and secrecy, he read us a paragraph in Lord Ashburton's letter of the 11th of July, from which it was to be dreaded that his Lordship and the British, if not forestalled by a prompt ratification of the treaty, might find out our secret, refuse the ratification themselves, and seize on all Maine down to the Penobscot. At the moment that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations was making these revelations and adjurations, struck by the strangeness of the scene, I demanded of him whether these communications came from the President? He answered, No; from the Secretary of State. I then declared that they were not covered by the rules of confidential intercourse between the President and Senate, and not entitled to secrecy; and the less so, because they had already been shown to many Senators out of doors. And, in the same instant, I treated the whole communication as a most unworthy contrivance—a fraud upon the British, if it was true; with a request to the Senate to become party to the fraud: an insult to the Senate if they were false; and the more so, if they had already been shown to Lord Ashburton, as they seemed to have been: and, in any event, a disgrace to its contrivers. At the same instant, I showed the bundle of old maps, collected and preserved by Mr. Jefferson, and belonging to the Congress Library, in which this very line was laid down in the same red color, while the true one was marked with dots, in a French map made in Paris, and dedicated and presented to Dr. Franklin in the year 1784. All this I did upon the instant—in the flash of the moment—with the hot feeling of indignation upon me—and without intending offence to the Senator from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, whose position had made him the organ of the Secretary on this humiliating occasion.

I do not go into the full defence of Dr. Franklin, whose very ghost seems to have been made to play a part to ravish from our astounded senses the instant ratification of this treaty. I do not undertake to defend him from the resulting implications of these strange communications; and, to show that his geography could not have mistaken the highlands between the Penobscot and the St. John, for the highlands between the St. Lawrence and the Atlantic—his astronomy could not have mistaken the south side of Nova Scotia for the north-west corner of that province—and that his geometry could not have substituted a crooked line, running zig-zag west from the head of the St. Croix, for a straight line running from the head of that river due north to the intersection of the ridge between the Atlantic and the St. Lawrence. I do not go into this defence, nor expose the attempt to stultify Dr. Franklin, in order to screen our present negotiator from responsibility for his enormous sacrifices. That task has been assumed by the natural defender of Dr. Franklin on this floor—the Senator from Mississippi, who has married his descendant, (Mr. WALKER,)—and who will do justice to the illustrious dead. I limit myself to showing a couple of maps—one of which shows the same line attributed to Dr. Franklin, in red coloring, and the true one in dots; the other shows the true boundary of the United States, marked by Mr. Jefferson. And, first, I will explain how I came to the knowledge of these maps, and chanced to have them on my table at such an appropriate moment.

The way of it is this: I made it my business to go and see Mr. Jefferson before he died; and in the course of a long winter evening, in which I contrived to make him do all the talking, he said to me many things which I have endeavored to remember, and to act upon as occasion presented. Among other things, he told me that when he was minister in Paris he had endeavored to make himself master of every thing that related to the New World, and especially to our own part of it; and for that purpose was accustomed to spend his leisure evenings in the booksellers' shops, searching out for every publication that related to the United States and the two Americas. He told me of many rare books, and in various languages, which he had collected, and of a mass of maps and charts which he had bound up; and that all his collection had gone to the United States with the sale of his library, and were in the library of Congress. I have often availed myself of this information to trace questions—historical, political, geographical—through his ample volumes; and had often looked over his collection of maps, venerable for their age and for the hand that collected them. This morning, when we locked our doors on this treaty, I sent a note to our Librarian, with a request to send me the Jefferson maps; and was actually looking over the collection at the time, and tracing the well-marked Northern boundary upon it, at the instant that the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations was revealing to us the unexpected discoveries of Mr. Jared Sparks. It struck me as very strange that Mr. Sparks should have discovered in Paris, in 1842, documents of such antiquity and of such moment in relation to our own country, and as coming from Dr. Franklin, when Mr. Jefferson, who was contemporary with the paper, the successor of Dr. Franklin, for so many years in Paris, and gave up so much of his time and thoughts to these researches; it struck me as very strange that all this should happen; and I immediately began to turn over the leaves of the map in my hand, to see if it was in his collection. Immediately I fell upon the same red line in a map made in Paris, in 1784, and dedicated and presented to Dr. Franklin, which map I instantly showed to the Senate, and had placed on the Secretary's table for the inspection of all the Senators. Its title is in these words:

"Carte des Etats Unis de l'Amérique, suivant

August, 1842.]

The British Treaty.

[27th Conn.]

le traité de paix de 1783. Dédiée et présentée à Son Excellence Mr. BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, ministre des Etats Unis de l'Amérique près la cour de France; ancien Président de la Convention de Pensilvanie, et de la Société Philosophique de Philadelphie, &c., &c. Par son très humble et très obéissant serviteur, LATRE, 1784; avec privilège du Roi.—Paris."

Here is the map which presents the same line, and in the same color with the one which Mr. Sparks has discovered; and with it is the true line, in dots, running up to the north-west corner of Nova Scotia. It was no secret in Mr. Jefferson's time, as its position now proves. It was of no weight in the determination of the boundary, as Mr. Jefferson's own map shows, made also in the year 1784, giving us all up to the north-west corner of Nova Scotia, and all the commanding islands which we have since lost by diplomacy—Campo-bello, Grand Menan, Bois-blanc, and the grand trading route between Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods; and it was of no weight in Mr. Jefferson's mind in any way, as his correspondence on the various attempts to settle the North-eastern boundary constantly showed. But I leave all this to the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. WALKER,) who has already done good execution upon Mr. Sparks's revelation. I limit myself to the production of the maps, one of which shows that Mr. Sparks's secret is no secret; and the other of which shows us the true boundaries of the United States, as settled by the treaty of Independence, and before diplomacy had mystified and mutilated it, and which gives us the commanding route through the long lakes west of Lake Superior; the Bois-blanc island, which commands the Detroit River; the islands of Campo-bello and Grand Menan, which command the Bay of Fundy; and the lofty mountain which covered Maine, and commanded Quebec; all of which British diplomacy has taken from us.

I turn to the device of our Secretary negotiator, and his attempt to ravish a ratification from us by means of this raw head and bloody bones, and his attempt to impose, as a secret upon the Senate, what was evidently known to Lord Ashburton. Taken in any way, and it is a most disreputable contrivance. If Dr. Franklin's pretended marks are the true lines, and we have found a piece of evidence which defeats our claim to one-third of Maine, then honor requires us to show it to the British; if, on the other hand, these marks are the same with those on the map I produce, and are of no value, then the Senate has been bamboozled; and, in either event, the secrecy demanded of us has not been required of Lord Ashburton, who shows very clearly that he has scented the existence of Mr. Sparks's discoveries! The Senator from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES,) chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, read a paragraph from his Lordship's letter of the 11th of July, to show the danger we were in of losing more than the treaty gave (by the British finding out our secret) if we did not immediately ratify it. I read the same, for the purpose of showing that the British minister knew our secret before we knew it ourselves! This is his paragraph:

"My inspection of these maps, and my examination of the documents, lead me to a very strong conviction that the highlands contemplated by the negotiators of the treaty were the only highlands then known to them at the head of the Penobscot, Kennebec, and the rivers west of the St. Croix; and that they did not precisely know how the north line from the St. Croix would strike them; and, if it were not my wish to shorten this discussion, I believe a very good argument might be drawn from the words of the treaty in proof of this. In the negotiations with Mr. Livingston, and afterward with Mr. McLane, this view seemed to prevail; and, as you are aware, there were proposals to search for these highlands to the west, where alone I believe they will be found to answer perfectly the description of the treaty. If this question should unfortunately go to a further reference, I should by no means despair of finding some confirmation of this view of the case."

Here we have the new-discovered line showed forth for us, along the heads of the Penobscot and the Kennebec, and west of the St. Croix, as marked in the secret map from Paris, and the public one from our library, with the expression of the opinion that it will answer perfectly the description of the treaty; with the significant declaration that his Lordship will not despair of finding some confirmation of his opinion, if the question goes to further reference. I submit this paragraph as evidence that his Lordship had already found Mr. Sparks's discoveries, and placed as little value upon them as I do, and has only given these hints to assist at the ratification of the treaty. After this, what are we to think of the private exhibitions of this Paris discovery to Senators before it was given to the Senate? What must we think of the invocations to secrecy with which it was communicated to us! What must we think of such a mode of operating upon the Senate? And, above all, what must we think of the treaty which, in the opinion of its negotiator, requires a resort to such contrivances to procure its ratification?

I have finished my view of this treaty, for what it contains, and will not recapitulate any thing. I find the treaty objectionable in every point of view, for what it contains—for what it omits—for the manner of making it—and the manner of seeking its ratification. Applause is bestowed upon it. That is a matter of course with all things done by any Government. But to any one who knows the exertions made by the British Government to procure our assent to the award, it must be known that such a treaty as this might have been made on any day by mail. Such a paper as that marked B, and identified by the signature of our Secretary, and by him communicated to the Maine commissioners,—such a paper as that, transmitted by mail to London, would have had its

2D Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

response by return mail, accepting it in toto, and sending us as much money into the bargain, if we had asked it, as would have paid our new public debt many times over. The cry of war is raised, if the treaty is not ratified. The British were not going to war, because we would not give them double as much as they were anxious to receive under the award. That much they intended to have, if it could be got; and for that they intended to bully up to the point of holding the lighted match over the loaded and primed cannon. Whether they touched the match would depend upon our countenance—the war countenance of our Government. This I always told the Senator from Maine, [looking at Mr. WILLIAMS.] I made no speeches when such brave ones were uttered on this floor; but I constantly told him that Maine was in danger! and if any thing saved her, it would be the war countenance of the American Government. [Mr. WILLIAMS nodded assent.] Unhappily, they have found a time when our Government has no war countenance to show! when a peace embassy has been sufficient to frighten our administration out of double as much as the British asked in Jackson's and Van Buren's time! The refusal to make this treaty would have brought no war; its ratification will bring war in the run of time. There are unsettled subjects, which cannot be settled with honor or safety after the ratification of this treaty. Contempt is now our portion from the British. Her present success will increase her audacity. The Columbia will be now considered hers; impressment will be revived when it suits her; liberation of slaves in Canada and the West Indies will go on; the affair of Schlosser will be repeated as often as it pleases the colonial authorities. The four deferred subjects are now incapable of being settled, except on terms to which war—the most exasperated war will be preferable. I look upon the ratification of this treaty as a calamity to the country; still I am not insensible to the embarrassment of Senators who yield it a reluctant assent. They expect nothing better. After the manner in which our claim has been weakened, and the British strengthened, by the conduct of our Secretary—by his surrender of 110 miles on this side the awarded line—by his $500,000 for Rouse's Point; and, above all, by his arraying the authority of Dr. Franklin against us, to the whole extent of the British claim down to the Penobscot;—after this, they expect nothing better than we have got, and are ready to close a bad bargain for fear it becomes worse. They yield reluctantly; and every patriot bosom in Maine and Massachusetts must now repent the rejection of the award, and hold the man to account who, rejecting it, has made a treaty so much worse.

I proceed to the omitted subjects; and here the objections to the treaty are fully as great for what it omits as for what it contains. The special mission came gloriously heralded as a mission of peace—to settle every thing; and to give a new point of departure to the inhabitants of two great countries in the walks of social, commercial, and political intercourse. It has only settled part; leaving four subjects out of seven to be pursued at London, with vastly diminished prospects of success; and producing all the effect of a separate treaty with a part of the confederacy, and that at the moment when British legislation had given a separate trade, and virtually a free trade, to this same part, in the great staples of grain and provisions. The mission of peace has given a separate peace to the Northern States: the new corn law has given them a separate trade; and the American citizen is very differently constituted from what I am, who can believe these coincidences to be the effect of accident, or a cause for joy in the American Union.

The omitted or pretermitted subjects are four: the Columbia River—impressment—the outrage on the Caroline—and the liberation of American slaves, carried by violence or misfortune into the British West India islands, or enticed into Canada. Of these, I begin with the Columbia, because equal in importance to any, and, from position, more particularly demanding my attention.

[Here Mr. B. went into an extended examination of our title to the Columbia.]

Impressment is another of the omitted subjects. This having been a cause of war in 1812, and being now declared, by the American negotiator, to be a sufficient cause for future wars, it would naturally, to my mind, have been included in the labors of a special mission, dedicated to peace, and extolled for its benevolent conception. We would have expected to find such a subject, after such a declaration, included in the labors of such a mission. Not so the fact. The treaty does not mention impressment. A brief paragraph in the President's Message informs us that there was a correspondence upon this point; and, on turning to this correspondence, we actually find two letters on the subject: one from Mr. Webster to Lord Ashburton—one from Lord Ashburton to Mr. Webster: both showing, from their dates, that they were written after the treaty was signed; and, from their character, that they were written for the public, and not for the negotiators. The treaty was signed on the 9th of August; the letters were written on the 8th and 9th of the same month. They are a plea, and a reply; and they leave the subject precisely where they found it. From their date and character, they seem to be what the lawyers call the postea—that is to say, the afterwards; and are very properly postponed to the end of the document containing the correspondence, where they find place on the 120th page. They look ex post facto there; and, putting all things together, it would seem as if the American negotiator had said to the British lord, (after the negotiation was over:) My Lord, here is impressment—a pretty subject for a composition; the people will love to read something about it; so let us compose. To which, it would seem, his Lordship had answered: You may compose as much as you please for your people; I leave that field to you: and when you are done, I will write three lines for my own Government, to let it know that I stick to impressment. In about this manner, it would seem to me that the two letters were got up; and that the American negotiator in this little business has committed a couple of the largest faults: first, in naming the subject of impressment at all! next, in ever signing a treaty, after having named it, without an unqualified renunciation of the pretension!

Sir, the same thing is not always equally proper. Time and circumstances qualify the proprieties of international, as well as of individual intercourse; and what was proper and commendable at one time, may become improper, reprehensible, and derogatory at another. When George the Third, in the first article of his first treaty with the United States, at the end of a seven years' war, acknowledged them to be free, sovereign, and independent States, and renounced all dominion over them, this was a proud and glorious consummation for us, and the crowning mercy of a victorious rebellion. The same acknowledgment and renunciation from Queen Victoria, at present, would be an insult for her to offer—a degradation for us to accept. So of this question of impressment. It was right in all the administrations previous to the late war, to negotiate for its renunciation. But after having gone to war for this cause; after having suppressed the practice by war; after near thirty years' exemption from it;—after all this, for our negotiator to put the question in discussion, was to compromise our rights! To sign a treaty without its renunciation, after having proposed to treat about it, was to relinquish them! Our negotiator should not have mentioned the subject. If mentioned to him by the British negotiator, he should have replied, that the answer to that pretension was in the cannon's mouth!

[Several Senators exclaimed, Yes! in the cannon's mouth!]

But to name it himself, and then sign without renunciation, and to be invited to London to treat about it;—to do this, was to descend from our position; to lose the benefit of the late war; to revive the question; to invite the renewal of the practice, by admitting it to be an unsettled question—and to degrade the present generation, by admitting that they would negotiate where their ancestors had fought. These are fair inferences; and inferences not counteracted by the euphonious declaration that the American Government is "prepared to say" that the practice of impressment cannot, hereafter, be allowed to take place!—as if, after great study, we had just arrived at that conclusion! and as if we had not declared much more courageously in the case of the Maine boundary, the Schlosser massacre, and the Creole mutiny and murder! The British, after the experience they have had, will know how to value our courageous declaration, and must pay due respect to our flag! For one, I never liked these declarations, and never made a speech in favor of any one of them; and now I like them less than ever, and am prepared to put no further faith in the declarations of gentlemen who were for going to war for the smallest part of the Maine boundary in 1838, and now surrender 800 miles of that boundary for fear of war, when there is no danger of war. I am prepared to say that I care not a straw for the heroic declarations of such gentlemen. I want actions, not phrases. I want Mr. Jefferson's act in 1806—rejection of any treaty with Great Britain that does not renounce impressment! And, after having declared by law, black impressment on the coast of Africa to be piracy; after stipulating to send a fleet there, to enforce our law against that impressment;—after this, I am ready to do the same thing against white impressment on our own coasts, and on the high seas. I am ready to enact that the impressment of my white fellow-citizens out of an American ship is an act of piracy; and then to follow out that enactment in its every consequence.

The case of the Creole, as it is called, is another of the omitted subjects. It is only one of a number of cases (differing in degree, but the same in character) which have occurred within a few years, and are becoming more frequent and violent. It is the case of American vessels, having American slaves on board, and pursuing a lawful voyage, and being driven by storms or carried by violence into a British port, and their slaves liberated by British law. This is the nature of the wrong. It is a general outrage, liable to occur in any part of the British dominions, but happens most usually in the British West India islands, which line the passage round the Florida reefs in a voyage between New Orleans and the Atlantic ports. I do not speak of the 12,000 slaves (worth, at a moderate computation, considering they must be all grown, and in youth or middle life, at least $6,000,000) enticed into Canada, and received with the honors and advantages due to the first class of emigrants. I do not speak of these, nor of the liberation of slaves carried voluntarily by their owners into British ports: the man who exposes his property wilfully to the operation of a known law, should abide the consequences to which he has subjected it. I confine myself to cases of the class mentioned—such as the Encomium, the Comet, the Enterprise, the Creole, and the Hermosa—cases in which wreck, tempest, violence, mutiny, and murder, were the means of carrying the vessel into the interdicted port, and in which the slave property, after being saved to the owners from revolt and tempest, became the victim and the prey of British law. It is of such cases

2D SESS.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

that I complain, and of which I say that they furnish no subject for the operation of injurious laws, and that each of these vessels should have been received with the hospitality due to misfortune, and allowed to depart with all convenient despatch, and with all her contents of persons and property. This is the law of nations: it is what the civilization of the age requires. And it is not to be tolerated in this nineteenth century that an American citizen, passing from one port to another of his own country, with property protected by the laws of his country, should encounter the perils of an unfortunate navigator in the dark ages, shipwrecked on a rude and barbarous coast. This is not to be tolerated in this age, and by such a power as the United States, and after sending a fleet to Africa to protect the negroes. Justice, like charity, should begin at home; and protection should be given where allegiance is exacted. We cannot tolerate the spoil and pillage of our own citizens, within sight of our own coasts, after sending 4,000 miles to redress the wrongs of the black race. But if this treaty is ratified, it seems that we shall have to endure it, or seek redress by other means than negotiation. The previous cases were at least ameliorated by compensation to their owners for the liberation of the slaves; but in the more recent and most atrocious case of the Creole, there is no indemnity of any kind—neither compensation to the owners, whose property has been taken; nor apology to the Government, whose flag has been insulted; nor security for the future, by giving up the practice. A treaty is signed without a stipulation of any kind on the subject; and, as it would seem, to the satisfaction of those who made it, and of the President, who sends it to us. A correspondence has been had; the negotiators have exchanged diplomatic notes on the subject; and these notes are expected to be as satisfactory to the country as to those who now have the rule of it. The President, in his Message, says:

“On the subject of the interference of the British authorities in the West Indies, a confident hope is entertained that the correspondence which has taken place, showing the grounds taken by this Government, and the engagements entered into by the British minister, will be found such as to satisfy the just expectations of the people of the United States.”—Message, Aug. 9.

This is a short paragraph for so large a subject; but it is all the Message contains. But let us see what it amounts to, and what it is that is expected to satisfy the just expectations of the country. It is the grounds taken in the correspondence, and the engagements entered into by the British minister, which are to work out this agreeable effect. Now, let us see what these grounds and these engagements are.

The grounds for the public satisfaction are in the Secretary's letters; the engagement is in Lord Ashburton's letter; and what do they amount to? On the part of the Secretary, I am free to say that he has laid down the law of nations correctly; that he has well stated the principles of public law which save from hazard, or loss, or penalty of any kind, the vessel engaged in a lawful trade, and driven or carried against her will into a prohibited port. He has well shown that, under such circumstances, no advantage is to be taken of the distressed vessel; that she is to be received with the hospitality due to misfortune, and allowed to depart, after receiving the succors of humanity, with all her contents of persons and things. All this is well laid down by our Secretary. Thus far his grounds are solid. But, alas, this is all talk! and the very next paragraph, after a handsome vindication of our rights under the law of nations, is to abandon them! I refer to the paragraph commencing: “If your Lordship has no authority to enter into a stipulation by treaty for the prevention of such occurrences hereafter,” &c. This whole paragraph is fatal to the Secretary's grounds, and pregnant with strange and ominous meanings. In the first place, it is an admission, in the very first line, that no treaty stipulation to prevent future occurrences of the same kind can be obtained here! that the special mission, which came to settle every thing, and to establish peace, will not settle this thing; which the Secretary, in numerous paragraphs, alleges to be a dangerous source of future war! This is a strange contradiction, and most easily got over by our Secretary. In default of a treaty stipulation, (which he takes for granted, and evidently makes no effort to obtain,) he goes now to solicit a personal engagement from his Lordship; and an engagement of what? That the law of nations shall be observed? No! but that instructions shall be given to the British local authorities in the islands, which shall lead them to regulate their conduct in conformity with the rights of citizens of the United States, and the just expectations of their Government, and in such manner as shall, in future, take away all reasonable ground of complaint. This is the extent of the engagement which was so solicited, and which was to supply the place of a treaty stipulation! If the engagement had been given in the words proposed, it would not have been worth a straw. But it is not given in those words, but with glaring and killing additions and differences. His Lordship follows the commencement of the formula with sufficient accuracy; but, lest any possible consequence might be derived from it, he takes care to add, that when these slaves do reach them, “no matter by what means” there is no alternative! Hospitality, good wishes, friendly feeling, the duties of good neighborhood—all give way! The British law governs! and that law is too well known to require repetition. This is the sum and substance of Lord Ashburton's qualifications of the engagement; and they show him to be a man of honor, that would not leave the Secretary negotiator the slightest room for raising a doubt as to the nature of the instructions which he engaged to have given. These instructions go only to the mode of executing the law. His Lordship engages only for the civility and gentleness of the manner—the suaviter in modo—while the firm execution of the law itself—the fortiter in re—remains as it was. The engagement is against officiousness—inquisitiveness—in finding out the arrival of the slaves; but, after it is found out, the law takes its course. This is the extent of this famous engagement—a promise to get the local authorities instructed to perform the operation of liberation, politely, but still to liberate.

August, 1842.]

The British Treaty.

[27th Conn.]

I take the case itself, from the account of it given in January last by the Secretary of State to our minister in London, instructing him to demand satisfaction for that outrage from the Government of Great Britain. This is his statement, and part of his instructions to Mr. Everett:

“The Creole was passing from one port of the United States to another, in a voyage perfectly lawful, with merchandise on board, and also with slaves, or persons bound to service, natives of America, and belonging to American citizens, and which are recognized as property by the constitution of the United States in those States in which slavery exists. In the course of the voyage, some of the slaves rose upon the master and crew, subdued them, murdered one man, and caused the vessel to be carried into Nassau. The vessel was thus taken to a British port—not voluntarily, by those who had the lawful authority over her; but forcibly and violently, against the master's will, and with the consent of nobody but the mutineers and murderers; for there is no evidence that these outrages were committed with the concurrence of any of the slaves, except those actually engaged in them. Under these circumstances, it would seem to have been the plain and obvious duty of the authorities at Nassau, the port of a friendly power, to assist the American consul in putting an end to the captivity of the master and crew, restoring to them the control of the vessel, and enabling them to resume their voyage, and to take the mutineers and murderers to their own country to answer for their crimes before the proper tribunal. One cannot conceive how any other course could justly be adopted, or how the duties imposed by that part of the code regulating the intercourse of friendly States, which is generally called the comity of nations, could otherwise be fulfilled. Here was no violation of British law attempted or intended on the part of the master of the Creole, nor any infringement of the principles of the law of nations. The vessel was lawfully engaged in passing from port to port in the United States. By violence and crime she was carried, against the master's will, out of her course, and into the port of a friendly power. All was the result of force. Certainly, ordinary comity and hospitality entitled him to such assistance from the authorities of the place as should enable him to resume and prosecute his voyage, and bring the offenders to justice. But, instead of this, if the facts be as represented in these papers, not only did the authorities give no aid for any such purpose, but they did actually interfere to set free the slaves, and to enable them to disperse themselves beyond the reach of the master of the vessel or their owners. A proceeding like this cannot but cause deep feeling in the United States.

“It has been my purpose to write you at length upon this subject, in order that you might lay before the Government of her Majesty, fully, and without reserve, the views entertained upon it by that of the United States, and the grounds on which those views are taken. But the early return of the packet precludes the opportunity of going thus into the case in this despatch; and as Lord Ashburton may shortly be expected here, it may be better to enter fully into it with him, if his powers shall be broad enough to embrace it. Some knowledge of the case will have reached England before his departure; and very probably his Government may have given him instructions. But I request, nevertheless, that you lose no time in calling Lord Aberdeen's attention to it in a general manner, and giving him a narrative of the transaction, such as may be framed from the papers now communicated; with a distinct declaration, that if the facts turn out as stated, this Government thinks it a clear case for indemnification.

“You will avail yourself of an early opportunity of communicating to Lord Aberdeen, in the manner which you may deem most expedient, the substance of this despatch; and you will receive further instructions respecting the case of the Creole, unless it shall become the subject of discussion at Washington.

“In all your communications with her Majesty's Government, you will seek to impress it with a full conviction of the dangerous importance to the peace of the two countries of occurrences of this kind, and the delicate nature of the questions to which they give rise.”

This was the case of the Creole, and it is well and clearly stated. Our Secretary writes well, but performs badly. He has well stated this case, and duly supported it by an argument against the legality of the conduct of the Nassau authorities, in favor of the just title of the injured owners to indemnification, and the necessity for a treaty stipulation to prevent the recurrence of cases so dangerous to the peace of the two countries. Mr. Everett was directed to press the case in London: the Secretary undertook to do it here, if Lord Ashburton brought the proper powers with him. The powers were not brought; nor have they been sent, or even sent for! Nothing in the case of the Creole has been done in London; nothing here; and now we are to ratify a treaty from which the whole case has been excluded, and to be content with a correspondence which contains a promise for an engagement which is a derision of our complaints. Five cases like those of the Creole, differing only in degree of atrocity, have occurred. In the two first, there was pecuniary compensation to the injured owners; in none of them has there been reparation to the insulted flag of the United States; and in the three latter, there has not even been a suggestion of indemnifying the owners. Great Britain is evidently assuming higher ground on the subject of slavery; and after the

to Seas.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

nanner in which we have been coerced into a naval and diplomatic alliance against slave-owners, and after the quintuple treaty has been hewn to us, there is no knowing what is in store for the slave possessors.

Sir, I hold that the honor of the Senate as a body, and the honor of the greater part of the Senators now present individually, is concerned in the settlement of this Creole case, and the others of the same class. We have done what involves our honor. We adopted resolutions on this subject—strong and just resolutions—and adopted them unanimously. They declare his conduct of the British local authorities to be a violation of the law of nations, and highly unjust to our citizens: and these resolutions, and the speeches in support of them, were forwarded to London, to be used by Mr. Everett in pressing the unsettled cases. Both the resolutions and speeches seem to have been disregarded in London: shall they be disregarded here? disregarded by the Senate which passed them, and by the Senators who spoke and voted for them? Here is the paragraph of the secretary's letter which informs us of the transmission of these resolutions and speeches to London, to be laid before the British ministry:

"You are acquainted with the correspondence which took place a few years ago, between the American and English Governments, respecting the cases of the Enterprise, the Comet, and the Encomium. I call your attention to the Journal of the Senate of the United States, containing resolutions unanimously adopted by that body respecting those cases. These resolutions, I believe, have already been brought to the notice of her Majesty's Government; but it may be well that both the resolutions themselves, and the debates upon them, should be again adverted to. You will find the resolutions, of course, among the documents regularly transmitted to the legation, and the debates in the newspapers with which it has also been supplied from this department."

And here are the resolutions themselves:

Resolved, That a ship or vessel on the high seas, in time of peace, engaged in a lawful voyage, and, according to the laws of nations, under the exclusive jurisdiction of the State to which her flag belongs; as much so as if constituting a part of her own domain.

Resolved, That if such ship or vessel should be forced by stress of weather, or other unavoidable cause, into the port and under the jurisdiction of a friendly power, she and her cargo, and the persons on board, with their property, and all the rights belonging to their personal relations, as established by the laws of the State to which they belong, should be placed under the protection which the laws of nations extend to the unfortunate under such circumstances.

Resolved, That the brig Enterprise, which was forced, unavoidably, by stress of weather, into Port Hamilton, Bermuda island, while on a lawful voyage on the high seas, from one part of the Union to another, comes within the principles embraced by the foregoing resolutions; and that the seizure and detention of the negroes on board, by the local authority of the island, was an act in violation of the laws of nations, and highly unjust to our own citizens to whom they belong."

I was not one of those who spoke in favor of these resolutions; I was satisfied with the speech of the mover, (Mr. CALHOUN,) and voted for them with a cordial good will. I deemed them correct then: I deem them so now. I consider all the cases of the Comet, the Encomium, the Enterprise, the Creole, and the Hermosa, to have been violations of the law of nations, a breach of good neighborhood, and a contempt for our Government. I cannot vote for the ratification of a treaty which refuses the slightest notice of these outrages, and remits us, for our "satisfaction," to the illusory stipulations of an empty and preposterous "engagement."

Sir, this offence against our ships and citizens is one of recent origin, but of increasing frequency, and of augmenting atrocity. It is evidently a part of the abolition crusade against slavery, and tends to excite insurrection and servile war in our country. The first case occurred in the year 1830; it was that of the Comet, which was stranded near the island of New Providence, and carried a wreck into Nassau, her slaves liberated, and the protest of the owners disregarded. These slaves were paid for. The next was that of the Encomium, in 1834—the same in all respects as the Comet, and with the same results: the owners of the slaves being eventually paid by the British Government. The third case was that of the Enterprise, whose fate was the subject of our resolves. It occurred in 1835; and was the case of a ship driven by tempest into the island of Bermuda, her slaves liberated, and the protest of the owners disregarded. For this outrage no atonement or compensation has been made, notwithstanding our brave resolutions, and their imposing communication to the British Government. Then came two cases together, worse than all the previous ones—the Creole, in January, 1842, and the Hermosa immediately after—cases, the one of mutiny, piracy, and murder; the other of violence on the part of wreckers. For these two outrages, as well as for that of the Enterprise, no indemnity or redress of any kind has been made. Pecuniary compensation to the owners—an inadequate redress to them, and no atonement to our insulted sovereignty—granted in the two first cases, is denied in the three last; and the go-by which has been given to the whole subject in this mission of peace, and the "satisfaction" expressed by the President, on behalf of the country, at this termination of the business, must, if sanctioned by the Senate, operate as an act of oblivion upon past outrages, and an invitation to the commission of new ones.

The term South, as indicating the slaveholding region in this Union, is now become a term of enlarged and extended application, and is fast shifting to the West. But lately applied to five Atlantic, it now includes seven transmon-tane States; the former decreasing; the latter increasing. The five Atlantic slave States lose fifteen Representatives under the late census: the seven Western gain eight. Their relative strength is now about equal. At the census of 1850, that of the Western seven must greatly preponderate; and, after that period, the gap between them must go on increasing, in the double ratio of the loss in one and the gain in the other. The slave interest, already equaling in the great West, that of the Atlantic, must soon find its chief seat there; and it behooves the Representatives from that quarter to attend in time to what must soon become a chief subject of their care. The liberation of slaves from wrecked vessels among the Bahama islands is but a branch of a vast system; but it is a branch of it which addresses itself directly to the slave States of the Valley of the Mississippi. The passage through these British islands is their line of communication with the Atlantic States, with the high seas, and with the whole world. They cannot tolerate the insecurity of that passage, either for themselves or their property. Rather they should say of that passage, and of the gulf from which it leads, as the Romans said of the Mediterranean—mare nostrum, and act upon the assumption. The masters of the Mississippi should command the outlet from the res fluviorum. As a Senator from that great region, I feel the responsibilities of my position, and the gravity of the circumstances which surround us. The pretension to liberate slaves between New Orleans and the Atlantic States, is a blow at the Great West—one blow out of many which the anti-slave allies are preparing for her. This treaty, by shirking the question, sanctions that pretension; and I feel bound to oppose it. A treaty of peace, as it is called—the fruit of a mission sent out to settle every thing—the approved of a Southern President: it still leaves unsettled the large question which concerns the twelve States which stretch from the Atlantic to the Missouri, and from the 89th parallel of north latitude to the Gulf. Such a question, affecting so many States, and so pregnant of war, deserved to be settled—deserved something very different from ignominious exclusion from the treaty, and derisory dismissal to the safeguard of a correspondence and an engagement. The peace mission has put this question, and the subject of which it is part, on the high road to war. To go with the British to Africa, to fight for slaves, while the British are liberating, enticing away, and exciting to revolt, our slaves at home, is to commit a folly of which the fruit must be shame and resentment, and all their disastrous effects.

The case of the Caroline, to which I now proceed, completes the list of the seven subjects which the President informs us occupied the attention of the negotiators. He does not tell us that no other subjects occupied their deliberations; and the want of protocols disables us from knowing. I should like to know whether the assumption of the State debts, or any provision or guarantee for their payment, constituted any part of the objects of the special mission. If they did, we ought to know it; and to know what was demanded on one side, and what was promised or denied on the other. Informality of the conference will make no difference. Every thing was informal in this anomalous negotiation. Wat Tyler never hated the ink-horn worse than our Secretary-negotiator hated it upon this occasion. It was only after a thing was finished, that the pen was resorted to; and then merely to record the agreement, and put a face upon it for the public eye. In this way many things may have been discussed, which leave no written traces behind them; and it would be a curious circumstance if so large a subject, and one so delicate as the State debts, should find itself in that predicament. In the absence of all evidence, I have no right to an opinion on the point; but, as a Senator, and a part of the treaty-making power, I have a right to know the facts; and shall submit a call upon the President for that purpose. [The call was submitted, but not acted upon for want of time.]

The Caroline is the last of the seven subjects in the arrangement which I make of them. I reserve it for the last; the extreme ignominy of its termination making it, in my opinion, the natural conclusion of a disgraceful negotiation. It is a case in which all the sources of national degradation seem to have been put in requisition:—diplomacy; legislation; the judiciary; and even the military. To volunteer propitiations to Great Britain, and to deprecate her wrath, seem to have been the whole concern of the Administration, when signal reparation was due from her to us.

And so ends the case of the Caroline and McLeod. The humiliation of this conclusion, and the contempt and future danger which it brings upon the country, demand a pause, and a moment's reflection upon the catastrophe of this episode in the negotiation. The whole negotiation has been one of shame and injury; but this catastrophe of the McLeod and Caroline affair puts the finishing hand to our disgrace. I do not speak of the individuals who have done this work, but of the national honor which has been tarnished in their hands. Up to the end of Mr. Van Buren's administration, all was safe for the honor of the country. Redress for the outrage at Schlosser had been demanded; interference to release McLeod had been refused; the false application of the laws of war to a state of peace had been scouted. On the 4th day of March, 1841, the national honor was safe; but on that day its degradation commenced. Timing their movements with a calculated precision, the British Government transmitted their assumption of the Schlosser outrage, their formal demand for the release of McLeod, and their threat in the event of refusal, so as to arrive here on the evening of the day on which the new Administration received the reins of Government. Their assumption, demand, and threat, arrived in Washington on the evening of the 4th day of March, a few hours after the inauguration of the new powers was over. It seemed as if the British had said to themselves: This is the time—our friends are in power—we helped to elect them—now is the time to begin. And begin they did. On the 8th day of March, Mr. Fox delivered to Mr. Webster the formal notification of the assumption, made the demand, and delivered the threat. Then the disgraceful scene began: They reverse the decision of Mr. Van Buren's administration, and determine to interfere in behalf of McLeod, and to extricate him by all means from the New York courts. To mask the ignominy of this interference, they pretend it is to get at a nobler antagonist; and that they are going to act the Romans, in sparing the humble and subduing the proud.* It is with Queen Victoria with whom they will deal! McLeod is too humble game for them. McLeod released, the next thing is to get out of the scrape with the Queen; and for that purpose they invent a false reading of the law of nations, and apply the laws of war to a state of peace. The jus belli, and not the jus gentium, then becomes their resort. And here ends their grand imitation of the Roman character. To assume the laws of war in time of peace, in order to cover a craven retreat, is the nearest approach which they make to war. When the special minister comes. They accept from him private and verbal explanations, in full satisfaction to themselves of all the outrage; Schlosser: but beg the minister to write them a little apology, which they can show to the people. The minister refuses; and thereupon they assume that they have received it, and proclaim the apology to the world. To finish this scene, to complete the propitiation of the Queen, and to send her minister home with legal and parchment evidence in his hand of our humiliation, the expression of regret for the arrest and detention of McLeod is officially and gratuitously renewed; the prospect of a detention of any of her Majesty's subjects in the future is pathetically deplored; and, to expedite their delivery from State courts when they again invade our soil, murder our citizens, and burn our vessels, the minister is informed at Congress has been "called" upon to pass a law to protect them from these courts. And here "a most serious fact" presents itself. Congress has actually obeyed the "call"—passed the act—secured her Majesty's subjects in the future—and given the legal parchment evidence of his success to her minister before he parts for his home. The infamous act—the bears corpus against the States—squeamishly led the "remedial justice act"—is now on a statute-book; the original polluting our law, the copy lying at the footstool of the British Queen. And this is the point we have reached. In the short space of a year and a half, the national character has been run down from the pinnacle of honor to the abyss of disgrace. I limit myself now to the affair of McLeod and the Caroline alone; and say that, in this business, exclusive of other disgraces, the national character has been brought to the lowest point of contempt. It required the Walpole administration five-and-twenty long years of cowardly submission to France and Spain to complete the degradation of Great Britain: our present rulers have completed the same work for their own country in the short space of eighteen months. And this is the state of our America! that America which Jackson and Van Buren left so proud! that America which, with three millions of people, fought and worsted the British empire—with seven millions fought it, and worsted it again—and now, with eighteen millions, truckles to the British Queen, and invents all sorts of propitiatory apologies for her, when the most ample atonement is due to itself. Are we the people of the Revolution?—of the war of 1812?—of the year 1884? when Jackson electrified Europe by threatening the King of France with reprisals!

2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

McLeod is given up, because he is too weak; the Queen is excused, because she is too strong; propitiation is lavished where atonement is due; an apology accepted where none was offered; the statute of limitations pleaded against an insult, by the party which received it! And the miserable performers in all this drama of national degradation expect to be applauded for magnanimity, when the laws of honor and the code of nations stamp their conduct with the brand of cowardice.*

It is a noble maxim of the English law, that every Englishman's house is his castle—inaccessible to every intruder but the law! "Not that it was surrounded with walls and battlements; it might be a straw-built shed. The winds of heaven might whistle through it; all the elements of heaven might enter it; but the King could not—the King dare not—enter it." So said the great Lord Chatham of the English—

* Every individual is permitted to recede from his rights to abandon a just subject of complaint or to forget an injury. But the conductor of a nation is not as free, in this respect, as a private person. The latter may hear only the voice of generosity, and, in an affair which interests none but himself alone, deliver himself up to the pleasure he finds in doing good, to his love of peace and tranquillity. The representative of a nation—a sovereign—cannot consult himself; cannot abandon himself to his own inclination. The rights of the nation are benefits of the nation—are benefits of which the sovereign is only administrator, and he ought to dispose of them no further than as he has reason to believe the nation itself would dispose of them. * * * Seldom is it safe for a nation to dissemble or pardon an injury, unless it be manifestly in a situation to crush those who are so rash as to dare to offend it. It is then glorious to pardon those who acknowledge their faults. Parcere subjectis et debellare superbo: and it may do this with safety. But, between two powers that are nearly equal, suffering an injury, without requiring complete satisfaction, is almost always imputed to weakness or cowardice: it is the means of soon receiving from them those that are most atrocious.

[Vattel's Law of Nations.]

Parcere subjectis, et debellare superbo.—Mr. Bosc's oath.

AUGUST, 1842.]

The British Treaty.

[37th CONG.]

man and his house. Not so with us, in this fallen state of our country. We have no king here, it is true, to break into our houses; but we have a Queen of England to send her Canadian subjects here to do it—to send them here to attack, kill, burn, and capture! and then to return to their royal mistress, to receive the rewards which are due to the chastisers of her Majesty's bad neighbors.

I have now finished what I had to say against the ratification of this treaty; and, in coming to the conclusion of so great a subject, and one to which I have made so much opposition, I deem it due to the occasion to declare my future course in relation to it. I take it for certain that the treaty will be ratified—reluctantly and unwillingly ratified. In that event, I shall abide by it in all its provisions which come within the pale of the treaty-making power—oppose it in all that lies beyond that pale. The national boundaries come within the pale; and they must remain as they are established, bad as they are. The money payments to Maine and Massachusetts are domestic and legislative questions; and, as claims addressed to Congress, I shall consider them, and do what I believe to be right. As treaty stipulations, I shall resist these payments; for I cannot admit the policy or the right of Great Britain to interfere between the Union and its members, and to acquire the character of mediator, protector, guarantee or remonstrant between them. The fugitive offenders article I consider inoperative without the aid of an act of Congress; and that aid I shall be unwilling to give, because I consider the stipulations of the article as dangerous to foreigners who may come to our country, and useless to us, in the two eminent cases in which the surrender of fugitive criminals would be most wanting—the cases of slaves and counterfeiters. The alliance articles, both naval and diplomatic, I hold to be beyond the pale both of the treaty-making and legislative power, and eminently dangerous and unwise; and shall oppose them in all the forms in which the question of their execution shall come before me. I shall defeat the appropriations for this African squadron, and for the pay and outfit of these remonstrating ambassadors, if I can; and if Great Britain complains, and demands the execution of the treaty in these particulars, I shall consider it a demand for the tribute—the tribute in men, money, and ships—which we are to pay her for five years' exemption from British search, and for so many years' reprieve from intended subjugation to the quintuple alliance.

Mr. WOODBURY said the great question of the North-eastern boundary was the essential part of the instrument; and as an attempt appeared to have been made, through the chairman, to cast a doubt over our former claims on that frontier, in consequence of the discovery of some new maps, Mr. W. felt bound at once to repel it. Whether he should vote to ratify this part of the treaty, or not—according as full consideration might in the end seem to require—this much is certain: that he never should approve it on the ground that our title to the whole of the disputed territory was in the smallest degree shaken by any thing which has yet appeared. Other high and momentous motives, connected with peace and war, as well as with the conduct of future negotiations or hostilities by a party so doubtful as to trustworthiness, and so embarrassed as that now in power; others connected with the recent ascent of Maine and Massachusetts—the States alone directly interested—to the particular boundary adopted in the treaty; and others looking to the diminished importance, yearly, of all questions of boundary between us and neighboring powers on this continent, where we grow so much faster than they, and are destined ere long to be supreme—might justify a ratification of the present stipulations. We shall see in a few days.

But, to seek an apology for doing it, in arguments against our undoubted rights, derived from loose conjectures of itinerant Americans in Europe, or from suggestions calculated to belittle the claim, and injure the reputation of one of the able negotiators of the treaty of 1783, did not seem to Mr. W. very patriotic, or at all warranted by any of the facts in the case.

The French map of 1745, which, with its red lines, running west from the St. Croix, had been made to occupy so prominent a position in this debate, was doubtless one illustrating the boundaries between the French and British colonies in America, before the conquest of Canada by England, and its cession in 1763.

There is a similar map in the French atlas, on the table of the Secretary, which I procured from the State Department. The publications of that day are full of corresponding descriptions, as well as maps, on the part of France. But, at the same time, Great Britain, with whom we are now treating, and whose claims then are ours now, always resisted the claims of France to crowd the southern limits of Canada so far south, and the western limits of Nova Scotia so far west.

Instead of permitting Nova Scotia, or Acadia, to come to the Kennebec, or even to the Penobscot, she herself originally granted it to come only to the St. Croix, and made and described its western line as one running north from the source of that river till it reached some stream connected with the navigable waters of the St. Lawrence. Here is her Latin charter of the province, and an English translation, giving this, in substance; and it was this boundary, with a slight change, to which England claimed uniformly to the very last moment of her jurisdiction over what now constitutes the United States.

The change is this: After the conquest of Canada, being then possessed of Nova Scotia also, she carried the boundaries of Canada south to the heights which turn the northern

2D Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

rivers into the St. Lawrence; but, independent of that, she kept the boundary of Nova Scotia virtually the same as before; and the same as Mitchell, her own geographer under the Lords of Plantations, had laid it down in 1755 on his map; and the same as has ever been claimed by this country since the peace of 1783.

Now, let it be recollected that this British official map of Mitchell was before the commissioners who formed the treaty of 1783. Both sides concede this, in the arguments prepared for the King of Holland, now in my hand. Recollect, too, that the line on that map runs due north from the source of the St. Croix till it strikes the St. Lawrence; and not west from the St. Croix, as on this French map. Recollect that the line described in the treaty is to run north of the St. Croix, precisely as it appears on that map, till it strikes the highlands from which spring the tributaries of the St. Lawrence, and which are near to its bank. Recollect that Doctor Franklin was by birth a Massachusetts man, and had been the agent of that province, and familiar with all its claims to boundary up to that line.

Recollect that he had got inserted into the preliminaries of peace an agreement to go still further east, and make the St. John, from its mouth to its source, the boundary, as more convenient, and, in many respects, more eligible to us than the old boundary.

Recollect that, when coming to sign the treaty, this was so strenuously opposed by England, on the ground of its being a new cession of territory, that the old line was agreed to be adhered to, and was intended to be described in the treaty.

Recollect all these circumstances; and then say, how could he, in a letter to Count Verennes on the 6th of December, 1782, mean to refer to any map but Mitchell's, or any line on that or any other map, except the old line, as here laid down, till it reached the highlands north of, and near the St. Lawrence? He asked neither information, vigilance, nor heedfulness. But a supposition (which some gentlemen make) that he referred to some map leaving our boundary-line run nearly west from the St. Croix, and cutting us off, also, from the sources of even the Penobscot, Kennebec, and Connecticut—a line not running north at all, as the treaty requires—a line not touching in that direction any highlands which turn waters into the St. Lawrence, as the treaty requires—a line contrary to Mitchell, and all the former British as well as Massachusetts claims—and a line at war with even his own express instructions—is an imputation of carelessness and ignorance altogether unfounded in any facts before us. It does not appear that he ever saw the old French map spoken of, and of which a partial copy is sent to us—much less referred to it—and the red lines on it are undoubtedly the old French lines, put on it when made in 1745, instead of 1782; and are those claimed by France when she owned Nova Scotia and Canada, and were never thought of as describing the boundary between us and England, as arranged in the treaty of peace.

For further confirmation of this view, and of the validity of our whole claim, Doctor Franklin, only eight days after, (viz. December 14, 1782,) wrote to Mr. Livingston that the old line of boundary was agreed on, and was to be run out afterwards between the parties. (See, also, his letter on the 14th of October, 1782, but twenty-three days previous.) Here are both the letters, in the argument prepared for the King of Holland in 1827.

So, nearly thirty other maps, published by England and her citizens, between 1763 and 1788, draw the boundary line as we claim it. Indeed, Mr. Gallatin collected more than fifty of that kind, in all; and one in Mr. Jefferson's collection, engraved in 1788, to show the limits under the treaty, by Osgood Carlton—a man of science and practical skill, as well as belonging to Massachusetts, and well acquainted with her localities. Before any controversy, or any motive existed to mislead, he laid down the boundary there as now claimed; and, to avoid mistakes as to dotted lines or coloring, he had printed on the map itself that this eastern line, as we have always claimed it, was "the boundary line between Britain and America," under the treaty of peace. Another map before me, in Mr. Gallatin's last memoir, made by Gov. Pownall, in 1776, lays down the same line as the eastern limit of Massachusetts; and others still, of the same date, by Carver, and others; and another by Bowen, in 1768. These are all English in their origin—several of them official in their character—and the whole, so far as regards the evidence to be derived from maps, entirely conclusive as to the right of the United States to the whole territory in dispute.

Mr. W. said he could fortify this position by a mass of documents and evidence of a different character; for he had devoted considerable attention to this topic ever since 1819, when the north-western boundary of New Hampshire had become hazarded in the controversy concerning some of the limits in the treaty of 1783. But he should occupy too much time, if he now entered into this point further.

[Several Senators said, No: go on.]

Mr. W. observed that, at this late period of the session, he felt reluctant to do it; though, before sitting down, he would advert a moment to one other reason which had been urged for assenting to the treaty, with diminished limits on the north-east. It was, that certain equivalents had been gained elsewhere, and, among the rest, on the north-western boundary of New Hampshire. This last impression was erroneous. He must say, once for all, that we had not gained a foot of land there to which that State was not clearly entitled.

Without entering into details, which might be tedious to others than citizens of New Hampshire, it was enough to say, on this occasion, that the north-westernmost head of

August, 1842.]

The British Treaty.

[27th Conn.]

Connecticut River—which was the boundary described in the treaty of 1788—was still further west than Hall's Stream, described in this treaty of 1842. That head was Lynch's Stream; and, as is apparent on Bouchette's map of Canada, (hanging before us,) would, if adopted, give to the United States several thousand acres more land than we now obtained. But, as New Hampshire had not surveyed and exercised jurisdiction west of Hall's Stream, she could not insist on going further on her account; and the land between that stream and Lynch's, if awarded to the United States, must, therefore, belong to the General Government.

It was for them, then, and not for her to complain, as to what was lost between those two streams. But that New Hampshire had a right to go as far as Hall's Stream, was apparent on all the modern maps made since the country was explored fully, as being more north-west than Indian Stream, or Perry's Brook, or the main branch of the Connecticut. This last was strangely selected by the King of Holland as the north-westernmost head, when it is the north-east one. It was also apparent on both Bowen's and Pownall's maps, made as long ago as 1776, as well as several others.

But, beyond this, the State of New Hampshire had, as early as 1789, surveyed to the source of this very stream, and run down to its mouth, as her north-west boundary; and ever since, when occasion required, had exercised jurisdiction to it.

All this, with other proofs, are fully detailed in a document referred to in the correspondence before us, which was prepared by myself, and published in the second volume of the New Hampshire Historical Collections, as long ago as 1827.

He took this occasion to do the justice to both the Secretary of State and Lord Ashburton, to add, that, after the New Hampshire delegation invited attention to that document, and one of them explained the strong evidence which existed in it against the narrower line first proposed in this negotiation, as set out in page 67 of the correspondence, they both seemed satisfied that New Hampshire should rightfully hold to Hall's Stream.

Let our decision, then, be what it may on the whole treaty, he must insist that, if in favor of the ratification, (as it probably would be,) it should not be so on account of any just doubt created by the old maps concerning the full claim of Maine, as originally set up; nor on any account of any equivalent in any new territory obtained for New Hampshire, beyond what her original limits justified, and what she had long claimed and enjoyed.

[On the ensuing day, the chairman referred to some correspondence, in 1838, between the British Government and the State Department, showing a willingness on our side to deviate west from a due-north line from the St. Croix, provided such highlands as are described in the treaty of 1788 were not discovered at the end of that line. And he, as well as Mr. Evans, argued thence, that the original claim had been in some respect abandoned by the past Administration. The chairman also referred to some new letters by Lord Palmerston, showing that in the case of the Caroline the American Executive, or, at least, the Secretary of State—knew, before 1840, that Great Britain intended to make no apology for that outrage.]

Mr. Woodbury expressed his regret that the conduct of two of his former associates in office had been called in question who were not now here—and, he lamented to add, were not in existence—so as to vindicate themselves. He must ask the indulgence of the Senate a few minutes, to correct what he considered an erroneous impression as to the conduct of both of them.

The proposition made by Mr. Livingston, as to a deviation from a due-north line, was only hypothetical—was very limited in its effect, in any event—and originated in this way: As long ago as 1827 or 1828, when considering the convention to refer this controversy to the arbitrament of the King of Holland, some gentlemen in the Senate had suggested that, after a due-north line from the source of the St. Croix crossed the St. John, and approached the highlands whence streams flow into the St. Lawrence one way, and the Atlantic Ocean the other, it would first strike some streams running into the Bay of Chaleurs, or the Gulf of St. Lawrence. They thence argued that it might be necessary, in that event, to deviate a little to the west, and go round the sources of those streams till those highlands were reached from which waters flowed into the St. Lawrence to the north, and into the Atlantic Ocean to the east and south-east. The treaty of 1788 also called for natural monuments at that point, by calling for highlands of that character, as well as mentioned a descriptive corner in the north-west angle of Nova Scotia. Mr. Livingston supposed that, in fact, both would be found to agree or coincide at a due-north point, as he says in his letter; but if they should not, he adds—as a lawyer would, and must, on sound legal principles—that the natural monuments must govern, rather than the descriptive corner.

All he proposed, then, was what the law of the case required—which is, that if the monument and the angle were not found to coincide a deviation might be made to the west far enough to strike the natural monument. But every one can see by this map of the commissioners, that the deviation, if made at all, instead of coming down near the British line at Mrs. Hill, or even to the St. John, would be only a few miles west from a line due north from the St. Croix—being a gore, wider at one end and a point at the other—leaving nine-tenths of the whole claim, if not all, with Maine, as before.

What is very conclusive evidence that the

2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

British, as well as Mr. Livingston, knew that this deviation must be small, if any, the proposition was refused by their ambassador.

So far from there being any pretence, then, that the deviation could in fact come south of the St. John, it is stated in Sir Charles Vaughan's letter expressly that it could not, in any event, probably go south of the St. John, nor even much beyond the St. Francis; and he adds that "The assent of the British Government to the proposition of Mr. Livingston would concede to the Government of the United States nearly all they had hitherto claimed."—Message to Senate, 24th Cong., 1st sess., Doc. 414, p. 17.

Let us, then, hear no more of this as an abandonment of the American claim, either in the view of the American cabinet, or of their far-sighted British opponents.

In respect to Lord Palmerston's recent letter, imputing to the past Administration, or to Mr. Forsyth, before 1840, any official knowledge at the British Government had decided to make no apology for the outrage on the Caroline, and to assume the act as their own; Mr. F. thought, when he heard the letter read, there must be some singular misconception or marvellous impudence in the charge. No man possessed a higher sense of honor, or sterner independence, than Mr. Forsyth. He was the best man in the nation to conceal anything through fear—the last man to delay bringing difficulties to a point through subserviency.

Looking at the rest of the correspondence with Lord Palmerston by Mr. Stevenson, it appears (as was to have been expected) that the latter at once, and categorically, repels the imputations of the British Secretary. He proceeds also to prove that no just ground for them could exist, in any thing communicated by Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth, or by Lord Palmerston to Mr. Stevenson. And when, in a second letter of Lord Palmerston, (not read by the chairman,) an attempt is made to qualify the first charge, and to soften it into one not implicating any conduct in the American Secretary, minister, or President, as at all dishonorable, Mr. Stevenson replies again, and insists that, whether honorable or dishonorable, in his lordship's opinion, the facts of the case had Lord Palmerston been entirely misapprehended.

The correspondence, as a whole, nullifies completely the imputation made by the British Secretary; and any inference drawn from it by the chairman, (Mr. Rives,) either derogatory to the past Administration, or favorable to a greater condescension supposed to be exhibited by England in the more recent explanations on that matter since the arrest and trial of McLeod, seems to rest on a very sandy foundation.

In voting on the separate articles of the treaty, Mr. W. voted against those in respect to the engagements to furnish a force of eighty guns towards suppressing the slave-trade. This arose, not from an unwillingness to do every thing proper for abolishing that trade with alacrity and efficiency; but from an aversion to enter into an entangling alliance with any nation for any object; and from a reluctance to seem compelled by England, or bound to her, to do as to other countries what she had no right to demand and enforce. The attitude appeared on our part one of inferiority and submission, or of subjection. A sovereign nation ought to do what is just and honorable, as to the world at large, or as to the general interests of humanity, without the intervention or guardianship of any other nation. Again: the quantity of force to be employed was too large, too expensive, and unnecessary, unless it was employed by detachments occasionally from our squadrons at Brazil, the Mediterranean, and the West Indies. Then, and then only, could the health of the officers and men be preserved, and a great burden on our finances averted, which England bore to protect her African colonies as well as to suppress the slave-trade. We had no such colonies belonging to our Government; and for this, and other reasons, should not be subjected to any thing like equal expenses in relation to this matter.]

After the Senate had gone through with the different articles of the treaty, and were ready to act on the question of its final ratification, Mr. W. said he wished to submit a motion.

He observed that the inclination of his mind was to vote for the ratification, though he disliked much both branches of the treaty. The engagement, by any stipulation made to a foreign power, to do any thing in suppressing the slave-trade, which it was our duty to do of our own accord, and without the surveillance or admonition of others, looked derogatory to us. He had an invincible repugnance to that kind of assumption by one nation, and the acquiescence in it by another. But he passed by that, to come to the north-eastern boundary, concerning which he wished to trouble the Senate with a single motion. It was made with a view to show—what he believed to be true—that the treaty in that particular was not what the country had a right to expect; and, therefore, that it would not have been ratified in that particular, had not Maine and Massachusetts—the parties specially interested—agreed to the line adopted. This, at least, was his own opinion. But as their commissioners had agreed to the new line, he, for one, should waive further objections. His motion was, therefore, to recommit the treaty with instructions to report the two following resolutions to precede the resolve for ratification:

1. Resolved, That the provisions in this treaty, relating to the North-eastern boundary, are not, in the opinion of the Senate, so favorable to the United States as they had a right to expect on the facts of the case.

2. Resolved further, That the Senate, though

August, 1842.]

The British Treaty.

[27th Cong.]

anxious to adjust all controversies with foreign powers, would not feel justified in advising a ratification of those provisions, had not Maine and Massachusetts, the States interested in the disputed territory, given their assent, by commissioners, to the particular boundary adopted in those provisions, [instead of conferring general authority on the Federal Government to agree to such new conventional line as it might deem just.]

[Mr. TALLMADGE moved to lay the proposition of Mr. W. on the table; but there being doubts whether this might not carry the treaty with it, Mr. T. withdrew it.

Mr. KING then suggested that the resolutions be moved as an amendment or addition to the resolve for ratification, so as to save a recommitment.]

Mr. WOODBURY replied, that the President of the Senate had doubts whether such a course would be in order, or he would acquiesce in it with pleasure.

[Some Senators called for a division of the question as to each resolution separately; being willing to vote for one, but not the other. Some expressed themselves embarrassed how to vote, as they approved one, if not both of the resolutions; but doubted whether it was expedient to make them a part of the record in the ratification, and requested Mr. W., on that account, to oblige them by withdrawing the motion.]

Mr. WOODBURY stated that his object in offering the motion and resolution was to show permanently, and in the briefest manner possible, his general views and grounds of justification in ratifying the treaty. As he had accomplished that object with the Senate, so far as regarded himself, he would not, for the purpose of placing the views of all on the journals as to these points, press other gentlemen to vote on them which was embarrassing, and might lead to more debate and delay. He would, therefore, consent to what was asked, and withdraw the motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I can truly say that "this is not the entertainment to which my State was invited." Soon after the arrival in this country of the special minister from England, the Governor of Maine was notified of that fact, and informed that this minister was charged with full powers from his sovereign to negotiate and settle the different matters in discussion between the two Governments; and had officially announced to this Government that, in regard to the boundary question, he had authority to treat for a conventional line, or line by agreement, on such terms and conditions, and with such mutual considerations and equivalents, as might be thought just and equitable: that he was ready to enter upon a negotiation for such conventional line, as soon as this Government should say it was authorized and ready, on its part, to commence such negotiation. And a strong appeal was made by this Government to the Governor of Maine to convene the Legislature, in order that authority might be communicated to this Government to settle the controversy, by agreeing upon a new line of boundary. It was known that Maine had heretofore declined to give her assent to a conventional line, and insisted upon the line as described in the treaty of 1788; and, to induce her to yield her assent, it was announced, in the letter of the Secretary of State to the Governor of Maine, that the President felt it to be his duty, unless some new course should be proposed, to cause the negotiation (for another arbitration) to be resumed, and pressed to its conclusion.

The Governor of Maine did not hesitate, upon such an invitation, and upon such announcements, to convene the Legislature, in a busy season of the year, and at great expense to the State; and to submit to its serious consideration the communication made to him from this Government.

That Legislature—"declaring its solemn conviction that the boundary of Maine, on its northern and north-eastern frontiers, as designated in the treaty of 1788, can be laid down and fixed according to the terms of that treaty; and that such line embraces all the territory over which Maine claims property, sovereignty, and jurisdiction; and that the Executive and Congress of the United States had recognized the validity of that claim, in its full extent"—was yet willing to regard the recommendation and request of the President with all the respect due to the high source from which they came; and to look carefully at the suggestions made by him, as the head of the Government of the Union, upon a subject so interesting to Maine, as well as to her sister States of the Confederacy. Thus, looking at the communication from this Government to the Governor of Maine, it was seen that, "without the concurrence of the two States of Massachusetts and Maine (whose rights are more immediately concerned—both having an interest in the soil and one of them in the jurisdiction and government,) the duty of the General Government will be to adopt no new course; but, in compliance with treaty stipulations, and in furtherance of what has already been done, to hasten the pending negotiations as fast as possible; that "the President thinks it a highly desirable object to prevent the delays necessarily incident to any settlement of the question by these means," (negotiation and arbitration;) that "it had been found that the exploration and examination of the several lines constitute a work of three years;" that "the existing commission for making such exploration, under the authority of the United States, has been occupied two summers; and a very considerable portion of the work remains to be done;" that "if a joint commission should be appointed, and go through the same work, and the commissioners should disagree, (as is very possible,) and an arbitration on that account become indispen-

2D SESS.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

sable, the arbitrators might find it necessary to make an exploration and survey themselves, or cause the same to be done by others of their own appointment; "that "if to these causes, operating to postpone the final decision, be added the time necessary to appoint arbitrators, and for their preparation to leave Europe for the service, and the various retarding incidents always attending such operations, seven or eight years constitute, perhaps, the shortest period within which we can look for a final result;" that, "in the mean time, great expenses have been incurred, and further expenses cannot be avoided;" that "it is well known that the controversy has brought heavy charges upon Maine herself, to the remuneration or proper settlement of which she cannot be expected to be indifferent;" that "the exploration by the Government of the United States has already cost one hundred thousand dollars; and the charge of another summer's work is in prospect;" that "these facts may be sufficient to form a probable estimate of the whole expense likely to be incurred before the controversy can be settled by arbitration; and our experience admonishes us that another arbitration might fail;" that "the opinion of this Government upon the justice and validity of the American claim has been expressed so many times, that a repetition of that opinion is not necessary;" that "the subject is a subject in dispute;" that "the Government has agreed to make it a subject of reference and arbitration; and it must fulfil that agreement, unless another mode for settling the controversy should be resorted to, with a hope of speedier decision;" that "the President proposes that the Governments of Maine and Massachusetts should severally appoint commissioners empowered to confer with the authorities of this Government upon a conventional line, or line by agreement, with its terms, considerations, and equivalents, with an understanding that no such line be agreed upon without the assent of such commissioners;" that "this mode of proceeding, or some other which shall express assent beforehand, seems indispensable, if any negotiation for a conventional line is to be had; since, if happily a treaty should be the result of a negotiation, it can only be submitted to the Senate of the United States for ratification," and that "these considerations, in addition to the importance of the subject, and a firm conviction in the mind of the President that the interests of both countries, as well as the interests of the two States more immediately concerned, requires a prompt effort to bring his dispute to an end, constrain him to express an earnest hope that your Excellency will concur the Legislature of Maine, and submit the subject to its grave and candid deliberation."

It cannot be unknown to the Senate and to the country, that Maine, ever since she became a State, has insisted upon her absolute and perfect right to all the territory claimed by her; and that such is her right, has been admitted and proclaimed by all departments of the General Government. Maine has uniformly protested against her right being brought into jeopardy by any submission of it to arbitration; and the protest of the lamented Governor Lincoln, now in the archives of the Department of State, and published by order of Congress, prior to the submission to the King of the Netherlands, will long be cherished by the citizens of Maine as a noble and masterly effort of a patriot and statesman to arrest the downward course which diplomacy and treaties had given to our once certain and undisputed title, and should have prevented the submission of the territorial rights of a sovereign State to the arbitrament of any foreign power. But, unfortunately for Maine, and I think for the nation, the reference was made; and we all know the result of it—precisely what was foretold; the arbiter split the difference, recommending a line which he thought more convenient, and giving to Great Britain that portion of the territory claimed by Maine which was necessary to the direct communication between the British provinces of Canada and New Brunswick. That award or recommendation was not ratified by this Government; and further efforts have been made on our part to obtain a settlement of the line, according to the treaty of 1783; but the British Government would not treat further upon that basis, unless our Government would first agree to certain preliminaries, which would weaken, if not destroy, our claim. And now, ten years after the award of the King of the Netherlands was rejected, Maine is told by this General Government, to which she has a right to look for the protection and preservation of her rights, and which is bound by the constitution to defend her in the enjoyment of her whole territory, that, unless she will authorize a conventional line, her rights must again be subjected to the judgment and final disposition and arbitrament of foreigners!—that seven or eight years is the least time in which we may expect a decision; and then it may fail, as did the former attempt to settle the question by arbitration!!

In this condition of things it was that the President announced to the Governor of Maine the arrival at the seat of Government of a minister plenipotentiary and special, with full powers from his sovereign to negotiate and settle all matters in discussion between the two Governments, and that that minister had announced that he was authorized to treat for a conventional line, or line by agreement, on such terms and conditions, and with such mutual considerations and equivalents, as may be thought just and reasonable.

The Legislature was assembled, and the President's views, as contained in the letter of the Secretary of State, were submitted to it; and the result was the following, among other preambles and resolutions, viz:

"Whereas the Government of the United States, not possessing the constitutional power to conclude

August, 1842.]

The British Treaty.

[7th Conn.]

any such negotiation without the assent of Maine, has invited the Government of this State to co-operate to a certain extent and in a certain form, in an endeavor to terminate a controversy of so long duration. Now, considering the premises, and believing that the people of the United States, after having already manifested a forbearance honorable to their character, under long-continued violations of their rights by a foreign nation; and though not disposed to yield to unfounded pretensions, are still willing, in regard to the proposal now made by the General Government, to give additional evidence to their fellow-citizens throughout the United States of their desire to preserve the peace of this Union, by taking measures to discuss and conclude, if possible, the subject in controversy in a manner that will secure the honor and interest of the State, this Legislature adopts the following resolutions—with the understanding, however, that, in the event of a failure of such endeavor toward an arrangement, no proceedings thereunder shall be so construed as to prejudice in any manner the rights of the State as they have been herein asserted to exist.

"Resolved, That there shall be chosen, by ballot, in convention of both branches of the Legislature, four persons, who are hereby appointed commissioners on the part of this State, to repair to the seat of Government of the United States, and to confer with the authorities of that Government touching a conventional line, or line by agreement, between the State of Maine and the British provinces, having regard to the line designated by the treaty of 1783, as uniformly claimed by this State, and to the declarations and views expressed in the foregoing preamble; and to give the assent of this State to any such conventional line, with such terms, conditions, considerations, and equivalents, as they shall deem consistent with the honor and interests of the State: with the understanding that no such line be agreed upon without the unanimous assent of such commissioners.

"Resolved, That this State cannot regard the relinquishment by the British Government of any claim heretofore advanced by it to territory included within the limits of the line of this State as designated by the treaty of 1783, and uniformly claimed by Maine, as a consideration or equivalent within the meaning of these resolutions."

The commissioners, thus appointed and thus authorized, came here in the fond hope of aiding the General Government in settling the long-pending and irritating question of the North-eastern boundary, in a manner honorable to both nations, consistent with the rights of Maine, and promoting the convenience of the citizens and subjects of both countries. And how were these fond hopes blasted! The first official communication in reference to our boundary is that of Lord Ashburton, of 21st June, wherein he shadows forth the line of boundary and equivalents which he came all the way from England, as the special minister of her Majesty, to offer to us "a line by agreement, on such terms and conditions, and with such mutual considerations and equivalents, as may be thought just and reasonable." And what is it? To understand what it is, we must take the answer of the commissioners of Maine, of 29th June, in connection with his Lordship's letter; and it will be seen that this is the amount of it:—the river St. John, from the place where the due-north line from the monument at the source of the St. Croix strikes it, to some one of its sources, (meaning the source near the head waters of the Penobscot and Kennebec,) with a strip on the south side of the St. John, to include the Madawaska settlement, and to extend from the Aroostook to Fish River, shall be the boundary; and that all lumber and produce of the forests of the tributary waters of the St. John shall be received freely, without duty, and dealt with in every respect like the same articles in the province of New Brunswick, is the equivalent!! In other words, his Lordship proposes to take from Maine about five millions of acres of her territory, and to compensate her therefor by allowing the timber of the forests of the tributary waters of the St. John to be received freely and without duty at the city of St. John's—their market—and dealt with in every respect like their produce: thereby securing a trade quite as important and beneficial to their provinces as to Maine! Mr. President, I was glad to see that this proposition, so unjust in itself, and so insulting to the people of Maine, was promptly rejected by our commissioners; and my regret is, that they did not content themselves with simply announcing that fact. I feel confident that they would have been justified in so doing, not only by the Legislature and people of Maine, but by the nation. More especially so, when it is disclosed in that same communication of June 29th "that they have been assured that Lord Ashburton is restrained by his instructions from yielding the island of Grand Menan, or any other of the islands in Passamaquoddy Bay, or even any portion of the narrow strip of territory which lies between the due-north line from the source of the St. Croix and the St. John's River, above Eel River, (so called,) as an equivalent for any portion of the territory claimed by Maine as within her boundaries!" Restrained by his instructions! Why, sir, we not the Governor of Maine assured by the President that Lord Ashburton, a minister plenipotentiary and special, had arrived charged with full powers from his sovereign to negotiate and settle all matters in controversy? And that he (Lord Ashburton) had officially announced to this Government, that, in regard to the boundary question, he had authority to treat for a conventional line, with such mutual considerations and equivalents as might be thought just and equitable? Further, sir, is it not true, as has been stated by many, that the Legislature of Maine were restrained from limiting the powers of their commissioners, by representations, from here, that Lord Ashburton, having full powers, might object to treating at all with commissioners not possessing equal full powers?

If the commissioners on the part of Maine, upon learning the boundary and equivalents proposed by Lord Ashburton—and more especially upon finding that he was restrained by instructions—had contented themselves with rejecting the proposition of Lord Ashburton, (as they very properly did,) we would not have had such a treaty as that now under consideration to act upon. Lord Ashburton must have been relieved from the restraint imposed upon him by instructions, or have suffered the negotiation to terminate upon his proposition; which the nation would applaud the commissioners of Maine for rejecting. But it was not so. The commissioners were unwilling to forego any reasonable chance of adjusting a controversy so long pending, and so vexatious to the people of Maine; they knew that the General Government, the State Governments, the nation itself, were all desirous that the question should be settled; and, if not settled, through any fault or obstinacy on their part, that Maine would stand worse than ever upon this all interesting question, at home and abroad; hence their counter proposition to Lord Ashburton, more liberal, and yielding more for peace and good neighborhood than could have been anticipated by the people or by the Legislature of Maine: that was rejected; and there the subject would have rested, but for the renewed efforts by the General Government itself, whereby the line and equivalents mentioned in the treaty now under consideration, were presented to the commissioners with the following remarks:

2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

"The line suggested, with the compensations and equivalents which have been stated, is now submitted for your consideration. That it is all which might have been hoped for, looking to the strength of the American claim, can hardly be said. But, as the settlement of a controversy of such duration is a matter of high importance; as equivalents of indoubted value are offered; as longer postponement and delay would lead to further inconvenience, and to the incurring of further expenses; and as no better occasion—or, perhaps, any other occasion—for settling the boundary by agreement, or on the principle of equivalents, is ever likely to present itself, the Government of the United States hopes that the commissioners of the two States will find it to be consistent with their duty to assent to the line proposed, and to the terms and conditions attending the proposition.

"The President has felt the deepest anxiety for the amicable settlement of the question, in a manner honorable to the country, and such as should preserve the rights and interests of the States concerned. From the moment of the announcement of Lord Ashburton's mission, he has sedulously endeavored to pursue a course the most respectful towards the States, and the most useful to their interests, as well as most becoming to the dignity and character of the Government. He will be happy if the result shall be such as shall satisfy Maine and Massachusetts, as well as the rest of the country. With these sentiments on the part of the President, and with the conviction that no more advantageous arrangement can be made, the subject is now referred to the grave deliberation of the commissioners."

Ah! no better occasion, and perhaps any other occasion for settling the boundary by agreement is ever likely to present itself, and with the conviction that no more advantageous arrangement can be made, the subject is referred to the grave deliberation of the commissioners. By whom? By the President and that Government which is bound by the constitution to protect Maine in all her rights, and without whose protection it is vain for any State to contend with a foreign Government, however just and well founded be her claim. Thus abandoned and thus admonished by the only power to which Maine could look for the maintenance and establishment of her just rights, it is said that she has assented to the line; and hence, that we are called upon merely to ratify and confirm what has been agreed upon by the parties immediately interested in the controversy. Not exactly so. Massachusetts, owning a moiety of the acres surrendered, is satisfied with the price to be paid for those acres; but the commissioners of Maine, now abandoned by her co-proprietor of the soil, and by the General Government, which is bound to protect her rights, are left to the grave consideration of the terms proposed by our own Government, under the assurance that no better, and, perhaps, no other occasion for settling the boundary by agreement is ever likely to present itself; and with the conviction that no more advantageous arrangement can be made.

[The letter of the Commissioners of July 22 was here read.]

This is the assent (if assent it may be called) which is to authorize and induce the Senate to ratify the treaty. What is it? A clear, strong, and convincing argument against submitting to the terms proposed; and concluding that, if the deliberate conviction of her sister States shall pronounce the proposed boundary and equivalents as honorable and expedient, even if that judgment shall lead to a surrender of a portion of the birthright of the people of Maine, the commissioners have determined to overcome their objections to the proposal, so far as to say that if, upon mature consideration, the Senate of the United States shall advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty upon those terms and conditions, they give the assent of Maine thereto. Now, sir, I am not well pleased with this mode of doing business. I would have preferred that our commissioners had agreed or disagreed to the line and terms proposed. The Legislature intrusted them with that power; and we have no reason to suppose that the Legislature would have authorized them to refer to the Senate of the United States the power to make a new line of boundary and to fix the equivalents. We know the Legislature did not so authorize them; but, on the contrary, required the unanimous consent of all the commissioners to any line which should be agreed upon; and expressly declared that it could not regard the relinquishment by the British Government of any claim heretofore advanced by it to any territory within the limits of Maine according to the treaty of 1783, as uniformly claimed by Maine, as a consideration or equivalent.

How, then, stands the question of assent on the part of Maine? If the Senate, upon mature consideration, shall advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty upon the terms and conditions therein contained;—in other words, if the Senate shall pronounce it honorable and expedient that Maine shall surrender a portion of her birthright upon the terms and conditions named—then, and then only, you have the assent of Maine to the sacrifice, for the public good. For one, I cannot do it. My own convictions of the perfect right of Maine to all the disputed territory, forbid it. I would go far, very far, to compromise this dispute upon honorable terms; and I would not be particular as to the value of equivalents. But I hold that Great Britain has contiguous territory, convenient to us, which she might and ought to give in exchange for the territory belonging to us, which she so much needs, and ought to have, for a just equivalent. This treaty does not accomplish, fairly, either object—it gives to Great Britain more than is necessary, and withholds from Maine what she ought to acquire.

But, Mr. President, I am not insensible that this question of our North-eastern boundary has been suffered, most unnecessarily, to be brought into dispute and controversy. By the treaty of 1783, and the subsequent determination of what river was intended as the St. Croix, our line of boundary was plain, practicable, and perfect; it was identical with the established lines of the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia—fixed and determined by the proclamation of 1763, and by an act of Parliament in 1774. On a former occasion I had the honor to submit to the Senate my views upon this question; others did the same; and I will now only refer to the able exposition and vindication of the right of Maine to the whole of the territory claimed by her, contained in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and to one of the resolutions adopted unanimously by the Senate on that occasion, in the following words:

“Resolved, That after careful examination and deliberate consideration of the whole controversy between the United States and Great Britain, relating to the North-eastern boundary of the former, the Senate does not entertain a doubt of the entire practicability of running and marking that boundary in strict conformity with the stipulations of the definitive treaty of peace of 1783; and it entertains a perfect conviction of the justice and validity of the title of the United States to the full extent of all the territory in dispute between the two powers.”

My regret is, that Congress did not then authorize and direct the running and marking that line according to the terms of the treaty of 1783, as proposed by the bill which I then presented. If that had then been done, we would have escaped the expense and hazard of the Aroostook war, the disgrace of having a portion of our territory seized and occupied by the military power of Great Britain, and the unwelcome task of deciding upon the present treaty—which sanctions the unjust pretensions of the British Government to a portion of the fruits of our glorious struggle for independence.

I will not tax the patience of the Senate with a recapitulation of the merits of our claim to the whole of the disputed territory. Suffice it to say, that the treaty which asserts our independence as a nation, gives it to us; and that the nation recognizes it. Still, it has been suffered to be brought into controversy, and is now disputed by a great and powerful nation. Unfortunately for us, at the treaty of Ghent, in 1814, a request on the part of the British negotiators to modify or vary the line described in the treaty of 1783, so as to give to Great Britain a convenient and direct communication between the provinces of Canada and New Brunswick, was suffered to ripen into an article of that treaty, which provided for the running and marking that line; and, in case the commissioners to be appointed to that service should disagree, they were to report the grounds of such disagreement to their respective Governments; and thereupon the question should be submitted to an arbiter, to determine upon the points of disagreement. A very simple and innocent article in appearance, but a most fatal one in its consequences! From this sprang the submission to the King of the Netherlands, his award, and its rejection—subsequent attempts at negotiation and the treaty now under consideration; and, if this treaty be rejected, another reference to arbitrators, to be selected by foreign powers, is to follow.

Thus a title, clear and perfect by the treaty of 1783, has been suffered, by diplomacies and treaties, to be brought into doubt and controversy, and has been agreed to be made the subject of arbitration! This is the embarrassment which has stood, and yet remains, in the way of all our efforts to obtain possession of our entire territory; to expel a foreign power from its military possession of part of it; to assert and maintain the rights and honor of the nation; and is now held up to us as the only alternative, if we reject this treaty. What is to be done, under such circumstances, I admit, is a question of difficulty. If there be no way of escaping the obligation of again submitting the question to a foreign arbiter, the result of the former submission should admonish us to avoid the repetition of that mode of obtaining our just rights; and the present arrangements may be better than to hazard the loss, by another reference, of the whole disputed territory. In common with my constituents, I deprecate another reference to foreigners, or arbitrators appointed by foreign powers, and protest against it. We have already fulfilled the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent, by referring the question to an arbiter. It failed to settle the controversy. The British Government have insisted that another reference would be unavailing. I am willing to take them at their word; and would submit to the Senate whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the honor and duty of the nation will not be better maintained by falling back upon our original clear and certain right under the treaty of 1783, than by ratifying the present treaty, or sanctioning another reference, as indicated by the President's declaration to the Governor of Maine.

[2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

I cannot agree to the ratification of the present treaty. It is unjust to Maine, and, in my judgment, dishonorable to the nation. I do not desire another arbitration, which may be more ruinous to Maine than the present arrangement. I have no confidence in further negotiation. What we have had, has greatly weakened our once perfect title; and I see no other way of getting our right as a nation, and performing our high obligation to one of the States of the Union, than by taking possession of what belongs to us, and holding it, on such a course, we will have right and justice on our side. If others interfere with us, it must be in their own wrong. With these views, I send to the Chair the following resolution; and ask the yeas and nays upon its adoption:

Resolved, That the treaty and documents now under consideration, be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instructions to report a resolution directing the President of the United States to take immediate possession of the disputed territory, and to report such contingent measures as, in their opinion, may be necessary to maintain the just right of the nation.

Mr. CALHOUN said that his object in rising was not to advocate or oppose the treaty, but simply to state the reasons that would govern him in voting for its ratification. The question, according to his conception, was not whether it was all we could desire, or whether it was liable to this or that objection; but whether it was such a one that, under all the circumstances of the case, it would be most advisable to adopt or reject. Thus regarded, it was his intention to state fairly the reasons in favor of and against its ratification; and to assign to each its proper weight, beginning with the portion relating to the North-eastern boundary, the settlement of which was the immediate and prominent object of the negotiation.

He was one of those who had not the slightest doubt that the boundary for which the State of Maine contended was the true one, as established by the treaty of peace in 1783; and had accordingly so recorded his vote, after a deliberate investigation of the subject. But, although such was his opinion, he did not doubt at the time that the boundary could only be settled by a compromise line. We had admitted it to be doubtful at an early period during the administration of Washington; and more recently and explicitly, by stipulating to submit it to the arbitration of a friendly power, by the treaty of Ghent. The doubt, thus admitted on our part to exist, had been greatly strengthened by the award of the King of Holland, who had been mutually selected as the arbiter under the treaty. So strong, indeed, was his (Mr. C.'s) impression that the dispute could only be settled by a compromise or conventional line, that he said to a friend in the then Cabinet, (when an appropriation was made a few years since for a special mission to be sent to England on the subject of the boundary, and his name, among others, was mentioned for the place,) that the question could only be settled by a compromise; and for that purpose, some distinguished citizen of the section ought to be selected; and neither he, nor any other Southern man, ought to be thought of. With these previous impressions, he was prepared, when the negotiation opened, to expect, if it succeeded in adjusting the difficulty, it would be (as it has been) on a compromise line. Notwithstanding, when it was first announced that the line agreed on included a considerable portion of the territory lying to the west of the line awarded by the King of Holland, he was incredulous, and expressed himself strongly against it. His first impression was, perhaps, the more strongly against it, from the fact that he had fixed on the river St. John, from the mouth of the Eel River, taking the St. Francis branch (the one selected by the King of Holland) as the mutual and proper compromise boundary, including in our limits all the portion of the disputed territory lying north of Eel River, and west and south of the St. John, above its junction; and all the other within that of Great Britain. On a little reflection, however, he resolved not to form his opinion of the merits or demerits of the treaty on rumor or imperfect information; but to wait until the whole subject was brought before the Senate officially, and then to make it up on full knowledge of all the facts and circumstances after deliberate and matured reflection; and that he had done with the utmost care and impartiality. What he now proposed was, to give the result, with the reasons on which it rests, and which would govern his vote on the ratification.

He still believed that the boundary which he had fixed in his own mind, was the natural and proper one; but, as that could not be obtained, the question for them to decide was, Are the objections to the boundary as actually agreed on, and the stipulations connected with it, such as ought to cause its rejection? In deciding it, it must be borne in mind that, as far as this portion of the boundary is concerned, it is a question belonging much more to the State of Maine than to the Union. It is, in truth, but the boundary of that State; and it makes a part of the boundary of the United States, only by being the exterior boundary of one of the States of our Federal Union. It is her sovereignty and soil that are in dispute, except the portion of the latter that still remains in Massachusetts; and it belongs in the first place to her, and to Massachusetts, as far as her right of soil is involved, to say what their rights and interests are; and what is required to be done. The rest of the Union is bound to defend them in their just claim; and to assent to what they may be willing to assent to in settling the claim in contest, if there should be nothing in it inconsistent with the interest, honor, or safety of the rest of the Union. It is so that the controversy has ever been regarded. It is well known that President Jackson would readily have agreed to the award of the King of Holland, had not Maine objected; and that to overcome her objection, he was prepared to recommend to Congress to give her, in order to get her consent, one million of acres of the public domain, worth, at the minimum prices, a million and a quarter of dollars. The case is now reversed. Maine and Massachusetts have both assented to the stipulations of the treaty, as far as the question of the boundary affects their peculiar interest, through commissioners vested with full powers to represent them; and the question for us to decide is, Shall we reject that to which they have assented? Shall the Government, after refusing to agree to the award of the King of Holland, because Maine objected, now reverse its course, and refuse to agree to that to which she and Massachusetts have both assented? There may, indeed, be reasons strong enough to authorize such a course; but they must be such as will go to prove that we cannot give our assent consistently with the interests, the honor, or the safety of the Union. That has not been done; and, he would add, if there be any such, he has not been able to detect them.

It has, indeed, been said that the assent of Maine was coerced. She certainly desired to obtain a more favorable boundary; but when the alternative was presented of another reference to arbitration she waived her objection, as far as she was individually concerned, rather than incur the risk, delay, uncertainty, and vexation of another submission of her claims to arbitration; and left it to the Senate, the constituted authority appointed for the purpose, to decide on the general merits of the treaty, as it relates to the whole Union. In so doing, she has, in his opinion, acted wisely and patriotically—wisely for herself, and patriotically in reference to the rest of the Union. She has not got, indeed, all she desired, and has even lost territory, if the treaty be compared with the award of the King of Holland; but, as an offset, that which she has lost is of little value, while that which she retains has been greatly increased in value by the stipulations contained in the treaty. The whole amount lost, is about half a million of acres. It lies along the eastern slope of the highlands skirting the St. Lawrence to the east, and is acknowledged to be of little value for soil, timber, or any thing else—a sterile region, in a severe, inhospitable climate. Against that loss, she has acquired the right to navigate the river St. John; and that, not only to float down the timber on its banks, but all the productions of the extensive well-timbered, and, taken as a whole, not a sterile portion of the State that lies on her side of the bosom of that river and its tributaries. But that is not all. She also gains what is vastly more valuable—the right to ship them on the same terms as colonial productions of Great Britain and her colonial possessions. These great and important advantages will probably double the value of that extensive region, and make it one of the most populous and flourishing portions of the State. Estimated by a mere moneyed standard, these advantages are worth, he would suppose, all the rest of the territory claimed by Maine without them. If to this be added the sum of about $200,000, to be paid her for the expense of defending the territory, and $800,000 to her and Massachusetts in equal moieties, in consequence of their assent to the boundary, and the equivalents received, it must be apparent that Maine has not made a bad exchange in accepting the treaty, as compared with the award, as far as her separate interest is concerned. But be that as it may, she is the rightful judge of her own interests; and her assent is a sufficient ground for our assent, provided that to which she has assented does not involve too great a sacrifice on the part of the rest of the Union, nor their honor or safety. So far from that, as far as the rest of the Union is concerned, the sacrifice is small and the gain great. They are under solemn constitutional obligations to defend Maine, as one of the members of the Union, against invasion; and to protect her territory, cost what it may, and at every hazard. The power, claiming what she contended to be hers, is one of the greatest, if not the greatest on earth. The dispute is of long standing, and of a character difficult to be adjusted; and, however clear the right of Maine may be regarded in the abstract, it has been made doubtful, in consequence of admissions, for which the Government of the Union is responsible. To terminate such a controversy, with the assent of the party immediately interested, by paying the small sum of half a million—of which a large part (say $200,000) is unquestionably due to Maine, and would have to be paid to her without the treaty—is, indeed, a small sacrifice a fortunate deliverance. President Jackson was willing to allow her, as has been stated, more than twice as much for her assent to the award; and, in doing so, he showed his wisdom, whatever might have been thought of it at the time. Those, at least, who opposed the treaty, will not charge him with being willing to sacrifice the interest and honor of the Union, in making the offer, and yet the charge

[2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

which they make against this portion of the treaty does, by implication, subject what he was ready to do to a similar one.

But it is said that the territory which England would acquire beyond the boundary of the awarded line would greatly strengthen her frontier, and weaken ours; and would thereby endanger the safety of the country in that quarter. He did not profess to be deeply versed in military science; but, according to his conception, there was no foundation for the objection. It was, if he did not mistake, the very last point on our whole frontier, from the mouth of the St. Croix to the outlet of Lake Superior, on which an expedition would be organized on either side to attack the possessions of the other. In a military point of view, our loss is as nothing in that quarter; while in another, and a much more important quarter, our gain by the treaty is great, in the same point of view. He referred to that provision by which we acquire Rouse's Point at the northern extremity of Lake Champlain. It is among the most important military positions on the whole line of our eastern and northern frontier, whether it be regarded in reference to offensive or defensive operations. He well remembered the deep sensation caused among military men in consequence of its loss; and he would leave the question of loss or gain, in a military point of view, (taking the two together,) to their decision, without the least doubt what it would be.

But if it should be thought by any one that these considerations, as conclusive as they seemed to be, were not sufficient to justify the ratification of this portion of the treaty, there were others, which appeared to him to be perfectly conclusive. He referred to the condition in which we would be left, if the treaty should be rejected. He would ask—if, after having agreed at Ghent to refer the subject to arbitration, and, after having refused to agree to the award made under that reference, by an arbitrator of our own selection, we should now reject this treaty, negotiated by our own Secretary of State, under our own eyes, and which had previously received the assent of the States immediately interested—whether there would be the slightest prospect that another, equally favorable, would ever be obtained? On the contrary, would we not stand in a far worse condition than ever, in reference to our claim? Would it not, indeed, be almost certain that we should lose the whole of the basin of the St. John, and Great Britain gain all for which she ever contended, strengthened as she would be by the disclosures made during this discussion? He was far from asserting that the facts disclosed established the claim of Great Britain, or that the map exhibited is the one to which Franklin referred, in his note to the Comte de Vergennes, the French Minister; but he cannot be doubted that the conformity of the line delineated on the map, with the one described in his note, would have the effect of strengthening not a little the claims of Great Britain, in her own estimation, and that of the world. But the facts stated, and the map exhibited by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, (Mr. Rives,) are not the only or the strongest disclosures made during the discussion. The French map introduced by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton,) from Mr. Jefferson's collection in the Congress' library, in order to rebut the inference from the former, turned out to be still more so. That was made in the village of Passy, in the year after the treaty of peace was negotiated, where Franklin (who was one of the negotiators) resided, and was dedicated to him; and that has the boundary line drawn in exact conformity to the other, and in the manner described in the note of Dr. Franklin—a line somewhat more adverse to us than that claimed by Great Britain. But, as striking as is this coincidence, he was far from regarding it as sufficient to establish the claim of Great Britain. It would, however, be in vain to deny that it was a corroborating circumstance, calculated to add no small weight to her claim.

It would be still further increased by the fact that France was our ally at the time, and, as such, must have been consulted, and kept constantly advised of all that occurred during the progress of the negotiation, including its final result. It would be idle to suppose that these disclosures would not weigh heavily against us in any future negotiation. They would, so much so—taken in connection with the adverse award of the King of Holland and this treaty, should it be rejected—as to render hopeless any future attempt to settle the question by negotiation or arbitration. No alternative would be left us, but to yield to the full extent of the British claim, or to put Maine in possession by force—and that, too, with the opinion and sympathy of the world against us and our cause. In his opinion, we would be bound to attempt it in justice to Maine, should we refuse to agree to what she has assented. So much for the boundary question, as far as Maine is concerned.

Having now shown (satisfactorily he hoped) that Maine had acted wisely for herself in assenting to the treaty, it remained to be considered whether we, the representatives of the Union on such questions, would not also do so in ratifying it—so far, at least, as the boundary question is involved. He would add nothing to what has already been said of the portion in which Maine was immediately interested. His remarks would be confined to the remaining portion of the boundary, extending from the north-western corner of that State to the Rocky Mountains.

Throughout this long extended line, every question has been settled to our satisfaction. Our right has been acknowledged to a territory of about one hundred thousand acres of land, in New Hampshire, which would have been lost by the award of the King of Holland.

August, 1842.]

The British Treaty.

[27th Conn.]

A long gore of about the same amount, lying in Vermont and New York, and which was lost under the treaty of Ghent, would be regained by this. It includes Rouse's Point. Sugar Island, lying in the water connection between the Lakes Huron and Superior, and heretofore in dispute, is acknowledged to be ours; it is large, and valuable for soil and position. So, also, is Isle Royale, near the northern shore of Lake Superior, acknowledged to be ours—a large island, and valuable for its fisheries. And also a large tract of country to the north and west of that lake, between Fond du Lac and the river St. Louis on one side, and Pigeon River on the other—containing four millions of acres. It is said to be sterile; but cannot well be more so than that acquired by Great Britain, lying west of the boundary awarded by the King of Holland. In addition, all the islands in the river St. Lawrence and the lakes, which were divided in running out the division line under previous treaties, are acquired by us under this; and all the channels and passages are opened to the common use of our citizens and the subjects of Great Britain.

Such are the provisions of the treaty in reference to this long line of boundary. Our gain—regarded in the most contracted point of view, as mere equivalents for the sum assumed to be paid by us to Maine and Massachusetts for their assent to the treaty—is vastly greater than what we have contracted to pay. Taking the whole boundary question together, and summing up the loss and gain of the whole, including what affects Maine and Massachusetts; and he could not doubt that, regarded merely as set-offs, our gain greatly exceeded our loss—vastly so compared to what it would have been under the award of the King of Holland, including the equivalent which our Government was willing to allow Maine for her assent. But it would be, indeed, to take a very contracted view to regard it in that light. It would be to overlook the vast importance of permanently establishing, between two such powers, a line of boundary of several thousand miles, abounding in disputed points of much difficulty and long standing. The treaty, he trusted, would do much to lay the foundation of a solid peace between the two countries—a thing so much to be desired.

It is certainly much to be regretted, after settling so large a portion of the boundary, that the part beyond the Rocky Mountains should remain unadjusted. Its settlement would have contributed much to strengthen the foundation of a durable peace. But would it be wise to reject the treaty, because all has not been done that could be desired? He placed a high value on our territory on the west of those mountains, and held our title to it to be clear; but he would regard it as an act of consummate folly, to stake our claim on a trial of strength at this time. This territory is now held by joint occupancy, under the treaty of Ghent; which either party may terminate by giving to the other six months' notice. If we were to attempt to assert our exclusive right of occupancy at present, the certain loss of the territory must be the result; for the plain reason, that Great Britain could concentrate there a much larger force, naval and military, in a much shorter time, and at far less expense than we could. That will not be denied; but it will not always be the case. Our population is steadily—he might say rapidly—advancing across the continent to the borders of the Pacific Ocean. Judging from past experience, the tide of population will sweep across the Rocky Mountains, with resistless force, at no distant period; when what we claim will quietly fall into our hands, without expense or bloodshed. Time is acting for us. Wait patiently, and all we claim will be ours; but if we attempt to seize it by force, it will be our task to elude our grasp.

Having now stated his reasons for voting to ratify the articles in the treaty relating to the boundary, he would next proceed to assign those that would govern his vote on the two relating to the African slave-trade. And here he would premise, that there are several circumstances, which caused no small repugnance on his part to any stipulations whatever with Great Britain on the subject of those articles; and he would add, that he would have been gratified if they, and all other stipulations on the subject, could have been entirely omitted; but he must, at the same time, say he did not see how it was possible to avoid entering into some arrangement on the subject. To understand the difficulty, it will be necessary to advert to the course heretofore taken by our Government in reference to the subject, and the circumstances under which the negotiations that resulted in this treaty commenced.

Congress at an early day—as soon, in fact, as it could legislate on the subject under the constitution—passed laws enacting severe penalties against the African slave-trade. That was followed by the treaty of Ghent, which declared it to be irreconcilable with the principles of humanity and justice, and stipulated that both of the parties—the United States and Great Britain—should use their best endeavors to effect its abolition. Shortly after, an act of Congress was passed declaring it to be piracy; and a resolution was adopted by Congress, requesting the President to enter into arrangements with other powers for its suppression. Great Britain, actuated by the same feelings, succeeded in making treaties with the European maritime powers for its suppression; and not long before the commencement of this negotiation, had entered into joint stipulations with the five great powers to back her on the question of search. She had thus acquired a general supervision of the trade along the African coast; so that vessels carrying the flag of every other country, except ours, were subject on that coast to the inspection of her

2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

cruisers, and to be captured, if suspected of being engaged in the slave-trade. In consequence, ours became almost the only flag used by those engaged in the trade, whether our own people or foreigners; although our laws inhibited the traffic under the severest penalties. In this state of things, Great Britain put forward her claim of the right of search, as indispensable to suppress a trade prohibited by the laws of the civilized world, and to the execution of the laws and treaties of the nations associated with her by mutual engagements for its suppression. At this stage, a correspondence took place between our late minister at the Court of St. James and Lord Palmerston on the subject, in which the latter openly and boldly claimed the right of search, and which was promptly and decidedly repelled on our side. We had long since taken our stand against it, and had resisted its abuse, as a belligerent right, at the mouth of the cannon. Neither honor nor policy on our part could tolerate its exercise in time of peace, in any form—whether in that of search, as claimed by Lord Palmerston; or the less offensive and unreasonable one of visitation, as proposed by his successor, Lord Aberdeen. And yet we were placed in such circumstances as to require that something should be done. It was in such a state of things that the negotiation commenced—and commenced, in part, in reference to this subject, which was tending rapidly to bring the two countries into collision. On our side, we were deeply committed against the traffic, both by legislation and treaty. The influence and efforts of the civilized world were directed against it—and that, too, under our lead at the commencement; and with such success as to compel vessels engaged in it to take shelter, almost exclusively, under the fraudulent use of our flag. To permit such a state of things to continue, could not but deeply impeach our honor, and turn the sympathy of the world against us. On the other side, Great Britain had acquired by treaties, the right of supervision, including that of search and capturing, over the trade on the coast of Africa, with the view to its subversion, from all the maritime powers except ourselves. Thus situated, he must say that he saw no alternative for us but the one adopted—to take the supervision of our own trade on that coast into our own hands, and to prevent, by our own cruisers, the fraudulent use of our flag. The only question, in the actual state of things, as it appeared to him, was, whether it should be done by a formal or informal arrangement? He would have preferred the latter; but the difference between them was not, in his opinion, such as would justify, on that account, the rejection of the treaty. They would, in substance, be the same, and have differed but little, probably, in the expense of execution. Either was better than the other alternatives—to do nothing; to leave things in the dangerous state they stood; or to yield to the right of search or visitation.

It is objected that the arrangement entered into is virtually an acknowledgment of the right of search. He did not so regard it. On the contrary, he considered it, under all the circumstances, as a surrender of that claim on the part of Great Britain; a conclusion, which a review of the whole transaction, in his opinion, would justify. Lord Palmerston, in the first place, claimed the unqualified right of search, in which it is understood he was backed by the five great powers. Lord Aberdeen, with more wisdom and moderation, explained it to mean the right of visitation simply; and finally, the negotiation closed without reference to either, simply with a stipulation between the parties to keep up for five years a squadron of not less than eighty guns on the coast of Africa, to enforce separately and respectively the laws and obligations of each of the countries for the suppression of the slave-trade. It is carefully worded, to make it mutual, but at the same time separate and independent; each looking to the execution of its own laws and obligations, and carefully excluding the supervision of either over the other, and thereby directly rebutting the object of search or visitation.

The other article, in reference to the same subject, stipulates that the parties will unite in all becoming representation and remonstrance, with any powers, within whose dominions markets are permitted for imported African slaves. If he were to permit his feelings to govern him exclusively, he would object to this more strongly than any other provision in the treaty;—not that he was opposed to the object or the policy of closing the market to imported negroes; on the contrary, he thought it both right and expedient in every view. Brazil and the Spanish colonies were the only markets, he believed, still remaining open, and to which this provision would apply. They were already abundantly supplied with slaves, and he had no doubt that sound policy on their part required that their markets should be finally and effectually closed. He would go farther, and say, that it was our interest that they should be. It would free us from the necessity of keeping cruisers on the African coast, to prevent the illegal and fraudulent use of our flag, or for any other purpose but to protect our commerce in that quarter—a thing of itself much to be desired. We would have a still stronger interest, if we were governed by selfish considerations. We are rivals in the production of several articles, and more especially in the greatest of all the agricultural staples—cotton. Next to our own country, Brazil possesses the greatest advantages for its production, and is already a large grower of the article; towards the production of which, the continuance of the market for imported slaves from Africa would contribute much. But he would not permit such considerations to influence him in voting on the treaty. He had no objection to see Brazil develop her resources to the full; but he did believe that higher considerations, connected with her safety, and that of the Spanish colonies, made it their interest that their market should be closed against the traffic.

But it may be asked, why, with these impressions, should he have any objection to this provision of the treaty? It was, because he was adverse to interfering with other powers, when it could be avoided. It extends even to cases like the present, where there was a common interest in reference to the subject of advice or remonstrance; but it would be carrying his aversion to fastidiousness, were he to permit it to overrule his vote in the adjustment of questions of such magnitude as are involved on the present occasion.

But the treaty is opposed, not only for what it contains, but also for what it does not; and, among other objections of the kind, because it has no provision in reference to the case of the Creole, and other similar ones. He admitted that it is an objection; and that it was very desirable that the treaty should have guarded, by specific and efficient provisions, against the recurrence of such outrages on the rights of our citizens, and indignity to our honor and independence. If any one has a right to speak warmly on this subject, he was the individual; but he could not forget that the question for us to decide is, Shall we ratify or reject the treaty? It is not whether all has been done which it was desirable should be done, but whether we shall confirm or reject what has actually been done; not whether we have gained all we could desire, but whether we shall retain what we have gained. To decide that as it ought to be, it is our duty to weigh, calmly and fairly, the reasons for and against the ratification, and to decide in favor of the side which preponderates.

It does not follow that nothing has been done in relation to the cases under consideration, because the treaty contains no provisions in reference to them. The fact is otherwise. Much, very much, has been done;—in his opinion, little short, in its effect, of a positive stipulation by the treaty to guard against the recurrence of such cases hereafter. To understand how much has been done, and what has been gained by us, it is necessary to have a correct conception of the state of the case in reference to them, before the negotiation commenced, and since it terminated.

These cases are not of recent origin. The first of the kind was that of the brig Comet, which was stranded on the false keys of the Bahamas, as far back as 1830, with slaves on board. She was taken into Nassau, New Providence, by the wreckers, and the slaves liberated by the colonial authorities. The next was the Encomium, which occurred in 1834, and which, in all the material circumstances, was every way similar to that of the Comet.

The case of the Enterprise followed. It took place in 1835, and differed in no material circumstance from the others, as was acknowledged by the British Government, except that it occurred after the act of Parliament abolishing slavery in the colonies had gone into operation, and the others prior to that period.

After a long correspondence of nearly ten years, the British Government agreed to pay for the slaves on board of the two first, on the ground that they were liberated before the act abolishing slavery had gone into operation; but refused to pay for those belonging to the Enterprise, because they were liberated after it had. To justify this distinction, Lord Palmerston had to assume the ground, virtually, that the law of nations was opposed to slavery—an assumption that placed the property of a third of the Union without the pale of its protection. On that ground, he peremptorily refused compensation for the slaves on board the Enterprise. Our Executive, under this refusal, accepted the compensation for those on board the Comet and Encomium, and closed the correspondence, without even bringing the subject before Congress. With such perfect indifference was the whole affair treated, that during the long period the negotiation was pending, the subject was never once mentioned, as far as he recollected, in any Executive message; while those of far less magnitude—the debt of a few millions due from France, and this very boundary question—were constantly brought before Congress, and had nearly involved the country in war with two of the leading powers of Europe. Those who are now so shocked that the boundary question should be settled, without a settlement also of this, stood by in silence, year after year, during this long period, not only without attempting to unite the settlement of this with that of the boundary, but without ever once naming or alluding to it as an item in the list of the dispute between the two powers. It was regarded as beneath notice. He rejoiced to witness the great change that has taken place in relation to it; and to find that those who were then silent and indifferent, now exhibit so much zeal and vehemence about it. He took credit to himself for having contributed to bring this change about. It was he who revived our claim when it lay dead and buried among the archives of the State Department—who called for the correspondence—who moved resolutions affirming the principles of the law of nations in reference to these cases, and repelling the presumptuous and insulting assumption at which it was denied by the British negotiator. Such was the force of truth, and so solid the foundation on which he rested our claim, that his resolution received the unanimous vote of this body; but he received no support—no, not a cheering word—from the quarter which now professes so much zeal on the subject. His utmost hope at the time was to keep alive our right, till some propitious moment should

2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

arrive to assert it successfully. In the mean time, the case of the Oreole occurred, which, as shocking and outrageous as it is, was but the legitimate consequence of the principle maintained by Lord Palmerston, and on which he closed the correspondence in the case of the Enterprise.

Such was the state of the facts when the negotiation commenced in reference to these cases; and it remains now to be shown in what state it has left them. In the first place, the broad principles of the law of nations, on which he placed our right in his resolutions, have been clearly stated and conclusively vindicated in the very able letter of the Secretary of State, which has strengthened our cause not a little, as well from its intrinsic merit as the quarter from which it comes. In the next place, we have an explicit recognition of the principles for which we contend, in the answer of Lord Ashburton, who expressly says that, "on the great general principles affecting his case," (the Oreole,) "they do not differ;" and that is followed by "an engagement that instructions shall be given to the Governments of her Majesty's colonies on the southern borders of the United States, to execute their own laws with careful attention to the wishes of their Government to maintain good neighborhood; and that there shall be no officious interference with American vessels driven by accident or violence into their ports. The laws and duties of hospitality shall be executed." This pledge was accepted by our Executive, accompanied by the express declaration of the President, through the Secretary of State, that he places his reliance on those principles of public law which had been stated in the note of the Secretary of State. To all this it may be added, that strong assurances were given, by the British negotiator, of his belief that a final arrangement may be made of the subject by positive stipulations in London. Such is the state in which the negotiation has left the subject.

Here, again, he would repeat, that such stipulations in the treaty itself would have been preferable. But who can deny, when he compares the state of facts, as they stood before and since the close of this negotiation, that we have gained—largely gained—in reference to this important subject? Is there no difference, he would ask, between a stern and peremptory denial of our right, on the road and insulting ground assumed by Lord Palmerston, and its explicit recognition by Lord Ashburton?—none in the pledge that instructions should be given to guard against the recurrence of such cases; to a positive denial that we had suffered wrong and insult, and had any right to complain?—none between a final closing of all negotiation, and a strong assurance of a final adjustment of the subject by satisfactory arrangement by treaty? And would it be wise or prudent on our part to reject what has been gained, because all has not been? As to himself, he must say, that, at the time he moved his resolutions, he little hoped, in the short space of two years, to obtain what has already been gained; and that he regarded the prospect of a final and satisfactory adjustment, at no distant day, of this subject, so vital in its principles to his constituents and the whole South, as far more probable than he then did this explicit recognition of the principles for which he contended. In the mean time, he felt assured the engagement given by the British negotiator would be fulfilled in good faith; and that the hazard of collision between the countries, and the disturbance of their peace and friendship, has passed away, as far as it depends on this dangerous subject. But if in this he should unfortunately be mistaken, we should stand on much more solid ground in defence of our rights, in consequence of what has been gained; as there would then be superadded broken faith to the violation of the laws of nations.

Having now said what he intended on the more important points, he would pass over, without dwelling on the provision of the treaty for delivering up to justice persons charged with certain crimes; the affair of the Caroline; and the correspondence in reference to impressment. The first is substantially the same as that contained in Jay's treaty on the same subject. On the next, he had nothing to add to what has already been said. As to the last, he did not doubt that the strong ground taken in the correspondence against the impressment of seamen on board of our merchant vessels, in time of war, would have a good effect. It will contribute to convince Great Britain that the practice cannot be renewed, in the event of another European war, without a certain and immediate conflict between the two countries.

I (said Mr. CALHOUN) have now stated my opinion fully and impartially on the treaty, with the connected subjects. On reviewing the whole, and weighing the reasons for and against its ratification, I cannot doubt that the former greatly preponderate. If we have not gained all that could be desired, we have gained much that is desirable; and, if all has not been settled, much has been—and that, not of little importance. It is not of little importance to have the North-eastern boundary settled—and that, too, with the consent of the States immediately interested: a subject which has been in dispute almost from the origin of the Government, and which had become more and more entangled, and adverse to our claim, on every attempt heretofore made to settle it. Nor is it of little importance to have the whole line of boundary between us and the British dominions, from the source of the St. Croix to the Rocky Mountains, settled—a line of more than three thousand miles, with many disputed points of long standing, the settlement of which had baffled all previous attempts. Nor is it of little importance to have adjusted the embarrassments relating to the African slave-trade, by adopting the least objectionable of the alternatives. Nor to have the principles of the law of nations for which we contended, in reference to the Creole, and other cases of the kind, recognized by Great Britain; nor to have a solemn pledge against their recurrence, with a reasonable assurance of satisfactory stipulations by treaty. Nor is it of little importance to have, by the settlement of these inveterate and difficult questions, the relations of the two countries settled down in amity and peace—permanent amity and peace, as it may be hoped—in the place of that doubtful, unsettled condition, between peace and war, which has for so many years characterized it, and which is so hostile to the interest and prosperity of both countries.

Peace (said Mr. C.) is the first of our wants, in the present condition of our country. We wanted peace, to reform our own Government, and to relieve the country from its great embarrassments. Our Government is deeply disordered; its credit is impaired; its debts increasing; its expenditures extravagant and wasteful; its disbursements without efficient accountability; and its taxes (for duties are but taxes) enormous, unequal, and oppressive to the great producing classes of the country. Peace, settled and undisturbed, is indispensable to a thorough reform, and such a reform to the duration of the Government. But, so long as the relation between the two countries continues in a state of doubt between peace and war, all attempts at such reform will prove abortive. The first step in any such, to be successful, must be to reduce the expenditures to the legitimate and economical wants of the Government. Without that, there can be nothing worthy of the name; but in an unsettled state of the relations of the two countries, all attempts at reduction will be baffled by the cry of war, accompanied by insinuations against the patriotism of those who may be so hardy as to make them. Should the treaty be ratified, an end will be put to that, and no excuse or pretext be left to delay the great and indispensable work of reform. This may not be desirable to those who see, or fancy they see, benefits in high duties and wasteful expenditures; but, by the great producing and tax-paying portions of the community, it will be regarded as one of the greatest of blessings. These are not the only reasons for wanting peace. We want it, to enable the people and the States to extricate themselves from their embarrassments. They are both borne down by heavy debts, contracted in a period of fallacious prosperity, from which there is no other honest and honorable extrication but the payment of what is due. To enable both States and individuals to pay their debts, they must be left in full possession of all their means, with as little exactions or restrictions on their industry as possible on the part of this Government. To this, a settled state of peace, and an open and free commerce, are indispensable. With these, and the increasing habits of economy and industry now everywhere pervading the country, the period of embarrassment will soon pass away, to be succeeded by one of permanent and healthy prosperity.

Peace is, indeed, our policy. A kind Providence has cast our lot on a portion of the globe sufficiently vast to satisfy the most grasping ambition, and abounding in resources beyond all others, which only require to be fully developed to make us the greatest and most prosperous people on earth. To the full development of the vast resources of our country, we have political institutions most happily constituted. Indeed, it would be difficult to imagine a system more so than our Federal Republic—a system of State and General Governments, so blended as to constitute one sublime whole; the latter having charge of the interests common to all, and the former those local and peculiar to each State. With a system so happily constituted, let a durable and firm peace be established, and this Government be confined rigidly to the few great objects for which it was instituted; leaving the States to contend in generous rivalry, to develop, by the arts of peace, their respective resources, and a scene of prosperity and happiness would follow, heretofore unequalled on the globe. I trust (said Mr. C.) that this treaty may prove the first step towards such a peace. Once established with Great Britain, it would not be difficult, with moderation and prudence, to establish permanent peace with the rest of the world, when our most sanguine hopes of prosperity may be realized.

Mr. BUCHANAN rose, and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: It is now manifest that the treaty under discussion is destined to be ratified by a large majority of the Senate. The news of this ratification will spread joy and gladness throughout the land. It will be hailed by the country as the pledge of a lasting peace between two great nations; and those who were instrumental either in its negotiation or ratification, will be esteemed public benefactors. Beyond all question, such will be the first impression upon the public mind. Amidst this general joy, it will be a subject of surprise and astonishment that some eight or ten Senators should have separated themselves from the mass, and voted against the ratification of this treaty. The first impulse of public feeling will be to condemn these Senators. Now, sir, as I shall be one of this small number, I rise to make my defence before the people of the country in advance, not doubting but that the justice, if not the generosity of the Senate, will remove the injunction of secrecy from our proceedings, and enable me to publish my remarks.

There is no Senator who has felt more anxious to vote in favor of this treaty than myself. I am conscious of all the happy effects upon the country which might result from unanimity

[2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

in this body; and I may say, in all sincerity, that I have endeavored to agree with the majority. Nay, more—I was disposed to distrust my own judgment, believing that it might have been prejudiced by the zealous and persevering efforts which I had formerly made, both as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and as a Senator on this floor, to sustain the rights of Maine against what I believed to be the unjust pretensions of the British Government. I have, therefore, earnestly endeavored to keep my mind open to conviction until the last moment; but, after all, I cannot vote for this treaty without feeling that I had violated my duty to the country, and without forfeiting my own self-respect. In the emphatic language of the Senator from Maine, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) I believe it to be a treaty unjust to Maine, and dishonorable to the whole country; and thus believing, if it depended on my vote, it should be rejected without regard to consequences. These I would leave to that superintending Providence which has ever been our shield in the day of danger. Even if war should be the result, (which I do not by any means anticipate,) I would rely with perfect confidence upon the courage, patriotism, and energy of my countrymen, for the defence of their rights.

When the mission of Lord Ashburton was first announced, I hailed it as the olive branch of peace and friendship, presented by England to this country. The auspices were all favorable. I believed then, and I believe still, that she was sincere. Her revenue was insufficient for her annual expenditures; she had experienced reverses in the East, where she was waging two expensive, unjust, and bloody wars; a large portion of her own population was almost in a state of open rebellion, and she had signally failed in her darling policy of extorting from France a ratification of the quintuple treaty, which would have given her the right of searching all European vessels on the coast of Africa. Such was the condition of England when Lord Ashburton arrived in Washington, "having been charged with full powers to negotiate and settle all matters in discussion between the two countries." When I make this declaration, I employ the very language used by Mr. Webster himself, in the very first sentence of his diplomatic note, dated on the 17th June last. His Lordship's powers were not confined to the North-eastern boundary question, which is the only disputed question settled by the treaty; but they would have enabled him to determine all the vexed and dangerous questions which still remain open to disturb the harmony and threaten the peace of the two nations.

Not only did a crisis then exist in the affairs of England eminently calculated to predispose her to a fair and amicable adjustment of all the disputed questions, but the British Government well knew that these questions were of such a distinct and varied character, that some one of them had strongly enlisted the feelings of each portion of our country; and, when combined, that they would unite the American people almost as one man in demanding justice. There was the North-eastern boundary question, which peculiarly interested the Eastern States, as did the North-western boundary the Western States, whilst the Creole question had deeply affected the sensibilities of the Southern and South-western portions of the Union. Redress for the Caroline outrage, and an abandonment of the right of search, were questions of national honor, in which every man with an American heart, throughout the broad extent of our country, felt the deepest interest. The varied wrongs of England had united us together in an adamantine chain, no link of which ought ever to have been broken until these wrongs had all been redressed. I believe in my soul that the propitious moment has arrived for settling all these questions upon just and honorable principles. Feeling this to be the case, I declared, on the floor of the Senate, at the period of Lord Ashburton's arrival, that our motto ought to be—All or none. This I did, because I felt that all could be adjusted. I believe still that all might have been adjusted; although I knew it would be the policy of the British Government to obtain a cession of that portion of Maine necessary to consolidate her power in North America, and leave the other questions—particularly that of the Creole—for "a more convenient season." This Creole question, from peculiar causes, which I need not explain, was the weakest, except in point of justice, of all the questions in dispute; whilst the prejudices of the British people were most strongly enlisted against its fair and honorable adjustment. Lord Ashburton has succeeded in obtaining all that his Government most desired, and in postponing for future negotiation all which was most desirable for the American people. Until within the last few weeks, we had every reason to believe that all matters in dispute would be adjusted by the treaty. I appeal to Senators whether they have not heard, over and over again, throughout the negotiation, that the only obstacle in the way of settling all our difficulties was the obstinate adherence of the Maine commissioners to the line of the treaty of 1783. I often made inquiries concerning the Creole question, believing that its adjustment would be the most difficult; and was as often informed that there would be no difficulty in providing for the future, although Lord Ashburton might not be able to grant indemnity for the past. I believed that all things were in successful progress; and never have I been more astonished and disappointed than when I first learned that the Maine question alone had been settled by the treaty, and that all the rest of the disputed questions had merely been made the subjects of a diplomatic correspondence.

Had all the questions been adjusted between the two countries, a career of happiness and prosperity would have been opened to both, on which the imagination of the philanthropist might love to dwell. Time might have soothed, or even obliterated, the memory of the successive wrongs and insults which we have suffered from England since she first acknowledged our independence; and we might have forgotten those unfriendly feelings towards her, which, unquestionably, now pervade the great body of the American people. Senators on this floor may speak of the two nations as the mother and the daughter, and may please their fancy by such epithets of mutual endearment; but, in the opinion of a large majority of our countrymen, England has ever acted as a harsh and severe stepmother towards this country. I had fondly hoped that this unnatural relationship would end with the termination of Lord Ashburton's mission; and, had all the questions been settled, I was prepared to yield much for the sake of such a happy consummation.

I shall now proceed to discuss each of the subjects separately, involved in the correspondence and the treaty. And, first, I shall refer to the question of impressment. The two last letters of the series relate to this subject. On the 8th of August, (the day before the termination of the special mission,) Mr. Webster addressed a letter to Lord Ashburton, which presents a clear and striking view of the arguments which have been heretofore urged against the impressment of American seamen; and suggests to the British Government the propriety of renouncing the practice hereafter. His Lordship replied to this letter on the next day, (the 9th of August;) and, with this letter, his mission terminated.

In this letter, I ask, does he abandon the odious claim of the British Government to impress seamen on board of American vessels? Does he yield to the unanswerable arguments presented by Mr. Webster? No, sir; no. On this subject, he is not merely non-committal. He comes up to the very point which has always been at issue between the two countries;—asserts the principle of the perpetual allegiance of all British-born subjects in the strongest terms; and justifies the practice of impressment in cases of necessity. Nay, more: he informs Mr. Webster that we ourselves would resort to the same practice, if our geographical position did not render it unnecessary.

I confess, sir, I did not anticipate that the subject of impressment would form any part of the negotiations between Mr. Webster and Lord Ashburton. This question ought never to have found a place in the correspondence, unless, from the preliminary conferences, it had been ascertained that England was prepared to renounce the practice forever. Its introduction has afforded Lord Ashburton the opportunity of insisting upon a claim to which we can never practically submit, without being disgraced and degraded among the nations of the earth. We declared war against Great Britain thirty years ago, to protect American seamen from impressment; and she, and all the world, ought to know that we shall declare war again, should the practice ever be resumed. If the stars and the stripes which float over an American vessel upon the ocean cannot protect all those who sail beneath them from impressment, no matter to what land they may owe their birth, then we are no longer an independent nation. Whenever any British officer shall dare to violate the flag of our country upon the ocean, and shall seize and carry away any seamen from the deck of an American vessel, no matter what may be the pretence, (unless instant reparation shall be made by his Government for the outrage,) our only alternative will then be war or national dishonor. We are deeply, solemnly pledged before the world, to avenge such a wrong without a moment's unnecessary delay. Such an act would, in effect, be a declaration of war against us; and Great Britain knows it well. She claims the right of impressment, as a belligerent right only, and when she shall go to war with France, or any other nation, she will then count the cost to herself which may result from this practice. She may refrain, from the conviction that it would convert us from being a neutral, into her most deadly enemy. No, sir; no. This is not a question for holiday negotiation, but for war, inevitable war, should the occasion ever unfortunately arise. But Great Britain will have a care how she provokes such a conflict, in violation of every principle of national law, although she may refuse formally to renounce the practice. War must be the necessary result of impressment, or our national character must become a subject of scorn and contempt for all mankind.

I proceed next to the case of the Caroline. There was nothing easier in the world than to settle this question satisfactorily. The British Government had only to acknowledge that Captain Drew and his band of volunteer desperadoes were in the wrong when, under the auspices of Colonel McNab, they had invaded our territory, burnt the Caroline, and murdered an American citizen; and then do all they could to repair this wrong, by indemnifying the owner of the steamboat for his loss of property, and providing for the family of the murdered Duffee, if he have a family. To acknowledge the wrong, and repair the injury as far as he can, is the first dictate of every just and honorable man, at the moment he becomes convinced of his error. Such ought to be the conduct of every just and honorable nation. But has Great Britain pursued this course in the case of the Caroline? Has she either admitted the national wrong, or repaired it by making compensation to those who were its victims? Neither the one nor the other. We have been told, indeed, by the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. Rives,) that this old and haughty nation, proud in arms, has submitted to ask our pardon for the outrage; and he considers this a great triumph. But is this the fact? Let the letter of Lord Ashburton to Mr. Webster, of the 23d July, be carefully examined by any Senator, and he must arrive at a directly opposite conclusion. I assert that this letter contains an able and elaborate justification of the attack on the Caroline, and a vindication of the British officers who planned and conducted it. How could it be otherwise? Has not Colonel McNab been knighted, and Captain Drew pensioned, for this gallant exploit against unarmed men, who vainly believed that the American flag upon American soil was a protection against British outrage? Have we not seen, within a few days, that a public dinner at which a noble Duke presided, has recently been given to Sir Allen McNab, in London, where he received such honors as will encourage him again to violate our territory, whenever interest or feeling shall again prompt to a similar outrage? I ask the Senator from Virginia to point to any portion of the letter where the conduct of McNab and Drew has been condemned; nay, more, I ask him to point to any portion of the letter where it has not been justified. It is very true that Lord Ashburton, whilst he earnestly maintains "that there were grounds of justification (for the Caroline outrage) as strong as were ever presented in such cases," declares "that no slight of the authority of the United States was ever intended;" and although this service was necessary, yet, as it involved a violation of our territory, he would deprecate its recurrence. In the very sentence to which the Senator from Virginia refers, in which his Lordship regrets "that some explanation and apology for this occurrence was not immediately made," he still continues to justify the capture and destruction of the Caroline on the plea of necessity. The whole substance of this letter may be summed up in a very few words, thus: Although the violation of your territory, and the destruction of the Caroline, were absolutely necessary and entirely justifiable, and as such have received the approbation of the British Government; yet I am extremely sorry that any such necessity existed, and hope it may not again occur. I also regret that such an explanation and apology for this occurrence as I have just made, had not been tendered to your Government immediately after the event. A man runs me through the body with a sword, and afterwards explains and apologizes to me, by assuring me that his act was both necessary and justifiable; but yet he is extremely sorry that any such necessity existed. This is Lord Ashburton's apology for the Caroline outrage.

2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

After all that I have said, it would be in vain to ask whether Lord Ashburton has granted indemnity to the owner of the Caroline, or provided for the family of the murdered Durfee. It does not appear that Mr. Webster ever demanded any such indemnity, or even alluded to the subject. He may possibly have adverted to it in his private conferences with Lord Ashburton; but if he did—my life upon it—the answer was, that the attack on the Caroline was justifiable, and, therefore, not a subject of indemnity. You have thus permitted this steamboat, owned by an American citizen, whilst under American colors, and moored in an American port, to be destroyed by the British authorities, without even asking them to indemnify the owner. Does not justice require that you should indemnify the citizen whom your own soil and your own flag could not protect, and for whom you asked no indemnity? I shall not, at present, attempt to answer this question. On the files of our executive documents, there is to be found a memorial from the citizens of Buffalo, presented in March, 1838, which places the claim of Mr. Wells, the American owner of the Caroline, in a very strong light; and as we have not even asked any satisfaction for him from the British Government, it will be a serious question whether we are not bound to indemnify him ourselves.

But Lord Ashburton, in this extraordinary letter, is not content with acting on the defensive. In the conclusion of it, he becomes the assailant. Referring to the case of McLeod, he complains that "individuals have been made personally liable for acts done under the avowed authority of their Government;" and he inquired whether the Government of the United States is now in a condition to surrender those engaged in such enterprises as the capture of the Caroline, without subjecting them to trial.

Mr. Webster replied to this letter on the 6th of August, and informs his Lordship that the President is satisfied, "and will make this subject, (the capture of the Caroline,) as a complaint of violation of territory, the topic of no further discussion between the two Governments." And thus ends the Caroline question.

But not so the McLeod question. Mr. Webster admits, as he had done in the beginning, that McLeod ought to have been surrendered, without trial, on the demand of the British Government. He graciously explains the reason why this could not be done, and casts the blame "upon a State court, and that not of the highest jurisdiction," which "was embarrassed, as it would appear, by technical difficulties." He says, however, that the Government of the United States holds itself not only fully disposed, but fully competent, to fulfil its acknowledged obligations to subjects of England, who may, hereafter, engage in such enterprises; and informs his Lordship that the attention of Congress "has been called to the subject, to say what further provision ought to be made to expedite proceedings in such cases."

I now come to the Creole question. And here we, who are opposed to the treaty, have been told that this is peculiarly a Southern question; and that, if the Senators from the South are satisfied with the manner in which it has been adjusted, we ought not to complain. Sir, this is not a mere Southern question, but it is a question which deeply affects the honor of the whole country. I might here repeat what I have said upon a former occasion—that all Christendom is leagued against the South upon this question of domestic slavery. They have no other allies to sustain their constitutional rights, except the Democracy of the North. I do not mean to insinuate that the Whig party of the North are generally abolitionists. Far from it. But this I will say, that Whig candidates most generally receive the support of the abolitionists; and, therefore, the Whigs, as a party, are careful not to give them offence. Far different is the conduct of the Democrats. In my own State, we inscribe upon our party banners, hostility to abolition. It is there one of the cardinal principles of the Democratic party; and many a hard battle have we fought to sustain this principle. Whilst the Democrats of the North are opposed to slavery in the abstract, they are ever ready to maintain the constitutional rights of the South against the fierce and fanatical spirit of abolition. I, therefore, claim the right of discussing the Creole question. It was my anxious desire and confident hope that this question, at least, might have been settled by the treaty. I firmly believe that the propitious moment for adjusting it on honorable terms has passed away forever. The British Government might have consented to accept the bitter with the sweet; and to have done us justice on the Creole question, for the sake of obtaining that portion of Maine which they so ardently desired. But we have not improved the golden opportunity; and now what are we told? Why, that a great advance has been made towards the settlement of this question by the correspondence before us.

August, 1842.]

The British Treaty.

[27th CHAM.

And what is a diplomatic note? What statesman ever dreamed of adjusting an important question, well calculated to impair the harmony and destroy the peace of two great nations, by a diplomatic note? A treaty is the only mode known to the law of nations by which such questions can be settled. Now, sir, if the letter of Lord Ashburton, of the 6th August, had even contained every stipulation which we could desire in regard to the Creole question, to what would it amount? It might possibly bind the honor of the present British cabinet; but, after a change of ministry, would it bind their successors? No man will pretend it. A new ministry would say to us, Why did you not secure your claimed rights by treaty? We are not bound by a mere diplomatic note, written by Lord Ashburton in behalf of a former ministry. And more especially are we not bound by it, when that minister himself, in the very first sentence of the note on which you rely, disclaims all authority from his Government to enter into any formal stipulation on the subject; and in a subsequent part of it, refers "to great principles too deeply rooted in the consciences and sympathies of the British people," which might cause a disavowal of any engagement into which he might enter for the purpose of settling this question.

But, even if the engagement contained in this note of Lord Ashburton were solemnly inserted in the body of the treaty itself, it would be wholly ineffectual. It is contained in two sentences, which I shall read:

"In the mean time, (says his Lordship,) I can engage that instructions shall be given to the Governors of her Majesty's colonies on the southern borders of the United States, to execute their own laws with careful attention to the wish of their Government, and that there shall be no officious interference with American vessels driven by accident or by violence into those ports. The laws and duties of hospitality shall be executed, and those seen neither to require nor to justify any further inquisition into the state of persons or things on board of vessels so situated, than may be indispensable to enforce the observance of the municipal law of the colony, and the proper regulation of its harbors and waters."

Now, sir, when we consider the nature of our grievance, we shall perceive at once how wholly inadequate his Lordship's stipulation will be to afford a remedy. American citizens, in transporting their slaves by sea, from the Atlantic States to States on the Gulf of Mexico, and on the Mississippi, must pass through the Bahama channel. If their vessels are driven into any British port along this channel, by storms, or are carried there in consequence of mutiny and murder, the slaves, who can escape to the shore by any means whatever, are instantly free. Such is the law of England, which will most probably never be changed. But whilst the slaves remain on board of an American vessel, they are, in the contemplation of the law of nations, on American soil. Now, if his Lordship had stipulated that the British authorities should prevent the slaves on board of vessels driven into port by storms, or carried there by mutiny, from making their escape to the shore, there would have been some efficiency in the engagement. This would have been a stipulation to do a positive act, which would have retained and secured the slaves in the possession of their masters. But the engagements of Lord Ashburton are all merely negative. The British colonial governors are not themselves to be instrumental in releasing the slaves—they shall not officially interfere with American vessels driven by accident and by violence into those ports,—they shall not make any further inquisition into the state of persons or things on board of vessels thus situated, than may be necessary to enforce the municipal law. All is negative, and is intended merely to prevent the British authorities themselves from becoming actors in violating our rights! The people of any of these colonies, without violating his Lordship's engagement, may interfere to produce the escape of the slaves from any such vessels. That they will hereafter act in this manner, there can be no doubt, judging from their past conduct.

On the 15th of April, 1840, we resolved, by a unanimous vote, that our ships on the high seas, in time of peace, were, according to the law of nations, under the exclusive jurisdiction of our country; and, further, that, when forced by stress of weather, or other unavoidable cause, into the ports of a friendly power, they, with

[2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

their cargoes, "and persons on board, with their property, and all the rights belonging to their personal relations, as established by the laws of the State to which they belong, would be placed under the protection which the law of nations extends to the unfortunate under such circumstances." These propositions have been demonstrated by the Secretary of State. And yet, after our clear rights, under the law of nations, have been repeatedly outraged by the British authorities and people, all we have obtained for their security is a diplomatic note containing engagements which will have no practical effect whatever, and which may be recalled at pleasure by the British Government. So much for the case of the Oreole.

I now approach the treaty itself, and shall first discuss the eighth article. It stipulates that each of the contracting parties shall maintain on the coast of Africa a naval force not less than eighty guns, to enforce, separately, the laws of each country for the suppression of the slave-trade; "the said squadrons to be independent of each other, but the two Governments stipulating, nevertheless, to give such orders to their officers commanding their respective forces, as shall enable them to act most effectually in concert and co-operation, upon mutual consultation, as exigencies may arise, for the attainment of the true object of this article; copies of all such orders to be communicated by each Government to the other, respectively."

Now, sir, the first remark in regard to this most important article, which must strike every mind, is, that it has become a part of the treaty, without any correspondence whatever between the two plenipotentiaries in relation to the subject. We are left entirely in the dark as to the motives which influenced the negotiators in forming this article, except from the obscure hints which may be collected from the President's Message which accompanied the treaty. And here I would remark, that this correspondence throughout presents a singular spectacle, which, I trust, may never be exhibited again in any important negotiation with a foreign power. Every thing had been previously arranged in verbal conferences, without any note or memorandum of what had transpired at them, before the date of the letters communicated with the treaty; and these letters were evidently intended merely to present results in such a form as might best satisfy the people of both nations. The original pretensions on the one side or the other—the manner in which they were resisted—the means by which they were modified and received their present form—all, all are buried in oblivion, so far as this Government is concerned. The tracks of the negotiators were made upon the sand, and the returning tide has effaced them forever. Such is the case in relation to this Government; but not so, I shall venture to assert, in regard to England.

Now, sir, in common with all America, I abhor the slave-trade. Our duty both to God and man requires that we should prevent it from being conducted under the American flag. For this purpose, we ought to send a naval force to the coast of Africa, whenever it may become necessary for its suppression. This course we have always hitherto pursued. But why should we yield up the exercise of our own free will, at the dictation of England? Why should we bind ourselves in bonds to her that we shall do our duty? The Father of his Country, while he advised us to cultivate peace and friendship with all nations, at the same time warned us against entangling alliances with any. We have hitherto acted upon this wise and salutary maxim; and the present is the first entangling alliance we have ever contracted with any nation, since the date of his solemn warning. Hereafter, whether it be convenient or inconvenient to us—whether it be necessary or not,—we have solemnly pledged ourselves to England, that, at all times, and under all circumstances, during the period of five years, we shall keep eighty guns afloat on the coast of Africa: and she, of all others, is the nation which will exact a strict performance of this pledge. There is no reciprocity, except in name, in this article of the treaty. The naval force of Great Britain is so large, that, without any engagement whatever, she would keep a greater number than eighty guns on the African coast. In the face of all these objections, and in this moment of our depressed finances, we agree to expend $700,000 per annum, to enable England to present to Christendom this new trophy which she has won in the cause of universal emancipation. I take my estimate of the expense from the Senators from Missouri and New Hampshire, (Messrs. BENTON and WOODBURY,) who state that the cost of each gun at sea (including ship-building and all) amounts to $9,000.

But, sir, much as I dislike this article in the aspect in which it has already been presented, I dislike it still more when viewed in another light. To me, it appears, under all the circumstances, to be the price paid to the British Government for a relinquishment of its claim, during the continuance of the treaty, to the right of visiting and searching American vessels on the coast of Africa. On this subject we must grope our way in the dark—having no light to direct our steps, but what appears on the face of the article itself, and the intimations contained in the President's Message.

We have the declaration of the President, "that the treaty obligations subsisting between the two countries for the suppression of the African slave-trade, and the complaints made to this Government within the last three or four years, (many of them but too well founded,) of the visitation, seizure, and detention of American vessels on that coast, by British cruisers, could not but form a delicate and highly important part of the negotiations which have now been held." We thus learn, from the highest authority, that the right of visitation and search on the African coast did form a delicate and highly important part of the negotiations. This was all conducted in private conferences; as nothing on the subject appears in the correspondence. Mr. Webster must, unquestionably, have complained to Lord Ashburton of the outrages committed upon our flag by British cruisers; and his Lordship most probably replied that these were necessary to suppress the slave-trade in American vessels. How was the question to be compromised? By a stipulation, on the part of the United States, that they would keep a sufficient force on the coast of Africa to visit and search their own vessels, thus rendering unnecessary their visitation and search by British cruisers. In this inference I am sustained by the language of the President. He says that "the examination or visitation of the merchant vessels of one nation, by the cruisers of another, for any purpose, except those known and acknowledged by the law of nations, under whatever restraints or regulations it may take place, may lead to dangerous results. It is far better, by other means, to supersede any supposed necessity, or any motive, for such examination or visit. Interference with a merchant vessel by an armed cruiser, is always a delicate proceeding, apt to touch the point of national honor, as well as to affect the interest of individuals. It has been thought, therefore, expedient, not only in accordance with the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent, but, at the same time, as removing all pretext on the part of others for violating the immunities of the American flag upon the seas, as they exist and are defined by the law of nations, to enter into the articles now submitted to the Senate." These articles, then, were entered into for the purpose of removing all pretexts, on the part of the British Government, for examining and searching our vessels on the coast of Africa. These articles are the price which we have agreed to pay for the privilege of not being searched by British cruisers. But the eighth article of the treaty may be annulled, at the pleasure of either Government, at the end of five years; and if it should be, what will then be our condition? All the arrogant and unjust pretensions of the British Government to visit and examine American vessels will then revive; because the treaty contains no renunciation whatever of these pretensions. The parties will then be remitted to the condition in which they were placed before it was concluded. Nay, more; the claim of Great Britain will be strengthened by the fact, that we have agreed to purchase a temporary exemption from its exercise, at the price of maintaining a squadron of eighty guns on the coast of Africa during a period of five years.

The President has referred to the stipulations contained in the treaty of Ghent as one reason for the adoption of this eighth article. The tenth article of that treaty declares as follows: "Whereas the traffic in slaves is irreconcilable with the principles of humanity and justice, and whereas both his Majesty and the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire abolition, it is hereby agreed, that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an object."

The whole world knows how early, and with what persevering energy, the United States have exerted themselves to suppress this odious trade. They were the first, a few years after the treaty of Ghent, to denounce it as piracy under their laws; and other nations have followed their example. They have faithfully complied with the treaty of Ghent, in using their best endeavors for the suppression of this trade. But will any person pretend that the tenth article of this treaty imposes any obligation upon them to make a new and distinct treaty, abridging their liberty of thinking and acting for themselves in accomplishing this desirable object; and compelling them to maintain a squadron on the coast of Africa, to act in concert with a British squadron, for this purpose? Surely, Lord Ashburton never set up any such pretension. The tenth article of the treaty of Ghent is complete in itself, and contemplated no new stipulation between the two Governments.

Senators say that the two squadrons are to act independently of each other; and no danger now exists that American vessels will be visited and examined by British cruisers. I trust that the facts may justify their prediction. But the treaty itself provides that the two Governments shall "give such orders to the officers commanding their respective forces, as shall enable them most effectually to act in concert and co-operation." The British squadron on the coast of Africa will necessarily be larger than the American; and it will be commanded by an admiral, or other officer of high rank. Although no direct orders may be issued from the British commander to an American officer: yet, when the two squadrons are bound to co-operate with each other, influence will, probably, be substituted for command. The American squadron will thus, in effect, become a mere subsidiary force to that of England. Upon a review of all the considerations involved in this subject, I feel deeply solicitous that the pending motion should prevail, to strike this eighth article from the treaty. There is not the least danger but that it will be ratified by England without this article. The honor of the nation requires that we should make this amendment. After all that has passed, we should stand upon that sacred principle of the law of nations that the American flag—waving at the mast head of an American vessel, shall protect her from visitation and search by British cruisers. In what condition do we place France by yielding to the demands of England—that France, whose people have ever been ready and ever willing to stand by us in the day and hour of danger? It is known to us all that England, by her persevering solicitations, had obtained from the Governments of France, Russia, Prussia, and Austria, a treaty yielding the right of search on the coast of Africa; and she expected to extort this concession from us, through the moral influence of these nations. The treaty had not yet been ratified by France, when our minister at Paris interposed. His powerful protest against it aroused the French people to a sense of their danger. They took the alarm, and, like their fathers in the Revolution, they united with us in asserting the independence of their flag and our flag. Such a storm of indignation was thus raised, that the French Government withheld its ratification from the quintuple treaty. And yet, after all this, we have deserted our ancient ally—we have framed a treaty with the British Government, by which they not only do not renounce the right of search, but have obtained from us an implied acknowledgment of the existence of such a right, by our engagement, in consideration of the temporary suspension of its exercise, to maintain a squadron of eighty guns on the coast of Africa for five years, to act in concert and co-operation with the British squadron. Surely, surely, the Senate will not ratify this article of the treaty. Surely, surely, the Senate will not ratify the unjust claim of the British Government to be the supreme protector of the rights of humanity, either on the ocean or on the land.

I have now reached the North-eastern boundary question; and I have, on former occasions, written and spoken so much in support of our title to the disputed territory, that I shall trouble the Senate with but a few observations on this branch of the subject. I entirely concur in the opinion formerly expressed by Mr. Webster, that the claim of the British Government "does not amount to the dignity of a debatable question." The Senate unanimously adopted a resolution on the 4th of July, 1838, reported by myself, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, declaring, "That after a careful examination, and deliberate consideration of the controversy between the United States and Great Britain relative to the North-eastern boundary of the former, the Senate does not entertain a doubt of the entire practicability of running and marking that boundary in strict conformity with the stipulations of the definitive treaty of peace of seventeen hundred and eighty-three; and it entertains a perfect conviction of the justice and validity of the title of the United States to the full extent of all the territory in dispute between the two powers." The distinguished predecessor (Mr. CLAY) of the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CRITTENDEN,) then a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, cordially approved both of the report and of this resolution; and, upon his motion, the latter was considered and adopted on the anniversary of our independence. He said that there was a peculiar fitness in resolving to maintain the independence and integrity of the old thirteen United States on the anniversary of that memorable day on which our independence was declared. I can never, then, admit that our title to the disputed territory was even doubtful.

[Here Mr. B. made an extended examination of our title as described in former treaties, and continued thus:]

I have said much more on this branch of the subject than I had intended, not for the purpose of establishing our right, but to show that the miserable pretexts to which the British Government have been compelled to resort in order to obtain our territory, are unworthy of a great nation, and that Lord Ashburton can never free them from the imputation of demanding that to which they must have known they had no right.

Let me now present a sketch of the history of this negotiation between Mr. Webster and Lord Ashburton, in relation to the Maine boundary, in a plain and distinct form, before the Senate. The first fact which strikes the mind with astonishment is, that Mr. Webster should have agreed, in their preliminary conference, to waive all discussion "on the general grounds on which each party considers their claims respectively to rest," as not calculated to lead to any practical result. This appears conclusively from the very first paragraph of the first letter addressed by Lord Ashburton to Mr. Webster, on the 13th June, 1842, and his answer of the 8th July.

I may be asked what course Mr. Webster, in my opinion, ought to have pursued. I answer, he ought to have invariably insisted on our right to the disputed territory; but, at the same time, to have expressed his willingness, for the sake of good neighborhood, and in consideration of a fair equivalent in territory, to have yielded this right so far as to grant to Great Britain what her commissioners had so earnestly desired at Ghent—"such a variation of the line of frontier as might secure a direct communication between Quebec and Halifax." Nature herself seems to have pointed out these mutual equivalents. Whoever will cast his eye over the map of Maine and New Brunswick, must be forcibly struck with this truth. If the right of way over our territory between Halifax and Quebec had been alone solicited, it ought to have been conceded to Great Britain in exchange for the right to navigate the St. John. But, as the British Government earnestly desired to possess the right of sovereignty in the soil over which this way passed, the northern triangle of Maine ought to have been surrendered for the much smaller triangle belonging to the province of New Brunswick, west of the St. John. This would have established a river boundary between the two countries, from the point where the due-north line from the monument strikes Eel River, all the distance round by Eel River, the St. John, and the St. Francis, to the western highland boundary of the treaty. But what is our present condition, under this treaty? We have ceded to Great Britain all the territory she desired; and yet we have not obtained this narrow strip of territory west of the St. John. She still retains it: and there an organized system of smuggling can be established; and from thence, in case of war, her troops can be poured into the very heart of the State of Maine. To preserve peace and good neighborhood between independent nations, a river or a mountain boundary has always been deemed of essential importance. And yet, strange as it may seem, we have never insisted upon this river boundary, on the east of Maine, which Nature herself seems to have established; whilst we have actually surrendered into the keeping of Great Britain the whole of our western mountain boundary.

August, 1842.]

The British Treaty.

[27th Conn.]

Lord Ashburton having obtained from Mr. Webster the important concession that the right of the United States to the disputed territory should no longer be a subject of discussion, the next concession which this shrewd, practical diplomatist desired to obtain, seemed to follow as an almost necessary consequence. For years the British Government have contended that the whole territory of Maine north of these pretended highlands, which take a westerly direction from Mars Hill, was in dispute; and that it was impossible to ascertain the rights of the respective parties, according to the treaty. Assuming these facts, they had, over and over again, proposed to divide the disputed territory between the two countries, without granting any equivalent to us beyond its limits. When the American negotiator, therefore, in the very beginning, admitted that it would be in vain for us to insist upon our rights under the treaty, it seemed to follow, as a necessary consequence, that the disputed territory must be divided between the parties, according to the suggestion of the British Government. But this was far from the opinion of the Legislature of Maine. Indeed, it does not even seem to have originally been the intention of Lord Ashburton himself to make any such extravagant demand. The Secretary of State, in his letter to Gov. Fairfield, dated 11th April, 1842, informs him that his Lordship has "officially announced to this department, that, in regard to the boundary question, he has authority to treat for a conventional line, or line by agreement, on such terms and conditions, and with such mutual considerations and equivalents as may be thought just and equitable." I would ask every Senator of this body, if, when he first read this letter of Mr. Webster, it entered into his imagination to conceive that Lord Ashburton, by these expressions, meant no more than a division of the disputed territory between the parties. Had he thus expressed himself, in distinct terms—my life upon it, Maine never would have appointed commissioners. But Maine did not leave this question in doubt. Her Legislature, on the 20th May, 1842, at the time when her commissioners were chosen, resolved, "That this State cannot regard the relinquishment, by the British Government, of any claim heretofore advanced by it to the territory included within the limits of the line of this State, as designated by the treaty of 1783, and uniformly claimed by Maine, as a consideration or equivalent within the meaning of these resolutions."

It is a most curious point of diplomatic history, how, in the very face of this resolution of instructions, the Maine commissioners were led on, step by step, to give their assent to the present treaty. It will be well worth while to spend a few moments in tracing this strange history.

The commissioners of Maine had their first audience with Mr. Webster on Monday, the 13th of June. On the 17th June, Mr. Webster informed Lord Ashburton that he was prepared to commence the negotiation. On the 18th June, they held their first conference; but what transpired at this conference is buried in oblivion. No record of it will ever meet the public eye. If Mr. Webster had evinced half as much skill in managing Lord Ashburton as he displayed in managing the commissioners of Maine, that State would have acquired the strip of territory on the right bank of the St. John, which she so much desired to possess.

The result of this conference was the letter of Lord Ashburton to Mr. Webster of the 21st of June. This letter, although conciliatory in its terms, is one of bold and barefaced pretension. It asserts the principle (which both the State of Maine and the General Government had so long resisted) that there must be a division of the disputed territory between the two countries, without any other equivalent to us; and it not only demands for Great Britain all the disputed territory north of the St. John and the St. Francis, but also the whole of the Madawaska settlement south of the St. John. Nay, more: his Lordship asserts a claim of which we never had before heard, to the whole territory south of the St. Francis and west of the St. John, down to "some one of its sources" in the highlands—thus intending to deprive Maine not only of her western highland boundary, but of the whole valley between that boundary and the river St. John. He seems to have well understood the policy of asking much more than he would be willing to accept. In making this demand, his Lordship resorts to the common diplomatic finesse, that he could not, in any case, abandon the obvious interests of the Madawaska settlement south of the St. John; and, to give this and other declarations the greater effect, he solemnly declares: "I have not treated the subject in the ordinary form of a bargain, where the party making the proposal leaves himself something to give up. The case would not admit of this, even if I could bring myself so to act." And yet the case did admit of this; and his Lordship did bring himself very quietly so to act, within a few days, and as soon as he discovered that the Maine commissioners had resisted this claim to

2D SESS.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

the Madawaska settlement with becoming spirit; his pretended instructions to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. Webster refers this letter of Lord Ashburton to the commissioners of Maine, and reserves to himself the part of mediator between them and Lord Ashburton. In their note to him of the 29th June, they declare (page 56) that they can never surrender the Madawaska settlement south of the St. John; "and that, if the adoption of such a line is a sine qua non on the part of the British Government, the commissioners on the part of the State of Maine feel it their duty as distinctly to say, that any attempt at an amicable adjustment of the controversy respecting the North-eastern boundary on that basis, with the consent of Maine, would be entirely fruitless."

The Maine commissioners then proceed to offer to Mr. Webster a counter-projet, and to propose a conventional line. And here permit me to observe, that it is a most astonishing fact, that these commissioners never even asked for a cession of the narrow triangular strip of land west of the St. John. I venture to say that no American statesman, who has ever examined the subject of a conventional line, has entertained any other idea than that this strip of land ought to be the equivalent for the tract of country north of the St. John and St. Francis. If a bare right of way was to be surrendered to England over the disputed territory, the navigation of the St. John would be the natural equivalent; but if, in addition to this, the British Government asked a cession of the sovereignty and soil of the territory north of the St. John, then the equally fair equivalent was a surrender by them to Maine of the strip of land north of Eel River, on the right bank of the St. John—thus establishing a river boundary between Maine and New Brunswick. This impression has been deeply fixed upon my mind for years. I have talked of it a hundred times, and every person with whom I have conversed has been under the same impression. This was the "general and confident expectation of the people of Maine," as we are informed by her commissioners. With a view to this, the Legislature of that State had solemnly resolved that no relinquishment of territory on the part of the British Government, within what it chose to denominate the disputed territory, should ever be considered by Maine as an equivalent for the surrender of any portion of that territory to Great Britain.

This resolution, it is well known, pointed clearly and distinctly to the acquisition of the strip west of the St. John. And yet the Maine commissioners, in their counter-projet, not only did not demand this territory, but they expressly surrendered all claim to it. And why? because, to use their own language, "they have been assured that Lord Ashburton is restrained, by his instructions, from yielding the island of Grand Menan, or any of the islands in Passamaquoddy Bay, or even any portion of the narrow strip of territory which lies between the due-north line from the source of the St. Croix and the St. John River, above Eel River, (so called,) as an equivalent for any portion of the territory claimed by Maine as within her boundaries." By whom had they been thus assured? Unquestionably by Mr. Webster. By whom had they been prevailed upon to surrender the claims of their State to this strip of territory? Certainly by Mr. Webster, upon the assurance that Lord Ashburton was restrained, by his instructions, from yielding it. This was the fatal point of negotiation for the State of Maine. It was here that the rights of that State, and of the United States, were abandoned. This territory ought to have been resolutely demanded as an equivalent for the darling object which Great Britain had for so many years eagerly pursued—that of acquiring the territory over which lay the communication between New Brunswick and Quebec. If Lord Ashburton's instructions prohibited him from surrendering this strip of territory, new instructions could and would have been obtained, had they been found necessary. If this had not been the case, I would have referred the question to another arbiter, (an alternative to which Lord Ashburton often alludes,) or have hazarded any other consequences, rather than have tamely yielded the principle against which we had so long contended—that our right to the disputed territory was doubtful; and, therefore, because it was so, that a division of it ought to be made between the two nations. But his Lordship (according to his own declaration) never could have surrendered the Madawaska territory south of the St. John; and yet he did agree to surrender it, before it was possible for him to have obtained new instructions from England. Had the Maine commissioners insisted upon this tract of country with the same manly firmness as they had done upon retaining the Madawaska settlement south of the St. John, in all human probability it would have been attended with a similar result. His Lordship's alleged instructions would have yielded to circumstances, as they had done before; and this negotiation might have closed with honor to the country. The moment that the Maine commissioners were prevailed upon to yield this point without a struggle, all was lost. Every principle for which we had so long contended was at once abandoned; and nothing more remained than to decide how much of the territory of Maine should be conceded to the demands of Great Britain. The Maine commissioners seem themselves to have been deeply sensible of this degrading truth. They declare that, as they can obtain no equivalent beyond the disputed territory, "they feel themselves constrained to say that the portion of territory within the limits of Maine, as claimed by her, which they are prepared, in a spirit of peace and good neighborhood, to yield for the accommodation of Great Britain, must be restrained and confined to such portions only,

August, 1842.]

The British Treaty.

[27th CONN.]

and in such reasonable extent, as is necessary to secure to Great Britain an unobstructed communication and connection of her colonies with each other."

They then proposed to yield to Great Britain all that had been awarded to her by the King of the Netherlands, (whose award the Senate had so promptly rejected, but which had been so eagerly accepted by the British King,) with the exception of a small portion of the territory north of the St. Francis. This proposition gave to England all the territory that was necessary to secure the communication between her provinces; but whilst doing this, it would, to a partial extent, have saved our Government from the disgrace of having, for so many years, warred against the award of the King of the Netherlands, and afterwards accepted worse terms than it proposed.

Mr. Webster, on the 7th of July, transmits this letter of the commissioners of Maine to Lord Ashburton, accompanied by a long diplomatic note. In this note he expressly recognizes that his Lordship is not at liberty "to cede the whole or part of the territory, commonly called the strip, lying east of the north line, and west of the St. John." How had Mr. Webster acquired a knowledge of this most important fact? It must have been in their verbal conferences; for Lord Ashburton had not previously committed himself by any such declaration in any portion of his correspondence. In it he has nowhere stated that his instructions forbade him to make such a surrender.

It is also worthy of remark, that whilst Mr. Webster, with a strange inconsistency between his arguments and his actions which characterizes this negotiation, is communicating to Lord Ashburton a proposition to surrender to him all that portion of the disputed territory for which England had originally contended, and although he had thus rendered it impossible that any discussion of our title could benefit his country, yet he does, notwithstanding, demonstrate the right of the State of Maine to all this territory, with irresistible clearness and power. He is equally triumphant on this question, as on the Creole and Caroline questions, or in resisting the doctrine of impressment; but, unfortunately, his arguments have fallen to the ground, without producing any beneficial result.

Lord Ashburton, with that skill and address which have characterized him throughout the whole negotiation, now eagerly seized the advantage which he had obtained over Mr. Webster and the Maine commissioners. They had fatally, in advance, bound themselves to grant all that England originally sought or desired. To this extent they stood committed; and his object now was to obtain, in addition, a cession of the western highland boundary of Maine, for the purpose of covering Quebec, and of assailing us with tremendous advantage in the event of war between the two countries. He now departs from the moderate and conciliatory tone which he had assumed everywhere else throughout the negotiation. In his letter to Mr. Webster of the 11th July, he avows the proposition of the commissioners of Maine; indeed, he treats it almost as if it were an insult. He feels himself "quite at a loss" to account for such a proposal, and he appeals to the candid judgment of Mr. Webster to say "whether this is a proposition for conciliation." He says that he need not examine the line proposed by the Maine commissioners in its precise details, because he is obliged to state frankly that it is inadmissible.

But with all this affected indignation and astonishment, he is very careful not to break off the negotiation. He was too wise and too wary thus to endanger the advantage he had obtained. He therefore suggests to Mr. Webster that the negotiation "would have a better chance of success by conference than by correspondence." He trusts more in the diplomacy of the secret conclave, where there was no ear to hear and no pen to record, their conferences, than in the bold, open, manly mode, in which a negotiation ought to be conducted between the responsible ministers of responsible Governments.

In this letter of the 11th July, his Lordship insists upon our surrender of the district between the St. John and the highlands west of that river, and, without disguise, declares that he wants it "for no other purpose than as a boundary." This, permit me to say, is the very reason why it should never have been yielded. These highlands were our natural boundary, as well as our treaty boundary; and we ought never to have surrendered them into the hands of the only formidable enemy we can ever have on this continent.

The prediction of his Lordship, that there would be a better chance of success by conference than by correspondence, was very well verified. In four short days, these personal conferences produced a wonderful effect. On the 15th July, 1842, Mr. Webster proposes to the commissioners of Maine and Massachusetts the lines of the present treaty; urges them to the strongest terms to surrender the western highland boundary of Maine to England; proposes to pay them out of the Treasury of the United States the sum of $250,000, as an equivalent for the surrender of this territory of 30 square miles; promises to refund the expenses which they had incurred for the civil posts they had maintained, and the survey they had made; and concludes with the expression of his "conviction that no more advantageous arrangement could be made."

Let us here pause for a moment upon this astonishing fact, that this proposition made to the Maine commissioners proceeded, not from Lord Ashburton, but from Mr. Webster; not from the British envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, but from our Secretary of State. It was a proposition previously concocted between the negotiators, and its acceptance urged upon the Maine commissioners

2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

as the British ultimatum, by the very man to whom the President had intrusted the rights and the honor of his country.

We now first hear from the Massachusetts commissioners; and their letter is truly characteristic. That State had no direct interest in the question of territorial sovereignty over the disputed territory, but merely in the right of soil. They accordingly treat it as a question, not of national honor, but of dollars and cents. They say to Mr. Webster, in their letter of the 20th July: "Whether the national boundary suggested by you be suitable or unsuitable; whether the compensation which Great Britain offers to the United States for the territory conceded to her be adequate or inadequate; and whether the treaty which shall be effected shall be honorable to the country, or incompatible with its rights and dignity, are questions not for Massachusetts, but for the General Government, upon its responsibility to the whole country, to decide." They thus waive the question of national honor; but not so the question of dollars and cents. They higgled about the price to be paid for their land. They demanded $25,000 more than Mr. Webster had offered. This seems to have been their sine qua non; and if the sum to be given them shall be increased to the sum of $150,000 instead of $125,000, the State of Massachusetts, through her commissioners, hereby relinquishes to the United States her interest in the lands which will be excluded from the dominion of the United States by the establishment of the boundary aforesaid." It is needless to say that Mr. Webster would not stand long for $25,000, in such a bargain, especially when the money was to be paid out of the treasury of the United States.

The Maine commissioners seemed then to be abandoned by the whole world, and their position became truly embarrassing. This proposition was urged upon them, not by Lord Ashburton, but by their own Secretary of State, with the approbation of their own National Administration. That man of gigantic intellect, those great powers ought to have been taxed to the utmost to save Maine from dismemberment, was the very man who urged them to assent to the dismemberment. They were seduced, at the most critical moment, by the commissioners of Massachusetts, who had assented to the proposition of Mr. Webster. They were induced to believe that the question of peace or war was suspended on their decision. It was proclaimed in the streets of Washington that the obstinacy of the Maine commissioners prevented the settlement of all our questions of dispute with England. I was myself induced to give credit to this rumor; and when I was confidentially informed, by a Senator on this side, of the true nature of the case, my astonishment and mortification knew no bounds. Under these circumstances, a most reluctant assent to the proposition of Mr. Webster was extorted from the Maine commissioners. It is due to them that I should read to the Senate the terms in which it is given. Their letter to Mr. Webster bears date 22d July, 1842, and concludes with the following paragraphs:

"We are now given to understand that the Executive of the United States, representing the sovereignty of the Union, assents to the proposal; and that this department of the Government at least is anxious for its acceptance, as, in its view, most expedient for the general good.

"The commissioners of Massachusetts have already given their assent on behalf of that Commonwealth. Thus situated, the commissioners of Maine, invoking the spirit of attachment and patriotic devotion of their State to the Union, and being willing to yield to the deliberate convictions of her sister States as to the path of duty, and to interpose no obstacles to an adjustment which the general judgment of the nation shall pronounce as honorable and expedient, even if that judgment shall lead to a surrender of a portion of the birthright of the people of their State, and prized by them because it is their birthright, have determined to overcome their objections to the proposal, so far as to say, that if, upon mature consideration, the Senate of the United States shall advise and consent to the ratification of a treaty, corresponding in its terms to your proposal, and with the conditions in our memorandum accompanying this note, (marked A,) and identified by our signatures, they, by virtue of the power vested in them by the resolves of the Legislatures of Maine, give the assent of that State to such conventional line, with the terms, conditions, and equivalents herein mentioned."

This conditional assent casts the responsibility of the treaty upon the Senate of the United States. It is for us to pronounce, in the language of the Maine commissioners, whether this treaty is honorable and expedient, and such a one as the general judgment of the nation will approve. We must encounter this responsibility, whether we will or not.

It would be a waste of time to pursue the subject further, in detail. Mr. Webster, on the 28th July, in form, made the proposition to Lord Ashburton, which had, in substance, been previously agreed upon between them, in personal conference, before it was presented to the Maine commissioners; and which he, therefore, knew would be accepted: and the treaty was concluded accordingly.

Thus have we yielded to a foreign power an ancient highland boundary for which our fathers fought. Thus has it been blotted out from the treaty which acknowledged our independence. Thus has England reclaimed an important portion of that territory, which had been wrested from her by the bravery and the blood of our revolutionary fathers. We have restored to her not only all the land north of the St. John and the St. Francis, but also our mountain boundary south of these rivers, down to the Metjarmette portage. Along the base of these mountains she can, and she will, establish fortifications and military posts, from which she may at once penetrate into the very heart of Maine. It is a vain labor for the Secretary to prove that the territory ceded is unfit for cultivation. England did not demand it for its agricultural value. Why did Lord Ashburton insist upon its surrender with so much pertinacity and zeal? Because it not only covered Quebec and Lower Canada from our assaults, but exposed our territory to the assaults of England without any interposing natural barrier. On the east, on the north, and on the west, Maine is now left naked and exposed to the attacks of our domineering and insatiable neighbor; and we have bestowed upon her all this territory, without having asked her to grant us even the small strip north of Eel River, on the right bank of the St. John, which would have given us, to that extent, a river boundary. These highlands, throughout their whole range, from the north-west head of the Connecticut River to the north-west angle of Nova Scotia, which divide the rivers flowing into the St. Lawrence from those which empty themselves into the Atlantic Ocean, will exclusively belong to England, should this treaty be ratified by the Senate. The Alpine boundary (which Adams and Franklin and Jay had secured to their country by the treaty of Independence) has been extorted from us by our most formidable enemy. We have acted as the Roman Republic would have done, had she surrendered the Alps to the hostile nations of Gaul and Germany, and thus opened the way for the invasion of Italy. And this suicidal policy has been adopted, upon the principle, or the pretext, that our Alpine barrier and boundary were not fit for cultivation! This is the argument of Mr. Webster.

And yet, to excuse this surrender, we are presented with the pretence of having obtained equivalents in lands better fitted for cultivation. What are these pretended equivalents? In describing them, I cannot do better than to adopt the language of the commissioners of Maine. "In New Hampshire (they say) Lord Ashburton consents to take the true north-west source of Connecticut River, instead of the north-east source." That is, in other words, he consents to abide by the clear language of the treaty of Independence, instead of persisting in the demand of England to substitute the north-east for "the north-westernmost head of Connecticut River." "In Vermont, he will abide by the old line which was run, marked, and solemnly established nearly seventy years ago. In New York, he will abide by the same old line, the effect of rectifying it being merely to give to New York a small angular strip on the west, and Great Britain a small angular strip on the east." "These small tracts and parings" (to use the language of the commissioners) are to be the equivalents for surrendering our mountain boundary into the keeping of Great Britain, without any estimate of the value of the strip which we have surrendered to her of our undisputed territory, along the line running due north from the monument. He has thus most graciously consented not to take advantage of the very trifling mistake committed by the British Government itself, more than 70 years ago, in running and marking the 45th parallel of latitude, and under which we have held possession ever since we were an independent nation.

I shall not speak of the equivalents which the Secretary claims to have obtained in the North-west. The Senator from Missouri (Mr. BEXRON) has already placed this part of the subject in so clear a light, that it would be a waste of time again to present it to the Senate. He has clearly demonstrated that, instead of acquiring any territory in that quarter to which we were not clearly entitled under the treaty of 1783, we have actually sacrificed important territorial rights which we held under that treaty.

Away with such pretences. They are nothing more than mere flimsy apologies for the disgrace of an unqualified surrender of our territory to British dictation. They are the miserable pretexts under color of which it is expected that this disgraceful treaty shall escape from public indignation.

There is one fact strictly in character with this whole transaction, which deserves special notice. It is this: that, under the terms of the treaty, we have solemnly bound ourselves to Great Britain that we shall pay to our own States of Maine and Massachusetts the expenses of their civil posse and their survey, and also the three hundred thousand dollars in consideration of their assent to the new line of boundary. On the face of the treaty, then, these two States have been restored to the protection of England, so far as the payment of this money is concerned. England, under the treaty, would be bound to demand and enforce its payment against the United States; and thus we have placed in the hands of a foreign nation the power to interfere in behalf of two States of this Union against their own Federal Government. Lord Ashburton himself thus construed the treaty; because, on the 9th August, he addressed a note to Mr. Webster, asking him to state that the British Government should incur no responsibility on account of this engagement; and to this Mr. Webster assented.

Before I leave this branch of the subject, permit me to remark, that I disclaim any imputation of improper motives to the commissioners of Maine in regard to their conduct. On the contrary, I entertain the highest respect for one and all of them. They have been led on step by step, to the consummation at which they arrived; when I firmly believe, that if the proposition to which they finally gave their reluctant conditional assent had been presented to them at the first, in all its naked deformity, they would have repelled it as an insult to the patriotic and gallant State of which they were the honored representatives.

I have now reached the North-western boundary question; which is, by far, the most dan-

2d Sess.]

The British Treaty.

[August, 1842.]

gerous and important question between the two nations. When Lord Ashburton arrived in this country, as the harbinger of peace, declaring himself to have been charged with full powers to negotiate and settle all matters in discussion between the United States and England, we had every reason to believe that the boundary question, in its whole extent, both in the north-east and the north-west, would have been finally adjusted by the negotiators. In consequence of this confident expectation, my friend from Missouri (Mr. Linn) ceased to urge his bill to establish a Territorial Government in Oregon upon the attention of the Senate, lest it might injuriously interfere with the pending negotiations. But what has been the catastrophe? Our North-western boundary not only forms no part of the treaty, but is not even mentioned or alluded to in the correspondence. We have a correspondence on the case of the Creole, on the case of the Caroline, and on the doctrine of impressment; but Mr. Webster has never addressed a line to Lord Ashburton against the encroachments of Great Britain on that vast region of our territory west of the Rocky Mountains. The only allusion which has been made to the subject, is in the President's Message transmitting the treaty to the Senate. He merely states that, "after sundry informal communications with the British minister upon the subject of the claims of the two countries to territory west of the Rocky Mountains, so little probability was found to exist of coming to any agreement upon that subject at present, that it was not thought expedient to make it one of the subjects of formal negotiation, to be entered upon between this Government and the British minister, as part of his duties under his special mission."

"It was not thought expedient to make it one of the subjects of formal negotiation." We shall not, then, even enjoy the miserable privilege of the vanquished—by all our sacrifices, we have not even purchased our peace. In all human probability, this question will never now be settled without a war, or without a surrender to Great Britain of the whole Oregon Territory north of the Columbia River; and it is even doubtful whether her lust of dominion will be satisfied with such a cession. Nay, more; we have not even purchased a momentary tranquillity; because the danger is impending, and before the close of the next session of Congress we shall probably determine to take possession of this territory. In that event, it will be almost impossible to prevent a collision between the two powers in this remote region.

I have thus concluded all I had intended to say upon this treaty. I cannot vote for its ratification without doing violence to my own conscience and my most cherished principles. Nor am I to be driven from my propriety by the dread of war. I do not apprehend that war would be the consequence of our refusal to ratify this treaty. Lord Ashburton himself has everywhere alluded to another arbitration as the alternative of a failure of success in the negotiation. If another arbiter should even make an award as unfavorable to this country as the terms of the present treaty—an event which I should not anticipate—still we could submit to his award without forfeiting our own self-respect. There would have been no national degradation in submitting to the award of the King of the Netherlands; but very different is the case when we ourselves surrender to England even more than he had bestowed upon her, after having, for so many years, resisted this award.

But suppose war should be the inevitable result? There is one calamity still worse than even war itself; and that is, national dishonor. The voluntary restoration to Great Britain of any portion of the sacred soil "of the old thirteen," which they had wrested from her dominion by the war of independence, without any corresponding equivalent in territory, is an event without a parallel in our past history; and I trust in Heaven that our future annals may never be disgraced by a similar occurrence. We might have yielded this with honor, in obedience to the award of a sovereign arbiter, chosen under the provisions of the treaty of Ghent; but we can never yield it, without national disgrace, to the imperious demand of that haughty power. In expressing myself thus independently, I am far, very far, from intending to impeach the motives of Senators who are friendly to the treaty. I know and appreciate the purity and patriotism of their intentions, and sincerely regret that my own sense of duty compels me to differ so widely from them.

The Senate of the United States in secret session, on the 30th of August, 1842, passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy be removed from the British treaty, the correspondence which accompanied it, and all the proceedings of the Senate thereon, embracing the speeches and remarks of Senators, as soon as the ratifications of the said treaty shall have been exchanged, and it shall have been proclaimed by the President of the United States.]

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.—THIRD SESSION.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

IN THE

SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 5, 1842.

This being the day set apart by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of Congress,

The PRESIDENT pro tem. (Mr. MANGUM) took the chair, and called the Senate to order at the hour of 12 o'clock. He stated that he had been informed by the Sergeant-at-Arms that there was not a quorum of the Senators present.

Mr. HUNTINGTON observed, that that being the case, it was apparent that no business could be transacted to-day; he therefore moved that the Senate adjourn till to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The question was put, and carried in the affirmative; and the Senate accordingly adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 5.

At 12 o'clock the SPEAKER took the chair, and called the House to order; when, the Clerk having called the roll, it appeared that one hundred and seventy members answered to their names, being a sufficient number to constitute a quorum.

The Hon. ROBERT C. WINTHROP, a Representative elect, from the State of Massachusetts, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. NATHAN APPLETON, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. CUSHING submitted the usual joint resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses of Congress had assembled, and were ready to receive any communication he might make.

The resolution having been adopted, Messrs. CUSHING, KENNEDY of Maryland, and TRINGHAST were appointed as the committee on the part of the House.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY, he was excused from serving, on account of indisposition; and Mr. HUNT, of New York, was appointed in his place.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING,

Ordered, That the daily hour of the meeting of the House be at 12 o'clock noon, till further ordered.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 6.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. took the chair at 12 o'clock, and stated that he had been informed by the Sergeant-at-Arms that there was still no quorum present. Such being the fact,

On motion of Mr. KERR, the Senate adjourned till to-morrow morning at 12 o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 6.

Death of the Hon. J. W. Williams.

Mr. JOHN T. MASON rose to announce the death of the Hon. JAMES W. WILLIAMS, of Maryland, and spoke as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I rise to announce the death of the Hon. JAMES W. WILLIAMS, a member of this House from the State of Maryland. Mr. WILLIAMS died suddenly, on the morning of the 2d inst., with a stroke of paralysis, which attacked him in his carriage while on his way to the seat of Government. Although he had been for a long time in feeble health, yet the very sudden and unexpected termination to

3d Sess.]

Death of the Hon. J. W. Williams.

[DECEMBER, 1842.]

which his disease finally came, was well calculated to add new pangs to the grief of his family and friends, which, without that circumstance, would have been deep and poignant at the loss of a parent and husband so devoted, a friend so faithful, and a man so estimable. The profound and unaffected sorrow with which his neighbors and friends received the sad intelligence of his death, the undivided voice with which his many virtues are acknowledged by those with whom he has been associated here, and the confidence which has been reposed in him from time to time by the citizens of his State, constitute a more eloquent and effective eulogium upon him than any thing I can say. In one respect—perhaps in none other—it is well that I have been selected to pay this last tribute to the memory of the deceased. No one, perhaps, on this floor, knew so well, and none could speak with the same knowledge, of those traits which characterized him, and which so exalted him in the estimation of the large circle of his acquaintance. During the whole time that I have been in public life—now four years—whether in our State Legislature, or as a member of this body, Mr. WILLIAMS has been associated with me. At first an adviser, and always a friend, I have had every opportunity of finding out his character, and of appreciating its worth. A more bland and amiable gentleman—a more upright man—a more faithful public servant—and a more sagacious statesman, I have never met with. The friendship and respect of all who knew him; the confidence of his neighbors; his frequent exaltation to responsible public stations; and the extraordinary verification of his prophecy of the civil evolution in Maryland in 1836, and of her recent financial embarrassments—made long before any one else had the wisdom to foresee them—are all abundant evidences of the truth of what I have said. On occasions like these, it is not unusual, I am aware, to pass high encomiums upon the character of the deceased—a mode of proceeding the less requisite in the present instance, as the character of Mr. WILLIAMS was too well established, and held in too high esteem, to have any thing to hope from praise, or to fear from censure. His mild and gentle spirit rendered it nearly impossible for him to have any enemies. The innocence and implicitness of his behavior, the sensibility of his heart, the fidelity with which he discharged his duties of life, the equanimity with which he bore its rebukes and sufferings, will leave a lasting impression on the minds of his friends and acquaintances.

We have just met to enter upon a new session; and the first thing almost that claims our attention—coming, as it were, as a message from the Executive on high, interrupting the salutations of friends, marrying the pleasure of the occasion, and checking the ardor of our hopes—is another example, in the death of our friend, of the uncertainty of human life. It could not have come on a more fit occasion.

We have entered upon a new portion of time, and such occasions are peculiarly favorable to moral reflection. On an entrance on a new scene, or a new period in our life, a contemplative mind will be naturally employed in estimating its acquisitions, comparing its improvements, retracing past occurrences, and revolving future prospects. The example of the deceased is not only before you for such a wholesome exercise of the mind; but to it may be added his voice, which may now be considered as addressing you from the tomb, and enjoining upon you the duty of preparation for another life. What an example of mortality is presented on the present occasion! Without the slightest warning, without the opportunity of a moment's immediate preparation, away from home, and alone, the destroyer met him—no tender assiduities of friendship, no well-known voice, no wife, nor son, nor daughter was near to soothe his sorrows or close his eyes in death. May this solemn event have a wide-spread influence. Instead of murmuring at such afflictive dispensations which separate us from those we love and esteem, let us employ them as motives to set our affections upon the more lasting things of another world—remembering that, whatever ties of affection are broken by death, whatever pleasures are lost to us here, are only taken from the enjoyments of time, to be added to those of eternity.

Mr. WILLIAMS was a native of Maryland, and was aged about fifty-five years. He was for many years a prominent member of the Legislature of his State, and was at one time Speaker of the House of Delegates. During the whole time he was a member, he opposed with firmness and unabated zeal that system of internal improvements which has eventuated in overwhelming the State in endless taxation. Those who are now lamenting over what they regard the evils which that policy has brought upon them, will cherish in high respect his sagacity in predicting those evils, and the pertinacity with which he resisted the system which has entailed them on us. Those who still believe the policy to have been a wise one, must do him the justice to admit that his opposition to it was as honest as it was unyielding. In May, 1841, Mr. WILLIAMS was elected to Congress, and continued a member of this body up to the time of his death. Here, as he was in the Legislature of his State, he was vigilant and regular in his attendance upon his public duties.

In him the State of Maryland has lost a faithful public servant; his family a devoted and affectionate head; and his friends one who was always ready to make any sacrifice to advance their interests.

In conclusion, Mr. MASON offered the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That this House have learned, with feelings of deep sensibility, the intelligence of the decease of the honorable JAMES W. WILLIAMS, late a member of this Congress; and as an evidence of the sympathy which the members entertain and hereby tender to his surviving relatives and personal friends, they will wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

DECEMBER, 1842.]

The President's Message.

[27th Cong.]

Resolved, also, (as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased,) that this House do now adjourn.

Ordered, That the Clerk communicate to the Senate information of the death of JAMES W. WILLIAMS, and of the proceedings of this House thereon.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 7.

Mr. HUNTINGTON presented the credentials of the Hon. SAMUEL C. CRAFT, Senator elected by the Legislature of Vermont, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Judge PRENTISS, which were read. Mr. C. was then qualified and took his seat.

Mr. MILLER presented the credentials of the Hon. WM. L. DAYTON, Senator elected by the Legislature of New Jersey, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD; which were read. Mr. D. was then qualified and took his seat.

The Bankrupt Law.

Mr. BENTON gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

The President's Message.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by MATTHEW ST. CLAIR CLARKE, their Clerk, informing the Senate that a quorum of that body had assembled, and were ready to proceed to legislative business; and also informing the Senate that they had passed a resolution, and appointed a committee under it, to join such committee as might be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses of Congress had assembled, and were ready to receive any communication he might make.

On motion of Mr. KERR, the above resolution was concurred in; and the Chair was authorized to appoint a committee of two on the part of the Senate; when Messrs. KERR and KING were appointed said committee.

A Message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of ROBERT TYLER, Esq., his private secretary, which was read as follows:

To the Senate and

House of Representatives of the United States:

We have continued reason to express our profound gratitude to the great Creator of all things for numberless benefits conferred upon us as a people. Blessed with genial seasons, the husbandman has his garners filled with abundance; and the necessaries of life, not to speak of its luxuries, abound in every direction. While in some other nations steady and industrious labor can hardly find the means of subsistence, the greatest evil which we have to encounter is a surplus of production beyond the home demand, which seeks, and with difficulty finds, a partial market in other regions. The health of the country, with partial exception, has, for the past year, been well preserved; and, under their free and wise institutions, the United States are rapidly advancing towards the consummation of the high destiny which an overruling Providence seems to have marked out for them. Exempt from domestic convulsion, and at peace with all the world, we are free to commit as to the best means of securing and advancing the happiness of the people. Such are the circumstances under which you now assemble in your respective chambers, and which should lead us to unite in praise and thanksgiving to that great Being who made us, and who preserves us as a nation.

I congratulate you, fellow-citizens, on the happy change in the aspect of our foreign affairs since my last annual Message. Causes of complaint at that time existed between the United States and Great Britain, which, attended by irritating circumstances, threatened most seriously the public peace. The difficulty of adjusting amicably the questions at issue between the two countries, was, in no small degree, augmented by the lapse of time since they had their origin. The opinions entertained by the Executive on several of the leading topics in dispute, were frankly set forth in the Message at the opening of your late session. The appointment of a special minister by Great Britain to the United States, with power to negotiate upon most of the points of difference, indicated a desire on her part amicably to adjust them; and that minister was met by the Executive in the same spirit which had dictated his mission. The treaty consequent thereon, having been duly ratified by the two Governments, a copy, together with the correspondence which accompanied it, is herewith communicated. I trust that, whilst you may see in it nothing objectionable, it may be the means of preserving, for an indefinite period, the amicable relations happily existing between the two Governments. The question of peace or war between the United States and Great Britain, is a question of the deepest interest, not only to themselves, but to the civilized world; since it is scarcely possible that a war could exist between them without endangering the peace of Christendom. The immediate effect of the treaty upon ourselves will be felt in the security afforded to mercantile enterprise, which, no longer apprehensive of interruption, adventures its speculations in the most distant sea; and freighted with the diversified productions of every land, returns to bless our own. There is nothing in the treaty which, in the slightest degree, compromises the honor or dignity of either nation. Next to the settlement of the boundary line, which must always be a matter of difficulty between States as between individuals, the question which seemed to threaten the greatest embarrassment was that connected with the African slave trade.

By the 10th article of the treaty of Ghent, it was expressly declared, that "whereas the traffic in slaves is irreconcilable with the principles of

[D. Sess.]

The President's Message.

[DECEMBER, 1842.]

humanity and justice; and whereas both his Majesty and the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire abolition; it is hereby agreed that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an object." In the enforcement of the laws and treaty stipulations of Great Britain, a practice had threatened to grow up, on the part of its cruisers, of subjecting to visitation ships sailing under the American flag, which, while it seriously involved our maritime rights, would subject to vexation a branch of our trade which was daily increasing, and which required the fostering care of the Government. And although Lord Aberdeen, in his correspondence with the American envoys, at London, expressly disclaimed all right to detain an American ship on the high seas, even if found with a cargo of slaves on board, and restricted the British pretension to a mere claim to visit and inquire; yet it could not well be discerned by the Executive of the United States, how such visit and inquiry could be made without detention on the voyage, and consequent interruption to the trade. It was regarded as the right of search, presented only in a new form, and expressed in different words; and I therefore felt it to be my duty distinctly to declare, in my annual Message to Congress, that no such concession could be made, and that the United States had both the will and the ability to enforce their own laws, and to protect their flag from being used for purposes wholly forbidden by those laws, and obnoxious to the moral censure of the world. Taking the Message as his letter of instructions, our then Minister at Paris felt himself required to assume the same ground in a remonstrance which he felt it to be his duty to present to M. Guizot, and, through him, to the King of the French, against what has been called the Quintuple Treaty; and his conduct, in this respect, met with the approval of this Government. In close conformity with these views, the eighth article of the treaty was framed, which provides that "each nation shall keep aloft in the African seas a force of not less than eighty guns, to act separately and apart, under instructions from their respective Governments, and for the enforcement of their respective laws and obligations." From this it will be seen that the ground assumed in the Message has been fully maintained, at the same time that the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent are to be carried out in good faith by the two countries, and that all pretence is removed for interference with our commerce for any purpose whatever, by a foreign Government. While, therefore, the United States have been standing up for the freedom of the seas, they have not thought proper to make that a pretext for avoiding a fulfilment of their treaty stipulations, or a ground for giving countenance to a trade reprobated by our laws. A similar arrangement by the other great powers could not fail to sweep from the ocean the slave-trade, without the interpolation of any new principle into the maritime code. We may be permitted to hope that the example thus set will be followed by some, if not all of them. We thereby also afford suitable protection to the fair trader in those seas; thus fulfilling at the same time the dictates of a sound policy, and complying with the claims of justice and humanity.

It would have furnished additional cause for congratulation, if the treaty could have embraced all subjects calculated in future to lead to a misunderstanding between the two Governments. The territory of the United States, commonly called the Oregon Territory, lying on the Pacific Ocean, north of the forty-second degree of latitude, to a portion of which Great Britain lays claim, begins to attract the attention of our fellow-citizens; and the tide of population, which has reclaimed what was so lately an unbroken wilderness in more contiguous regions, is preparing to flow over those vast districts which stretch from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific Ocean. In advance of the acquirement of individual rights to these lands, sound policy dictates that every effort should be resorted to by the two Governments to settle their respective claims. It became manifest, at an early hour of the late negotiations, that any attempt, for the time being, satisfactorily to determine those rights, would lead to a protracted discussion, which might embrace in its failure other more pressing matters; and the Executive did not regard it as proper to waive all the advantages of an honorable adjustment of other difficulties of great magnitude and importance, because this, not so immediately pressing, stood in the way. Although the difficulty referred to may not, for several years to come, involve the peace of the two countries, yet I shall not delay to urge on Great Britain the importance of its early settlement. Nor will other matters of commercial importance to the two countries be overlooked; and I have good reason to believe that it will comport with the policy of England, as it does with that of the United States, to seize upon this moment, when most of the causes of irritation have passed away, to cement the peace and amity of the two countries, by wisely removing all grounds of probable future collision.

With the other powers of Europe our relations continue on the most amicable footing. Treaties now existing with them should be rigidly observed; and every opportunity, compatible with the interests of the United States, should be seized upon to enlarge the basis of commercial intercourse. Peace with all the world is the true foundation of our policy, which can only be rendered permanent by the practice of equal and impartial justice to all. Our great desire should be to enter only into that rivalry which looks to the general good, in the cultivation of the sciences, the enlargement of the field for the exercise of the mechanical arts, and the spread of commerce (that great civilizer) to every land and sea. Carefully abstaining from interference in all questions exclusively referring themselves to the political interests of Europe, we may be permitted to hope an equal exemption from the interference of European Governments in what relates to the States of the American continent.

On the 28d of April last, the commissioners on the part of the United States, under the convention with the Mexican Republic of the 11th of April, 1839, made to the proper department a final report in relation to the proceedings of the commission. From this it appears that the total amount awarded to the claimants by the commissioners and the umpire appointed under that convention, was two million twenty-six thousand and seventy-nine dollars and sixty-eight cents. The arbiter having considered that his functions were required by the convention to terminate at the same time with those of the commissioners, returned to the board, undecided for want of time, claims which had been allowed by the American commissioners, to the amount of nine hundred and twenty-eight thousand six hundred and twenty dollars and eighty-eight cents. Other claims, in which the amount sought to be recovered was three million three hundred and thirty-six thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven dollars and five cents, were submitted to the board too late for its consideration. The Minister of the United States at Mexico has been duly authorized to make demand for the payment of the awards, according to the terms of the convention, and the provisions of the act of Congress of the 12th June, 1840. He has also been instructed to communicate to that Government the expectations of the Government of the United States in relation to those claims which were not disposed of according to the provisions of the convention, and all others of citizens of the United States against the Mexican Government. He has also been furnished with other instructions, to be followed by him in case the Government of Mexico should not find itself in a condition to make present payment of the amount of the awards, in specie or its equivalent.

I am happy to be able to say that information, which is esteemed favorable, both to a just satisfaction of the awards, and a reasonable provision for other claims, has been recently received from Mr. Thompson, the Minister of the United States, who has promptly and efficiently executed the instructions of his Government in regard to this important subject.

The citizens of the United States who accompanied the late Texan expedition to Santa Fé, and who were wrongfully taken and held as prisoners of war in Mexico, have all been liberated.

A correspondence has taken place between the Department of State and the Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs, upon the complaint of Mexico that citizens of the United States were permitted to give aid to the inhabitants of Texas in the war existing between her and that republic. Copies of this correspondence are herewith communicated to Congress, together with copies of letters on the same subject, addressed to the diplomatic corps at Mexico, by the American Minister and the Mexican Secretary of State.

Mexico has thought proper to reciprocate the mission of the United States to that Government, by accrediting to this a minister of the same rank as that of the representative of the United States in Mexico. From the circumstances connected with this mission, favorable results are anticipated from it. It is so obviously for the interest of both countries, as neighbors and friends, that all just causes of mutual dissatisfaction should be removed, that it is to be hoped neither will omit or delay the employment of any practicable and honorable means to accomplish that end.

The affairs pending between this Government and several others of the States of this hemisphere formerly under the dominion of Spain, have again, within the past year, been materially obstructed by the military revolutions and conflicts in those countries.

The ratifications of the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Ecuador, of the 13th of June, 1839, have been exchanged, and that instrument has been duly promulgated on the part of this Government. Copies are now communicated to Congress, with a view to enable that body to make such changes in the laws applicable to our intercourse with that Republic as may be deemed requisite.

Provision has been made by the Government of Chili for the payment of the claim on account of the illegal detention of the brig Warrior at Coquimbo, in 1820. This Government has reason to expect that other claims of our citizens against Chili will be hastened to a final and satisfactory close.

The empire of Brazil has not been altogether exempt from those convulsions which so constantly afflict the neighboring republics. Disturbances which recently broke out are, however, now understood to be quieted. But these occurrences, by threatening the stability of the Government, or by causing incessant and violent changes in it, or in the persons who administer them, tend greatly to retard provisions for a just indemnity for losses and injuries suffered by individual subjects or citizens of other States. The Government of the United States will feel it to be its duty, however, to consent to no delay, not unavoidable, in making satisfaction for wrongs and injuries sustained by its own citizens. Many years having, in some cases, elapsed, a decisive and effectual course of proceeding will be demanded of the respective Governments against whom claims have been preferred.

The vexatious, harassing, and expensive war which so long prevailed with the Indian tribes inhabiting the peninsula of Florida, has happily been terminated; whereby our army has been relieved from a service of the most disagreeable character, and the treasury from a large expenditure. Some casual outbreaks may occur, such as are incident to the close proximity of border settlers, and the Indians; but these, as in all other cases, may be left to the care of the local authorities, aided, when occasion may require, by the forces of the United States. A sufficient number of troops will be maintained in Florida, so long as the remotest apprehensions of danger shall exist; yet their duties will be limited rather to the garrisoning of the necessary posts, than to the maintenance of active hostilities. It is to be hoped that a territory, so long retarded in its growth, will now speedily recover from the evils incident to a protracted war, exhibiting, in the increased amount of its rich productions, true evidences of returning wealth and prosperity. By the practice of rigid justice towards the numerous Indian tribes residing within our territorial limits, and the exercise of a parental vigilance over their interests, protecting them against fraud and intrusion, and at the same time using every proper expedient to introduce among them the arts of civilized life, we may fondly hope not only to wean them from their love for war, but to inspire them with a love for peace and all its avocations. With several of the tribes, great progress in civilizing them has already been made. The schoolmaster and the missionary are found side by side; and the remnants of what were once numerous and powerful nations may yet be preserved as the builders up of a new name for themselves and their posterity.

The balance in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1842, (exclusive of the amount deposited with the States, trust funds, and indemnities,) was $231,483 68. The receipts into the treasury during the first three quarters of the present year, from all sources, amount to $26,616,593 78; of which more than fourteen millions were received from customs, and about one million from the public lands. The receipts for the fourth quarter are estimated at nearly eight millions; of which four millions are expected from customs, and three millions and a half from loans and treasury notes. The expenditures of the first three quarters of the present year exceed twenty-six millions, and those estimated for the fourth quarter amount to about eight millions; and it is anticipated there will be a deficiency of half a million on the 1st January next; but that the amount of outstanding warrants (estimated at $800,000) will leave an actual balance of about $224,000 in the treasury. Among the expenditures of the year, are more than eight millions for the public debt, and $600,000 on account of the distribution to the States of the proceeds of sales of the public lands.

3d Sem.]

The President's Message.

[DECEMBER, 1842.]

The present tariff of duties was somewhat hastily and hurriedly passed near the close of the late session of Congress. That it should have defects, and, therefore, be surprising to no one. To remedy such defects as may be found to exist in many of its numerous provisions, will not fail to claim our serious attention. It may well merit inquiry, whether the exaction of all duties in cash, does not call for the introduction of a system which has proved highly beneficial in countries where it has been adopted. I refer to the warehousing system. The first and most prominent defect which it would produce, would be to protect the market alike against redundant or deficient supplies of foreign fabrics; both of which, in the long run, are injurious as well to the manufacturer as to the importer. The quantity of goods in store being at all times readily known, it would enable the importer, with an approach to accuracy, to ascertain the actual wants of the market, and to regulate himself accordingly. If, however, he should fall into error by importing an excess above the public wants, he could readily correct its evils by availing himself of the benefits and advantages of the system thus established. In the storehouse, the goods imported would await the demands of the market; and their issues would be governed by the fixed principles of demand and supply. Thus an approximation would be made to a steadiness and uniformity of price, which, if attainable, would conduce to the decided advantage of mercantile and mechanical operations.

The apprehension may be well entertained, that, without something to ameliorate the rigor of cash payments, the entire import trade may fall into the hands of a few wealthy capitalists in this country and in Europe. The small importer, who requires the money he can raise for investments abroad, and who can but ill afford to pay the lowest duty, would have to subvert in advance a portion of his funds, in order to pay the duties, and would lose his interest upon the amount thus paid for all the time the goods might remain unsold; which might absorb his profits. The rich capitalist abroad, as well as at home, would thus possess, after a short time, an almost exclusive monopoly of the import trade; and laws designed for the benefit of all, would thus operate for the benefit of the few—a result wholly uncongenial with the spirit of our institutions, and anti-republican in all its tendencies. The warehousing system would enable the importer to watch the market, and to select his own time for offering his goods for sale. A profitable portion of the carrying trade in articles entered for the benefit of drawback, must also be most seriously affected, without the adoption of some expedient to relieve the cash system. The warehousing system would afford that relief, since the carrier would have a safe resource to the public storehouses, and might, without advancing the duty, re-ship within some reasonable period to foreign ports. A further effect of the measure would be to supersede the system of drawbacks, thereby effectually protecting the Government against fraud, as the right of debenture would not attach to goods after their withdrawal from the public stores.

In revising the existing tariff of duties, should you deem it proper to do so at your present session, I can only repeat the suggestions and recommendations which, upon several occasions, I have heretofore felt it to be my duty to offer to Congress. The great primary and controlling interest of the American people is union; union, not only in the mere forms of government—forms which may be broken—but union founded in an attachment of States and individuals for each other. This union in sentiment and feeling can only be preserved by the adoption of that course of policy which, neither giving exclusive benefits to some, nor imposing unnecessary burdens upon others, shall consult the interests of all, by pursuing a course of moderation, and thereby seeking to harmonize public opinion, and causing the people everywhere to feel and to know that the Government is careful of the interests of all alike. Nor is there any subject in regard to which moderation, connected with a wise discrimination, is more necessary than in the imposition of duties on imports. Whether reference be had to revenue—the primary object in the imposition of taxes—or to the incidents which necessarily flow from their imposition, this is entirely true. Extravagant duties defeat their end and object, not only by exciting in the public mind an hostility to the manufacturing interests, but by inducing a system of smuggling on an extensive scale, and the practice of every manner of fraud upon the revenue, which the utmost vigilance of Government cannot effectually suppress. An opposite course of policy would be attended by results essentially different, of which every interest of society—and none more than those of the manufacturer—would reap important advantages. Among the most striking of its benefits would be that derived from the general acquiescence of the country in its support, and the consequent permanency and stability which would be given to all the operations of industry. It cannot be too often repeated, that no system of legislation can be wise, which is fluctuating and uncertain. No interest can thrive under it. The prudent capitalist will never adventure his capital in manufacturing establishments, or in any other leading pursuit of life, if there exists a state of uncertainty as to whether the Government will repeal to-morrow what it has enacted to-day. Fitful profits, however high, if threatened with a ruinous reduction by a vacillating policy on the part of Government, will scarcely tempt him to trust the money which he has acquired by a life of labor upon the uncertain adventure. I, therefore, in the spirit of conciliation, and influenced by no other desire than to rescue the great interests of the country from the vortex of political contention, and in the discharge

DECEMBER, 1842.]

The President's Message.

[27TH CONG.]

of the high and solemn duties of the place which I now occupy, recommend moderate duties, imposed with a wise discrimination as to their several objects, as being not only most likely to be durable, but most advantageous to every interest of society.

The report of the Secretary of the War Department exhibits a very full and satisfactory account of the various and important interests committed to the charge of that officer. It is particularly gratifying to find that the expenditures for the military service are greatly reduced in amount; that a strict system of economy has been introduced into the service, and the abuses of past years greatly reformed. The fortifications on our maritime frontier have been prosecuted with much vigor, and at many points our defences are in a very considerable state of forwardness. The suggestions in reference to the establishment of means of communication with our territories on the Pacific, and to the surveys so essential to a knowledge of the resources of the intermediate country, are entitled to the most favorable consideration. While I would propose nothing inconsistent with friendly negotiations to settle the extent of our claims in that region, yet a prudent forecast points out the necessity of such measures as may enable us to maintain our rights. The arrangements made for preserving our neutral relations on the boundary between us and Texas, and keeping in check the Indians in that quarter, will be maintained so long as circumstances may require.

For several years angry contentions have grown out of the disposition directed by law to be made of the mineral lands held by the Government in several of the States. The Government is constituted the landlord, and the citizens of the States wherein lie the lands are its tenants. The relation is an unwise one; and it would be much more conducive to the public interest that a sale of the lands should be made, than that they should remain in their present condition. The supply of the ore would be more abundantly and certainly furnished when to be drawn from the enterprise and the industry of the proprietor, than under the present system.

The recommendation of the Secretary in regard to the improvements of the Western waters, and certain prominent harbors on the lakes, merit, and I doubt not will receive, your serious attention. The great importance of these subjects to the prosperity of the extensive region referred to, and the security of the whole country in time of war, cannot escape observation. The losses of life and property which annually occur in the navigation of the Mississippi alone, because of the dangerous obstructions in the river, make a loud demand upon Congress for the adoption of efficient measures for their removal.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy will bring you acquainted with that important branch of the public defences. Considering the already vast and daily increasing commerce of the country, apart from the exposure to hostile inroad of an extended seaboard, all that relates to the navy is calculated to excite particular attention. Whatever tends to add to its efficiency, without entailing unnecessary charges upon the treasury, is well worthy of your serious consideration. It will be seen, that while an appropriation exceeding by more than a million the appropriations of the present year, is asked by the Secretary, yet that, in this sum, is proposed to be included $400,000 for the purchase of clothing, which, when once expended, will be annually reimbursed by the sale of the clothes, and will thus constitute a perpetual fund, without any new appropriation to the same object. To this may also be added $50,000 asked to cover the arrearages of past years, and $250,000 in order to maintain a competent squadron on the coast of Africa; all of which, when deducted, will reduce the expenditures nearly within the limits of those of the current year. While, however, the expenditures will thus remain very nearly the same as of the antecedent year, it is proposed to add greatly to the operations of the marine, and, in lieu of only twenty-five ships in commission, and but little in the way of building, to keep, with the same expenditure, forty-one vessels afloat, and to build twelve ships of a small class.

A strict system of accountability is established, and great pains are taken to insure industry, fidelity, and economy in every department of duty. Experiments have been instituted to test the quality of various materials, (particularly copper, iron, and coal,) so as to prevent fraud and imposition.

It will appear by the report of the Postmaster General, that the great point which, for several years, has been so much desired, has, during the current year, been fully accomplished. The expenditures of the department for the current year have been brought within its income, without lessening its general usefulness. There has been an increase of revenue equal to $166,000 for the year 1842 over that of 1841, without, as it is believed, any addition having been made to the number of letters and newspapers transmitted through the mails. The Post Office laws have been honestly administered, and fidelity has been observed in accounting for, and paying over by the subordinates of the department, the moneys which have been received. For the details of the service, I refer you to the report.

I flatter myself that the exhibition thus made of the condition of the public administration will serve to convince you that every proper attention has been paid to the interests of the country by those who have been called to the heads of the different departments. The reduction in the annual expenditures of the Government already accomplished, furnishes a sure evidence that economy in the application of the public moneys is regarded as a paramount duty.

At peace with all the world—the personal liberty of the citizen sacredly maintained, and his rights secured under political institutions deriving all their authority from the direct sanction of the people—with a soil fertile almost beyond example, and a country blessed with every diversity of climate and production, what remains to be done in order to advance the happiness and prosperity of such a people? Under ordinary circumstances, this inquiry could readily be answered. The best that probably could be done for a people inhabiting such a country, would be to fortify their peace and security in the prosecution of their various pursuits, by guarding them against invasion from without, and violence from within. The rest, for the greater part, might be left to their own energy and enterprise. The chief embarrassments which, at the moment, exhibit themselves, have arisen from overaction; and the most difficult task which remains to be accomplished is that of correcting and over-

3D SESS.]

The President's Message.

[DECEMBER, 1842.]

coming its effects. Between the years 1833 and 1838, additions were made to bank capital and bank issues, in the form of notes designed for circulation, to an extent enormously great. The question seemed to be, not how the best currency could be provided, but in what manner the greatest amount of bank paper could be put in circulation. Thus, a vast amount of what was called money—since, for the time being, it answered the purposes of money—was thrown upon the country; an over-issue which was attended, as a necessary consequence, by an extravagant increase of the prices of all articles and property, the spread of a speculative mania all over the country, and has finally ended in a general indebtedness on the part of the States and individuals, the prostration of public and private credit, a depreciation in the market value of real and personal estate, and has left large districts of country almost entirely without any circulating medium. In view of the fact that, in 1830, the whole bank-note circulation within the United States amounted to but $61,323,398, according to the Treasury statements, and that an addition has been made thereto of the enormous sum of $88,000,000 in seven years, (the circulation on the 1st January, 1837, being stated at $149,185,890,) aided by the great facilities afforded in obtaining loans from European capitalists, who were seized with the same speculative mania which prevailed in the United States—and the large importations of funds from abroad, the result of stock sales and loans—no one can be surprised at the apparent, but unsubstantial, state of prosperity which everywhere prevailed over the land; and while the cause of surprise should be felt at the present prostration of every thing, and the ruin which has fallen so many of our fellow-citizens in the sudden withdrawal from circulation of so large an amount of bank issues since 1837—exceeding, as believed, the amount added to the paper currency in a similar period antecedent to 1837—it ceases to be a matter of astonishment that such extensive upwreck should have been made of private fortunes, or that difficulties should exist in meeting their engagements on the part of the debtor States. Apart from which, if there be taken into account the immense losses sustained in the dishonor of numerous banks, it is less a matter of surprise that solvency should have visited many of our fellow-citizens, than that so many should have escaped the blighting influences of the times.

In the solemn conviction of these truths, and with an ardent desire to meet the pressing necessities of the country, I felt it to be my duty to cause to be submitted to you, at the commencement of our late session, the plan of an Exchequer; the sole power and duty of maintaining which, in vigor and vigor, was to be exercised by the Representatives of the people and of the States, and, therefore, virtually by the people themselves. It was proposed to place it under the control and direction of a treasury board, to consist of three commissioners, whose duty it should be to see that the plan of its creation was faithfully executed; and that the great end of supplying a paper medium of exchange, at all times convertible into gold and silver, should be attained. The board, thus constituted, was given as much permanency as could be imparted to it, without endangering the proper exercise of responsibility which should attach to all public agents. In order to insure all the advantages of a well-matured experience, the commissioners were to hold their offices for the respective periods of two, four, and six years; thereby securing, at all times, in the management of the Exchequer, the services of two men of experience, and to place them in a condition to exercise perfect independence of mind and action, it was provided that their removal should only take place for actual incapacity or infidelity to the trust, and to be followed by the President with an exposition of the causes of such removal, should it occur. It was proposed to establish subordinate boards in each of the States, under the same restrictions and limitations of the power of removal, which, with the central board, should receive, safely keep, and disburse the public moneys; and in order to furnish a sound paper medium of exchange, the Exchequer should retain of the revenues of the Government a sum not to exceed $5,000,000 in specie, to be set apart as required by its operations, and to pay the public creditor, at its own option, either in specie, or treasury notes of denominations not less than five, nor exceeding one hundred dollars; which notes should be redeemed at the several places of issue, and to be receivable at all times and everywhere in payment of Government dues; with a restraint upon such issue of bills, that the same should not exceed the maximum of $15,000,000. In order to guard against all the hazards incident to fluctuations in trade, the Secretary of the Treasury was invested with authority to issue $5,000,000 of Government stock, should the same at any time be regarded as necessary, in order to place beyond hazard the prompt redemption of the bills which might be thrown into circulation: thus, in fact, making the issue of $15,000,000 of exchequer bills rest substantially on $10,000,000; and keeping in circulation never more than one and one half dollar for every dollar in specie. When to this it is added that the bills are not only everywhere receivable in Government dues but that the Government itself would be bound for their ultimate redemption, no rational doubt can exist that the paper which the Exchequer would furnish would readily enter into general circulation, and be maintained at all times at or above par with gold and silver; thereby realizing the great want of the age, and fulfilling the wishes of the people. In order to reimburse the Government the expenses of the plan, it was proposed to invest the Exchequer with the limited authority to deal in bills of exchange, (unless prohibited by the State in which an agency might be situated,) having only thirty days to run, and resting on a fair and bona fide basis. The legislative will on this point might be so plainly announced, as to avoid all pretext for partiality or favoritism. It was furthermore proposed to invest this Treasury agent with authority to receive on deposit, to a limited amount, the specie funds of individuals, and to grant certificates therefor, to be redeemed on presentation, under the idea (which is believed to be well founded) that such certificates would come in aid of the exchequer bills in supplying a safe and ample paper circulation. Or, if in place of the contemplated dealings in exchange, the Exchequer should be authorized not only to exchange its bills for actual deposits of specie, but for specie or its equivalents to sell drafts, charging therefor a small but reasonable premium, I cannot doubt but that the benefits of the law would be speedily manifested in the revival of the credit, trade, and business of the whole country. Entertaining this opinion, it becomes my duty to urge its adoption upon Congress, by reference to the strongest considerations of the public interests, with such alterations in its details as Congress may in its wisdom see fit to make.

I am well aware that this proposed alteration and amendment of the laws establishing the Treasury Department has encountered various objections; and that, among others, it has been proclaimed a Government bank of fearful and dangerous import. It is proposed to confer upon it no extraordinary powers. It purports to do no more than pay the debts of the Government with the redeemable paper of the Government; in which respect it accomplishes precisely what the Treasury does daily at this time—in issuing to the public creditors the treasury notes, which, under law, it is authorized to issue. It has no resemblance to an ordinary bank, as it furnishes no profits to private stockholders, and lends no capital to individuals. If it be objected to as a Government bank, and the objection be available, then should all the laws in relation to the Treasury be repealed, and the capacity of the Government to collect what is due to it, or pay what it owes, be abrogated.

This is the chief purpose of the proposed Exchequer, and surely, if, in the accomplishment of a purpose so essential, it affords a sound circulating medium to the country and facilities to trade, it should be regarded as no slight recommendation of it to public consideration. Properly guarded by the provisions of law, it can run into no dangerous evil; nor can any abuse arise under it, but such as the Legislature itself will be answerable for, if it be tolerated; since it is but the creature of the law, and is susceptible at all times of modification, amendment, or repeal, at the pleasure of Congress. I know that it has been objected that the system would be liable to be abused by the Legislature—by whom alone it could be abused—in the party conflicts of the day; that such abuse would manifest itself in a change of the law, which would authorize an excessive issue of paper for the purpose of inflating prices and winning popular favor. To that it may be answered, that the ascription of such a motive to Congress is altogether gratuitous and inadmissible. The theory of our institutions would lead us to a different conclusion. But a perfect security against a proceeding so reckless, would be found to exist in the very nature of things. The political party which should be so blind to the true interests of the country as to resort to such an expedient, would inevitably meet with a final overthrow, in the fact that, the moment the paper ceased to be convertible into specie, or otherwise promptly redeemed, it would become worthless, and would, in the end, dishonor the Government, involve the people in ruin, and such political party in hopeless disgrace. At the same time, such a view involves the utter impossibility of furnishing any currency other than that of the precious metals; for, if the Government itself cannot forego the temptation of excessive paper issues, what reliance can be placed in corporations, upon whom the temptations of individual aggrandizement would most strongly operate? The people would have to blame none but themselves for any injury that might arise from a course so reckless, since their agents would be the wrongdoers, and they the passive spectators.

There can be but three kinds of public currency: 1st. Gold and silver; 2d. The paper of State institutions; or, 3d. A representative of the precious metals, provided by the General Government, or under its authority. The sub-treasury system rejected the last, in any form; and, as it was believed that no reliance could be placed on the issues of local institutions, for the purposes of general circulation, it necessarily and unavoidably adopted specie as the exclusive currency for its own use. And this must ever be the case, unless one of the other kinds be used. The choice, in the present state of public sentiment, lies between an exclusive specie currency on the one hand, and Government issues of some kind on the other. That these issues cannot be made by a chartered institution, is supposed to be conclusively settled. They must be made, then, directly by Government agents. For several years past, they have been thus made in the form of treasury notes, and have answered a valuable purpose. Their usefulness has been limited by their being transient and temporary; their ceasing to bear interest at given periods, necessarily causes their speedy return, and thus restricts their range of circulation; and being used only in the disbursements of Government, they cannot reach those points where they are most required. By rendering their use permanent, to the moderate extent already mentioned, by offering no inducement for their return, and by exchanging them for coin and other values, they will constitute, to a certain extent, the general currency so much needed to maintain the internal trade of the country. And this is the Exchequer plan, so far as it may operate in furnishing a currency.

I cannot forego the occasion to urge its importance to the credit of the Government in a financial point of view. The great necessity of resorting to every proper and becoming expedient, in order to place the treasury on a footing of the highest respectability, is entirely obvious. The credit of the Government may be regarded as the very soul of the Government itself—a principle of vitality, without which all its movements are languid, and its operations embarrassed. In this spirit the Executive felt itself bound, by the most imperative sense of duty, to submit to Congress at its last session, the propriety of making a specific pledge of the land fund, as the basis for the negotiation of the loans authorized to be contracted. I then thought that such an application of the public domain would, without doubt, have placed at the command of the Government ample funds to relieve the treasury from the temporary embarrassments under which it labored. American credit had suffered a considerable shock in Europe, from the large indebtedness of the States, and the temporary inability of some of them to meet the interest on their debts. The utter and disastrous prostration of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania had contributed largely to increase the sentiment of distrust by reason of the loss and ruin sustained by the holders of its stock—a large portion of whom were foreigners, and many of whom were able ignorant of our political organization, and of our actual responsibilities. It was the anxious desire of the Executive that, in the effort to negotiate the loan abroad, the American negotiator might be able to point the money-lender to the land mortgaged for the redemption of the principal and interest of any loan he might contract, and thereby

D. SESS.]

Death of Mr. Williams.

[DECEMBER, 1842.]

indicate the Government from all suspicion of bad faith, or inability to meet its engagements. Congress differed from the Executive in this view of the subject. It became, nevertheless, the duty of the Executive to resort to every expedient in its power to negotiate the authorized loan. After a failure to do so in the American market, a citizen of high character and talent was sent to Europe—with no better success; and thus the mortifying spectacle has been presented, of the inability of this Government to obtain a loan so small as not in the whole to amount to more than one-fourth of its ordinary annual income; at a time when the Governments of Europe, although involved in debt, and with their subjects heavily burdened with taxation, readily obtain loans of any amount at a greatly reduced rate of interest. It would be unprofitable to look further into this anomalous state of things; but I cannot conclude without adding, that, for a Government which has paid off its debts of two wars with the largest maritime power of Europe, and now owing a debt which is almost next to nothing, when compared with its boundless resources—a Government the strongest in the world, because emanating from the popular will, and firmly rooted in the affections of a great and free people—and whose fidelity to its engagements has never been questioned; for such a Government to have rendered to the capitalists of other countries an opportunity for a small investment of its stock, and yet to have failed, implies either the most unfounded distrust in its good faith, or a purpose, to obtain which the course pursued is the most fatal which could have been adopted. It has now become obvious to all men that the Government must look to its own means for supplying its wants; and it is consoling to know that these means are altogether adequate for the object. The Exchequer, if adopted, will greatly aid in bringing about this result. Upon what I regard as a well-founded supposition, that its bills would be readily sought for by the public creditors, and that the issue would, in a short time, reach the maximum of $15,000,000, it is obvious that $10,000,000 would thereby be added to the available means of the treasury, without cost or charge. Nor can I fail to urge the great and beneficial effects which would be produced in aid of all the active pursuits of life. Its effects upon the solvent State banks, while it would force into liquidation those of an opposite character, through its weekly settlements, would be highly beneficial; and, with the advantage of a sound currency, the restoration of confidence and credit would follow, with a numerous train of blessings. My convictions are most strong that these benefits would flow from the adoption of this measure; but, if the result should be adverse, there is this security in connection with it—that the law creating it may be repealed at the pleasure of the Legislature, without the slightest implication of its good faith.

I recommend to Congress to take into consideration the propriety of reimbursing a fine imposed on General Jackson, at New Orleans, at the time of the attack and defence of that city, and paid by him. Without designing any reflection on the judicial tribunal which imposed the fine, the remission at this day may be regarded as not unjust or inexpedient. The voice of the civil authority was heard amidst the glitter of arms, and obeyed by those who held the sword—thereby giving additional lustre to a memorable military achievement.

Vol. XIV.—39

If the laws were offended, their majesty was fully vindicated; and, although the penalty incurred and paid is worthy of little regard in a pecuniary point of view, it can hardly be doubted that it would be gratifying to the war-worn veteran, now in retirement and in the winter of his days, to be relieved from the circumstances in which that judgment placed him. There are cases in which public functionaries may be called on to weigh the public interest against their own personal hazard; and, if the civil law be violated from praiseworthy motives, or an overruling sense of public danger and public necessity, punishment may well be restrained within that limit which asserts and maintains the authority of the law, and the subjection of the military to the civil power. The defence of New Orleans, while it saved a city from the hands of the enemy, placed the name of General Jackson among those of the greatest captains of the age, and illustrated one of the brightest pages of our history. Now that the causes of excitement existing at the time have ceased to operate, it is believed that the remission of this fine, and whatever of gratification that remission might cause the eminent man who incurred and paid it, would be in accordance with the general feeling and wishes of the American people.

I have thus, fellow-citizens, acquitted myself of my duty under the constitution, by laying before you, as succinctly as I have been able, the state of the Union, and by inviting your attention to measures of much importance to the country. The Executive will most zealously unite its efforts with those of the Legislative Department in the accomplishment of all that is required to relieve the wants of a common constituency, or elevate the destinies of a beloved country.

JOHN TYLER.

WASHINGTON, December, 1842.

Mr. KERR moved that 1,500 copies of the Message and accompanying documents, and 3,500 copies without the documents, in addition to the usual quantity, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The question being put, it was carried in the affirmative.

Death of Mr. Williams.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, informing the Senate of the death of one of its members, Mr. J. W. WILLIAMS, late a Representative from the State of Maryland; which being read,

Mr. KERR rose, and remarked as follows:

I rise, with feelings of painful regret, to perform the duty of proposing to the Senate some special notice of the communication from the House of Representatives upon the recent and sudden death of the Hon. JAMES W. WILLIAMS, late a member of that body from the State which I have the honor here, in part, to represent.

The first news of this distressing event reached me on my journey hither. The fact was then too confidently related to admit of doubt on my part, and was soon confirmed in all its particulars.

The deceased was travelling, on Friday last,

DECEMBER, 1842.]

The Bankrupt Act.

[27th CONG.]

from his home, to the discharge of his high duties in this Capitol, when he was stricken down by the visitation of Providence—apoplexied. In a state of insensibility, he was re-conveyed to his own mansion, in time only to draw his last breath in the bosom of his afflicted family.

I will not detain you, Mr. President, by any tedious homily of mine upon this striking example of the uncertainty of the life of man, and of the poor assurance we have of its continuance, from day to day, even in the highest health, amidst the gayest enjoyments that life can supply, and with all the honors to which ambition may prompt us to aspire. We are proudly conscious of "this sensible warm motion" of our being, but little think how soon it may "become a kneaded clod!" We live on, heedless of the continual recurrence of fatal incidents like this, and take no warning from them. We seem, indeed, to live to be ever verifying the well-known aphorism—which is daily repeated—that "Man thinks all men mortal but himself!"

Let us, Mr. President, take to heart this fatal blow on one who, like us, perhaps, was indulging the hope of prolonged life and happiness; and, in doing the formal honors to his virtues and his memory which custom here demands of us, let us apply to ourselves the sad story of his untimely death, in solemn reflection, and keep it in mind, as a token and proof that we—aye, the wisest and the best of us—must ere long follow him to "that bourne from whence no traveller returns!"

It becomes me, as a friend of the deceased, to say a few words in justice to the character of so worthy and so excellent a citizen.

Mr. WILLIAMS was a native of Maryland, and born in a section of it distant from that in which he last and long resided. He was educated with unusual care, and great pains were taken to make him a scholar—and a good one; and he rewarded, by an assiduous improvement of his advantages, the kindness of an anxious parent, who bestowed on him the noble boon of a well-regulated education.

Though intended for the profession of the law, he married early, and became an active and distinguished merchant in our commercial emporium, (the monumental city,) but ultimately retired, as most men seem inclined to do, to the pursuit of agriculture. Yet, with the advantages of early study and a cultivated mind, this gentleman was enabled to fulfil with high credit the duties of a Representative in the Legislature of his native State, and, for his superior intelligence and usefulness, was for some time distinguished by the honor of presiding over the deliberations of its popular branch.

In the discharge of all public duties, he was able, steady, and diligent; and it is a proof of his elevation in the general confidence and respect, that he was raised by the voice of an intelligent community around him to that high and honorable station, the duties of which he was hastening to discharge, and in which he died.

I do not choose, Mr. President, to advert to the particular religious persuasion to which this gentleman belonged; but he performed his moral duties, and his social and domestic obligations, with fidelity, with kindness, and uniform courtesy; and all who knew him will ever bear testimony to that amiable demeanor for which he was remarkable in all his private intercourse.

If the deceased had any peculiar faults or foibles I knew them not; and I trust they were only such as frail humanity is heir to. It were bootless now to weigh them in the rigid scale of justice. Let us not too scrupulously scan that account of him, which we, ourselves, could not render but in asking mercy:

"No farther seek his merits to disclose,
Or draw his frailties from their dread abode—
There they, alike, in trembling hope repose—
The bosom of his Father and his God!"

I will offer for the adoption of the Senate, and as a memorial for our record, the resolutions which I send to the Chair:

Resolved, That the Senate have received with deep sensibility the proceedings of the House of Representatives on the sudden death of the Hon. JAMES W. WILLIAMS, a member of that body from the State of Maryland, and sincerely sympathize in the regrets incident to that mournful occasion.

Resolved, That, in testimony of their high respect for the character of the deceased, the members of the Senate will wear the usual badge of mourning for the space of thirty days; and as a further testimonial of respect for the memory of the deceased, that the Senate forthwith adjourn.

The Senate, accordingly, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, December 7.

The One-Hour Rule.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON rose for the purpose of giving notice that to-morrow he should move that the one-hour rule be rescinded.

IN SENATE

THURSDAY, December 8.

Election of Chaplain.

The Senate proceeded to ballot; when 25 votes were received—of which

Mr. Tuston received	-	-	-	25
Mr. Bulfinch	-	-	-	1
Blank	-	-	-	1

Mr. Tuston was therefore declared to be duly elected.

The Bankrupt Act.

Mr. BENTON, on leave, and agreeably to notice given, introduced a bill to repeal the bankrupt act; which was read, as follows:

Whereas the bankrupt act of 1841 is unconstitutional;

3d Sess.]

The One-Hour Rule.

[DECEMBER, 1842.]

tutious and immoral, and violates the rights of the States and of individuals, and is invalid and void, and ought not to be permitted to remain on the statute-book; therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act passed on the 19th of August, 1841, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," be, and the same hereby is, repealed, except for the trial of cases now pending under said act; which cases may be prosecuted to termination under the following limitations and conditions, to wit:

First. That no discharge from his debts shall be granted to any bankrupt, except with the consent of two-thirds of his creditors, and upon the judicial certificate of his integrity, as provided for in the 36th section of the bankrupt act of April 4, 1800, which is as follows:

"That no person becoming a bankrupt, according to the intent and provisions of this act, shall be entitled to a certificate of discharge, or to any of the benefits of the act, unless the commissioners shall certify, under their hands, to the judge of the district within which such commission issues, that such bankrupt hath made a full discovery of his or her estate and effects, and in all things conformed him or herself to the directions of this act; and that there doth not appear to them any reason to doubt of the truth of such discovery, or that the same was not a full discovery of the said bankrupt's estate and effects; or unless the said judge should be of opinion that the said certificate was unreasonably denied by the commissioners; and unless two-thirds, in number and in value, of the creditors of the bankrupt, who shall be creditors for not less than fifty dollars, respectively, and who shall have duly proved their debts, under the said commission, shall sign such certificate to the judge, and testify their consent to the allowance of a certificate of discharge, in pursuance of this act; which signing and consent shall be also certified by the commissioners; but the said commissioners shall not certify the same till they have proof, by affidavit or information, in writing, of such creditors, or of the persons respectively authorized for that purpose, signing the said certificate; which affidavit or affirmation, together with the letter or power of attorney to sign, shall be laid before the judge of the district within which such commission issues, in order for the allowing the certificate of discharge; and the said certificate shall not be allowed, unless the bankrupt make oath or affirmation, in writing, that the certificate of the commissioners, and consent of the creditors hereunto, were obtained fairly and without fraud; and any of the creditors of the said bankrupt are allowed to be heard, if they shall think fit, before the respective persons aforesaid, against the making or allowing of such certificates by the commissioners or judge."

Secondly. That the insolvent laws of the States be respected and left in force, to the same degree as they were ordered to be respected by the 61st section of the act of 1800; which section is in the following words:

"That this act shall not repeal or annul, or be construed to repeal or annul, the laws of any State now in force, or which may hereafter be enacted, for the relief of insolvent debtors, except so far as the same may respect persons whose debts shall amount, in the cases specified in the second section thereof, to the sums therein mentioned. And if any person within the purview of this act shall be imprisoned for the space of three months for any debt or upon any contract, unless the creditors of such prisoner shall proceed to prosecute a commission of bankruptcy against him or her, according to the provisions of this act, such debtor may, and all be, entitled to relief under any such laws for the relief of insolvent debtors, this act notwithstanding."

Thirdly. That the liens created by State laws on the property of bankrupts be respected and observed in the same full and absolute manner in which they were ordered to be respected and observed by the 64th section of the said act of 1800; which section is in these words:

"That nothing contained in this act shall be taken or construed to invalidate or impair any lien existing at the date of this act upon the lands or chattels of any person who may become bankrupt."

Fourthly. That a person subject to involuntary bankruptcy shall not have the privilege of voluntary bankruptcy; but, on filing a declaration of insolvency, shall be subject to be proceeded against at the will of his creditors, according to the principles of the 6th section of the bankrupt act of George IV., and the 13th section of the insolvent debtors act of the same reign.

Fifthly. That the operation of the act be prospective only, according to the first section of the bankrupt act of the year 1800.

Sixthly. That agreements on the part of Bankrupts in office to assign a part of their salaries and emoluments to their creditors, be binding in law, and give the creditors a right to have the same retained for their benefit.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill was then ordered to be printed, and read a second time.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 8.

The One-Hour Rule.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON rose, pursuant to notice given yesterday, to move that the one-hour rule adopted at the last session, (which had been incorporated in the general rules, and was, therefore, in force for the present session,) be now rescinded.

Mr. JOHNSON said it was not his intention to consume the time of the House, but he felt desirous to say that it was indispensable to wise legislation that a reasonable time should be given for the discussion of the questions which should come before this House. It was due to the country that the Representatives of the people should have the opportunity to express their opinions on some of the vast questions that would arise—the currency, for instance. His object, therefore, was not to delay but to expedite the public business. He was willing that a particular day should be fixed to terminate debate on any particular bill, or that the House should have the control of it by the previous question. But he contended that no party had been benefited by the adoption of this one-hour rule. They had been here during two sessions, and, since the adoption of this rule, no member had time to express his views fully on any question. He (Mr. JOHNSON) had been thereby compelled to be a silent member of the House—[laughter]—and for one, he should desire, on one or two subjects, to address the House at a greater length than the rule in question would permit. He wished this great body to be the organ of the people; and, as their Representatives, to discuss public measures, and to carry them out after a full examination; and hence he made this motion. But as it was not his intention, as he had before stated, to consume unnecessarily the time of the House, he would now move the previous question.

DECEMBER, 1842.]

Abolition Petitions.

[27TH CONG.]

The previous question was seconded; and as the SPEAKER was about to propose the question, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. McKENNAN rose and said, believing that to be one of the best rules this House ever adopted, he would move to lay the resolution on the table; and on this motion he called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the motion to lay the rescinding resolution on the table prevailed as follows:—

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Ayer, Babcock, Baker, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Brunell, William Butler, William O. Butler, Calhoun, Thomas J. Campbell, Casey, Chapman, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Garrett Davis, Deberry, John Edwards, Fessenden, Fillmore, A. Lawrence Foster, Gamble, Giddings, Gilmer, Goggin, Patrick G. Goode, Granger, Hall, Halsted, Hays, Henry, Holmes, Houston, Howard, Hudson, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James, Cave Johnson, Keim, John P. Kennedy, Linn, Abraham McClellan, McKennan, Marchand, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Meriwether, Mitchell, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Owsley, Patridge, Pendleton, Plumer, Powell, Ramsay, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Rencher, Ridgway, Rodney, Rogers, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Shepperd, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Snyder, Stanly, Stokeley, Stratton, Alexander H. H. Stuart, Summers, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Warren, Washington, Weller, Westbrook, Joseph L. White, Thomas W. Williams, Winthrop, Yorke, and Augustus Young—116.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Arrington, Atherton, Bernard, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Charles Brown, Burke, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, Clifford, Clinton, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Cushing, Daniel, Dawson, Dean, Eastman, Egbert, Everett, Ferris, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Gerry, William O. Goode, Gordon, Gustine, Harris, Hastings, Hopkins, Hubbard, Charles J. Ingersoll, William W. Irwin, Jack, William Cost Johnson, John W. Jones, Littlefield, Lowell, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Mallory, Alfred Marshall, Mathews, Medill, Miller, Newhard, Payne, Pearce, Pickens, Read, Reding, Reynolds, Rhett, Riggs, Sanford, Shaw, William Smith, Sprigg, Steenrod, Sweney, Turney, Van Buren, Ward, Watterson, Joseph L. Williams, Wise, and Wood—70.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House then adjourn, which was agreed to; and the House adjourned to meet again on Monday next.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 12.

Fine on General Jackson.

The Senate met at 12 o'clock.

Mr. LINN gave notice that he would on tomorrow ask leave to introduce certain bills; among which was a bill to indemnify General

Andrew Jackson the fine of $1,000, with costs imposed on him for discharging his official duties, by Judge Hall of New Orleans.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, December 12.

Abolition Petitions.

Mr. FILLMORE rose and said, as the standing committees had been appointed, and this was a short session, he would move that the President's Message be taken up for reference.

Mr. ADAMS objected; the business in order being his resolution to rescind the 21st rule on which, for three previous days of the session the House had refused to order the main question.

Mr. FILLMORE urged the necessity of referring to the President's Message; and observed that the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts would come up when the Message was disposed of.

Mr. ADAMS persisted in his objection.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON said, if the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts was thus to obstruct the public business, he would move it be laid upon the table.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Landaff W. Andrews, Arrington, Atherton, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Black Bone, Boyd, Milton Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, William Butler, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Cary, Casey, Clifford, Clinton, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Daniel, Dean, Deberry, Doan, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Gamble, Gerry, Gilmer, Goggin, William O. Goode, Gustine, Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubbard, Charles J. Ingersoll, Jack, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Isaac H. Jones, Keim, Abraham McClellan, McKay, Marchand, Thomas F. Marshall, Mathews, Meriwether, Miller, Mitchell, Moore, Newhard, Owsley, Payne, Pearce, Pickens, Plumer, Pope, Rayner, Reding, Rencher, Reynolds, Riggs, Rogers, Saunders, Shaw, Shepperd, William Smith, Sprigg, Sollers, Sprigg, Steenrod, Summers, Sumter, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Van Buren, Ward, Warren, Washington, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, Christopher L. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Wise, and Wood—106.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Ayer, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botts, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Jeremiah Brown, Brunell, Calhoun, Chittenden, J. C. Clark, Stanley N. Clark, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cross, Cushing, Garrett Davis, R. D. Davis, Douglass, John Edwards, Egbert, Everett, Ferris, Fessenden, Fillmore, John G. Floyd, A. Lawrence Foster, Giddings, Patrick G. Goode, Gordon, Granger, Hall, Halsted, Henry, Howard, Hudson, Hunt, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, W. W. Irwin, James, John

[D. SIGS.]

Repeal of the Bankrupt Law.

[DECEMBER, 1842.]

P. Kennedy, Andrew Kennedy, Lane, Linn, Littlefield, Lowell, Robert McClellan, McKennan, McLeon, Alfred Marshall, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Parmenter, Patridge, Pendleton, Ramsay, Benjamin Randall, Read, Ridgway, Rod-ey, Roosevelt, William Russell, James M. Russell, altonstall, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stokeley, tration, Alexander H. H. Stuart, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Trumull, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Joseph L. White, Vinthrop, Yorke, and John Young—102.

The resolution was, therefore, laid on the table.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 13.

Board of Exchequer.

Mr. TALLMADGE, agreeably to notice, and on leave, introduced a bill amendatory of the several acts establishing the Treasury Department; which was read twice, and ordered to be printed; and

On the further motion of Mr. T., who said the bill was precisely of the same character as that introduced by him at the last session, it was postponed till Tuesday two weeks, and made the special order for that day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 13.

Repeal of the Bankrupt Law.

Mr. EVERETT asked leave, pursuant to notice, to introduce a bill to repeal the bankrupt law; and he wished it to be put on its second reading, and printed. [Objections were made from all parts of the House.] He would move, then, the suspension of the rules, that it might be received.

Mr. HOPKINS called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend; and they were ordered, and, being taken, resulted—yeas 137, nays 63.

The rules were, therefore, suspended by a majority of two-thirds.

Mr. EVERETT then introduced his bill, which was read a first and second time. It was as follows:

A BILL to Repeal the Bankrupt Act.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved on the nineteenth day of August, eighteen hundred and forty-one, be, and the same hereby is, repealed; Provided, That this act shall not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy commenced before the fifth day of December, eighteen hundred and forty-two; or any pains, penalties, or forfeitures, incurred under such act.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the bill be printed; agreed to

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 14.

Fine on General Jackson.

Mr. LINN, on leave, introduced a bill to indemnify Major-General Andrew Jackson for damages sustained in the discharge of official duty; which was read twice.

Mr. L. said the bill was very short; and, taking example of the Senator from New York, (Mr. WRIGHT,) he would not move to refer it to any committee. It was fully discussed at the last session; and its provisions being simple, were, no doubt, understood on all sides. He would, therefore, move that the bill be postponed till this day week, and made the order for that day. The motion was agreed to.

Repeal of the Bankrupt Law.

The orders of the day brought up Mr. BENTON's bill for the repeal of the bankrupt act.

The CHAIR announced that it was on its second reading, and would be considered as in Committee of the Whole; the question pending being on the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Carolina, (Mr. GRAHAM.)

Mr. BERRIEN observed that, if the bill was still subject to such a motion, he would move to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The CHAIR stated that the motion would be in order.

Mr. BERRIEN observed that he believed it was considered expedient, in obedience to public opinion, to bring forward the repeal of the law at the commencement of this session of Congress.

The law, as it now exists, applies to cases both of voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy. It was proposed to repeal this law, on the ground that public opinion was against it; but, in his (Mr. B.'s) opinion, the public sentiment was directed rather against that portion of the law which relates to voluntary bankruptcy, than against the law itself. With a view, then, to ascertain, by examination, whether such a bill may not be presented to the consideration of the Senate as would steer clear of the objections which may apply to the existing law, it seemed desirable that it should be referred to a committee for inquiry. And he was strengthened in this conviction by the fact, that among the numerous petitions which had been presented to Congress at a former session, upon the subject of the bankrupt law, by far the greater portion sought, not its repeal, but a modification of it, by excluding the provisions which relate to voluntary bankruptcy, and by modifying the terms upon which certificates of bankruptcy should be granted. It seemed to him that public opinion, so far as it had been ascertained by the representations made to Congress, was not at all adverse to the existence of a system of mercantile bankruptcy; and with a view of ascertaining whether a bill in such a form might not be substituted for the present law, he thought it was desirable that it should be referred. But it was particularly desirable in another and a general view; inasmuch as it would protect the legislation of the United States Congress from the imputation of instability, and insure that respect which ought to be entertained towards all legislation. Besides, it seemed to him improper to proceed in the consideration of the matter with such rapidity, precluding the possibility of giving it that due deliberation which it required. They should not hurry their investigations upon this subject, without making those preliminary inquiries which they were in the habit of making in regard to every ordinary subject. These were the considerations which induced him to propose that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DECEMBER, 1842.]

Repeal of the Bankrupt Law.

[27th CONG.]

Mr. BENTON objected, in the most strenuous terms, to the reference proposed by the Senator from Georgia. To refer the bill to that committee, would be tantamount to its total rejection. He would tell the Senate plainly, that, if the reference was made, he would consider the proposition to repeal the bankrupt act at once rejected. What would it be, but inviting a committee hostile to the purpose of the bill, to go into the question of a universal bankrupt system, or exercise its ingenuity to build up a system like that of the British bankrupt system? and that is not a work that can be performed this session, if it ever can be performed successfully. The committee was under the delusion of the false doctrine which induced the original measure: that delusion was, that insolvency and bankruptcy are one and the same thing. This fallacy has ever been maintained by the Judiciary in the application of the law which cannot be administered without gross error. A question cannot arise between two neighbors about a dozen of eggs, without being liable to be taken from the custody of the laws of the States and brought up to the Federal courts. And now, when this doctrine that insolvency and bankruptcy are the same, if a continuance of the law is to be contrived, it must be done in conformity with such a fallacy. The law has proved to be nothing but a great insolvent law, for the abolition of debts, for the benefit of debtors; and would it be maintained that a permanent system ought to be built up on such a foundation as that? No, he could tell the Senate they could not go into any such work. He should resist the motion for these reasons. He resisted it, also, because it was contrary to all parliamentary usage to send a bill to a committee hostile to its principles. To send it to such a committee is to send it where it is foredoomed. There was no occasion for such a course; the law has met the universal condemnation of the country. The present bill was a bill for its repeal, with provisions for bringing the remaining cases within constitutional limits. With this view he had taken the 36th section of the old bankrupt act of 1800, which required the consent of two-thirds of the creditors to the extinction of the bankrupt's debts. The whole of the creditors are treated as a partnership for the purpose of saving their debts—all having an interest, but giving a large majority a decisive voice in the adjustment. The old bankrupt act was in reality a bankrupt system, and respected the insolvent laws of the States. But the present law undertakes to expunge the insolvent laws of States. The old law was confined to traders; but this extends to every one who wants to get rid of his debts. The old law of 1800 not only respected the insolvent laws of the States, but the lien laws of the States; this presumes to abrogate both. In the provisions of this repeal bill, the necessary clauses of the old law are to be incorporated, in relation to the remaining cases of bankruptcy. This must be done to bring them within the pale of the constitution. One good effect will be that, although we may not tell the judges they have been guilty of gross error, we can show them that they have acted unconstitutionally. In England, a bankrupt must have his certificate signed by two-thirds of his creditors, and he is treated as an uncertified bankrupt. And he would tell the Senate that here, now, every person who has been discharged under the act of last session is an uncertified bankrupt; and his claim to be discharged from liability to his debts should be disregarded in any court acting up to the constitution. If he (Mr. B.) were a judge of a court, he would treat as a nullity any certificate under the present law, brought forward as a plea against the claim of debt. He would ask for a certificate signed by two-thirds of the creditors; and if that could not be produced, he would disregard the plea altogether. He would ask, was the Senate now to elongate this iniquitous act? and if it was, for what length of time? He could tell them how long it would admit of remaining cases being continued: just as long as the assets would hold out to pay the officers of the courts and the commissioners.

Some months ago, he read in a Philadelphia paper a notice to creditors to come forward for a dividend of half a cent in the dollar in a case of bankruptcy pending, under the old law of 1800, since the year 1801. And, three or four days ago, he read a notice in a London paper, calling on creditors to come in for a dividend of five-sixths of a penny in the pound in a case of bankruptcy pending since the year 1798. Here has been a case where the value of property has been going on for fifty years in England, and another case where it has been going on in this country forty-one or forty-two years. He had been himself twenty-three years in the Senate, and during that time various efforts were made to revive the old law of 1800 in some shape or other; but never, till last session, in the shape in which the present law passed. And how could this law be expected to stand, when even the law of 1800 (which was in reality a bankrupt law) could not stand; but was, in the first year of its operation, condemned by the whole country? With regard to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. GRAHAM) to amend the bill, he should say that it fairly brought up the question properly at issue. It brought up the question of repeal; and that being decided, it next presented the question of how the pending cases are to be treated. One proposition is to go on, in relation to these cases, with the bankrupt law as if not repealed; the other is, to make these remaining cases subject to the provisions of a constitutional bankrupt law. On this issue, the question is just as fairly presented, and much better presented, than it can be by any report of a committee. The motion of the Senator from North Carolina does all that can be required. It brings up the main subject on all its bearings. All that is necessary, is to fix a day for its consideration. If, however, the motion of reference was persisted in, he should call for the yeas and nays.

[2d Sess.]

Election of Chaplain.

[DECEMBER, 1842.]

Mr. TALLMADGE did not know that the mere question of reference was such a vital one as to commit those who should vote for it. He supposed, from present indications, that the law would be repealed. But those who intended to vote for the repeal, could assuredly vote for the reference, without thereby being committed against the repeal. The question of reference is, simply, whether the Senate shall proceed in the matter deliberately, and upon full information; or precipitately, and without any guide. It was, he considered, all-important that the bill now under discussion, should undergo the examination of the appropriate committee. The Senator from Missouri says the question is fairly and fully presented on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina. But there are many Senators who think the question should also embrace a modification of the law; and they, too, wish to see that view presented from the proper source. Let the bill, then, go to the Committee on the Judiciary; and if the law is to be repealed, there will be time enough to effect that object. It seemed, indeed, strange to him that there should be any objection to letting the bill pass through the Judiciary Committee; for the Senate must have the same control of it after it is reported back, that it has now. He hoped there would be no objection to considering the opinion of the committee.

Mr. BERRIEN said it was truly stated by the Senator from Missouri, that the bill he proposes and the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, present two questions—the question of repeal, and the question as to the terms of that repeal. But, independently of these, there was a third question. A portion of the Senate desired to have it inquired of, by a committee, whether, instead of an absolute repeal of the law, it might not be so modified as to make it conform to the interests of the country, and to the prevailing public opinion. With a view to ascertain whether such a modification could be proposed, it was asked that the bill might be referred to the Judiciary Committee. And surely, in relation to a matter of this important nature—in relation to the exercise of a power which could alone be exercised by the General Government—notwithstanding gentlemen might entertain the opinion that the bill, even when so modified, would not be acceptable to them, yet it was but one of the ordinary courtesies of legislation to allow gentlemen who may take a different view, an opportunity of presenting their views for the consideration of that body. He (Mr. BERRIEN) denied, therefore, that the reference of the bill to the committee would at all influence the vital question of repeal or no repeal. The only effect of the reference would be, to give those who were in favor of a modification of the law an opportunity of presenting their views in a deliberate form. He would not, however, object to the yeas and nays being taken.

Mr. BENTON said if there was any Senator present who would say that the vote he should give for reference would not commit him, he (Mr. B.) was willing to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he was disposed to gratify the gentleman by the reference, although he should vote for the repeal of the law.

Mr. MERRICK said he should vote for the reference, without feeling himself committed at all, with respect to the vote he should give on the question of repeal. He intended to vote for the repeal in some form.

Mr. BENTON said he would, then, withdraw his call for the yeas and nays.

The question was then taken on referring the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 17, noes 12; and it was accordingly so referred.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 14.

Election of Chaplain.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that the House proceed to the election of its Chaplain; which was agreed to.

The nominations having all been made, Messrs. BOWNE, HENRY, and JAMES COOPER, were appointed tellers to receive the votes.

A vote was then taken, the result of which Mr. BOWNE announced to be—

Whole number of votes	-	-	198
Necessary to a choice	-	-	100
Of which—
Mr. Tiffany received	-	-	119
Mr. Reese	-	-	39
Mr. Muller	-	-	29
Mr. Maffitt	-	-	10
Mr. Bulfinch	-	-	1

DECEMBER, 1842.]

Death of the Hon. Mr. Habersham.

[27th Conn.]

Mr. Tiffany having received a majority of all the votes given, he was declared duly elected to the chaplaincy of the House of Representatives for the present session.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 15.

The Quintuple Treaty.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution; which lies one day, under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate whether the quintuple treaty, for the suppression of the slave-trade, has been communicated to the Government of the United States in any form whatever? And if so, by whom? for what purpose? and what answer may have been returned to such communication? Also, to communicate to the Senate all the information which may have been received by the Government of the United States, going to show that the "course which this Government might take in relation to said treaty has excited no small degree of attention and discussion in Europe." Also, to inform the Senate how far the "warm animadversions," and the "great political excitement," which this treaty has caused in Europe, have any application or reference to these United States. Also, to inform the Senate what danger there was of having the "laws and the obligations" of the United States, in relation to the suppression of the slave-trade, "executed by others," if we did not "remove their pretext and motive for violating our flag, and executing our laws," by entering into the stipulations for the African squadron, and the remonstrating sentences, which are contained in the eighth and ninth articles of the late British treaty.

MONDAY, December 19.

Death of the Hon. Mr. Habersham.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing to the Senate the death of the Hon. RICHARD W. HABERSHAM, late Representative from the State of Georgia, and the passage of certain resolutions; which message being read,

Mr. BERRIEN rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: In offering the resolutions which it is my duty to submit to the Senate on this occasion, the usage of this Chamber requires that I should accompany them with some notice, however brief, of the character of the deceased—with some reference, however transient, to the event which calls for this expression of our sympathy.

It would be to me, sir, a grateful, though a melancholy office, to pronounce the eulogy of my departed friend and associate—to dwell with cherished recollection on his public virtues—on his private worth—above all, on that benevolence of feeling, which was so beautifully exhibited in all his intercourse with his fellow-men. It would be my privilege to speak of him thus, sir; for it has been my good fortune to have been associated with him from his earlier years, in relations of kindness and amity, which experienced no solitary interruption to the close of his life; while, in mutually cherishing these feelings, we only lengthened the chain which united our fathers in like friendly bonds. The occasion is, however, perhaps, inappropriate to the expression of mere private feelings—and I forbear.

Mr. HABERSHAM was a native of Georgia. His family name is associated with the records of her colonization, and is honorably inscribed on the pages of her provincial annals. It has been distinguished in each successive period of her history, and, unsullied by a spot, will now be registered on the stone which covers his own remains. In Georgia, sir, that name is the synonyme of patriotism, integrity, and benevolence.

Mr. HABERSHAM was born in the city of Savannah—I think in the year 1786. He obtained his collegiate education at Nassau Hall, in New Jersey; received the honors of that institution in 1805; and, returning to his native State, after the usual course of preparatory study, was called to the bar. He was early distinguished among his professional associates and was for a series of years the counsel of the United States in the courts of that district. He retired from office, with the applause of the people of Georgia, when the duties which it imposed conflicted with his own sense of justice to a portion of his fellow-citizens. He served with reputation in the municipality of the city of Savannah, and in the Legislature of his native State, and has been twice honored by a seat in the councils of the Union. It can scarcely be necessary to say to those to whom I address myself, that his duties here have been discharged with zeal and fidelity, with assiduity and intelligence, and in a frank and conciliatory spirit, which, even amid the conflicts of party, secured to him the esteem and regard of his associates. He died at his own residence in Georgia, on the 2d instant, at a moment when, but for the disease which had prostrated him, he would have been hastening to unite with us in the duties of legislation.

Mr. HABERSHAM has now closed his earthly labors. Hereafter, among us, he lives only in the memory of his virtues. These will be long held in grateful remembrance by those to whom he was most intimately known. The recollection of them will, I trust, assuage the sorrows of the widowed partner of his life, and of that group of orphans who are clustering around her in this hour of anguish.

But Mr. HABERSHAM yet lives. The record of this probationary life, as to him, indeed is closed forever. But he has gone, in the immortality of his being, to render his account to his Creator and his Judge. It remains to us to hope that he may find acceptance in that solemn hour through the atoning blood of the Redeemer; and to inscribe on our own hearts the monitory lesson which this event is calculated to impart.

3d Sess.]

The African Squadron.

[DECEMBER, 1842.]

Mr. B. closed by offering the usual resolutions in testimony of the respect of the Senate for the memory of the deceased, and authorizing the wearing of crape; which were read, and unanimously adopted; and, in accordance with which, the Senate forthwith adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 19.

Death of the Hon. Mr. Habersham.

Mr. GAMBLE, of Georgia, rose, and addressed the House as follows:

The present Congress, it is believed, has oftener performed the painful duty of announcing the death of its members, than any which has preceded it under the Government. In the first week of our session, we were called upon to pay the last tribute of respect to the memory of one who died on his way to the seat of Government, to resume his duties as a member of this body; and, to-day, the duty has devolved upon me to communicate to the House the mournful intelligence which has reached us, of the death of another member of this branch of the National Legislature. For some time we entertained hopes that the rumor of his death was unfounded; or, at most, premature. But it is at length reduced to painful certainty that RICHARD W. HABERSHAM is no more. He has finished his course on earth; his seat in this hall is vacant; and he now sleeps in the silent tomb. His constitution being naturally feeble, and his health somewhat impaired when he first took his seat as a member of this body—added to the severity of the climate, and his laborious and close attention to his duties, which was more than he was able to endure—brought on a disease, which has only terminated in his death; which painful event, as we are informed, took place at his residence in Habersham county, Georgia, on the second day of this month, surrounded by his family and friends. Mr. HABERSHAM was a descendant of one of the most honorable and distinguished families in Georgia. He was endowed with more than ordinary powers of mind, which was enlarged and cultivated by a liberal education. Being thus qualified, he early engaged in public life, and, by a long course of upright conduct and unbending integrity, he acquired a degree of confidence which few attain, and (what is still more rare) which he never abused. He has occupied stations of honor and trust, both under the Federal and State Governments, the duties of which he discharged to the full requisitions of the law, and entire satisfaction of those with whom he had official transaction.

In 1838 he was elected as a member of Congress, and continued in that character until his death. To you, sir, and his associates here, I need say nothing. You have witnessed his course; you appreciate his worth as a man, and his usefulness as a member of this body. And notwithstanding the political asperity of the times during which he has been a member—and although he has been firm and unwavering in his political course—yet, I believe, he never indulged in a sentiment, or suffered an expression to escape his lips, at which even the most sensitive political opponent could justly take exception. His errors and infirmities, if any he had—and none are faultless—“were of the head and not of the heart.” He was amiable, generous, and forgiving in his disposition; his home was the centre of kindness and hospitality; and his hand ever open to the calls of charity. It may be said of him, and can with truth be said of him, that he has gone, and left not an enemy behind him. In his lamented death, Georgia has lost one of her most useful, virtuous, and talented citizens—one of her most distinguished, patriotic, and cherished sons; and his family have sustained a loss which cannot be repaired by time. May that Being who “tempers the wind to the shorn lamb,” comfort and sustain them in this, their deep affliction; and may this memento of our mortality make a deep and lasting impression upon our hearts, and cause us well to consider the admonition addressed to us in the word of truth, which is enforced by this solemn dispensation—“Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh.”

Mr. G. then offered the usual resolution, viz: that the members, as a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, go into mourning, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days: which was adopted; and, as an additional mark of respect for his memory,

On motion by Mr. GAMBLE,
The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 20.

The African Squadron.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. BENTON some days ago, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate whether the quintuple treaty, for the suppression of the slave-trade, has been communicated to the Government of the United States in any form whatever; and, if so, by whom? for what purpose? and what answer may have been returned to such communication? Also, to communicate to the Senate all the information which may have been received by the Government of the United States, going to show that the “course which this Government might take in relation to said treaty has excited no small degree of attention and discussion in Europe.” Also, to inform the Senate how far the “warm animadversions,” and “the great political excitement,” which this treaty has caused in Europe, have any application or reference to these United States. Also, to inform the Senate what danger there was that “the laws and the obligations” of the United States, in relation to the suppression of the slave-trade, would be “executed by others” if we did not “remove their pretext and

DECEMBER, 1842.]

The African Squadron.

[27th Conv.]

motive for violating our flag and executing our laws," by entering into the stipulations for the African squadron, and the remonstrating sentences, which are contained in the 8th and 9th articles of the late British treaty. And, also, to communicate to the Senate all the correspondence which may have been received from our ministers abroad, having relation to the foregoing points of inquiry.

Mr. AROHER said he believed he could give the Senator from Missouri all the information that he would be enabled to obtain by the adoption of this resolution. The Senator would perceive, by reference to the Message of the President, of August last, communicating the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, that an answer to the first branch of his interrogatories was there given. The President had there declared that the quintuple treaty had not been communicated to this Government by any of the parties to that treaty. It was very true, that the Government of the United States had got information of the character of that treaty, as seemed to be the case with regard to the various Governments of Europe; but it had not yet been officially communicated.

As to the other matters inquired for by the resolution, the same answer would, he thought, equally apply to them. The Government had no other means of obtaining information, than that possessed by the gentleman from Missouri himself. It was within the knowledge of the honorable Senator himself, that—in consequence, perhaps, of the importance of the treaty itself, or, perhaps, in consequence of the attention which had been attracted to it by General Cass—it had become a subject of discussion and animadversion throughout Europe, as well as the United States.

The next branch of inquiry contained in the resolution, as he (Mr. AROHER) understood it, was in relation to the opinion which had been expressed by the Executive of the United States as to the course which this Government ought to pursue in reference to the slave-trade. He (Mr. A.) would at least presume that the honorable Senator from Missouri was indifferent, as he himself was, as to the opinions entertained by the President upon this subject; and he would therefore submit to the honorable Senator whether there could be any propriety or necessity for asking these opinions. He would ask, then, inasmuch as there had been no official communication on the subject between this and any foreign Government, wherefore should a call be made for information which could not be rendered? The President had merely expressed an opinion that it was best to execute our own laws, and not submit to the indignity of having them executed for us by other nations.

The Senator from Missouri, he was sure, would concur with him, that as there were no facts in the possession of the Executive, which were not equally in the possession of the Senator himself, there could be no necessity for the resolution of inquiry. He hoped, therefore, the honorable Senator would be willing that the motion which he was now about to make, to lay the resolution upon the table, should prevail.

Mr. BENTON replied to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. AROHER,) and said his resolution of inquiry was founded upon the President's Message of August last, recommending the ratification of the British treaty; and all the points of inquiry made by him were found in that Message. He would have made the call at the last session, when the treaty was ratified; but there was no time for it. The treaty was at the end of a nine months' session, in the midst of the dog-days, and when there was no time for inquiries. But the appropriations for the treaty were still to be made; and the information he wanted, would be used when the supplies for the African squadron were demanded. The Message says the quintuple alliance was not officially communicated to the Government. This implies that it was unofficially communicated; and, if so, the country ought to know by whom, and for what purpose. The Message speaks of our conduct in relation to that treaty, as being the subject of attention and discussion in Europe; and tells us of various animadversions, and great political excitement in relation to it. Of course, it is the parties to this quintuple treaty—the holy allies—who are giving us this attention, and making it the subject of this discussion; who bestow this animadversion, and experience this great excitement;—and it is certainly right that the people of the United States should know what all this portends; and how far the affairs of the United States are taken into the keeping of the holy allies. The Message also presents, as an argument for the African squadron, that others would execute our laws if we did not; and execute them in a way to violate our flag. This is presented as an argument to operate on the minds of the Senate, in favor of the ratification, when it might be an argument against carrying it into effect; for this country was not to be dragooned into an alliance. The whole case, as made out in the President's Message of August last, went to show that the holy allies had taken our conduct into consideration; and that Great Britain was going to execute our laws for us, if we did not execute them ourselves; and that this squadron and these remonstrating ambassadors were the price which we paid to appease the holy allies, and to escape search from Great Britain. This was the aspect of the Message; and he wished to know whether there were facts to justify it. If there were, he thought it a case for resistance, not for submission.

Mr. AROHER desired to say a single word in relation to this matter, to the Senator from Missouri, and to the Senate. He presumed no one would contend that it comported with the dignity of that body to make a call upon the Executive for information, when they were sub-

3d Sess.]

The African Squadron.

[DECEMBER, 1842.]

ciently advised that no information could be obtained. And, to be convinced that none could be obtained, it was only necessary to refer to the Message of the President. What, then, was the object of this resolution? Was it a resolution of crimination? The Senator was informed that there had been no communication made to this Government by the parties to the quintuple treaty: how, then, could he expect to obtain the information he asked?

How could the Government, by any possibility, furnish the evidence demanded by the honorable Senator, when they were told by the Executive that he had had no negotiations upon the subject with any power whatever? There being, then, no information in the possession of the Government going to answer the inquiry contained in the resolution, he would submit to the honorable Senator whether it was fit that they should send a criminatory or a vindictive resolution to the President. He would put it to the honorable Senator, if it was really information that he sought. The honorable Senator knew full well there was no information that he could receive. His object, then, with all due respect to the honorable Senator, he (Mr. A.) must suppose was merely to utter a denunciation against the Executive. This being his view of the case, he felt bound to move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. KING suggested that it would be better to postpone its consideration, and, in the mean time, order it to be printed.

Mr. AROHER said he intended no discourtesy towards any honorable Senator; and if any one desired to discuss the resolution further, he would withdraw the motion.

Mr. BENTON observed that he wanted the information, not for crimination, but for use on the discussion of the appropriation. Every thing in relation to the origin and cause of this African squadron would then be wanting; for he, for one, meant to resist the appropriations for this African crusade. He said the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. AROHER) was mistaken in supposing that he wanted the opinions of the Administration. Not so. He had their opinions in the August Message; and he wished to see whether they had any facts for the opinions they then delivered. He wished to see if the holy allies were animadverting upon us, and whether Great Britain intended to search our ships if we did not join her in the African alliance. This seemed to be the opinion of the Administration; and Mr. B. wished to see if they had any foundation for it. With this view, he called for all the information they possessed, and especially for the correspondence of our ministers abroad. He felt certain that those ministers must have written on the subject. It could not be supposed that the President had founded his communication to the Senate on coffee-house discussions, or on newspaper discussions, or even on the debates of the French Chambers: there was nothing in all that to alarm us, or to show that the holy allies were occupying themselves with our affairs. The President must have had official correspondence on the subject, even if he had no official communication of the treaty: and he wished to see that correspondence. He had a right to see it, and should insist upon his right.

Mr. B. then read the paragraphs from the President's Message of August last; and argued that every inquiry was bottomed upon the Message, and proper for the information of Congress and the country. Mr. B. said these paragraphs presented grave matter for the consideration of Congress and the country. They were gravely presented to the Senate, to influence its action on the treaty; and, from the case which they present, it is perfectly clear that this squadron is our tribute in men and ships to appease the holy allies, and to prevent Great Britain from searching us. It is clear, from these paragraphs, that this five years' alliance is the price which we pay for these favors. Now, it might or it might not be so. In either event, we have a right to know; and, in either event, the Administration is on the horn of a dilemma. If the holy allies and Great Britain are going to take us in hand if we do not give them this squadron, then it was cowardice and national degradation to give it. If, on the other hand, the holy allies have no designs upon us, and Great Britain has no design to search us, if we do not search ourselves, then the Senate has been trifled with, and considerations brought to bear upon them which have no foundation in fact. In either case, we have a right to know the facts. Has Great Britain threatened us? Have the holy allies taken our conduct in hand? These are the questions which arise on the President's Message; and let us have them answered. Let us have the correspondence of our ministers, if there is any. Does the Senator from Virginia undertake to say for the Administration, that they have no such correspondence? [Mr. AROHER was understood to answer negatively.] Then let the Administration answer! As the case now stands, we have given this squadron under a threat—under the threat of seeing Great Britain execute our anti-slave-trade laws for us, if we do not execute them ourselves; upon the same principle that she executes our neutrality laws for us on the Canadian frontier. The excuse—no, not the excuse! for she does not descend to excuse, but boldly justifies!—the justification for the attack on the Caroline was, that the United States did not, or could not, execute its own laws on that frontier; and, therefore, Great Britain was under the necessity of executing them for us. This is the language with respect to the Canada frontier; and, from the tenor of the Message, we have the same language in relation to the coast of Africa. By land and by water—at home and abroad—Great Britain undertakes to execute our laws for us, and to punish our citizens for us! and, from the termination of the Schlosser affair, and this African tribute in men and ships, it seems that the present Administration admits her pretension in both cases. But, let us see. Let us have the facts—the correspondence; and let the country judge whether we have really been menaced, or whether our Administration have taken fright at nothing.

Mr. ARCHER assenting to the suggestion of postponing the resolution to Thursday, on motion to that effect, the resolution was postponed to Thursday next, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 20.

Mutiny and Executions on Board the Brig Somers.

Mr. GWIN asked the permission of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House whatever official information may have been received at the Navy Department relative to the alleged design of mutiny on board the United States brig Somers, under the command of Alexander Slidell McKenzie; and what number of persons have been executed for said offence; their names and rank; and the proceedings which were had on board of said vessel in reference thereto.

Mr. WISE suggested to the gentleman from Mississippi, that, as a court of inquiry was to be called, from which official information would be received in a very few weeks, it would be better to postpone his resolution, until the court had been held.

Mr. GWIN intimated his intention to press his resolution, that the necessary information might be got from the President.

Mr. G. moved a suspension of the rules for the reception of his resolution, to which objection had been made.

The motion was negatived.

The Bankrupt Law.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the House take up the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EVERETT said he now offered this bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law, because he conceived it to be destroying confidence between man and man; and seemed to be a shelter for those who were disposed to live without labor. Its future operation he looked upon as injurious; and it would be difficult to ingraft any amendment upon the present act which would diminish its evils. He said he did not propose to commit this bill, because he was in favor of a total repeal of the bankrupt law; and, therefore, its committal was unnecessary. If, however, such a motion should be made, he should consider it a test question between those who desired the continuance, and those who desired the repeal of that law.

Mr. BARNARD said: This motion for a repeal of the bankrupt law came from Vermont, and from his excellent and learned friend from that State, (Mr. EVERETT,) who took the pains to declare, at this and at the last session of Congress, that, upon the whole, the bankrupt act was the best and wisest law that Congress had ever passed. Now it was to be repealed upon the motion of the very gentleman who made this eulogium. Considering the source from which that motion emanated, and considering the sort of support which it was about to receive, it struck his mind as one of the most alarming movements he had ever witnessed in the political world. It went far to prove the truth of the charge so often made against this nation—that its legislation was destined to be unstable; not guided and governed, as it ought to be, by the settled, well-considered, well-digested opinions of the people of the country; but that it was destined to be disturbed by every wave of popular sentiment—to follow, in short, not only the shiftings and turnings of popular sentiment, but popular error, and popular delusion. That such a thing as popular error and popular delusion existed, as well in this country as in others, he was not afraid or ashamed to say. By unsettled, ill-digested popular opinion, he never had been—and so help him God!—never would be governed.

But Vermont demanded the repeal of the bankrupt law; and, therefore, it was to be repealed. Vermont was a creditor State—she was in the happy condition of owing nobody, and everybody was indebted to her; and her Legislature, at its last session, passed a resolution instructing her Senators, and requesting her Representatives in Congress, to procure the repeal of that law. He denied the right of Vermont to dictate to Congress upon this subject, or upon any other. She might express her opinions, it was true; but the opinions that governed here were those of the members of the National Legislature, and not those of the members of her State Legislature. He was utterly hostile to this doctrine of instruction, as it came from what source it might, avowed or not avowed. What security was there for legislation, if the representatives of a State—the very same men—were to be governed one day by one set of opinions, and another day by another, just as the waves of popular sentiment ebbed and flowed. Vermont did not, it seemed, like to see her debtors escape, and, in common with almost all other creditors, she had a very great reluctance to see the dead body of debt buried out of her sight. Well, this might be a very natural feeling; but it was a morbid one, which ought not to be encouraged. Creditors were not buzzards, to feed on carrion; and he did not want to see the dead bodies kept above ground till they tainted the whole atmosphere.

He had remarked that he could not see any security for legislation in the country, unless party and party men were to be precluded from influencing it to suit their temporary purposes. If they could not be, then the legislation of the country would be blown about by every popular gale. Unless the Representatives would abide by their own opinions after having once promulgated them, he was free to declare that there could be no stability in the policy of the country.

[3d Sess.]

The Bankrupt Law.

[DECEMBER, 1842.]

But his excellent friend from Vermont (Mr. EVERETT) had discovered that the bankrupt law had performed its office; that it had fulfilled its objects, and, therefore, ought to be repealed. He further avowed, that it was his opinion at the time the act was passed, that it should have been limited to the term of one year; that it ought to be a temporary law. What was a temporary law? What was it but repudiation in its most odious form—repudiation by individuals of their own debts at their own time; a proclamation by debtors of a jubilee—not like that of the Jews, which, occurring at regular and stated periods, creditors as well as debtors could prepare themselves for—but a jubilee, the time of which was to be prescribed by the debtors themselves. Such a bankrupt law was not the establishment of a rule of law; it was the establishment of an exception to a rule of law, in the face of the law itself. It was a law by which you open the prison doors, and let loose those confined at the moment; though at the next day the jails may be as full as ever—and of those, too, who are not to be set at liberty. Was that a bankrupt law in the understanding of the constitution? The constitution authorized Congress to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy: but could a law of a year's duration be called a uniform law? It was not a law, because it was not a rule of conduct affecting all alike; but it was a mere partial arbitrary act of arbitrary power, interposing between the creditor and his debtor, to break up for the time being the relations between them, and to take away the power which the law gave the former over the latter. In this way, the creditor, in his turn, might be ruined and driven to bankruptcy; though, in consequence of the temporary nature of the law, he would be precluded from its benefits. Mr. B. said he denied the power of Congress to pass any such law. It had the power to pass a permanent and uniform law, and he admitted that it had the power to repeal it; but it had no power to pass a bankrupt law that was not permanent and uniform. Such a bankrupt law as was contemplated by the constitution would have the tendency to prevent bankruptcy; but a temporary law, such as was contemplated by the gentleman from Vermont, would have the tendency to encourage bankruptcy, and to encourage extravagance and speculation, by the hope held out that a proclamation of jubilee would be made to free debtors for the time being from the power of their creditors.

If, then, this bankrupt law was to be repealed, let it be because it was inexpedient; because such a law ought never to have been passed; but, for Heaven's sake, do not let it be repealed on the ground that it has accomplished the object for which it was enacted.

Mr. B. said he had no manner of doubt but that very much of the influence which was abroad in the country, and was brought to bear on the House at the time the bankrupt law was passed, was that of individuals, who, if they did not then hold the sentiments advanced now by his friend from Vermont, were yet willing to receive the benefits of them; in other words, they were willing that a temporary law should be passed to relieve them from their embarrassments, to be repealed, or to expire at the time they came to be creditors. He prayed and besought gentlemen, therefore, if they meant to vote for the repeal, to put their votes on better grounds than those of his friend from Vermont. Let the law be repealed, if it is to be repealed, because it is a bad law; but do not let it be repealed because it was intended as a temporary measure, and because it has fulfilled its objects.

But why should the bankrupt law be repealed? He addressed himself to those who had been its friends. What was the greatest objection to the measure, in the minds of intelligent men, at the time of its passage? Was it not because of its retrospective operation, violating, in their opinions, one of the provisions of the constitution, by impairing the obligation of contracts? That objection was now almost removed. The force of the bankrupt law in regard to old cases was almost spent; and it was now about to commence its most wholesome and beneficent functions, by operating upon cases which have arisen since its enactment. The constitutional objection was, therefore, no longer in force.

After some further remarks from Mr. B., showing the benefits derived, and to be derived, from the bankrupt act, he concluded by moving to commit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to bring in a bill to repeal that part of the law providing for voluntary bankruptcy, and to provide that this shall take place in 18 months from the passage of the act.

Mr. B. said the House was aware that, in the other branch of Congress, a resolution had been adopted calling upon the Secretary of State for information in relation to this subject; and he hoped that the House would wait till that information was received, and not, by precipitate legislation, run the risk of committing an act of cruelty and injustice.

Mr. O. J. INGERSOLL said he should like to move the adoption of instructions to the committee, in case the bill was referred to their consideration. He, therefore, sent to the Chair the following instructions:

"And that the said committee be instructed to report a bill excluding the voluntary provision from the present bankrupt act, and including banks."

Mr. BARNARD inquired whether the motion was in order; to which

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. O. J. INGERSOLL modified his instructions by striking out the word banks, and substituting the words trading corporations.

Mr. WINTHROP only wished to explain simply the reasons which should induce him to vote against the repeal of this law, representing, as he did, a great commercial community.

The power of Congress to enact a bankrupt law was not implied merely, but was found in the category of these clearly expressed and enumerated powers about which there was no dispute. Now, he held it to be the duty of Congress to exercise its power; and not to exercise it, a positive neglect and omission—not less than it would be to omit to exercise the power given to regulate commerce, establish courts, coin money, provide for the common defence of the country, and, in short, any other power expressed among those named in the constitution. He was aware that it had been suggested by his friend from Vermont, (Mr. EVERETT,) that, though the present law might be repealed, another might be enacted. But when would such an event occur? When could it be expected? Certainly not until it should be called for by the people, to sweep off the load of indebtedness that might be upon them; and then the law would itself be swept off, after having performed its office. Such was the fate of the first bankrupt law, and such seemed to be the inevitable destiny of this.

But the language of the constitution was remarkably strong. It was, not that "Congress shall have power to pass," but to "establish a uniform system of bankruptcy." Would a mere passage of an act be a fulfilment of the power to establish a system? So far from it, the reverse of the proposition would be true; and such passage be a mere temporary remedy. Such a course—the enactment of a bankrupt law for a particular temporary purpose—could be justified on no principle whatever. He, therefore, protested against the introduction of a bankrupt law at irregular intervals, and before the trader and the man of business could be aware how to act. Anticipating the results which had flowed from the insertion of the retrospective principle in the present act, he had voted for it with reluctance; and, had he believed that the whole act was destined to be so soon expunged from the statute-book, he should not have voted for it at all. And here he would make a suggestion to that gentleman, who had denounced the retrospective character of the act; and that was, that, by voting for the repeal of the law at the present time, they would become responsible for its revival hereafter. The only mode of preventing the enactment of a retrospective law was to establish the prospective provision of the present law upon a firm basis. True, the present law might not be perfect, and might require remedy in its details. What he had to say was, let it be perfected; let it be limited in its operation to traders, if necessary; and even let a provision be inserted comprehending banks, under certain circumstances and regulations. It did seem to him that the responsibility of the enactment of a retrospective bankrupt act hereafter would rest on those gentlemen who should vote for the repeal of the present.

There was one more view of the subject which he would mention. He meant the monstrous injustice of an immediate and unconditional repeal of the law. It was known that many debtors, responding, as had been said, to the first sound of the trumpet, had advanced and obtained relief, having first stripped themselves for the purpose, and leaving as little matter to be decided upon by the courts as effects to be distributed among the creditors. A repeal of the law would not take away the benefits these men had obtained, whilst it would give the same desperate debtor the further advantage of any new bankrupt law which might be enacted hereafter. On the other hand, there were numbers whose affairs, not altogether hopeless, left the prospect of distributing something to their creditors—men whose applications for the benefit of the act had been held back, in the hope of making an honorable compromise; or whose cases had been delayed in the courts by arguments upon points of law; these would be altogether deprived of the advantages secured by more expeditious, and, perhaps, less scrupulous debtors. In conclusion, he hoped—if it was not too late to hope—that the House would pause before it resolved to wipe out altogether the law now in force.

Mr. PAYNE remarked that one of the strongest objections which he had to the passage of this act, was its retrospective character. He was not fully persuaded that the Government had power to pass a law absolving individuals from their contracts. He could not believe it to be legal and proper for the Government to destroy the relations subsisting between debtor and creditor. Government, as he thought, should, at least, have permitted the obligations between the creditor and his security to be performed.

These were some of his objections to the law at the beginning; but, with regard to a prospective bankrupt law, properly established, he did not then, nor did he now, object. All objections, however, were disregarded by those who controlled the action of this House; and a uniform system of bankruptcy, to be perpetual as the law of the country, was passed; and this was the first time that the avowal had been made—as it had been made this morning—that the object of the bankrupt law was to violate private contracts, and to turn men loose from their obligations. It was immaterial how they regarded it here; but the eyes of all the commercial world were turned upon them; and to Europe it would appear that they repealed the law, after it had done—what? Released at least the debtor from the obligation of his contracts. It appeared to him this proposition

[3d Sess.]

The Bankrupt Law.

[DECEMBER, 1842.]

portrayed, more clearly than any thing else could do, the true object the gentlemen who advocated it had in pressing it on the country. Now, if he might be permitted to advise those gentlemen who passed this law, he should say: For Heaven's sake do not lay it on this exclusive ground—that the object was to release the debtor from the obligation of his contract, for which he had received a valuable consideration.

He would declare again, that, if a bankrupt law were established, striking out the voluntary feature, and making it such a bankrupt law as was contemplated by the constitution, he should not object to see it become part of the permanent policy of our country. But if they voted for the bill which was now presented to the House, for the repeal of the existing bankrupt law, they would commit themselves with regard to the constitutionality of the whole measure. The proviso was designed to secure to those who had taken the first step, the benefit of the existing bankrupt law up to the 5th of the present month; and when this bill was introduced, he gave notice that he should move to strike out that proviso; but he was conscious of the great difficulty which must result. There was much force in what had been said by gentlemen on this subject, respecting the indecent haste of bankrupts to avail themselves of the law, to release them from their obligations; whereas, those who were less hasty, and who regretted the necessity to avail themselves of the provisions of the law, and, therefore, held back, were to be deprived of the benefits of the law. There were difficulties, too, in the way of their voting for this bill to repeal the bankrupt law, with such a provision as would compromise them on the constitutional question which it involved; and the whole case afforded a striking illustration of the evil of that hasty legislation which was forced on the country without consideration by the operation of the gag rule, which did not permit an i to be dotted, or a t to be crossed. Under all the circumstances, he did not know that he could go for the repeal, as the bill now stood; for he was unwilling to commit himself with regard to the constitutional question.

The question recurring on Mr. INGERSOLL's motion to amend the motion to commit with instructions—

Mr. ARNOLD moved to strike out that part of the instructions relating to voluntary bankrupts, so that the instructions would read "to report a bankrupt bill including corporations not owned by States."

Mr. BOWNE said: Every member on that floor understood well what was the will of the whole country, as well as that of his constituents, in relation to this question. It had been long before the public; and the public mind, having weighed it in the balance, had, as far as he could understand it, declared it had been found wanting. He was ready to act on it now, though he confessed he would like to see some little modification of the bill before the House. If he could not get that modification, he would vote for the bill as it was; though he would not vote for a single motion that, in his view, would have a tendency to defeat the measure.

The only modification he wanted to make was a proviso that the repeal shall take effect from the passage of the act, so as to leave all persons who had already commenced the preliminary proceedings of bankruptcy, under the faith of a law of Congress, at liberty to consummate them. There would be great cruelty and injustice in cutting off those who had incurred a heavy expense to obtain the benefits of this law, and who did so under the faith of an act of Congress. With this proviso, he would be perfectly satisfied to vote for the bill before them; though, if he could not get it, he would vote for the bill as it then stood.

Mr. CHARLES BROWN said he was not in so great a hurry to repeal the bankrupt law as many gentlemen seemed to be. He was opposed to its passage, and was still opposed to it as it stood upon the statute-book; and if it could not be amended as he desired, he would vote for its repeal. But, before he voted for its repeal, he was desirous of making a fair and full effort to have embraced within its provisions all the banks and other trading corporations of the country. The operation of the voluntary provisions of the law, as they were called, had been almost unmitigated evil. But it had done its worst; and, if left in full force, could do comparatively but little more evil. It had deranged and destroyed all the long-established relations of debtor and creditor—had invalidated contracts, and released from their obligations all the large and princely debtors. It had afforded an opportunity for thousands to be released from their debts, who, otherwise, would have paid them, and, thereby, enabled those to whom they were indebted, in their turn to pay their debts. This last class—the creditors of those who have taken the benefit of the bankrupt law—have been made bankrupts by its operation; and now, by its repeal, you will leave them without remedy. Was this just? Was that the way the obligation of contracts ought to be maintained? Much, if not all, the opposition in the public mind against the bankrupt law, was owing to its voluntary and retrospective action—its violation of past engagements and existing contracts. But these had already been cancelled by it; and the repeal of the law would not restore these obligations—would not place them in the situation they were before its passage. The evil it had done could not, therefore, be remedied. If it remained in force, it could now only affect contracts made under it, and could do no positive wrong. Many had been made bankrupt by the effects of the law, who, otherwise, would have paid all their debts. He doubted the policy or justice of making these its victims, and then to deprive them of its remedies by legislation.

Before its passage, every man knew when he incurred a debt what were the penalties for non-payment. All knew what they had a right to expect and demand as creditors, or to give or suffer as debtors; all the debtors and creditors stood upon the same platform. If they repealed the law before all the relations of these parties that have been changed by it have been arranged according to its provisions, manifest injustice would be done to a large portion of them. Those who have been released, have had especial benefits conferred upon them; which especial benefits have bankrupted others, who will be left under all their obligations to others, again, without claims on those who were indebted to them. This was, he said, a great wrong, and one inflicted by the Government.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 21.

The Bankrupt Act.

MR. BENTON presented a petition from Washington county, Vermont, by W. Richardson, praying the repeal of the bankrupt act, and accompanied by a letter to him, stating that the people of Vermont were as unanimous as the Legislature of their State in condemning that act. Mr. B. would take the opportunity which the presentation of this petition offered, to declare that, holding the bankrupt act to be unconstitutional at six different points, (the extinction of the debt without the consent of a given majority of the creditors being at the head of these points,) he would vote for no repeal which would permit the act to continue in force for the trial of depending cases, unless with provisions which would bring the action of the law within the constitution. To say nothing, at present, of other points of unconstitutionality, he limited himself to the abolition of debts without the consent of a given majority of the creditors. This, he held, no power in our country can do. Congress can only go as far as the bankrupt systems of England and other countries go; and that is, to require the consent of a given majority of the creditors (four-fifths in number and value in England and Scotland) and that founded upon a judicial certificate of integrity by the commissioners who examined the case, and approved afterwards by the Lord Chancellor. Upon these principles only could Congress act: upon these principles the Congress of 1800 acted, in making a bankrupt act: and to these principles he would endeavor to conform the action of the present act so long as it might run. He held all the certificates granted by the courts to be null and void; and that the question of the validity would be carried before the courts, and before the tribunal of public opinion. The federal judges decided the alien and sedition law to be constitutional. The people reversed that decision, and put down the men who held it. This bankrupt act was much more glaringly unconstitutional—much more immoral—and called more loudly upon the people to rise against it. If he was a United States judge, he would decide the act to be unconstitutional. If he was a State court, and one of these certificates of discharge from debts should be pleaded in bar before him, on an action brought for the recovery of the old debt, he would treat the certificate as a nullity, and throw it out of court. If commanded by the Supreme Court, he would resign first. The English law held all bankrupts, whose certificates were not signed by the given majority of the creditors, to be uncertificated; and, as such, he held all these to be who had received certificates under our law. They had no certificate of discharge from a given majority of the creditors; and were therefore, what the English law called "uncertificated bankrupts." He said the bankrupt systems formed the creditors into a partnership for the management of the debtor's estate, and his discharge from debt; and, in this partnership, a given majority acted for the whole, it having the same interest in what was lost or saved; and, therefore, to be governed by a given majority, doing what was best for the whole. But even to this there were limitations. The four-fifths could not release the debt of the remaining fifth, except upon a certificate of integrity from the commissioners who tried the case, and a final approval by the Lord Chancellor. The law made itself party to the discharge, as it does in a case of divorce, and for the sake of good morals; and required the judicial certificate of integrity, without which the release of four-fifths of the creditors could not extinguish the debt of the other fifth. It is only in this way that Congress can act. It can only act according to the established principles of the bankrupt systems. It had no interest or supreme authority over debts: it could not abolish debts as it pleased. It could not confound bankruptcy and insolvency, and so get hold of all debts, and sweep them off as it pleased. All this was despotism, such as only could be looked for in a Government which had no limits, either on its moral or political powers. The attempt to confound insolvency and bankruptcy, and to make Congress supreme over both, was the most daring attack on the constitution, on the State laws, on the rights of property, and on public morals, which the history of Europe or America exhibited. There was no parallel to it in Europe or America. It was repudiation—universal repudiation of all debts—at the will of the debtor. The law was subversive of civil society; and he called upon Congress, the State Legislatures, the Federal and State judiciaries—and, above all, the people—to brand it for unconstitutionality and immorality, and to put it down.

Mr. B. said he had laid down the law, but he would refer to the forms which the wisdom of

3D SESS.]

The Oregon Territory.

[DECEMBER, 1842.]

the law provided for executing itself. These forms were the highest evidences of the law. They were framed by men learned in the law—approved by the courts—and studied by the apprentices to the law. They should also be studied by the journeymen—by the professors—and by the erminent judges. In this case, especially, they should be so studied. Bankruptcy was a branch of the law but little studied in our country. The mass of the community were uninformed upon it; and the latitudinarians, who could find no limits to the power of our Government, were daringly presuming upon the general ignorance, by undertaking to confound bankruptcy and insolvency, and claiming for Congress a despotic power over both. This daring attempt must be chastized. Congress must be driven back within the pale of the constitution; and for that purpose, the principles of the bankrupt system must be made known to the people. The forms are one of the best modes of doing this: and here are the forms of a bankrupt's certificate in Great Britain—the country from which our constitution borrowed the system. [Mr. B. then read from Jacobs's Law Dictionary, title Bankruptcy, at the end of the title, the three forms of the certificates which were necessary to release a debtor from his debts.] The first form was that of the commissioners who examined the case, and who certified to the integrity of the bankrupt, and that he had conformed in all particulars to the act. The second form was that of the certificate of four-fifths of his creditors, "allowing him to be discharged from his debts." The third was the certificate of the Lord Chancellor, certifying that notice of these two certificates having been published for twenty-one days in the London Gazette, and no cause being shown to the contrary, the certificates granted by the commissioners and by the creditors were "confirmed." Then, and not till then, could the debtor be discharged from his debts; and with all this, the act of 1800 in the United States perfectly agreed, only taking two-thirds instead of four-fifths of the creditors. Congress could only absolve debts in this way, and that among the proper subjects of a bankrupt law: and the moral sense of the community must revolt against any attempt to do it in any other form. The present act was repudiation—criminal repudiation, as far as any one chose to repudiate—and must be put down by the community.

The memorial was then referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The Oregon Bill.

Mr. LINN, from the Select Committee on the subject, reported back, with several amendments, the bill for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, and for extending portions of the laws of the United States over the same, and for other purposes.

The amendments were ordered to be printed.

VOL. XIV.—40

THURSDAY, December 22.

The Oregon Territory.

The resolution introduced on yesterday by Mr. LINN, came up in order, and was read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate of the nature and extent of the "informal communications" which took place between the American Secretary of State and the British special minister, during the late negotiation in Washington city, on the "subject of the claim of the United States and Great Britain to the territory west of the Rocky Mountains," and also to inform the Senate what were the reasons which prevented "any agreement on the subject at present," and which made it "inexpedient to include that subject among the subjects of formal negotiation."

Mr. AROHEE suggested to the Senator from Missouri, that, inasmuch as it might be inconsistent with the public interests that this information should be communicated at this time, it would be better to amend the resolution by inserting the words "if not inconsistent with the public interests." His own opinion was, that the honorable Senator would be nearer to the accomplishment of his purpose by not pressing the passage of the resolution at this time.

Mr. LINN said he considered the suggestion of the honorable Senator exceedingly reasonable. The reason why he had introduced the resolution was, that they might have some information regarding the condition of the Oregon Territory. The negotiations upon that subject had slept for the last twelve or fourteen years. It appeared that some correspondence had taken place, informally, between the Secretary of State and Lord Ashburton; and he felt great anxiety that something positive should be known regarding the course which had been pursued in reference to this subject. Many of our citizens were now going to that Territory, and they were desirous of knowing in what position they were likely to be placed. The claim of the British Government appeared to be in some degree strengthened by lapse of time; and the public feeling in many of the States throughout the valley of the Mississippi generally, and, indeed, throughout the whole United States, demanded that some definite action should take place. We want to know what the British Government are disposed to tolerate us the possession of. That seemed to be the nature of the case; not what we are disposed to assert our right to and to claim, but what they will allow us the possession of. He was of opinion that the resolution would do very well as it was; if, however, the gentleman from Virginia was desirous that it should be modified in accordance with the suggestion he had made, he (Mr. LINN) had not the least objection.

The question was then put on the resolution, and it was adopted.

DECEMBER, 1842.]

Fine on General Jackson.

[27th CONG.]

Assumption of State Debts.

Mr. BENTON's resolution, offered yesterday, was taken up for consideration, and read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether the late special minister from Great Britain to the United States made any proposition, informally or otherwise, to the negotiator on the part of the United States, for the assumption or guarantee of the State debts by the Government of the United States to the holders of said debts.

Mr. ARCKER observed that, with regard to the subject of this resolution, he could furnish the Senator from Missouri with as much information as he could obtain from the executive department. As advised, he could assure the Senator that no proposition whatever, or even allusion to the subject of the assumption of the State debts, had been made in the course of the negotiation with this Government. After this answer, he submitted to the Senator from Missouri whether the resolution ought to be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. BENTON was very much pleased with the information given by the Senator from Virginia; but he would prefer having it directly from the Executive. He therefore should urge the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. ARCKER said the answer he had given was advisedly; and he understood from the department itself, that no other answer could be returned by the Executive. He did not think it right to pass a resolution calling upon the department for information already derived from it; he should therefore vote against the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BENTON called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Barrow, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Crafts, Crittenden, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mangum, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, White, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbridge, Woodbury, and Wright—26.

NAYS.—Messrs. Archer, Bates, Berrien, Clayton, Conrad, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, and Phelps—12.

Fine on General Jackson.

The bill introduced by Mr. LINN, to indemnify General Jackson for the fine imposed on him at New Orleans while in the discharge of his official duty, came up for consideration, as in Committee of the Whole; and there being no motion to amend, it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. LINN remarked that he hoped the bill would be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. If there was to be any discussion on the subject, it could take place upon the third reading. It was his desire that it should be advanced now, and he hoped the Senate would consent to the course he had pointed out.

Mr. CRITTENDEN observed, that it seemed to him there was no good reason for exempting it from the ordinary course of bills passing through the Senate—that of referring it to an appropriate committee. Indeed, it seemed the more necessary that this bill should now take this course, in consequence of the extraordinary manner in which the subject had been recommended to the consideration of Congress in the President's Message. If it is a subject of such importance to the general welfare, as to call for that recommendation, it must surely be one which it is proper should take the ordinary course of being referred, like the other topics of the Message. This is, at all events, a safe course, and one from which he would not exempt this bill. He did not well know—nor, indeed, did he consider it important what committee it should be referred to; but he would suggest that probably the Committee on the Judiciary was the most appropriate.

Mr. LINN said the bill was very simple; it required but few words to express its object; that it clearly did, without the slightest reference to any controverted point; and, therefore, he could not see any reasonable objection to letting it be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and then if any gentleman wished to enter into discussion, he would be ready to show why he thought the bill ought to pass. It might, by common consent, now be advanced to that stage, and the discussion might proceed; or, if it was thought more desirable, a day or two week might be fixed for debate, and the subject might be so postponed. When he introduced the bill, his only reason for then fixing a day for its consideration as a special order, was to proceed with it in conformity with the course pursued by the Senator from New York (Mr. TALLMADGE) on introducing his exchequer bill, which was made the special order for Tuesday next, without being referred to any committee. He wished this to take the same course, presuming that it required no elaborate report from any committee—and that there could exist no desire to give it unnecessary delay. He would now propose that the bill be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and that the discussion be postponed till it came up on its third reading.

Mr. HUNTINGTON objected, that if the course pointed out by his friend from Missouri were adopted, the bill would be placed beyond the stage of reference and amendment, even should it appear in discussion that either were necessary. There was, he thought, one fact not touched upon, which placed the matter in a light somewhat different from that reflected upon it last session. It was well known to the Senate that, when the subject was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary last session, and when the committee returned the bill without a report, it was because the committee had no evidence before it, either documentary, historical, or otherwise, upon which it could base a report. Now the case may be quite different. There may be authentic evidence to lay before the committee; it may be in a condition to advise the Senate, which it did not feel authorized to do last session.

3D SESS.]

Fine on General Jackson.

[DECEMBER, 1842.]

Mr. BAYARD observed, that when this matter was submitted to the Senate at the last session, he felt disposed to return the fine—not on the ground that there was any legal claim on the Government of the United States, but as a matter of courtesy—as an additional acknowledgment of services rendered. It seemed, however, that the gentlemen who advocated the bill were not satisfied with this concession, but that, seeking the absolute exculpation of the General, he and his friends insisted that his course on the occasion in which the fine originated, was perfectly justifiable—that the action of the judge was wrong, and that it is the duty of Congress to refund the fine. And this was the very issue which demanded the amendment of the bill which he had submitted at the last session. The alternative was presented of either giving countenance to an implied approval, or expressly disavowing the intention of passing any opinion; and the Senate preferred the latter course.

Through the kindness of the Senator from Louisiana, (Mr. CONRAD,) he (Mr. B.) was now enabled to refer to more documentary evidence of the grounds of decision in the matter, than was at his disposal last session. He held in his hand a copy of the record of the court, in the handwriting of the clerk of the court, and made out at the time. He had read it carefully, and had come to the conclusion that justice to the court itself—the permanent interests of the people of the United States—required that the matter should stand as it does; and that it comports better with those interests, and the reputation of the distinguished individual in question, that the affair should rest on its present footing.

It is not a light matter for Congress to sanction the idea that the lives of our citizens, their property, and their personal liberty, may, with impunity, be placed at the mercy of a military commander, and a court-martial of his officers, brought together at his summons. He knew very well that there were some very extraordinary notions entertained of martial law, which would render a court-martial the mere ministers of the arbitrary will of the commanding officer. Now, he thought he was prepared to show that, by the Constitution of the United States, it is not in the power even of the Congress of the United States, much less of an officer acting under a commission derived from the Federal Government, to declare martial law, affecting every class of the community. Congress may, indeed, suspend the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus, but cannot declare martial law to be the law of the United States, or of any part of them. There is a great and glaring error committed in this matter, by confounding these things. Civil law is that law which regulates the rights and duties of citizens generally. Martial law is a code specially applicable to the army and the navy, and militia when called into actual service, and is a distinct code for their government. Even in time of war, the private citizen, the non-combatant, cannot be subjected to the code which governs those engaged in warfare, without a manifest violation of his civil rights. A person not enlisted in the service of the United States, either in the army or the navy, or in the militia when in actual service, cannot be subjected to the operation of martial law, because Congress could confer no such power. It is limited in its powers. The constitution says, Congress shall have power to declare war, to raise armies, to provide a navy, to provide arms and munitions of war, and to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces. On these limited and specific powers, it has been inferred that Congress may declare martial law. To avoid this very conclusion, there is an express provision in the very next section, among the restrictions on the power of Congress, declaring that the remedy of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless in cases of rebellion or invasion.

A state of war, then, authorizes the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, which is the sacred instrument of liberty in the hands of the State authorities; but does not give the right of declaring martial law, as applicable to the community generally, subjecting the citizen to a code which is summary in its proceedings, and arbitrary in its judgments. No citizen, unless with his own consent, is amenable to the military code; and that occurs when he enlists in the army or navy, or is called into action as part of the militia. There is an express provision in the 5th article of the amendments to the constitution which guards against such a result, by declaring that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service, in time of war or public danger." The only power Government has to establish a code of martial law, is in relation to those who are enlisted in its land and naval forces, including the militia. It is to be regretted that such erroneous notions, avowed in relation to martial law, should prevail in a country boasting of its civil liberty. All Congress can do, even in the cases of war and invasion, is to suspend the privilege of the right of habeas corpus; and that can be done by Congress only—not by an officer of the Government without its authority. But that suspension of the writ, although it may leave the individual subject to the inconvenience of temporary restraint, does not subject him to be tried and punished by the military code. If an individual, no matter how high in commission, or how much impelled by necessity, usurps the power, he cannot be said to act rightfully, though he may be excused. A high and im-

DECEMBER, 1842.]

Hills on General Jackson.

[27TH CONG.]

perious necessity may exist, which can alone form his excuse; and whenever such a case is presented, he (Mr. B.) would sustain the officer. Whether such was the fact in the case of General Jackson, should be distinctly settled. And the report of the committee, presenting all the facts of the case, would place the matter on the right footing, and prevent any erroneous conclusions in relation to this question of martial law.

Mr. LINN had not sought to place the bill on any ground different from that on which bills heretofore had been placed for refunding officers in the public service fines incurred, or judgments awarded against them, for official acts done for the benefit of the country. Money paid by them, in compliance with the mandates of the law, had been refunded by Congress; and upon the same ground he placed this bill—that of restoring to the public servant money paid by him for the public good. He had no wish to go any further with the subject than this; and would not, unless compelled by the remarks of others. He had no desire to disturb the question of the constitutionality of the matter. The question was, simply, whether General Jackson shall have the same measure of justice extended to him, which has been extended to other officers of the Government—even to the lowest in grade of your revenue officers. The cases of Generals Brown and Wilkinson, Colonel Purdy, &c., will present themselves at once to the memory of Senators; they being of a high military character. This bill must pass. The American people have willed it. It is not with them a party question. All go for it—Jew and Gentile, Democrat and Whig; and it should be done promptly.

He should repeat, that the friends of this measure had not argued it on the ground of the act for which the fine was incurred being constitutional. He apprehended not one of his friends had taken that position, and that therefore the Senator from Delaware was in error in supposing it was so advocated. The constitutional question was a reserved question. The friends of the bill never urged it on that ground; they never said aught about the Judge being right or wrong. There might have been those who disapproved of the course pursued by the Judge, and so condemned it. But, whether they did so or not, it had nothing to do with the bill now before the Senate, which was disconnected from any question of that kind. And, as to the record referred to by the Senator from Delaware, he knew not what it contained; but he hoped the Senator would move to have it printed. Let it come to light, and not be kept floating about in holes and corners. If there is any thing in it of such importance as is supposed, it is right it should be made known—right that the country should see it.

Mr. BUCHANAN had but a few words to say on this subject. The Senator from Delaware

(Mr. BAYARD) had been discharging his heavy artillery against nothing. He had not even a target to aim at. It had never been contended on this floor that a military commander possessed the power, under the Constitution of the United States, to declare martial law. No such principle had ever been asserted on this (the Democratic) side of the House. He had then expressly declared (and the published report of the debate, which he had recently examined, would justify him in this assertion) that he did not contend, strictly speaking, that General Jackson had any constitutional right to declare martial law at New Orleans; but that, as this exercise of power was the only means of saving the city from capture by the enemy, he stood amply justified before his country for the act. We placed the argument not upon the ground of strict constitutional right, but of such an overruling necessity as left General Jackson no alternative between the establishment of martial law, or the sacrifice of New Orleans to the rapine and lust of the British soldiery. On this ground Mr. B. had planted himself firmly at the last session of Congress; and here he intended to remain.

In the history of every nation at war, cases might occur of such extreme and overpowering necessity, that, in order to save the country, a military commander might be compelled to resort to the establishment of martial law. Emergencies might exist, in which he would be guilty of culpable negligence, if he refused to adopt this expedient. This was eminently the position of General Jackson at New Orleans. If, knowing, as he did, that a traitorous correspondence was carried on with the enemy, and that no other means of arresting it existed, he would justly have exposed himself to the severest censure, had he suffered the city to be sacked, rather than save it by declaring martial law. But, in every such case, the commanding general acts upon his own responsibility, and at his own peril; and must afterwards appeal to his country for justification. To that country he had made his appeal, and it had nobly justified his conduct. It was an act of the most heroic patriotism—of the sternest duty. Most fortunate had it been for us that a man commanded in that city who never shrunk from personal responsibility when his country was in danger.

General Jackson's situation at New Orleans presented the case par excellence for such an exercise of power. If we were to search the history of the world for examples—if imagination were permitted to take the widest range, we could not present, or even fancy, a case more strongly justifying, in every particular, the declaration of martial law, than that which existed at New Orleans. All the attendant circumstances are now matters of authentic history. General Jackson was sent to defend our great Western commercial city against the British forces. He was almost destitute of regular soldiers. A few thousand

3D SEM.]

Assumption of State Debts.

[DECEMBER, 1842.]

raw militia, suddenly brought together, constituted nearly his whole army. All that he had to rely upon was their native but undisciplined courage. He had to organize them, to discipline them, to infuse into them his own indomitable spirit, and then to lead them to battle and to victory.

And what was the condition and character of the enemy against whom he had to contend? The British General commanded a numerous and well-provided army of regulars, in a perfect state of discipline, and flushed with victory over the conquerors of Europe. Such were the fearful odds against General Jackson! We can all remember that, for a time, despair sat on almost every countenance; and we have been informed that when the news of the victory reached Congress, there was such a burst of enthusiastic joy as had never been witnessed before in these halls. This was the effusion of patriotic hearts upon the delivery of their country from fearful and impending danger.

By what means did General Jackson achieve this great and glorious victory?

Louisiana had been a Spanish province but a few years before. Its ancient inhabitants had not become warmly attached to our constitution and laws, as they are at present. Besides, there were many discontented foreigners within the city of New Orleans. Whilst a very large majority of the inhabitants displayed their patriotism and their courage on the field of battle, the city harbored within its bosom a number of traitors, who were in correspondence with the enemy. The General's weakness and his plan of defence were in this manner communicated to the British commander, who was thus instructed in the best mode of attack.

General Jackson was thus placed in a position of awful responsibility. On the one hand, he was aware that the letter of the constitution conferred upon him no authority to declare martial law, whilst, on the other, he knew that the establishment of martial law was the only human means of arresting this traitorous correspondence with the enemy, and saving the city. Before this act was performed, he had consulted the leading inhabitants of New Orleans, who entirely approved the measure.

Suppose General Jackson had refused to establish martial law, and the city had been captured: how could he then have justified his conduct to his country? Could he have said, "I knew there was a band of traitors within the city, who were in correspondence with the enemy; I knew that, in this manner, all my plans for its defence would be defeated; I knew that by declaring martial law, the city could have been saved: I knew all this, but such was my reverence for the letter of the constitution, that, rather than violate it, I determined that New Orleans should be surrendered to the possession and pillage of the enemy! I would not, even for a few days, restrain the constitutional liberty of the citizens, even to secure the permanent salvation of the city."

No, sir, no. Excusable is not the word. General Jackson stands justified—amply justified—in the judgment of this whole country, for his conduct. This is no party question; at least, so far as I am acquainted with the feelings of the people. Posterity has already decided the question; because more than a quarter of a century has elapsed since the event. The passage of this bill, therefore, is only important as it will embody public sentiment, and place upon the records of the nation the vindication of their General.

Mr. CONRAD presented to the Senate a copy of the record of the trial of General Jackson at New Orleans, which was made out thirty years ago, by the then clerk of the court. It was,

On motion of Mr. LINN, ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, December 23.

Assumption of State Debts.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a Message from the President of the United States, covering the following communication from the Secretary of State:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, Dec.-23, 1842.

To the President:

The Secretary of State—to whom the President has referred the resolution of the Senate of the 22d instant, in the following words: "That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether the late special minister from Great Britain to the United States made any proposition, informally or otherwise, to the negotiator on the part of the United States, for the assumption or guarantee of the State debts by the Government of the United States to the holders of said debts"—has the honor to report to the President, that the late special minister from Great Britain to the United States made no proposition, informal or otherwise, to the negotiator on the part of the United States, for the assumption or guarantee of the State debts by the Government of the United States to the holders of said debts.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

On motion of Mr. ARCHER, and by unanimous consent, the communication was ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate the following communication from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have received the resolution of the 22d inst., requesting me to inform the Senate of the nature and extent of the "informal communications" which took place between the American Secretary of State and the British special minister, during the late negotiation in Washington city, on the "subject of the claim of the United States and Great

DECEMBER, 1842.]

The Bankrupt Law.

[27th CONG.]

Britain to the territory west of the Rocky Mountains;" and also to inform the Senate what were the reasons which prevented "any agreement on the subject at present," and which made it "expedient to include that subject among the subjects of formal negotiation."

In my message to Congress at the commencement of the present session, in adverting to the territory of the United States on the Pacific Ocean, north of the 42d deg. of north latitude, a part of which is claimed by Great Britain, I recommended that, "in advance of the claims of individual rights to these lands, sound policy dictates that every effort should be resorted to by the two Governments to settle their respective claims;" and also stated that I should not delay to urge on Great Britain the importance of an early settlement. Measures have been already taken, in pursuance of the purpose thus expressed; and under these circumstances, I do not deem it consistent with the public interest to make any communication on the subject.

JOHN TYLER.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 28; 1842.

On motion of Mr. ARCHER, and by unanimous consent, the communication was ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, (there being no further business before the Senate,) the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, having spent a short time therein, adjourned till Tuesday next.

TUESDAY, December 27.

The American Squadron.

The resolution, submitted by Mr. BENTON some days ago, was taken up for consideration: and, after remarks by Mr. ARCHER, it was adopted.

Fine on General Jackson.

The bill introduced by Mr. LINN some time since, to indemnify General Jackson for the fine imposed upon him by Judge Hall, at New Orleans, while in the discharge of his official duty, came up on its postponement from Thursday last.

Mr. LINN hoped the bill would now be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by acclamation, as had been urged in a memorial presented this day from Pennsylvania by the Senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN.)

Mr. CRITTENDEN understood the question of reference was yet pending.

The CHAIR decided that the motion to postpone had superseded the motion to refer.

Mr. CRITTENDEN then renewed his motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LINN asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question of reference to the Committee on the Judiciary was then taken by yeas and nays, and resulted in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—21.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Berrien, Buchanan, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mangum, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—19.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, December 27.

The Bankrupt Law.

The SPEAKER announced the regular order of business to be the bill to repeal the bankrupt act.

The Clerk stated the question as it now stood. The original bill was introduced by Mr. EVERETT, as already published. This Mr. BARNARD had moved to amend, so as to repeal only so much of the bankrupt law as permits voluntary bankruptcy; providing, however, that this act should not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy already commenced, or which should be commenced before the 4th day of March next. Mr. CUSHING had moved to amend the amendment, so as to provide that this act should not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy commenced before the passage of this act, and, consequently, not to extend it to cases commenced before the 4th of March next. Mr. BRIGGS had moved to commit the bill and all its amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instruction to report a bill to repeal that part of the existing law which authorizes the voluntary application of debtors, and to include corporations which issue paper to circulate as money, within the operation of the bankrupt law. And Mr. CAYE JOHNSON had moved to amend Mr. BRIGGS's amendment, by striking out all the instructions, and inserting instructions to the Judiciary Committee to report, at 12 o'clock to-morrow, the following bill: "That the act passed on the 19th day of August, 1841, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' be, and the same hereby is, repealed."

Mr. SALTONSTALL, after taking a brief view of the history of the passage of the bankrupt act, and of the constitutional powers and obligations of Congress to pass it, entered into a consideration of the reasons urged for its repeal. It had been said that public opinion demanded its repeal; and the gentleman who introduced the bill was supported by the resolutions of a sovereign State demanding it. He denied, however, that there was any evidence showing that the people demanded the repeal of this law. Where was it shown? There had been no petitions presented calling for it. The Legislatures of the States (with but one exception) had made no move in relation to it; and, if he judged from what he had seen of the public press, there was no evidence there of a desire for the repeal of the act. They had every

[30 SEN.]

General Jackson's Fine.

[JANUARY, 1848.]

evidence that public opinion was loudly in favor of this law at the time of its passage. It was called for by numerous petitions, coming from every quarter of the country, signed by men of all classes of the community. It was advocated in the public papers, and strongly recommended to the favorable consideration of Congress in the Message of the President of the United States. Mr. S. deprecated the repeal of this law before sufficient time had elapsed to give it a fair trial and examination. He contended that it was now operating most favorably, and that the principal cause for objection to it had nearly passed away. This was the retrospective feature of the bill; but as all (or nearly all) the cases of that class had been acted on, there was now no longer any objection to the bill. In a country like ours, he held that some uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy should exist. Such laws were just as necessary now, as when the constitutional provision authorizing Congress to pass such laws was adopted; and the very reasons which operated upon the convention for the insertion of this provision, operated now in favor of retaining the present law in force.

Mr. DAWSON said: I have not heard a solitary complaint from one of my constituents of my vote in favor of this bill. On the contrary, I have received many grateful acknowledgments in approbation of my course. I have in my drawer a long list of the most respectable names in Louisiana, urging me to oppose the repeal of the bankrupt law. No man in this House would rejoice more than I would to see this bill amended; but I will hold on to it as it is, sooner than see it repealed. I am opposed to the oppression of the debtor, in every shape, form, and manner. Debt is a misfortune; and bitter is the cup of life (Heaven knows) to the unfortunate debtor, at best, without being treated as a criminal. I am willing to see the debtor forced to make an honest, full, and unqualified surrender of all he has: and then I would paley the arm of the Shylock who would attempt to take his pound of flesh. This is the poor man's law; and it stands "solitary and alone," as the poor man's law, in the history of the world. I am the open and avowed advocate of a bankrupt law to benefit debtors, and not a law to benefit creditors exclusively. I would not make a retrospective law, to favor or shield the debtor; but I would place him henceforth beyond the reach of personal cruelty and degradation. His property might be seized and sold; the roof that shelters his wife and children from the peltings of the pitiless storm might be taken from him, and they might be turned over to penury and want. But his person, at least, should be sacred. The creditor should not touch a hair of his head, after he had made a fair and honest surrender of every thing he was worth on the face of the earth.

"Man's inhumanity to man Makes countless millions mourn;"

and wise legislation will always defend and protect the weak, the helpless, the unfortunate, and oppressed. The fate of the bankrupt law is already foretold. I entertain no doubts of its being repealed in a few days. It is the first law that ever was passed—and, I greatly fear, it will be the last—to favor the poor and the unfortunate. It is idle to resist the power of money; to its secret, subtle, and pervading influences, imagination can devise, and strength can accomplish no bar. It will buy the prayers of the church, the fidelity of man, and the love of woman. It is the alpha and omega of all human desires. Reason and justice are impotent when opposed to the magic power of gold.

"Plate sin with gold,
And the strong lance of Justice hurtless breaks;
Clothe it in rags, a pigmy's straw doth pierce it."

Mr. CUSHING rose in opposition to the repeal of the bankrupt law. It should be allowed to remain in force, and be further tested by public judgment. Instead of a hasty and precipitate action, he thought the public interests would be better promoted by modifying the law, so as to exclude voluntary applicants for its benefits, and to include corporations issuing paper for circulation. Let it be modified to suit the views of gentlemen, but not wantonly demolished.

It was true that there were objections to the act in the first place; yet these had been either extenuated, or had lost their force. The main objection to the passage of the law was, that it would operate on contracts made, and would thus affect vested rights. Now, this objection applied with equal force to the repeal of the measure as proposed in the present bill, since many enterprises had been entered into by men acting in reference to its continuance.

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 29.

Quintuple Treaty.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution, which, under the rules, lies one day on the table, viz:

Resolved, That, in addition to copies of all the correspondence with and from all our ministers abroad in relation to the quintuple treaty, the President be requested to communicate to the Senate (so far as it may be compatible with the public interest) all such correspondence in relation to the treaty with Great Britain.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 8, 1848.

General Jackson's Fine.

Mr. BOWNE offered a resolution on this subject, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report, on Thursday next, the fol-

JANUARY, 1848.]

The Bankrupt Law.

[27TH CONG.]

lowing bill to refund the fine imposed on General Andrew Jackson at New Orleans.

[The bill was that introduced by Mr. LINN, in the Senate, on the 10th March, 1842, which provided that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be directed to ascertain the amount of the penalty for damages awarded by the district judge of the United States at New Orleans, in the year 1815, against Major-General Andrew Jackson, then commander-in-chief of that district, for official acts in that capacity, and paid by him at that time; and that the sums paid, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, be paid to Major-General Andrew Jackson, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.]

Mr. BOWNE moved the previous question on the adoption of his resolution.

The SPEAKER put the question, and the motion was negatived.

The Bankrupt Law.

Mr. EVERETT called for the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER announced the order of the day to be the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

Mr. MARSHALL said he was warned by the experience of last night, that personal debility would prevent him from proceeding, as he could have wished, for the short time the rules of the House allowed him. He should, therefore, yield the floor to any gentleman who wished to address the House on the subject. He was perfectly sure, he added, that the state of his health would not enable him to proceed as he wished.

Mr. MILTON BROWN said his simple and sole object in now rising to address the House, was to say something in regard to the reasons which would induce him to vote against the repeal of the bankrupt law. He voted for that law originally, under the impression that his constituents desired him to do so; and, having no information that they desired its repeal, he voted against that measure at the last session; and, pursuing the same course, he should, for stronger reasons, vote against it now.

Perhaps, in the history of our whole legislation, there never had been a law more misunderstood and more misrepresented than this. Objections have been urged against it, that, he ventured to say, had seldom originated in the law itself, but in the representations of those who raised the objections. It was not his purpose (Mr. B. said) to give this question a party turn; on the contrary, it was his intention to discuss it in connection with the opinions of both the political parties of the country. It would be borne in mind that, before the last presidential election, the passage of a bankrupt law was advocated by gentlemen of both political parties; and even now it would be found that there were very few who object to such a bankrupt law, of itself, though they object to its details. It was said that there were obnoxious features in the law which not only ought to be repealed, but that the law itself should be repealed. It was worthy of observation, that the clause in the constitution which gave to Congress the power, and the only power, of passing a bankrupt law, was adopted by nine States to one. At that time a large majority of all parties concurred in the belief that it was a wise provision, and should be acquiesced in by Congress.

To show that both parties, previous to the last presidential election, concurred in the propriety of passing a bankrupt law, he should refer to the fact that there were two bills reported in the Senate, at the same time, from the two political parties in that body; each professing to be the plan of the party who reported it.

But a word or two as to the provisions of this bill, and the reasons given for its repeal. Those reasons had all turned on its retrospective operations. And what did gentlemen propose? To let all its retrospective features stand, and to repeal its prospective features, which every gentleman on that floor professed to believe was right. There were two views to be taken of the operation of that bill: first, its operation as beneficial to the debtors; and, secondly, its operation as affecting creditors. In the discussion of this bill, at the time of its passage, he expressed his apprehension that it would at first be misapprehended and misunderstood by the country; but that if it could withstand the first shock, it would be upheld by the people; and he now deemed it most unwise and impolitic to sweep off that which all agreed was wise and constitutional. Why was this? Was it because, in the desire for political effect, a storm had been raised against one part of the law which it was too late to repeal, that that storm had been turned against that part which was unobjectionable? It was admitted that this law, in its prospective operation, was calculated to do good by preventing fraudulent conveyances and dishonest preferences. One of the greatest evils abroad in this land, was the liberty of the debtor to prefer one creditor to another. Not that honest preference which the law designed; but a preference in favor of a member of the debtor's family—perhaps a son, a brother, or a father. Again: this law was calculated to operate favorably on the morality of the country in another point of view. It was calculated to induce the debtor to give up all he had, in consideration of getting a discharge from all his debts. What was the effect now? A man might be in failing circumstances, with a wife and children dependent upon his exertions; or, by a stroke of adverse fortune, nearly every thing might be swept away from him, and from those who were dependent on him; and, in such circumstances, there was strong temptation which human nature could not always withstand, to withhold something in the hands of a friend for his wife and children. It was wrong, but he confessed there was strong mitigation in consideration of what a man must feel who had a wife and children dependent on him. In these two points of view, then, it was calculated to benefit the morals of the country, by cutting off preferences, and inducing the debtor to give up every thing he had, in consideration that he should then have the right to go free. But it was calculated, in its prospective operation, to protect a large class of creditors from the cunning and artifice of the few; for a man might stand by and see a debtor overtrading until while the mass of the creditors knew nothing (if what was going on) a deed of trust was executed, and all his effects were swept from the mass of his creditors into the hands of one who stood by and saw his overtrading. This law, however, stepped in, and said, you shall have no private and confidential relations with the debtor, if misfortune overtakes him, but all creditors shall share alike. Was not this, then, calculated to protect the mass of the creditors from unlawful and unhallowed preferences? Would they not believe, then, if this feature of the law was understood, that the people would feel it to be their interest to preserve it? And did they not also believe that, if it was preserved, it would cut off a most fruitful source of litigation, with which the country was flooded? Go into their courts of justice, and the most fruitful source of litigation would be seen to be in questions of preference, deeds of trust, and mortgages; and after exhausting the property, it perhaps fell into the hands of that creditor who was the least of all entitled to it. It not only did this, but it produced a most fruitful crop of perjuries; and if they desired to cut off the inducement to that class of crimes, it must be by adherence to a simple and equitable proceeding in the division of property, and he cutting off that source of litigation which, in its operation, caused a thousand frauds where but one would exist under this law.

3D Sess.]

The Bankrupt Law.

[JANUARY, 1843.]

Mr. WELLER rose, and said that he was opposed to the enactment of the present bankrupt law, because he deemed it to be a violation of the constitution, which he had sworn to support. He did not find in that instrument any power given to Congress to enact laws giving to individuals the power to violate their contracts. He held that Congress could exercise no powers but those expressly delegated. If he power to pass a general bankrupt law could be exercised without making the law retrospective, he should have no objection to vote for such a measure.

The present bankrupt law was passed at the extra session, under peculiar circumstances. On one day, it was laid upon the table by a majority of eleven votes. The next day the notion was reconsidered—the majority having determined, when the wine flowed freely the night before, to change their determination. It was found necessary to the passage of another bill—the land distribution bill—that this bankrupt measure should be carried through. The whole legislation of the extra session was accomplished by contract. Now that the land bill had been practically repealed, those who vote for the bankrupt law, in order to secure its passage, were calling for a repeal of that measure likewise. The cry for the repeal of the bankrupt law was general, and he presumed no one would have the independence to stand up on that floor and say that the popular voice was not in favor of an early repeal. Indeed, it had been pretty generally admitted by all who spoke, that public sentiment was against the law. Let Congress, then, act in accordance with the wishes of the people. The advocates of the law seemed to concede its unpopularity; yet they contended that the people were ignorant, and did not understand the principles of the law!

He then went on to argue that a properly digested bankrupt law, prospective in its character, and including corporations within its provisions, would be beneficial. He admitted that the repeal of the present law would be attended with some hardships; that the declaration of some men to be bankrupt necessarily brought on others; and that the continuance of the law might be productive of some advantages; yet, believing the measure to be unconstitutional, he was bound to vote for its repeal. It was a paramount duty which he owed to the constitution he had sworn to support, to seize the first opportunity to wipe it from the statute-book. He held that this course should be adopted by all who were convinced of the unconstitutionality of the measure, no matter how well they might be convinced of its advantages.

Mr. FERRIS said the bankrupt bill was passed at the time the country was in a state of extraordinary excitement arising from revulsions in commerce, embarrassments in trade, the derangement of the currency, and the desolation and ruin spread over the land from the extravagant speculations and wild projects engendered by the inflation of the paper system. It passed in its present unconstitutional and objectionable form, in which the rights of creditors were totally disregarded, and the obligation of contracts violated, by the most powerful and eloquent appeals to the passions, by which reason was dethroned, and sympathy substituted for judgment. The prominent constitutional objections then urged against the bankrupt law, were, that it was not such a bankrupt law as was authorized by the constitution, inasmuch as it was retrospective in its operation, and violated existing contracts; that this part of the law came within the spirit, if not within the express letter, of the prohibition against the passage of ex post facto laws; that it was voluntary, and the proceedings might be commenced by the debtor, without the actual assent or concurrence of the creditors, or any part of them; and that it extended to all persons, instead of being confined in its operations to traders. It was also urged that the law was inexpedient; that it held out temptations for fraud and perjury; destroyed confidence between man and man; and that, while it held out relief to the unfortunate, imprudent, or profligate, it carried desolation to the homes of the industrious, prudent, economical, and substantial part of the community. In vain it was urged that it would be better to allow the unfortunate to resort to the State insolvent laws, and to a compromise with creditors—which is seldom refused to men who make a fair exposé of their affairs—than to afford them relief, by inflicting on the community evils of such magnitude and danger as would result from an unconstitutional and badly organized bankrupt law; that it was better even that individuals should suffer the consequence of their own extravagance, folly, or imprudence, than that the constitution should be trampled upon, and the rights of the citizens violated, to accomplish the relief which the bankrupt law was intended to afford. The bankrupt law was passed; and experience has shown the evils resulting from it: and, so far as I can form an opinion, the people call for its repeal. It has been said that a bankrupt law was absolutely essential to the prosperity of a commercial country. This is not warranted by the past experience of our own country. For a period of near forty years between the repeal of the first and the passage of the second bankrupt law, this country had enjoyed an unexampled state of prosperity. Her commerce whitened every sea, and the enterprise of her citizens penetrated the most remote climes. No nation of the same population had, during that time, advanced to prosperity and greatness with more rapid strides, or whose commercial transactions were more extensive or various: yet all this was accomplished without a bankrupt law; and the unfortunate found relief in a compromise with creditors, or the State insolvent laws.

We have had, since the organization of the Government, two bankrupt laws: the first bankrupt law, passed soon after the formation of the Government, was a regular constitutional English bankrupt law, and was confined in its operation to traders. It was severe in its provisions, and coercive in its character. It was made in conformity with the constitution, and in the spirit and policy of a bankrupt law which in its origin and formation was intended to afford to creditors a means of relief against fraudulent or defaulting debtors, by coercing the debtor, in the commission of an act of bankruptcy, to deliver up all his estate for the benefit of his creditors; and in its improved organization, it extended relief to unfortunate traders, as such persons were liable, from contingencies against which human prudence could not guard, to sudden losses and misfortunes. But it was never intended by the bankrupt law to extend to all persons relief from the effects of their own voluntary imprudence or extravagance, to encourage the contracting of debts and obligations, without the means of payment or performing them. This first bankrupt law was severe and searching in its provisions, and was calculated to secure creditors, and reach the fraudulent, nevertheless. It became unpopular; and, although it was limited in its duration to five years, it was repealed in less than three years, in obedience to the voice of the people, loudly expressed in all parts of the country.

We have recently had the experience of a bankrupt law of a different description—a law which was so framed, that the debtor could, on his own application, be discharged from his liabilities without the assent of his creditors, and in absolute violation of their rights, and his own contract, solemnly and voluntarily entered into; and notwithstanding its advent was hailed with so much enthusiasm, it has inflicted injuries on the country incomparably greater than any benefits it has conferred; and now, in the short space of one year, its repeal is loudly called for from all parts of our widely-extended country. Thus both experiments have failed; and it must be manifest that the difficulties of making a bankrupt law which is calculated to prevent fraud, while it relieves from oppression, are almost insurmountable. In England, from the first formation of a bankrupt law, under Henry VIII., to the present time, there have been constant and repeated efforts to improve the bankrupt law. There appears to have been a conflict between the Legislature and those disposed to commit frauds under the law—the one passing provisions against practices of a fraudulent character; and the other seeking to elude them. The bankrupt law was revised in the reign of George IV.; improved in the reign of William IV.; and Queen Victoria has issued a commission to inquire into the measures necessary to improve the bankrupt law. So productive of fraud and iniquity have been the English bankrupt laws, that some of her best statesmen and jurists—and among the rest, Lord Eldon—have lamented their existence. And here let me observe, that one great objection to the retention of the involuntary portion of the bankrupt law is, that persons disposed to act fraudulently, after arranging their affairs to suit their purposes, obtain some friend to commence proceedings against them—apparently hostile, but in reality to aid the bankrupt fraudulently to obtain a release from his creditors; and the check to this fraud in the English law, which does not exist in the law (and which it is not probable will be incorporated into its provisions) now under consideration, is a provision requiring a large part of the creditors—I believe four-fifths of all the creditors of the bankrupt—to assent in writing to his discharge.

An objection has been urged in this debate against the repeal of the bill, of an extraordinary character. It is said that the bill has discharged many persons from their debts, and that, by so doing, it has swept away the assets of solvent debtors, and placed them in a state

D SECS.]

The Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1848.]

f bankruptcy; and it is urged that the law should be continued for their relief. It may be recollected that this was one of the fatal results which was predicted from the passage of the bill. It was then said, You propose relief by releasing one part of the community from their debts and obligations, and by deriving another portion of the community of their rights and property; you propose to relieve the insolvents, by bankrupting their creditors—to benefit one part of society by ruining the other part; and here is an argument based upon the assertion that all these results have been fully verified. If this argument prevails, the bankrupt law must be perpetual, because it will be continually producing the same effects; and if it has made bankrupts by its past operation, what will prevent the like causes from producing like effects by its future operation? Is it not better to check the evil by immediately repealing this bill, thereby restoring confidence between man and man, and proclaiming to the community that those who contract obligations must perform them, and that those who confide their property on the faith of contracts shall have the legal means of enforcing them?

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 4.

Warehousing System.

Mr. WRIGHT said that some days ago he presented a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of New York city, on the subject of the warehousing system, and proposed to refer it to the Committee on Finance; and that motion, at the solicitation of the Senator from Connecticut, and by his consent, was postponed until Senators might have an opportunity to read the memorial, (which was ordered to be printed,) and enable them to vote understandingly on the question of reference. The proposition to resume the subject had been delayed, that certain Senators who were absent might return to their places, and vote on the question. He now moved to take up the memorial, with a view to its reference. He would merely make the notion, for he did not desire to occupy the attention of the Senate, under the conviction of his own mind that the warehousing system, however arranged, must be, in the business of Congress, a financial system, and not one of commercial regulation. He was confident that, if Senators had read the memorial, they would agree with him that the memorialists viewed the question as one of finance, and which only incidentally affected the commerce of the country.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said that the motion to refer this memorial, which was made some days since, was postponed, at his request, with a view to examine the memorial in connection with the proposed reference, for the purpose of enabling him to see whether there was any thing in it that, with propriety, might be made a subject of reference to the Committee on Finance. The perusal by him of the document, so far from changing his opinion expressed to the Senate, that the subject was primarily and principally one of commercial regulation, and not of finance, had but confirmed it. It would be seen that the warehousing system, as argued in this memorial, was one principally to increase the trade of the country, to benefit the importing interests—to give to the importers and the factor the benefits that, under the cash system of duties, they do not now enjoy—the benefits of such a credit system as was afforded by means of dock-warrants. He contended that the object of the warehousing system, as stated in the memorial, was to build up the commercial marine of the United States.

Mr. H. spoke at some length upon the subject of the English warehousing system, which, though it was characterized as a liberal one, took care to carry out one principle—that of securing a home market at the expense of all other commercial countries. He then viewed the system as proposed by the memorial, as one to benefit merchants of small means, and to counteract the bad effect of the present system of cash duties, which gave a monopoly in trade to large capitalists.

Messrs. WRIGHT and KING spoke at some length upon the subject, maintaining that the warehousing system was one pre-eminently of finance—especially so, as it might have the tendency to withhold from the treasury, for the present, some portions of the revenue which were indispensably necessary to carry on the operations of Government. They argued, that, so far as the system went either to increase or diminish the present amount of revenues, it was a question of finance; and that it would have the effect to diminish them, it was very probable. They, therefore, thought there could be no doubt as to the propriety of referring the memorial to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT demanded the yeas and nays on the question of reference to the Committee on Finance, which were ordered; and the question being put, it was decided in the negative—yeas 17, nays 27.

On motion of Mr. HUNTINGTON, the memorial was then referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The Oregon Territory.

The bill providing for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, was taken up.

The CHAIR stated that the question pending was on concurring with the amendments made in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were all concurred in; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

JANUARY, 1848.]

The Bankrupt Law.

[27th CONG.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 4.

General Jackson's Fine.

Mr. BOWNE again submitted the resolution on this subject, which he offered yesterday, as published in the Globe Congressional reports.

Mr. ARNOLD presumed the principal motive with gentlemen who brought forward bills and resolutions on this subject, was, that they might make a harangue in favor of the Old Hero. He would, therefore, move to refer the resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where there was already a bill pending on this very subject.

Mr. BOWNE did not wish, on this question, to trust himself at all in making an answer to charges like those which had emanated from the member from Tennessee, (Mr. ARNOLD,) farther than to say, that gentlemen who were the most ready to impute motives of this description to others, are most apt to entertain them themselves. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee would most certainly be liable to the objections of his colleague, (Mr. BARNARD;) for it would not be taking the ordinary incipient steps of legislation. His resolution, however, did not conflict with the usual course of legislation. It proposed to instruct the Committee on the Judiciary to bring in a bill on Thursday next; and when that bill came in, it would, of course, take the ordinary channel of legislation. His colleague was mistaken in supposing there was no precedent for the resolution he offered. His recollection informed him that at the last session there was a resolution passed, instructing the Judiciary Committee to report a given bill, (the bill to repeal the bankrupt act;) in consequence of which, that committee did report the bill; and it was in this way brought summarily before the House. His only desire (Mr. B. said) was to have this bill—which he deemed the best one—brought at once before the House, so that there might be a chance of acting on it at the present session. It must be remembered that more than one-third of the session was already gone; and therefore, if they expected to pass a bill on this subject at the present session, it must be brought speedily before the House.

Mr. BARNARD then offered the following amendment:

To report to the House, with all convenient despatch, the principal and material facts in relation to the fine imposed on General Andrew Jackson at New Orleans by Judge Hall, and the opinion of said committee upon the material questions of law involved in the imposition of such fine, and the acts leading thereto.

Mr. BOWNE remarked, that, should the course proposed by his colleague be adopted, the matter would stand just where it did now. A report had already been made, accompanying the bill which was reported.

Mr. MERIWETHER said it was many years ago when the fine was imposed. During the long period which had elapsed, the Democratic party had often had a majority in Congress, and made no effort to have the fine refunded. Now, he wished to help to do that which they had been too modest to bring about. They would have a majority in the next Congress; and as he presumed they would be again too modest, there was a greater necessity for having the fine returned by the present. For himself, he was willing to return the fine, with interest; not because General Jackson ought to have it—not because the imprisonment of Judge Hall was right—but because he believed the motive of General Jackson to be pure. He wished to do that which the friends of the General would not themselves do for their chief. He wished the committee to report the facts, and to show that censure of Judge Hall was not implied.

The Bankrupt Law.

Mr. EVERETT called up the orders of the day—the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

Mr. PICKENS went on to argue against the principle of voluntary bankruptcy in the present law. He knew that it had been said that there was but little difference between an insolvent law and a bankrupt law, and the opinion of the Attorney-General had been given in support of this assumption; but Mr. P. contended that there was a broad distinction between them. The insolvent law was intended for the benefit of the debtor; while the bankrupt law was intended for the benefit of the creditor, and to provide that the assets of his debtor should be paid over for his use. Now, when a bankrupt law contained within it the voluntary principle of bankruptcy, allowing the debtor at his option to relieve himself from his obligations to his creditors, it was nothing but an insolvent law, and, therefore, entirely out of the meaning of the clause in the constitution referred to. He would, therefore, make the act, if he passed one at all, in strict conformity with the meaning of bankruptcy, as it was understood at the time the provision on the subject was inserted in the constitution: the meaning of bankruptcy, as laid down in Blackstone, was precisely the one that he should be governed by. He thought that the present law was unconstitutional; because it clearly interfered with existing contracts, and was clearly an ex post facto law; and he held that gentlemen who supported it were bound to argue that Congress had a right to interfere with contracts, and make an ex post facto law. In fact, a gentleman at the last session did take such grounds; and what was his argument? Why, that Congress could interfere with contracts, because the power was prohibited to the States. This was a perfect solecism, and an argument he never expected to have heard. He had thought that this was a Government of limited powers, and confined within the provisions of a written constitution. But, if such doctrines prevailed, it would sweep within the power of the Federal Government

3d Sess.]

General Jackson's Fine

[JANUARY, 1848.]

all the contracts within the country, all the relations between debtor and creditor, and nearly all the transactions of private life. Were gentlemen aware of the tremendous powers they claimed for the Federal Government, by adopting such an argument as this? Credit and confidence between man and man would be broken up. No man would trust his neighbor; and all business would be destroyed, if it should be decided that the Federal Government could step in and interfere with contracts, releasing the debtor from the obligations he had entered into, and thereby depriving the creditor of a portion of his property. If gentlemen took it on this ground, they were compelled to take the argument that this Government can interfere with contracts, and pass ex post facto laws. It was a power that would shake the very foundations of civilized society; and, of course, it was not granted to this Government by the framers of the constitution. It was on this ground principally that he was in favor of a repeal of the law. It had been argued that it should be retained, because all the harm that could be done under it had been done already, and that there were numbers who, having been driven into bankruptcy by it, were now, in justice, entitled to its benefits. Much had been said to excite the commiseration of the House for this class of unfortunate persons. Though he loved the attribute of mercy, he was still bound to do justice. He would not do evil that good might follow. He was for doing equal and exact justice to all, and would not, for the sake of indulging in the kindly feelings of his nature, trample on the constitution of his country. Mr. P. next went into an argument against the proposition of the gentleman from New York, to include banks and other corporations in the provisions of the bankruptcy law. He asked if the gentleman had reflected on the alarming consequences that would follow the successful termination of his motion. What, he asked, would be left to the States, if this proposition should be carried into effect? Their churches, their railroads, their school corporations, and private chartered companies of every description, would be swept away. He was as much opposed to banks as any gentleman on that floor, and had assailed them with all the energies of which he was capable, when other gentlemen, who were now so ready to attack them, quailed under their power. He was utterly and irreconcilably opposed to them; but he would not, for the sake of getting at them, sweep away that noble instrument, on which our liberties rest. Look at Alabama, whose State Bank is a part of her financial system. Look at South Carolina, which was largely interested in her banks. Would gentlemen have these to be placed at the mercy of the Northern and Eastern banks, to sue out commissions of bankruptcy against them, and drag them down to ruin? What would be the effect of such a provision on the banks of the South and South-west? Exchanges were generally against them, and in favor of the Northern and North-eastern banks, and they would be placed at the feet of New York and New England. The provision the gentleman sought to introduce would be, in effect, a tremendous Bank of the United States, with branches in the North and East, having the power to ruin the Southern banks at their pleasure. Having said all that he intended to say on the bill before the House, he would now briefly touch on the incidental subject that had been brought forward in the debate.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 5.

General Jackson's Fine.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. BOWNE,) directing the Committee of the Whole to report the bill to refund the fine imposed on Gen. Andrew Jackson in 1815, together with an amendment thereto by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. BARNARD.)

Mr. GWIN said that the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MERIWETHER) had declared his intention to vote for the bill to repay, with interest, the fine imposed on General Jackson at New Orleans, by Judge Hall. The gentleman also invoked action on the bill this session. He (Mr. G.) was glad to hear that the gentleman from Georgia would not only vote for the bill, but urge early action upon it. He hoped the gentleman's zeal would not abate under the influence of party drill; for such certainly were not the feelings or intentions of his party associates on this floor. He (Mr. G.) was of opinion that the dominant party in this House intended to give the go-by to the bill; and, for that reason, he had urged the gentleman from New York (Mr. BOWNE) to introduce the resolution now under discussion. It was a resolution of instruction, which could, by a call of the yeas and nays, test the sense of the House whether there should be action on this subject this session or not. His reason for believing that no action would be had on the bill this session, was founded upon the manner in which the go-by was given to it at the last session of Congress. The subject had been referred to the Judiciary Committee at an early period of the session. Before action could be had upon it in committee, a member from Ohio (Mr. MEDILL) had to move instructions, by a resolution similar to the one now under consideration. The resolution was not adopted; but it brought the bill out of committee, and it was referred to the Committee of the Whole. There it was permitted to sleep for three months. At length, after every important public bill had been disposed of, he (Mr. G.) had tried, from day to day, to get this bill up in committee for consideration; but the majority pertinaciously refused to take it up. He at length, to test the sense of the House, moved to make it the special order, and called the yeas

JANUARY, 1848.]

General Jackson's Finc.

[27th Cong.]

and nays. A majority of the members present voted to make it the special order; but not two-thirds, as required by the rule; and his motion was lost. But in five minutes, (the House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole,) he was able to catch the chairman's eye, and moved to take up the bill. The majority on yeas and nays, that had existed but a few minutes before, suddenly vanished, when the only test of their sincerity was a vote by tellers; and he failed to get it off the table. Well, sir, how stands the question now? The President has recommended to Congress to pass a bill refunding that money to General Jackson. Instead of referring that portion of the Message to the Committee of the Whole, (where the bill of the last session now is,) it was, by a party vote, referred to the Judiciary Committee. What had been the action of the committee on the subject he had no means of knowing. He had inquired of a member of the committee, and learned that it was in the keeping of a member now absent from the city, and there was no telling when the committee would act upon it. Under these circumstances, the subject had been brought before the House in its present form, to ascertain whether it was the wish of a majority to consider the subject this session, or to give it the go-by, as was done at the last.

Mr. CUSHING said he had regretted to perceive, in the course of the conversation, rather than the debate, which had taken place on this subject, the least possible indications of any tendency to refer this question to party or personal controversies. He equally regretted to perceive mere technical questions—he meant questions appertaining to legal disputes which had occurred in Louisiana at the time of these incidents—that they should in like manner be deemed material to the question which arose on this bill, or the resolution of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. BOWNE.) He thought the question invoked the House to regard it under an aspect far more interesting to them, and with reference to considerations which he should hope would preclude division in that House, and lead to unanimity of opinion on the subject of the bill. He could not but recall to mind that they were then on the eve of the anniversary of that victory of New Orleans—one of the greatest events in the history of our country; and which (whatever might be the differences of opinion in regard to personal incidents in the event—whatever questions there might be in regard to the political views of him who was the hero of that day) was an event which covers the name of our country with imperishable laurels; and he would it were possible for that House and for that Congress (if that bill were to be passed, as he hoped it would) to cast aside all the lesser considerations on which he had touched, to take up the bill in Committee of the Whole, to pass it, and to make the anniversary of the victory of New Orleans a day to be sanctified, in the action of this House, by a restoration of the amount of that fine to Andrew Jackson. [Cries of "Good."] And he intended to propose to the House (if they were ready to welcome and act on such a proposition) a method by which the subject might be accomplished; for there were many of them there—it might be a majority of that House—who had had occasion to condemn certain of the administrative acts of that individual. But he had ceased to be the President of the United States—he was no longer the director of the Administration of this country—he had passed from the theatre of public action here, to be a historical personage, not only in this country, but in the eyes of the world.

Mr. ADAMS proceeded to comment on remarks which had been made in relation to this bill not being a party measure, and pointed to the debates and proceedings in the Senate of the United States, and in State Legislatures, to show that the opposite of that assertion was the truth; particularly referring to the prime mover on this subject in the Legislature of New York, (Maj. Davezac,) who was neither Anglo-Saxon, Anglo-Irish, nor Anglo-Scott; but a protégé of General Jackson, of French origin, who introduced it as a Democratic measure, and as one of the first fruits of the Democratic triumph in the State of New York. He hoped this measure would not be allowed to pass in this House without a thorough discussion, even if it did transcend "the glorious 8th of January," which this year (his colleague had forgotten to notice) was a day devoted to the worship and service of God; and, therefore, it was one on which this House would not be in session. But God forbid that he should say a word in disparagement of that day, or of the person to be honored and profited by this donation. If, however, a proposition was brought before this House to make a present to Andrew Jackson of $1,000, as proposed by the bill which had been reported to that House, with interest on it from the month of March, 1815, there was but one consideration that would induce him to vote against it—and that was, he should not like to set the example of pensioning an ex-President of the United States, for that was the principle on which this bill was to be passed, if passed at all. The real object was to make a present to General Jackson in his latter days. He did not know what his circumstances were, [A voice: "Rich enough;"] but if they were such as to require it, (though he would not grant it as a pension or a gratuity for that service,) he would do what had been done before—he would make up a subscription among the members of Congress to make a present to the old man in his last days. It had been done before, and there was no disgrace in it; and if it were now done, that a donation might be made to General Andrew Jackson, he, for one, would take his share of it.

But he could not consent to employ the public money, in order to testify the approbation

[D. Sess.]

The Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1843.]

f the people of this country of those acts for which the sum of $1,000 was levied on him by the regular officers of the law, which he had isolated in its tenderest parts. His colleague had changed entirely the issue upon the question in this bill. It was not to refund the fine imposed on the General for his imprisonment of a judge—for his causing a citizen of the United States to be jeopardized in his liberty and life, and for other acts subversive of law and justice; but for glorifying the battle of New Orleans. The gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. Linn) had stated a number of facts in the pamphlet lately published on this subject, which were contradicted by General Jackson. If a bill were to pass, giving General Jackson money upon disputed facts, these facts should be previously cleared up. But he was speaking of the extraordinary circumstances under which his bill could be brought forward. A bill on the same subject was acted on in the Senate at the last session, and, after being amended, so as to comprehend clearly the facts of the case, it was rejected by General Jackson's friends, because it did not contain a condemnation of the judge who imposed the fine; and, if he was not mistaken, he had seen a letter from General Jackson himself, in which he says that he would not have received a dollar unless the character of the judge was blasted. Such was the history of that proceeding of the last session of Congress. The bill was actually passed, or would have been passed; but was rejected by the General's friends coinciding with him, insisting that not only his character should be justified, but the character of the judge blasted. It was a very grave and serious question with him, whether the character of the judge should be censured and condemned by the Representatives of the people of this nation, for the purpose of making a donation to General Jackson. Perhaps he might express himself more strongly by saying that the bill ought not to pass; that we are to give this donation to General Jackson, it was not by casting reproach upon a just and honorable judge, that we should do justice and vindicate the honor and glory of the country. Again: what were the grounds on which his colleague was pressing this bill? Why, the great and glorious victory of New Orleans. Because we whipped the British, that nobody else could whip—because of this great and glorious victory, this bill must be passed. That was the reason given by his colleague, and that was the reason why he wished the bill passed on the anniversary of the victory. That was not the question of justice involved in this rant—this donation. The victory of New Orleans undoubtedly was a great and glorious one, in which he took a just pride; but he could not, on account of that victory, sanction the acts alluded to in the Kentucky pamphlet, and which were there designated as treason. This reminded him of an anecdote he had heard many years ago of General Arnold, a man very celebrated in our revolutionary history. After his exploits here, Arnold went to England; and finding himself generally shunned there, he sought the society of the Americans whom he found in that country. Being in company with one of them whom he had known in this country, he asked him what the Americans would have done with him, had they caught him instead of Andre. The American answered him by saying, "We would have buried with the honors of war the leg that was mutilated in our service, and then we would have hung the remainder of your body." He should think that this sort of justice would be rather more complete than that of his colleague, who was for rewarding General Jackson for the battle of New Orleans, at the expense of law and justice. He wished to have this matter fully discussed when it came up, and deliberated on without any of your gag-laws, to stop the investigation of the principles involved in it.

Mr. CUSHING moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted in deciding the question in the negative—yeas 100, nays 106.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 9.

The Oregon Territory.

Mr. LINN's bill for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, came up as the postponed business of last week, appointed for further consideration on this day.

Mr. CALHOUN inquired what was the pending question.

The CHAIR said it was on the passage of the bill. It had been read a third time.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that he had been greatly gratified to learn that the Senator from Missouri, who introduced this bill, disclaimed any intention that its provisions should conflict with the provisions of our treaties with Great Britain. It was for the purpose of obtaining time to compare these provisions, and to satisfy himself that they did not conflict, that he had asked a postponement of the bill to this day. He had since examined both the provisions of the bill and of the treaties in relation to the North-west Territory; and the result of his investigation was, that there was one provision in the bill which would conflict with the existing treaty with Great Britain in relation to this very territory. He alluded to the provision granting lands to settlers, which he read from the bill. To show in what respect this conflicted with the treaty, he should first take a review of the grounds on which both countries lay claim to the territory, and then the provisions of the adjustment by treaty, which must govern the action of both.

Here Mr. C. made a clear and precise statement of the three grounds upon which the United States Government sustains its title:

JANUARY, 1848.]

The Oregon Territory.

[27th Cong.]

first, of discovery by Captain Gray of the mouth of the Columbia River, and then by Lewis and Clark of its source; next, by its transferred right to the Spanish title to the north-west coast; and, thirdly, to the transferred title and claims of France, through its extension of the Louisiana territory. He also stated the grounds upon which England based her claims, which were two: first, under the treaty with Spain, in 1790; and next, with regard to the Columbia River, by priority of discovery of the country tributary to that river. These conflicting claims had been the subject of negotiation, and by the treaty of 1818, it was agreed between Great Britain and the United States that the territory should be open to the subjects of Great Britain and citizens of the United States for ten years. In 1827 the treaty was renewed, leaving it optional with either country to discontinue its obligations upon giving the other a year's notice. He pointed out that the British Government merely claimed for its subjects the equal right of settlement and occupation of the territory with the citizens of the United States; and the Government of the United States insisted on its exclusive right of occupation, settlement, and jurisdiction. He also deduced, from the review of the whole case, that any provision of this bill undertaking to secure to a settler any part of the land which he should occupy for five years, would be in conflict with the spirit and meaning of the treaty. For this reason, and also for another reason—namely, that it might be necessary to investigate whether the manner in which it is proposed to extend jurisdiction over the territory is reconcilable with the provisions of the treaty, and the interpretation of it by the British Government as exemplified in its acts of Parliament—he thought it desirable the bill should be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, or the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. Linn replied, acknowledging that the Senator from South Carolina had correctly stated the claims of the two Governments, and the position in which they stood with regard to the treaty of 1818, renewed in 1827, and requiring one year's notice of discontinuance. He denied, however, that the Senator's deductions were correct—first, that the promise of this bill to make a grant of lands to the settlers, was in conflict with the treaty; and, next, that there could be any question of the right of the United States to extend our jurisdiction over our citizens residing in the territory. The object of the bill was to encourage emigration, by an assurance to those emigrating that they should have the benefit of the jurisdiction of our laws, and the security of their settlements. Without these encouragements, there would be no emigration of our citizens, and England would be left to occupy the whole country, through the agency of her Hudson's Bay Company. Through that agency, she was daily settling down her subjects—taking possession of, and occupying for all practical purposes, the choicest portions of the territory.

Through the same agency, she had extended to those settlers the protection of the British laws. We asked, by this bill, to do nothing more than Great Britain had done. If she interpreted the treaty to her advantage, we surely are entitled to make use of her interpretation to our advantage. But he did not want either the example or dictation of Great Britain in this matter. He took ground upon the indefeasible right of the United States to the territory, and to our indisputable right to extend the jurisdiction of this Government to our citizens within our territory.

Mr. CHOATE was sorry that he was obliged to concur with the Senator from South Carolina, that there was one objection fatal to the provision in the bill making a grant of lands to settlers. He said sorry; because he was entirely favorable to the bill itself, and approved of the objects and purposes proposed by it. On due examination of the existing treaty, he was constrained to say that, to grant away, or to secure a settlement, (which amounted to the same thing,) would be to exercise an ownership, contrary to the spirit of the treaty, according to which every portion of the territory is to be left open to the citizens of both Governments. The obligation not to exercise exclusive jurisdiction or ownership by either party, was implied in the obligation to leave the country free and open to the mutual occupation and settlement of the citizens of both. There was nothing in this view of the treaty conflicting with the extension of the British laws to the subjects of Great Britain residing in the territory; nor would there be in the extension of the jurisdiction of the laws of the United States, in the same manner, over our citizens residing there. There would be mutual jurisdiction; but mutual occupation could not be reconciled with an undertaking on our part to secure locations to our settlers.

Mr. LINN observed, that Congress had, at all events, made some progress in this matter. It was now admitted in Congress that there may be mutual occupation and jurisdiction, without cause of offence to Great Britain. As Great Britain had extended her laws over the territory, so may we extend ours. As she had built forts and made settlements, so may we. She is either to set us the example, or dictate to us what we may do. Now, he would pay no regard to the dictation of Great Britain. He maintained our right to the territory over which we proposed to extend our jurisdiction: and our population, and it was on this right he based the present bill. There was nothing in it to conflict with any obligation of the United States.

After a few remarks from Messrs. CHOATE, HENDERSON, and BAYARD, The Senate adjourned.

3d Sess.]

Fine on General Jackson.

[JANUARY, 1848.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 9.

Plan of the Exchequer.

Mr. FILLMORE, on leave, made a report from the Committee of Ways and Means, on the plan of an exchequer presented by the Secretary of the Treasury, and recommended by the President of the United States, concluding with the following resolution, which, Mr. F. said, was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the plan of an exchequer presented to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury at the last session, and entitled "A bill amendatory of the several acts establishing the Treasury Department," ought not to be adopted.

Mr. AHERTON asked leave, and presented a report on the same subject, from the minority of the committee, concluding with the following amendment, which he said he was instructed by them to offer:

And that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to bring in a bill regulating the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public money, in such a manner as shall, as far as possible, substitute provisions of law for executive discretion in the management of the finances, shall prevent the moneys of the people from being used for purposes of private speculation and emolument, and shall render the Government independent of the agency and influence of moneyed corporations.

Mr. FILLMORE said he was instructed by the committee to move the printing of the report, and he would include in his motion the report and amendment of the minority. He would further move that 10,000 copies of both reports be printed.

The question was then taken on Mr. FILLMORE's motion to print the two reports, and carried; leaving the motion to print the extra number of copies open.

On motion by Mr. WM. W. IRWIN,
The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 10.

Fine on General Jackson.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred "A bill to indemnify Major-General Andrew Jackson for damage sustained in the discharge of his official duty," made the following report:

"The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill to indemnify Major-General Andrew Jackson for damage sustained in the discharge of his official duty, beg leave to submit the following report:

"This bill has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, after having been made a special order in the Senate, and after having undergone discussion there. It has been so referred generally, and without specifying the particular points of inquiry, which were contemplated by the Senate in ordering the reference. The whole subject having been thus referred to their examination, with all the interesting questions which it includes, perhaps it may be considered to be the duty of the committee, as the organ of the Senate in the preparatory examination of legal subjects, to examine and report on those connected with the object of this reference.

"Yet, in the absence of any specific instructions from the Senate, and looking to the discussions which have led to the reference of the bill, the committee have come to the conclusion that they will best fulfil their duty to the Senate by reporting it with an amendment, placing the restoration of the fine imposed on General Jackson, by Judge Hall, on grounds which do not involve any censure of either of the parties in this bygone transaction, nor in any degree arraign the conduct of the patriotic citizens of New Orleans; but simply protect the Senate from the possible inference that, in passing this bill, it has acknowledged the legal authority of a military officer to establish martial law within the limits of this free republic. They accordingly report the bill with an amendment.

"Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert—

"That, in consideration of the distinguished military services of Major-General Andrew Jackson, in the defence of the city of New Orleans, and of the desire expressed by sundry citizens and Legislatures of this Union, in divers petitions and legislative resolutions submitted to the Congress of the United States, the fine of $1,000 imposed upon Major-General Andrew Jackson by the Hon. Dominick A. Hall, be, and the same is hereby, restored; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay to Major-General Andrew Jackson the said sum of $1,000, with interest at six per cent. thereon, from the day of its payment by him, out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

"Also, strike out the title of the bill, and insert 'A bill for the relief of Major-General Andrew Jackson.'

Mr. WALKER, from the same committee, read the following; which he submitted to the Senate as a minority report, viz:

"The undersigned, one of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate of the United States, to whom was referred the bill to indemnify Major-General Andrew Jackson for damages sustained in the discharge of his official duty, dissents from the views of the majority of the committee in this case. The bill referred to the committee contains no censure of the conduct or motives of Judge Hall, nor does it express any opinion as to the acts of the citizens of New Orleans. It leaves all those subjects untouched, to depend upon the judgment of the present age and of posterity. The bill, should it become a law, will be only an expression of the legislative will, that, under all the circumstances of the case, the money paid by Gen. Jackson in discharge of his fine, and now retained in the treasury of the United States, should be refunded. Such a bill arraigns and censures no one. But the report of the committee, by the clearest implication, in the opinion of the undersigned, does arraign the conduct of General Jackson in this case as subver-

JANUARY, 1843.]

Fine on General Jackson.

[27th CONG.]

sive of the Constitution of the United States. The case does not necessarily involve the power of a military commander to "establish martial law within the limits of this free republic." This question, however, having been introduced by the committee, the undersigned submits that, in time of war, and of imminent public danger, it may be the duty of the commander to arrest those regarded as traitors, spies, or mutineers, within the limits of his camp; especially in cases where it was obvious to him that his refusal to exercise such power would involve the disbanding of his forces, the defeat of his army, and the surrender of that army and of the country which he was bound to defend. The alternative, as he fully believed, was to make the arrest, or the abandonment of his country's standard, and the surrender of one of her greatest cities, to a powerful enemy, whose motto of victory involved indiscriminate plunder and licentious outrage. Under such circumstances, should he make the arrest and save the country? To this question there will be but one response from the heart of every true American patriot. That General Jackson, and those united with him in the defence of New Orleans, fully believed this emergency to exist, is beyond all doubt or controversy. If, then, this was the state of the case, it was the duty of General Jackson to have made the arrest; and the act was not merely excusable, but justifiable. It was demanded by a great and overruling necessity; and had he failed to assume this responsibility, and the consequences which he anticipated had occurred, he would have merited and received universal execration. Such being the facts, was General Jackson bound to liberate the prisoner, immediately upon the mandate of the Federal judge of that district? If, as Gen. Jackson believed, the danger was still imminent—that the liberation at that time of the prisoner would overthrow his power, and bring his authority as commander into contempt—that it would surely produce a repetition of similar acts of mutiny and treason, and demonstrate his inability to restrain, much less to punish them—that it would lead to the depopulation or defeat of his army, and the surrender of the city he was bound to defend; the same overruling necessity which justified the arrest, would require the detention of the prisoner until the emergency had passed, and he could be surrendered with safety into the hands of the civil authority. The law which justified the act, was the great law of necessity; it was the law of self-defence. This great law of necessity—of defence of self, of home, and of country—never was designed to be abrogated by any statute, or by any constitution. This was the law which justified the arrest and detention of the prisoner; and, however the act may now be assailed, it has long since received the cordial approbation of the American people. That General Jackson never desired to elevate the military above the civil authority, is proved by his conduct during the trial, and after the imposition of this fine. When the magistrate ascended to the bench—acting for no contempt in the presence of the court—acting in his own case as prosecutor, witness, accuser, and judge; when the General's answer was refused to be heard, and he was denied a trial by jury; when a victorious army, and a rescued and grateful people, thronged the court, and the terrified Judge was about to adjourn the court without inflicting the sentence.—General Jackson rose; he quieted the threatened tumult; requested the Judge to proceed; the sentence was imposed; he bowed, in a calm and dignified submission to the mandate of the law, and paid, at once, the penalty inflicted for saving the country. And when, upon retiring from the court, he was surrounded by a grateful and indignant people, his brief, but glorious address, was an appeal to all who heard him to respect the civil tribunals, and maintain the supremacy of the law. And now the question is, shall this penalty, thus incurred in discharge of a solemn duty, and thus paid, be paid, or refunded? The title is, "A bill to indemnify Major-General Andrew Jackson for damages sustained in the discharge of his official duty." The title is in strict conformity with the facts of the case, and, in the opinion of the undersigned, should be retained. The committee, however, propose to reject it, and to substitute, as title, "A bill for the relief of General Andrew Jackson." General Jackson has never solicited, nor will he ever receive, such relief. He is no mendicant; he asks no alms, or pension, or bounty, from his country: but that country itself demands that his money shall be refunded as an act of justice. It was a penalty incurred for saving the country, and the country requires that it shall be restored. Nor is the undersigned prepared to give the reasons assigned in the bill for refunding this money. The bill places the restoration of the penalty mainly upon the "consideration of the distinguished military services of General Jackson." This bill is not a payment for services, however great or meritorious. These services are being paid in the approbation of his conscience and of his country, in the glorious result of his immortal victories on a frontier saved from savage fury and from indiscriminate massacre, in the rescue of New Orleans and the reconquest of Louisiana and of its noble river; paid in closing our late eventful struggle with glory and renown; paid in the highest honors and offices which a grateful people could bestow; and, through ages to come, posterity will continue the payment in gratitude and praise, re-echoed by countless millions throughout this great republic, and in every country and in every land where our principles shall go on, conquering and to conquer, striking down the thrones of despots, and erasing upon their ruins the glorious fabric of the people's will. And are these the services which it is now proposed to compensate by the payment of this paltry sum, in a bill for the relief of General Andrew Jackson? It is not a bill for relief, but for indemnity; not a payment for services, but a restoration of money unjustly withheld; and in no other view can it receive the support of

"R. J. WALKER"

Mr. BERRIEN moved that the report of the committee, and the bill, as amended, be printed; which motion was put, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the report of the minority of the committee was ordered to be printed, and appended to the report of the majority.

3d SESS.]

Impeachment of the President of the United States.

[JANUARY, 1843.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 10.

Impeachment of the President of the United States.

Mr. BORTS rose and inquired of the Chair whether the proposition which he had given notice of his intention to submit on yesterday, could be now received and entertained as a privileged question.

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. BORTS then said that he came prepared to acquit himself of the pledge which he was under, to prefer charges against the acting President of the United States.

Here Mr. EVERETT arose, and inquired if he was to understand the Chair as deciding that the proceeding on the part of the gentleman from Virginia was in order at that time.

The SPEAKER replied he had so decided.

Mr. BORTS resumed the remarks he had begun. He said that he proposed to introduce charges of corruption, of mal-conduct in office, of high crimes and misdemeanors, committed by the acting President of the United States—charges which he stood prepared to prove, by testimony the most conclusive. He asked that the House might appoint a committee to investigate the charges, and to report what course it was proper to pursue. He was himself prepared to prove every charge which he should bring against the President. He not only asked but he DEMANDED an opportunity of making these charges good. Were he to come here as the humblest citizen of the Republic, and declare his readiness to prove them, he would claim the privilege of so doing as such; much more so, then, did he claim, and insist upon it, as the Representative of fifty thousand people. It was his highest constitutional privilege. One hundred members of this House had declared, and placed it on record, that John Tyler had committed impeachable offences. He (Mr. B.) had so declared; and he considered it due to his own personal honor and reputation that he should be permitted to prove the truth of what he asserted. He was not one of those who dealt in vague and general charges, but would not come up and put their assertions in a tangible form. He made no charges which he was not prepared to sustain with the most conclusive proof. Since his first agitation of this subject at the last session, he had been deeply reflecting and deliberating upon it; and the more he reflected, the more imperative appeared his duty to make these charges. In doing so, he must declare that, so far from being actuated by a desire to render himself conspicuous before the country, and place himself ahead of those on that floor whose lead he generally followed, and whom he would be proud to follow on this as on other subjects, he must be permitted to declare that this was the most sinful duty he had ever undertaken to perform. He declared that he was actuated alone by the obligations which rested upon him. He knew not how long he should be a member of the House of Representatives. If the ability of the Legislature of his State was equal to their good will towards him, he should not sit here long; [laughter;] but he could not retire to private life, unless he had first discharged this sacred duty. Should he live to see the overgrown power of the Executive hereafter trampling under foot all opposition—the independence of the Legislature sacrificed—the energies of the people relaxed into listlessness at Executive encroachment and obedience to his will;—should he witness such a state of things in this country, he would have the satisfaction, with a proud heart and erect bearing, that he, for one, at least, had endeavored to arrest it.

Mr. WISE asked if any motion was made in writing. If so, he should like to have it read, in order that he might judge for himself when he came to vote.

Mr. BORTS said that he would read it himself.

Mr. WISE wished the Clerk to read it.

Mr. BORTS replied that he would rather read it himself, as he understood his own writing better than anybody else did. Mr. R. then read the following charge:

"I do impeach John Tyler, Vice President, acting as President of the United States, of the following high crimes and misdemeanors:

"1. I charge him with gross usurpation of power and violation of law, in attempting to exercise a controlling influence over the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, by ordering the payment of amounts of long standing, that had been by them rejected for want of legal authority to pay, and threatening them with expulsion from office unless his orders were obeyed; by virtue of which threat, thousands were drawn from the public treasury without the authority of law.

"2. I charge him with a wicked and corrupt abuse of the power of appointment to, and removal from, office; first, in displacing those who were competent and faithful in the discharge of their public duties, only because they were supposed to entertain a political preference for another; and, secondly, in bestowing them on creatures of his own will, alike regardless of the public welfare and his duty to the country.

"3. I charge him with the high crime and misdemeanor of aiding to excite a disorganizing and revolutionary spirit in the country, by placing on the records of the State department his objections to a law, as carrying no constitutional obligation with it; whereby the several States of this Union were invited to disregard and disobey a law of Congress, which he himself had sanctioned and sworn to see faithfully executed, from which nothing but disorder, confusion, and anarchy can follow.

"4. I charge him with being guilty of a high misdemeanor, in retaining men in office for months after they have been rejected by the Senate as unworthy, incompetent, and unfaithful, with an utter defiance of the public will, and total indifference to the public interests.

"5. I charge him with the high crime and misde-

JANUARY, 1848.]

Impeachment of the President of the United States.

[27th CONG.]

meanor of withholding his assent to laws indispensable to the just operations of government, which involved no constitutional difficulty on his part; of depriving the Government of all legal sources of revenue; and of assuming to himself the whole power of taxation, and of collecting duties of the people without the authority or sanction of law.

"6. I charge him with an arbitrary, despotic, and corrupt abuse of the veto power, to gratify his personal and political resentments against the Senate of the United States, for a constitutional exercise of their prerogative, in the rejection of his nominees to office, with such evident marks of inconsistency and duplicity as leave no room to doubt his disregard of the interests of the people, and his duty to his country.

"7. I charge him with gross official misconduct, in having been guilty of a shameless duplicity, equivocation, and falsehood, with his late Cabinet and Congress, which led to idle legislation, and useless public expense; and by which he has brought such dishonor on himself as to disqualify him from administering the Government with advantage, honor, or virtue, and for which alone he would deserve to be removed from office.

"8. I charge him with an illegal and unconstitutional exercise of power, in instituting a commission to investigate the past transactions under a former administration of the custom house in New York, under the pretence of seeing the laws faithfully executed—with having arrested the investigation at a moment when the inquiry was to be made as to the manner in which those laws were executed under his own administration—with having directed or sanctioned the appropriation of large sums of the public revenue to the compensation of officers of his own creation, without the authority of law; which, if sanctioned, would place the entire revenues of the country at his disposal.

"9. I charge him with the high misdemeanor of having withheld from the Representatives of the people information called for, and declared to be necessary to the investigation of stupendous frauds and abuses alleged to have been committed by agents of the Government, both upon individuals and the Government itself, whereby he himself becomes accessory to those frauds."

Mr. BORRIS then said that he wished to connect no man or set of men with his fame on this resolution. He wished no man to commit himself on it till he had an opportunity of proving the truth of his charges.

Mr. WISE interrupted his colleague, and asked for the reading of the proposition founded on the charges. He did not wish to hear the gentleman's speech till he was in possession of the whole subject.

Mr. BORRIS submitted that the matter was not within the control of his colleague.

The SPEAKER requested the gentleman to submit his motion to the House; when

Mr. BORRIS read the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of nine members be appointed, with instruction diligently to inquire into the truth of the preceding charges preferred against John Tyler, and to report to this House the testimony taken to establish said charges, together with their opinion whether the said John Tyler hath so acted in his official capacity as to require the interposition of the constitutional power of this House; and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. BORRIS said that all he wanted to remark was, that he desired to connect no man, or set of men, with his proposition. He desired no man or party to be committed on it, till the evidence was before the House. By the appointment of a committee to investigate the testimony he would be able to bring forward, they would be able to decide, at a future day, whether Mr. Tyler had committed acts deserving of impeachment by that House. If he succeeded in establishing the truth of these charges, he presumed there would be no member of that House found voting against the impeachment. If, on the contrary, he failed in establishing them, let the odium fall on him, and him alone. He was willing to take all the responsibility, and he wanted no man now to commit himself for or against the charges he offered.

The SPEAKER here asked permission to explain more fully the grounds of his decision. Since the present Speaker had been in the chair, there had been no cases of this kind before the House, and only two cases since the beginning of the Government. The first was that of Chief Justice Chase, in which no question like the one now raised was presented. The case was then considered and acted upon by the House as a privileged question. Mr. Randolph arose in his seat, and, without any resolution or specific charges, after some remarks on the conduct of Judge Chase, moved for a committee to take into consideration the propriety of impeaching him. The matter went on day after day, and, by the universal acquiescence of the House, took preference of all other business as a privileged question. In addition to this, the Chair considered this as a high constitutional question, paramount to all others, without reference to the rules of the House. The Chair, therefore, considered the House bound to act on the resolution, either by reception or rejection of it.

Mr. BORRIS, at the suggestion of Mr. McKAY, modified his resolution, by inserting the word "preceding," before the word "charges." Mr. B. took the occasion further to modify his resolution, by adding "and that the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers."

The resolution as modified was then read: when

Mr. WISE said: Now, sir, I ask, what is the preceding charges?

Mr. BORRIS said he had now appended the resolution to the charges, and would read them up in that form to be read.

The charges and resolutions were then sent up to the Chair, and read by the Clerk.

At the conclusion of the reading by the Clerk, there were loud cries of "Question," "Question."

Mr. CAYE JOHNSON moved to lay the resolu-

D. SESS.]

The Bankrupt Law.

[JANUARY, 1848.]

ion on the table. [Cries of "Oh, no; let us have a vote."]

Mr. BORRIS called for the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. WISE, and many other members, entertained Mr. C. JOHNSON to withdraw his motion; but he refused to do so.

The yeas and nays were then ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 101, nays 119.

So the motion was negative.

The question then recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question; which was agreed to.

Mr. CUSHING demanded the yeas and nays on the question, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. TURNER inquired what would be the effect of negating the main question?

The SPEAKER replied, it would drive the question over till-morrow.

Mr. CUSHING then withdrew his call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. UNDERWOOD renewed the demand; and the yeas and nays were ordered.

The yeas and nays were then taken, and resulted—yeas 122, nays 90.

So the main question was ordered.

The question then recurred on the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BORRIS,) and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Landaff W. Andrews, Arnold, Aycrigg, Babcock, Barnard, Birdseye, Black, Boardman, Botta, Boyd, Milton Brown, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Carvers, Casey, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, Colquitt, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Cranston, Ravens, Daniel, Garrett Davis, Deberry, John Edwards, Fessenden, Fillmore, A. Lawrence Foster, Gamble, Gentry, Goggin, Green, Halsted, Hays, Houston, Hunt, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James, John Kennedy, King, Lane, McKennan, Thomas F. Marshall, Mathiot, Maynard, Moore, Morgan, Morrow, Osborne, Owsley, Pendleton, Powell, Ramsay, Alexander Randall, Rayner, Ridgway, Rodney, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Sewell, Shepperd, Slade, Truman Smith, Sollers, Stanley, Stratton, John T. Stuart, Summers, J. B. Thompson, W. Thompson, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Turkey, Underwood, Warren, Washington, Joseph L. White, Christopher H. Williams, and John Young—83.

NAYS.—Messrs. S. J. Andrews, Atherton, Baker, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Borden, Bowne, Brewster, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, Burnell, William Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick Caldwell, Calhoun, John Campbell, Cary, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Cowen, Cross, Cushing, Richard D. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Doan, Doig, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Egbert, Everett, Ferrie, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Gates, Giddings, Gilmer, Patrick G. Goode, Wm. O. Goode, Gordon, Graham, Justine, Gwin, Harris, Hastings, Henry, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Howard, Hubard, Hudson, Hunter, James Irvin, William W. Irwin, Jack, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, Isaac D. Jones, Keim, Andrew Kennedy, Lewis, Littlefield, Lowell, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Malory, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, S. Mason, J. T. Mason, Mathews, Mattocks, Maxwell, Medill, Meriwether, Miller, Mitchell, Newhard, Oliver, Farmer, Partridge, Payne, Pickens, Proffit, Read, Reding, Rencher, Reynolds, Rhett, Riggs, Roosevelt, Sanford, Saunders, Shaw, Shields, Snyder, Sprigg, Steenrod, Stokeley, Alexander H. H. Stuart, Sumter, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Trotti, Van Buren, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Ward, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Winthrop, Wise, Wood, and Augustus Young—127.

So the House refused to adopt the resolution.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 11.

The Bankrupt Law.

Mr. BEXTON presented the petition of Abraham R. Van Nest and others, of the city of New York, praying for the unconditional repeal of the (so called) bankrupt act, upon the ground of its unconstitutionality, and because it was destructive of the rights of creditors.

In presenting this petition, Mr. B. took leave, under the indulgence of the Senate, to correct, for the third time in this body, an error into which he had fallen some time back in relation to voluntary bankruptcy. He had been led to believe that bankruptcy might be voluntary—that the English bankrupt system contained this principle; and, consequently, the principle came to us as a part of the system which we had borrowed from England. He had been led to believe this, and had expressed himself to that effect in several speeches. He had spoken in favor of this voluntary bankruptcy, and on questions of amendment or in substitution of one bill for another, he had voted in favor of it. But it was all wrong, and he had declared and renounced the error in two speeches heretofore made before the Senate—once in December, 1841, and again in August, 1842—on both which occasions he had traced the error to its source, and showed there was no such thing in the English systems. The sixth section of the act of George IV., (1826,) was the foundation of this error: on referring to that section, (which he did a year or two ago,) he found that the section only authorized those traders and merchants who were the proper subjects of a bankrupt law, to make a declaration of insolvency, and file it in the bankrupt court, where it operated as an act of bankruptcy, on which the creditors might proceed, or not, as they pleased. If the creditors did not proceed, and that within a limited time, the declaration of insolvency stood for nothing: the debtor could not proceed upon it—he could not drag the creditors into court! This the section shows. Mr. B. here read the section as follows:

Bankrupt act of the sixth year of George IV. (1826.)

"SEC. 6. That if any such trader shall file in the office of the Lord Chancellor's secretary of bankrupts, a declaration in writing, signed by such trader, and attested by an attorney or solicitor, that he is insolvent or unable to meet his engagements, the said secretary of bankrupts, or his deputy, shall sign a memorandum that such declaration hath been filed; which memorandum shall be authority for the London Gazette to insert an advertisement of such declaration therein; and every such declaration shall, after such advertisement inserted as aforesaid, be an act of bankruptcy committed by such TRADER at the time when such declaration was filed: but no commission shall issue thereupon, unless it be sued out within two calendar months next after the insertion of such advertisement, and unless such advertisement shall have been inserted in the London Gazette within eight days after such declaration filed. And no docket shall be struck upon such act of bankruptcy before the expiration of four days next after such insertion of such advertisement, in case such commission is to be executed in London; or before the expiration of eight days next after such insertion, in case such commission is to be executed in the country; and the Gazette containing such advertisement shall be evidence to be received of such declaration having been filed."

Having read this section, Mr. B. said it was explicit, and precluded argument. The voluntary action of the debtor, which it authorized, was limited to the mere filing of the declaration of insolvency. It went no further; and it was confined to traders—to the trading classes—who, alone, were subject to the laws of bankruptcy. Mr. B. said his first error, in acting upon this idea of voluntary bankruptcy, applicable both to traders and to those who were not, was committed in 1827, soon after the British act passed, and when he had not seen it. It was, in fact, only one or two years ago that he had seen the statute; and, from that time, had renounced the error.

Mr. B. said that the English had, as we all knew, an INSOLVENT SYSTEM, as well as a BANKRUPT SYSTEM. They had an INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT, as well as a BANKRUPT COURT; and both these were kept separate, although there were no STATES in England to be trodden under foot by treading down the insolvent laws. Not so with us. Our insolvent laws, though belonging to States called sovereign, are all trampled under foot! There would be a time to go into this. At present, Mr. B. would only say that, in England, bankruptcy and insolvency were still kept distinct; and no insolvent trader was allowed to proceed as a bankrupt. On the contrary, an insolvent, applying in the Insolvent Debtors' Court for the release of his person, could not proceed one step beyond filing his declaration. At that point the creditors took up the declaration, if they pleased, transferred the case to the Bankrupt Court, and prosecuted the case in that court. This is done by virtue of the 13th section of the Insolvent Debtors' Act of 7th Geo. IV., (1827.) Mr. B. read the section, as follows:

Insolvent debtors' act of 7th year of George IV. (1827.)

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the filing of the petition of every person in actual custody, who shall be subject to the laws concerning bankrupts, and who shall apply by petition to the said court, for his or her discharge from custody, according to this act, shall be accounted and adjudged as an act of bankruptcy from the time of filing such petition; and that any commission issuing against such person, and under which he or she shall be declared bankrupt before the time appointed by the said court, and advertised in the London Gazette, for hearing the matters of such petition, or at any time within two calendar months from the time of filing such petition, shall have effect to avoid any conveyance and assignment of the estate and effects of such person, which shall have been made in pursuance of the provisions of this act; Provided, always, That the filing of such petition shall not be deemed an act of bankruptcy, unless such person be so declared bankrupt before the time so advertised as aforesaid, or within such two calendar months as aforesaid; but that every such conveyance and assignment shall be good and valid, notwithstanding any commission of bankruptcy under which such person shall be declared bankrupt after the time so advertised as aforesaid, and after the expiration of such two calendar months as aforesaid."

This (said Mr. B.) accords with the section of the year before in the bankrupt act. The two sections are accordant, and identical in their provisions. They keep up the great distinction between insolvency and bankruptcy, which some of our judges have undertaken to abrogate: they keep up, also, the great distinction between the proper subjects of bankruptcy—to wit: traders, and those who are not traders; and they keep up the distinction between the release of the person (which is the object of the insolvent law) and the extinction of the debt with the consent of creditors, which is the object of insolvent systems. By this section, if the "person" in custody who files a declaration of insolvency shall be a trader, subject to the laws of bankruptcy, it only operates as an act of bankruptcy, upon which the creditors may proceed, or not, as they please. If they proceed, it is done by suing out a commission of bankruptcy; which carries the case to the bankrupt court. If the creditors do not proceed, the petition of the insolvent trader only releases his person. Being subject to bankruptcy, his creditors may call him into the bankrupt court, if they please; if they do not, he cannot take it there, nor claim the benefit of bankruptcy in the insolvent court: he can only get his person released. This is clear from the section; and our act of 1840 committed something worse than a folly in not copying this section. That act creates two sorts of bankruptcy—voluntary and involuntary—and, by a singular folly, makes them convertible! so that all may be volunteers if they please. It makes merchants, traders, bankers, and some others of the trading classes, subject to involuntary bankruptcy: then it gives all persons whatever the right to proceed voluntarily. Thus the involuntary subjects of bankruptcy may become volunteers; and the

3d SESS.]

Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1848.]

distinction becomes ridiculous and null. Our act, which is compiled from the English Insolvent Debtors' Act, and is itself nothing but an insolvent law perverted to the abolition of debts at the will of the debtor, should have copied the 18th section of the English insolvent law: for want of copying this, it annihilated involuntary bankruptcy—made all persons, traders or not, volunteers who chose to be so—released all debts, at the will of the debtor, without the consent of a single creditor—and committed the most daring outrage upon the laws of property which the world ever beheld!

Report on the Fine on General Jackson.

The resolution introduced by Mr. LINN to print 10,000 extra copies of the report of the majority, and 20,000 of the report of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary on the bill to indemnify General Andrew Jackson or damages sustained in the discharge of his official duties, came up for consideration.

Mr. ALLEN demanded the yeas and nays on the resolution; which were ordered, and were as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Serier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—17.

NAYS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, McDuffie, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Smith of Indiana, White, and Woodbridge—23.

So the Senate refused to print the reports.

Oregon Territory.

The bill to authorize the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon came up as the unfinished business; the question pending being, "Shall this bill pass?"

Mr. TAPPAN said he hoped the bill would be adopted by the Senate; for he considered it of the utmost importance that it should pass, notwithstanding the reasons which had been assigned by the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Massachusetts, on a former day, against its passage. It appeared that, by certain treaty stipulations between his Government and Great Britain, entered into in the year 1818, the British had the right of trading throughout the whole of that territory; of entering into all the ports and harbors upon the coast; and of carrying on their trade therein, as freely and as fully as might be done by the citizens of the United States. Under this treaty, the British Trading Company had erected a fort, called Fort Vancouver, and had settled and cultivated some of the adjacent lands: but to what extent, he (Mr. TAPPAN) did not know.

And now (said Mr. TAPPAN) we have the proposition advanced in this Senate, that these treaty stipulations give to Great Britain a pre-eminence in common with the Government of the United States within the Oregon Territory—that the subjects of Great Britain had a right to occupy it with the citizens of the United States. No Senator had intimated any doubt as to the title of the United States to the territory, founded upon discovery and upon treaties. As to the treaty or convention of 1818, although he thought the construction put on it by honorable Senators was quite a forced construction, he would guard against the consequences of such construction, that it might not grow up into an admitted claim to the whole territory.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had merely stated what interpretation was put upon the treaty; he had given no opinion as to the correctness of that interpretation.

Mr. TAPPAN said the Senate would recollect that there had been recently before them a question as to the North-eastern boundary of the United States. That question had arisen from the same kind of carelessness or ignorance in our negotiators of the treaty of Ghent, which seemed to have prevailed in negotiating the convention of 1818.

By the treaty of peace of 1783, the north-west corner of Nova Scotia was the point from which the boundary line of the United States was to be run, and it was the point at which that boundary line was to terminate. Whatever uncertainty there might be in the description of any part of that boundary, there was none whatever in the place where the line should begin and end; nor was there any difficulty, doubt, or uncertainty, as to where that north-west corner was to be found. The map which it is known that the commissioners had before them, and used, as well as all the English maps of their North American possessions, agreed in placing this corner far north of the St. John River, and west of the Bay of Chaleurs. I speak of English maps, because it is well known that the French claimed that the northern part of Maine belonged to Canada, and laid it down accordingly on their maps of that country, even after the peace 1783. Any ordinary country surveyor might have ascertained where that north-west corner of Nova Scotia was, and from that might have run the north line of Maine; nor would any two honest surveyors have differed as to the position of that corner, or the line to be run from or to it.

This matter, so clear, and, until then, undisputed, was made doubtful and uncertain by our negotiators of the treaty of Ghent. If that treaty, instead of stipulating for the appointment of a joint commission, "to run and mark the boundary line between the two Governments," had required such commission "to ascertain the north-west corner of Nova Scotia, and to run the line from and to that point," no difficulty would ever have arisen between the two Governments as to either the north or east line of Maine; but, as the treaty stipulated that if the commissioners disagreed where the line was, it should be left to some

JANUARY, 1848.]

Oregon Territory.

[27th Cong.]

friendly power to determine, the British Government, with their usual adroitness, seized upon this agreement to draw off the attention of the people of Great Britain and the United States from the true point for settlement, and fix it upon an inquiry and examination as to where are the highlands mentioned in the treaty of peace. The British Government, after raising this controversy, took possession of the country north of the St. John, and held it by military force. You all know (said Mr. T.) the long train of negotiation which we have been amused with upon this matter; the reference of the question of "where were the highlands," to the King of Holland; and his award, and the rejection of it by this Government. He would now ask the attention of the Senate to the close of this controversy to the treaty recently concluded with Lord Ashburton. The negotiation of this treaty shows the complete success of British diplomacy. A territory which had been ours, not only without dispute, but without any suspicion as to the goodness of our title, for more than thirty years, until the treaty of Ghent, was admitted by our own Secretary of State to have never belonged to us. When the late treaty with Great Britain was laid before the Senate, with the correspondence which led to it, it was seen that the boundary settled by it, between our possessions and the British, was one proposed by our Government, and acceded to by the British negotiator, giving them all the territory north of the St. John, and a large tract west, which they had never claimed. We lost all this (said Mr. T.) by negotiation, and would not regain it without a war; for in any future negotiation or reference as to the northern line of Maine, we could not expect the British to recede from the St. John, when we had offered, not to cede the country north of that river for an equivalent, but to fix upon that as the true boundary intended to be described in the treaty of 1788. For this reason, he voted to ratify this treaty. The boundary was our own proposition; and we would be considered by the whole civilized world as precluded from advancing a claim to a more northern boundary. The territory was lost by our own folly, and could not be regained without a war; and war, in the present state of the country, (which he would not explain, as it was understood by every Senator,) was, with him, entirely impracticable.

Individuals (said Mr. T.) are called fools if they will not profit by their own experience: so are nations. If, soon after the treaty of 1783, we had granted the land in the north part of Maine, and invited a settlement to be made on it, it would never have been claimed by Great Britain. The north-west corner of Nova Scotia would now be the north-east corner of the United States. But, instead of settling it ourselves, we let the British settle it; we negotiated until it was gone from us. He was for taking a very different course with the Oregon Territory. He would let the hardy Western yeomanry in upon that country; he would plant fifty thousand rifles there, in hands that knew how to use them; and no more would be heard of British claimants, or British claims to that territory. If (said Mr. T.) this is not done—if, from fear of offending our old mother, we forbear to take strong possession of the country, and go on negotiating and arbitrating about it as we did about Maine—by-and-bye some Secretary of State will be found proposing the line of the Rocky Mountains as the Western boundary of our glorious Union. Yes, and proposing it when we dare not involve the nation in a war. He would trust to no such contingency. He would settle the country immediately, and hold it.

On motion of Mr. SEVIER, who intimated a desire to examine certain documents relating to this subject, the bill was informally passed over.

On motion of Mr. HUNTINGTON,
The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 12.

Oregon Territory.

The bill to authorize the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, came up as the unfinished business; the question pending being, "Shall this bill pass?"

Mr. SEVIER said the Select Committee, to whom the subject of the settlement of the Oregon Territory had been referred, had endeavored, in considering the subject, to effect two objects—one was the preservation of our national faith, and the other the preservation of our rightful possessions west of the Rocky Mountains. And the committee believed that those two objects will be effected by the passage of the bill they have submitted to the Senate.

It was gratifying to him to find that every Senator conceded the point, that our right to the territory in question was incontestable. That question had been well settled.

He had in his possession documents which set forth, in brief and comprehensive terms the claim of the United States.

Mr. Gallatin had claimed for the United States the possession of this territory on these grounds:

"The first discovery of the Columbia, by Gray: the first exploration of the territory through which that river flows, by Lewis and Clark; and the establishment of the first posts and settlements in the said territory, by citizens of the United States:

"The virtual recognition by the British Government of the title of the United States, in the restitution of the post near the mouth of the Columbia agreeably to the first article of the treaty of Ghent, without any reservation or exception whatsoever:

"The acquisition by the United States of all the titles of Spain, which titles were derived from the discovery and exploration of the coasts of the region in question, by Spanish subjects, before they had been seen by the people of any other civilized nation:

[2d Sess.]

Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1848]

"And, lastly, upon the ground of contiguity, which should give to the United States a stronger right to these territories than could be advanced by any other power. 'If,' said Mr. Gallatin, 'a few trading factories on the shores of Hudson's Bay have been considered by Great Britain as giving an exclusive right of occupancy as far as the Rocky Mountains—if the infant settlements on the more southern Atlantic shores justified a claim thence to the South Seas, and which was actually enforced to the Mississippi—that of the millions of American citizens already within reach of those seas, cannot consistently be rejected. It will not be denied, that the extent of contiguous country to which an actual settlement gives a prior right, must depend, in a considerable degree, on the magnitude and population of that settlement, and on the facility with which the adjacent land may, within a short time, be occupied, settled, and cultivated by such population, compared with the probability of its being occupied and settled from any other quarter. This doctrine was admitted to its fullest extent by Great Britain, as appeared by all her charters, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, given to the colonies established then only on the borders of the Atlantic. How much more natural and stronger the claim, when made by a nation whose population extended to the central parts of the continent, and whose dominions were by all acknowledged to extend to the Rocky Mountains."

These were the points upon which our claim was based. It was unnecessary to trouble the Senate by going any further into the evidence of our title. Our discovery of the country drained by the Columbia River had been made as early as the year 1792. But our claim did not rest alone upon priority of discovery, but also upon a treaty of cession with Spain, by which the title of Spain to the country in question, in 1819, became the property of the United States. We had not, in the year 1792, any settlement west of the Mississippi River, which then belonged to Spain; and, in fact, but few settlers west of the Alleghany Mountains. We had no State west of the Ohio River or of the Alleghany Mountains; and it was therefore a matter of no consequence whether we owned the territory at that early period or not. But in the year 1803, when the treaty with the French Republic was made, it had become important that we should possess that portion of the country, for the purposes of trade, for the sake of the fur trade and of the lumber trade; but most of all was it important for the purpose of protecting our settlements from the Indians, who were tampered with, as had always been the case, by the English. Hence it would be found that Mr. Jefferson had, as early as 1804, recommended to Congress an appropriation for the exploration of the Missouri, and the country west of the Rocky Mountains. Lewis and Clark were accordingly authorized to explore the Missouri River to its source, and thence the country west of the Rocky Mountains to the Ocean; and they were the first who explored the tract of country lying along the course of that river, and west of the Rocky Mountains. Pursuing the same object, Mr. Madison granted facilities for the establishment of a colony at the mouth of the Columbia, upon the application of Mr. Astor. A settlement was formed, and a fort erected, and an important commerce was established with Russia and with China. But when the war of 1812 broke out, that coast being under the control and in the possession of renegades, it was given to a British armed force, without firing a gun. Had there been a sufficient force, the result would have probably been different. But the place was surrendered; and it continued to be occupied by the British until the treaty of 1818, when our commissioners required its surrender, and it was given up. But, the British having occupied the country for so long a period—from 1812 until 1818—they had been enabled to erect a line of forts, and to extend their settlements over the whole country; and, when our people came again into possession, they found themselves under considerable disadvantage—all the most important points being pre-occupied by the English; who had taken care also to instil in to the Indian tribes such a hatred of our people, that it was dangerous for them to attempt forming a settlement at all. They were compelled, in some cases, to abandon their forts. And, when an attempt was made, in 1818, to settle the line of boundary, the British refused to come to any terms. They desired to navigate the Columbia River, and, in fact, to command the whole country. The consequence was, that certain stipulations, by which the country was to be occupied in common for the space of ten years, were entered into. If Senators would for a moment turn their attention to the terms of those stipulations, they would find that no provision was contained in them by which the settlement of that tract of country was prohibited or prevented. Each nation had the right to claim access to the ports of the other, for the purposes of trade and commerce. There was no provision by which settlement was restricted. He had procured a work, which was prepared for the State Department, by Greenhow, in which this arrangement will be found, and in which much other valuable information, connected with the discovery and settlement of that country, is also to be found.

The British had extended their settlements everywhere; and not only had they done this, but they had gone on and attached the whole of that country to the province of Canada, appointed justices of the peace, and were administering their laws throughout that country.

What was it that we now proposed to do? We proposed to endeavor to get possession of what we were entitled to, and of which we had for so long a time been kept out of possession. By passing this bill, we should extend to our settlements that protection and encouragement they so much needed. The bill had been more carefully drawn than that which passed the British Parliament; for provision had been made that, in all cases, persons claiming to be British settlers should be handed over to the British authorities for trial; whereas they made no such concession on their part, but, on the contrary, compelled every aggressor to be tried by her laws, as administered in the courts of Canada, and the smaller offences by justices of the peace within the territory.

Mr. LINN here stated the additional fact, that the British even claimed the right to exercise jurisdiction over the Indian tribes, and had actually tried and executed Indians for capital offences.

Mr. SEVIER proceeded to observe that this bill had been framed with a view to as great liberality as possible. It provided for the building of a chain of forts across the mountains. The British had been building forts themselves everywhere; they could not, then, find fault with us for doing what they had already done.

Now, what were the objections which were raised against the passage of this bill? One objection was, that by it we grant land to settlers. He (Mr. S.) looked upon this as the very life and soul of the bill. Strike out this provision, and you would have no settlers there; but, on the contrary, the country would remain in the possession of the British henceforth and forever.

Look at the situation of the country. Consider the distance from the confines of Missouri to be traversed by settlers—through a country, too, filled with Indians, many of them hostile—a country through which there was no road, and in which they could only subsist by their skill and success as hunters. They would have to traverse the mountains amid hostile bands of Indians, and afterwards descend the river, where they would meet the British—worse antagonists than the Indians. They would have then to establish their settlements, make their improvements, and erect their mills; this would be a work of time, requiring two or three years; and until this was done, they would have to subsist upon the fish of the river and the game of the woods. Was it reasonable to suppose that any one would be willing to encounter these difficulties and dangers without the hope of reward? No. In his opinion, the bounty was too small. He did not believe they would get a single settler to go there. If the land clause was stricken out, they might as well destroy the whole bill; they would then have a line of forts erected, without settlers to be protected; they would have forts to protect nobody, for nobody would go there. They would settle on this side of the mountains, where there were no difficulties to be encountered. For his own part, he would rather see the bounty quadrupled. He was sorry to hear so much said about the power of Great Britain, and our fears of her power. He disliked to hear these appeals made to our fears.

Though Great Britain had filled the whole world with dread, yet he hoped to see one nation, at least, that would not succumb to her aggression—and that nation was the United States. He hoped to see this country carry out her laws, regardless of what Great Britain might think or do. This country had already experienced aggressions on the part of Great Britain. The public mind was a little sore on this subject. He would dislike to see them repeated, though he did not fear the power of England. On a late occasion he had voted to take possession of a tract of country claimed by Great Britain. And he was not alone in that vote—he had with him the Senator from Missouri—and not succeeding, he had voted for the treaty. He had grown tired of negotiations at that time, and was more so now; and he believed other Senators were also.

In regard to this subject, he desired some action should take place. We had a right to the whole of that country, from the Mexico to the Russian possessions—all of it that was worth claiming;—for south of 42 degrees parallel, there was not sufficient rain for agricultural purposes. The only portion fit for cultivation was from 42 degrees to 49 degrees of north latitude. If the British were confined to the country north of the 49th parallel of latitude, they could have no other object in remaining there but the carrying on of the fur trade, that would soon be exhausted; and when that is exhausted, that whole coast, both by British and Russians, will be abandoned, and, of consequence, virtually fall into our possession.

He believed the possession of that country was highly important to this Government for the purpose of carrying on our trade in the Pacific Ocean with China and Russia. It was important that we should have a place where our vessels might go for supplies and for repairs; they were now obliged to resort to the Sandwich Islands for these purposes. He considered it important, also, in order to preserve peace upon our frontier. He would be in favor of putting in operation the principles advanced by Mr. Monroe, in his Message to Congress in December, 1823.

Mr. Monroe said that

"The occasion had been judged proper for asserting as a principle, in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for colonization by any European power."

This is a sentiment to which he most cordially responded; and in order to carry it out to the letter, he was willing to encounter some difficulties and dangers. He would be willing, if our financial condition would justify it, to vote a million or two of dollars to build a

3D SEAS.]

Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1848.]

railroad from the frontiers of Missouri, up the valley of the river Platte, to its source in the Rocky Mountains; and on this road, between these points, which could be travelled in two or three days, carry all our emigrants and their effects for a year or two, free of cost or charges. But, unfortunately, we have not got the money for making such a road, although over such a country, which is level and a prairie, where there would be no grading of consequence, and no timber or obstructions to remove, it would cost comparatively but a trifling sum—perhaps a million and a half, or two millions of dollars. I would at this time prefer such an expenditure of the public money, to any distribution of it to the States.

He was sorry to find Senators object to pursue this course, for fear of giving offence to Great Britain. She had been extending her settlements south of the Columbia River, and he had erected forts; but the building of forts done by us, without including settlers to migrate, would as speedily set us by the ears with Great Britain, as if we made the grants. These were the views he entertained in relation to the subject. He hoped, therefore, the bill would pass, as he believed it was highly important to the interest of this country that the Territory of Oregon should be settled and protected.

Mr. BENTON said he would not restate the American title to this country: it had been well done by others who had preceded him in the debate. He would only give a little more development to two points—the treaties of 1803 and 1819; the former with France, by which we acquired Louisiana; the latter with Spain, by which we acquired all her rights on the north west coast of America north of 42 degrees. By the first of these treaties we became a party to the 10th article of the treaty of Utrecht, between France and England; the treaty of peace of 1714, which terminated the wars of Queen Anne and Louis XIV., and settled all their differences of every kind in Europe and America, and undertook to prevent the recurrence of future differences between them. The 10th article of this treaty applied to their settlements and territories in North America, and directed commissaries to be appointed to mark and define their possessions. These commissaries did their work. They drew a line from ocean to ocean to separate the French and British dominions, and to prevent future encroachments and collisions. This line began on the coast of Labrador, and followed a course slightly south of west, to the centre of North America, leaving the British settlements of Hudson's Bay to the north, and the French Canadian possessions to the south. This line took for a landmark the Lake of the Woods, which was then believed to be due east from the head of the Mississippi; and from that point took the 49th parallel of north latitude indefinitely to the west. The language of the line is "indefinitely;" and this established the northern boundary of Louisiana, and erected a wall beyond which future French settlements could not cross to the north, nor British to the south.

As purchasers of Louisiana, the treaty of 1803 made us party to the 10th article of the treaty of Utrecht, and made the 49th parallel the same to us and the British, which it had been to the French and the British: it became a wall which neither could pass, so far as it depended upon that line. This the British saw, and quickly went to work to abrogate or mutilate a line which presented an impassable barrier to their designs upon the Columbia River. The American, Captain Gray, had first discovered that river at its mouth, in 1790; Lewis and Clark had discovered it from its head to the sea in 1804-5; and these discoveries of contiguous territory gave us the rights of first discovery over the whole river, in addition to the rights derived from treaties. But no sooner had Captain Gray discovered this great river than the British coveted it, and sent out McKenzie to discover it over again, and especially to find its head in high northern latitudes. To do this, McKenzie, proceeding from Canada, bore far to the north; missed all the waters of the Columbia; fell upon the Tacoutche Teras, and struck the ocean five hundred miles (following the coast) to the north of the Columbia. Thus, this attempt to hatch a claim to this river, by discovering it at the head, after we had discovered it at the mouth, entirely failed; and the British were left without a pretext for claiming our property. In this dilemma, McKenzie proposed to make short work of it with the United States: he proposed to seize the river, and to hold it, because it was necessary to the British scheme of trade and domination in that quarter; and to expel all "American adventurers" from it.

This was the proposition of McKenzie; and from that moment the labors of the British Government became systematic and incessant to seize the Columbia. Their first step in this work was to abrogate, or mutilate, the established boundary of the 49th degree of north latitude; for, while that line stood, they could not approach within three degrees of the mouth of the Columbia, which was in 46 degrees. British diplomacy now went to work to destroy this line, at least beyond the Rocky Mountains; and labored indefatigably at it, until they accomplished their design.

Louisiana was acquired in 1803. In the very instant of signing the treaty which brought us that province, another treaty was signed in London, (without a knowledge of what was done in Paris,) fixing, among other things, the line from the Lake of the Woods to the Mississippi. This treaty, signed by Mr. Rufus King and Lord Hawkesbury, was rejected by Mr. Jefferson without reference to the Senate, on account of the fifth article, (which related to the line between the Lake of the Woods and the head of the Mississippi,) for fear it might compromise the northern boundary of Louisiana and the line of 49 degrees. In this negotiation of 1803, the British made no attempt on the line of the 49th degree, because it was not then known to them that we had acquired Louisiana; but Mr. Jefferson, having a knowledge of this acquisition, was determined that nothing should be done to compromise our rights, or to unsettle the boundaries established under the treaty of Utrecht.

Another treaty was negotiated with Great Britain in 1807, between Messrs. Monroe and William Pinckney on one side, and Lords Holland and Auckland on the other. The English were now fully possessed of the fact that we had acquired Louisiana, and became a party to the line of 49 degrees; and they set themselves openly to work to destroy that line. The correspondence of the ministers shows the pertinacity of these attempts; and the instructions of Mr. Adams, in 1818, (when Secretary of State, under Mr. Monroe,) to Messrs. Rush and Gallatin, then in London, charged with negotiating a convention on points left unsettled at Ghent, condense the history of the mutual propositions then made. Finally, an article was agreed upon, in which the British succeeded in mutilating the line, and stopping it at the Rocky Mountains. This treaty of 1807 shared the fate of that of 1803, but for a different reason. It was rejected by Mr. Jefferson, without reference to the Senate, because it did not contain an explicit renunciation of the pretension of impressment!

At Ghent the attempt was renewed: the arrest of the line at the Rocky Mountains was agreed upon, but the British coupled with their proposition a demand for the free navigation of the Mississippi, and access to it through the territories of the United States; and this demand occasioned the whole article to be omitted. The Ghent treaty was signed without any stipulation on the subject of the line along the 49th degree, and that point became a principal object of the ministers charged with completing at London, in 1818, the subjects unfinished at Ghent in 1814. Thus the British were again foiled; but, true to their design, they persevered, and accomplished it in the convention signed at London in 1818. That convention arrested the line at the mountains, and opened the Columbia to the joint occupation of the British; and, being ratified by the United States, it has become binding and obligatory on the country. But it is a point not to be overlooked, or undervalued, in this case, that it was in the year 1818 that this arrestation of the line took place; that up to that period it was in full force in all its extent, and, consequently, in full force to the Pacific Ocean; and a complete bar (leaving out all other barriers) to any British acquisition, by discovery, south of 49 degrees in North America.

The other point in our title, to which I wish to give a little more development than it has received from other speakers, is, its derivation under the treaty with Spain of 1819. By that treaty the United States succeeded to all the rights of Spain on the north-west coast of America north of 42 degrees. These rights, according to the memoir of the Spanish minister Don Onís, extended to the Russian possessions—the British having nothing on that coast! This was the representation of the Spanish minister; and with this, the fact of the case agreed. The Nootka Sound treaty and controversy of 1790 had decided that point! It decided that the British had no right to Nootka, a place four degrees north of the Columbia, and no way connected with it: and it ended in obtaining for the British the privilege, and nothing but the privilege, of fishing and hunting along the north-west coast, and erecting the temporary huts which the pursuit of these occupations might require. Colonization or settlement was renounced. The treaty itself, especially the 8d and the 6th articles, will prove this; and the parliamentary debates of the day correspond with the words of the treaty. As a fact, that treaty nullifies all British claim on the north-west coast; as a law, (if not abrogated by war,) it would still confine them to the pursuit of hunting and fishing. The treaty of 1819, by which we acquired all the Spanish title north of 42°, has given us all the benefits of the Nootka Sound treaty, both as a fact, and as a law; and, tested by either, the British are excluded from the north-west coast of America for all the purposes of settlement or colonization.

Having given this development to our title as derived from the treaties of 1803 and 1819 with France and Spain, Mr. B. proceeded to show the nullity of the British pretensions, and the tortious nature of the possession which they had acquired on the Columbia River. For this purpose he took several positions, and stated them as points which he meant to establish by proof. The first was, that up to the year 1814, the British never pretended to state any claim, or any shadow or color of claim, of any kind whatever, to the Columbia River. The second position was, that in the year 1818 they suggested title under the discoveries of Captain Cook, and under purchases made from Indians south of the Columbia prior to the American revolution; but showed nothing to sustain these empty suggestions. The third position was, that in 1826 they abandoned the title suggestions of 1818, and took refuge, for the first time, under the Nootka Sound treaty; and, in the fourth place, he undertook to show that their possession of the Columbia was intrusive and tortious—a trespass, and a fraud upon the pre-existing possession of the same river; and a wrong and aggression which the Government of the United States should resist and repel.

In support of these positions, Mr. B. read copiously from Mr. Adams's instructions of 1818 to the American ministers in London who negotiated the convention of that year; and from a letter from Mr. John Jacob Astor of

3d Sess.]

Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1848.]

1818 to the Secretary of State, (Mr. Monroe,) to be laid before President Madison. These documents established, as he maintained, all the points he had stated, and showed the nullity and futility, as well as the impudence, of the British pretension.

Having read these extracts from Mr. Adams's letter of instructions of July, 1818, Mr. B. commented upon them to sustain his several positions in relation to the nullity, inconsistency, and bad faith of the British pretension. He particularly relied upon these expressions: "The new pretension of disputing our title to the Columbia River"—"design on their part to encroach by new establishments south of 49 degrees"—"desire to check the progress of our settlements"—"jealousy of the United States"—"affected to apply the indefinite extension of the limit to our territories, and not to those of Great Britain"—"leave a nest-egg for future pretensions south of 49°"—"the Spanish minister claims for Spain to 56°"—"the pretensions of the British Government may, on this occasion, be disclosed"—"we know not precisely what they are." Upon these expressions, and others, Mr. B. relied, and commented, to show that, up to the date of that letter of Mr. Adams, (to wit, July 28th, 1818,) the British had shown or suggested no claim of any kind whatever to any part of the valley of the Columbia; that they were trusting to the arts of diplomacy to generate something which could be hatched into a claim; and that their design was to encroach upon our settlements south of 49°.

This was the state of the question in July, 1818, when the negotiation was commenced in London, which ended in the convention of October of that year, for a ten years' joint possession of all the country west of the Rocky Mountains. The negotiation was conducted by Messrs. Gallatin and Rush, and, of course, was calculated to constrain the British to make a disclosure of the grounds of their pretensions. Mr. Adams had notified them that, on this occasion, the British claim must be disclosed; and disclosed it was! and what a disclosure! Listen to it, as communicated to our Government by Messrs. Gallatin and Rush in their despatch of October 20, 1818. Here it is:

"The British plenipotentiaries asserted that former voyages, and principally that of Captain Cook, gave to Great Britain the rights derived from discovery; and they alluded to purchases from the natives south of the river Columbia, which they alleged to have been made prior to the American revolution."

This was the claim disclosed; and in support of this, not one name, fact, or specification of any kind was submitted. Discovery and purchase was the ground of their pretension. But who discovered, and when, and from whom the purchase was made, the British commissioners could not tell. They did not attempt to tell; but proposed to compromise the question by taking the river for the boundary, and getting the use of the harbor at its mouth. The proposition to this effect is thus stated, in the same despatch, by Messrs. Gallatin and Rush:

"They did not make any formal proposition for a boundary, but intimated that the river itself was the most convenient that could be adopted, and that they would not agree to any that did not give them the harbor at the mouth of the river in common with the United States."

This (said Mr. B.) was their intimation for a boundary; and in this intimation we recognize the precise policy which McKenzie had marked out, and by which the British were to become the masters of the Columbia, and to expel the "American adventurers" from it.

Our commissioners did not agree to this boundary, and to this joint-tenancy in the harbor; but they signed the convention of 1818, according to their instructions, which arrested the line of the 49th degree at the Rocky Mountains, and gave a joint occupation of the country beyond the mountains to both parties. Their instructions authorized them to do this; and the point to be now noted is, that up to the ratification of that convention the line of 49 degrees, as established under the treaty of Utrecht, to define the possessions and limit the acquisitions by discovery of France and Great Britain in North America, remained in full force! That line was in force until we ratified the convention; and, by that line, without regard to other barriers, Great Britain was barred out from all the valley of the Columbia, and all the coast of North America south of 49 degrees. The convention abrogated the line—unhappily abrogated it—from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific Ocean. But it did so with a reservation, that the claims of the parties were not to be affected by it. The abrogation was unfortunate; but the reservation was a stipulation to prevent mischief—a stipulation to baffle the designs of subtle diplomacy, always seeking to deposit the seeds of a new contestation in the simulated settlement of an old one; and it was equivalent to an express declaration that the British claim was to be made no better, and ours to be made no worse, by this arrestation of the line of 49 degrees, and the joint occupation of the Columbia, which resulted from it.

We have now (said Mr. B.) traced the British pretension up to the conclusion of the convention of 1818; and we have seen that, up to the month of July of that year, they had stated or suggested no claim, or even shadow or color of claim, to the Columbia; that, being pressed, they then intimated a claim resting on discovery and purchase, but without stating a single particular by which this pretended discovery and purchase could be brought to the touchstone of proof and reason. They were evidently absurd, and even ridiculous. All the world knows that Capt. Cook never saw the Columbia!—all the world knows that no other British

JANUARY, 1848.]

Oregon Territory.

[27th Conn.]

navigator saw it, until after Capt. Gray showed it to them!—and, as for the Indian purchases south of that river, before the Revolution, it is a story of a man in the moon! and has no name, date, place, sum, sign, trace, circumstance, fact, or supposition to rest upon!

The pretension, then, of this right by discovery, and by purchase, so tardily brought forward in October, 1818, are absurdities which the British could not, and did not, support; and which they have since totally abandoned. This abandonment was made in 1827—at the time when the convention of 1818, being about to expire upon its limitation of ten years—was renewed until one of the parties chose to terminate it by giving twelve months' notice. It was made by Messrs. Huskisson and Addington, in their formal negotiations with Mr. Gallatin for the renewal of the convention of 1818. In that negotiation, they delivered a paper to the American negotiator, in which the British claim to the Columbia is referred—and for the first time referred—to the Nootka Sound convention of 1790! Hear it!

"The rights of Great Britain are recorded and defined in the convention of 1790: they embrace the right to navigate the waters of those countries—to settle in and over any part of them, and to trade with the inhabitants and occupiers of the same. These rights have been peaceably exercised ever since the date of that convention; that is, for a period of nearly forty years. Under that convention, valuable British interests have grown up in that quarter."

Here is a complete abandonment of the claim founded on discovery and purchase before the Revolution! That claim, set up for the first time in 1818, is abandoned in 1827!—and the Nootka Sound convention, which had never been vouched before, is then paraded as the instrument in which the "rights" of Great Britain are "recorded" and "defined;" and under which valuable "British" interests had grown up in that quarter. This is, at least, an admission that the discovery and purchase brought forward as the foundation, and the sole foundation, of the British claim in 1818, were unfounded and supposititious! and not only relieves us from all further attentions to such intimations, but gives us the benefit of a legal maxim, as universal in its application as it is just and reasonable in its principle!—that maxim which discredits the whole title, in support of which an untruth has been adduced.

But the British "right" to the Columbia now rests upon the Nootka Sound convention; since the year of our Lord 1827, their claim to this country has become a "right," and this "right" has established itself in the musty record of the Nootka Sound convention! Be it so! We will quickly see what that convention is worth to them. For that purpose we may look to the convention itself, or to the character of it given in the British House of Commons at the time of its negotiation. The first article of the treaty restored the British to their fishing and hunting privileges and buildings in Nootka Sound. The third article granted the limited privilege of fishing and hunting on certain other parts of the coast; and the sixth article limited the buildings which might be erected to the temporary huts necessary for the hunters and fishermen. This was the treaty. Listen to Mr. Fox. After denouncing the treaty as one of concessions, and not of acquisitions, on the part of Great Britain, he goes on to say:

"Our right before, was to settle in any part of the south or north-west coast of America, not fortified against us by previous occupancy: and we are now restricted to settle in certain places only; and under certain restrictions. This was an important concession on our part."
"Our right of making settlements was not, as now, a right to build huts, but to plant colonies, if we thought proper."

"By the 3d article, we are authorized to navigate the Pacific Ocean and South Seas, unmolested, for the purpose of trading with the natives. But, after this pompous recognition of right to navigation, fishery, and commerce, comes another article, (the sixth,) which takes away the right of landing and erecting even temporary huts, for any purpose but that of carrying on the fishery; and amounts to a complete dereliction of all right to settle in any way for the purpose of commerce with the natives."

This was the language of Mr. Fox; and under this language, Mr. Pitt (the author of the convention) sunk down and admitted that no new rights were gained under the treaty: that nothing had been gained but the acknowledgment of the pre-existing right of fishing, trading, and navigating the Pacific Ocean! Hear him:

"In answer to this, Mr. Pitt maintained that, though what this country had gained consisted of new rights, it certainly did of new advantages. We had before a right to the Southern whale fishery, and a right to navigate and carry on fisheries in the Pacific Ocean, and to trade on the coasts of any part of north-west America; but that right not only had not been acknowledged, but disputed and resisted; whereas by the convention, it was secured to us—a circumstance which, though no new right, was a new advantage."

This (said Mr. B.) is the Nootka Sound treaty, which is now relied upon to establish the British right to the Columbia. Under this treaty they have taken possession of the Columbia, although 500 miles from Nootka, and having no connection with it. Under this treaty a British colony is growing up there; and in protection of this colony, the British now declare their determination to maintain their ground. The same paper from Mr. Huskisson and Mr. Addington, which vouched the Nootka convention for the record and the definition of their "right," proceeds to say:

"Under that convention, valuable British interests have grown up in these countries.
In the interior of the country in question, the sub-

[3d Sess.]

Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1843.]

jects of Great Britain have had for many years settlements and trading posts. Several of these posts are on the tributary streams of the Columbia; several upon the Columbia itself; some to the northward, and others to the southward of that river. And they navigate the Columbia as the sole channel for the conveyance of their produce to the British stations nearest the sea, and for the shipment of it from thence to Great Britain. It is also by the Columbia that these posts and settlements receive their annual supplies from Great Britain.

To the interests and establishments which British industry and enterprise have created, Great Britain owes protection. That protection will be given both as regards SETTLEMENT and FREEDOM OF TRADE AND NAVIGATION, with every attention not to infringe the co-ordinate rights of the United States; it being the desire of the British Government, so long as the joint occupancy continues, to regulate its own obligations by the same rules which govern the obligations of every other occupying party."

Have grown up there, and will be protected! British interests have grown up on the Columbia; and the British Government owes protection to these interests, and will give it! This is now the language of British ministers; and this is what we have got for forty years' forbearance to assert our title! The nest-egg laid by British diplomacy, has undergone incubation, and has hatched, and has produced a full-grown bird—a game cock—which has clapped his wings and crowed defiance in the face of the American eagle! and this poor eagle, if a view could be got of him as he stood during the "informal conferences" between Mr. Webster and Lord Ashburton, would be found (no doubt) to have stuck his head under his wing, and hung out the white and craven feather.

British interests have grown up on both sides of the Columbia—to the south as well as to the north of the river—and it is the intention of the British Government to protect the whole. So say Mr. Huskisson and Mr. Addington. But this is diplomacy—modern diplomacy—equivalent to finesse. The south of the Columbia has not been seized to be retained, but to be given up! The north is to be retained, for that is the commanding bank. The south is only seized to be given up as an equivalent, according to the modern system of compromising, so successfully introduced in the case of Maine. Seize all! then give back half! all this a compromise! and there will be people (for the minds of men are various)—there will be people to applaud the fine arrangement, and to thank God for such a happy deliverance from war. No, sir; no. This is a joke about holding on to the south bank. The settlements made there are for surrender; not for retention. They are made there to be given up as equivalents for what is taken from us on the north; and thus settle the Columbia question according to the precedent of Maine.

But the settlements on the north bank: their protection is no joke. The British mean to hold on to them, for they command the remainder. The Nootka Sound controversy is to have the effect upon us which it could not have upon the Spaniards forty years ago. In vain the lighted match was brandished over the British cannon in the affair of Nootka in 1790; in vain immediate and bloody war was threatened. The Spanish Government, though old, decrepit, and tottering under the feeble sway of Charles IV. and the favorite Godoy, had yet too much of the Castilian blood in it to prefer dishonor to war. They prepared for war! and the British, seeing that the Don could not be bullied, relinquished their high pretensions of colonization and settlement, and accepted the humble privilege of fishing, and hunting, and sailing the high seas. This is the way the old Nootka controversy between Spain and England ended fifty years ago. After the experiment which the British have just made of our peace-loving temper, it is not to be supposed that we shall get out of the new Nootka scrape without seeing the match applied to the priming, or having the cup of dishonor held to our lips until we drink it to the dregs.

They have the possession of the country: while the possession by right, by treaties, and by the admission of the British themselves, belongs to us. This was admitted during the negotiations of 1818. Mr. Rush, in a letter to Mr. Adams of February, 1818, bears testimony to this admission. He says:

"It is proper, at this stage, to say that Lord Castlereagh admitted, in the most ample extent, our right to be reinstated, and to be the party in possession while treating of the title."

This was the admission of Lord Castlereagh while negotiating the convention of 1818. He had admitted our right to be reinstated—that is, to be restored to the possession which we had before the war, and of which war had deprived us. This possession was not limited to the diagram of earth covered by Mr. Astor's fort, but to the country of which it was part. To give up this diagram covered by a fort, and then go and take possession of all the country besides, was not a restitution, no more than it would have been to have taken possession of Michigan after giving up Mackinaw, or of Maine, after giving up Castine. We have a right to the possession, while treating of the title; but we have not the possession; and this bill, which professes merely to obtain a part of what is due to us, is resisted, because it implies the assertion of an exclusive possession, and may be a breach of the convention of 1818. This is a mistake. Exclusive can only be to the extent occupied. The British now have exclusive possession of the ground covered by Fort Vancouver, Fort Colville, and other forts, and of all the ground which they cultivate. They have forts, houses, fields, and farms, and possess them exclusively. Our grants will be no more exclusive than theirs: they will only exclude to the extent of the grant.

The objection to the terms of this bill grow out of the third article of the convention of 1818—that article which gives mutuality of occupancy, for certain purposes, to the country claimed by each party, for ten years; an article which is continued indefinitely by the convention of 1828, subject to determination on one year's notice from either party. It is supposed that that article will prevent us from using our own property as we might have used it before that convention was made. This is a mistake; and the reading of the article itself will show that its object was to give the privileges of hunting, fishing, and navigation to the citizens and subjects of each power over the territories claimed by the other, without diminishing the power of each over the territories claimed by itself. This is clear from the article, which is in these words:

"It is agreed that any country that may be claimed by either party on the north-west coast of America, westward of the Stony Mountains, shall, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open for the term of ten years from the date of the signature of this convention, to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two powers; it being well understood that this agreement is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim which either of the two high contracting parties may have to any part of said country; nor shall it be taken to affect the claims of any other power or State to any part of the said country; the only object of the high contracting parties, in that respect, being to prevent disputes and differences amongst themselves."

This (said Mr. B.) is clear and explicit. We acquire the right of going upon the British claims to hunt, fish, and navigate: they acquire the right to come upon our claims for the same purposes: the claims of each remaining precisely as they were. This is all clear. Now, what were the claims of each at that time? Ours was territorial, and definite and notorious to the Columbia River, from its head to its mouth. The letter of Mr. Adams to our ministers in London, and their letters to him, show that the British had no such claim; that they pretended none such; but only labored to abrogate the line of forty-nine degrees, and to lay a nest-egg for future pretensions south of that line. Their claims were in the north-west—far in the north-west—where McKenzie, Hearne, and other discoverers had gone, and where the fur companies had taken possession. Our claim covered the whole Columbia. Mutuality of occupancy in each other's claimed territories for ten years, without diminution of rights over our own claimed territories, was the extent of the stipulation; and, therefore, we might do upon our claim whatever we did before, subject to the navigation, trade, &c., with which it was encumbered. We might grant land before the convention; we can grant it since. We might plant a colony before the convention, and may do it since; and the grant of land is the incident of colonization. In fact, we have placed no limitation upon our pre-existing rights.

And now, what has been the conduct of the British under this article? They have crossed the 49th degree—come down upon the Columbia—taken possession of it from the head to the mouth—fortified and colonized it—monopolized the fur trade—driven all our traders across the mountains—killed more than a thousand of them, (through their Indians,) and used the Columbia as a free port, through which they bring goods free of duty into our territories—up into the Rocky Mountains, and across them. This is what they have done by their agent, the Hudson Bay Company. In its own name, and by an act of Parliament immediately after the convention, the British Government has extended jurisdiction over the whole country, taking no notice at all of our claims, and subjecting all our citizens and their property to British judges, British courts, and appeals to Canada. This act has been read by my colleague, (Mr. Linn.) and I commend it to the consideration of all Americans who object to this bill for fear it may imply an exclusive jurisdiction! and so give offence to the British. This is what has been done by the British since the convention. They have taken possession of our claimed territory, of our harbor, our river—colonized the country—and killed and expelled our traders. What have we done? Nothing! So far from going into the North-west to hunt, fish, and navigate on their claims, we have been expelled from our own! and the mutual convention has become the means of the exclusive possession of the British! Our traders, left to contend single-handed against the organized Hudson Bay Company, against their Indians, against their free goods, have all been driven in—forced not only out of the valley of the Columbia, but out of the Rocky Mountains—and ruin has overtaken many of them. Even the strong and rich company of Mr. Chouteau can no longer approach the Rocky Mountains. The Hudson Bay traders are the masters there. Every American that approaches that region, does so at the peril of his life. Many were killed there this summer. And, in the face of all this, we sit here, fearing to pass this bill, lest it may give offence to the British.

It is time to terminate this convention of 1818; it is time to terminate the discreditable state of things in relation to the Columbia. It is a war subject, and the peace mission should have terminated it! No earthly consideration should have detached this question from the Maine boundary, and the other subjects of complaint. To separate them, was to surrender all the unsettled questions. The Columbia and the Southern question in relation to slaves, were separated; and in that separation their sacrifice, or a war on account of them, was involved.

3d Sess.]

Fine on General Jackson.

[JANUARY, 1843.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 14.

Fine on General Jackson.

The resolution introduced by Mr. BOWNE, to instruct the Committee on the Judiciary to bring in a bill to refund the fine extorted from General Jackson, at New Orleans, in 1815, by Judge Hall, came up as the business of the morning hour.

The amendment submitted by Mr. ADAMS, to refer the subject with certain instructions to the same committee, being the pending question—

Mr. HUNT said: Having but a brief portion of the morning hour left him, he proposed, as succinctly as possible, to place before the House his own views of the legal grounds on which this case rested; and, in order to do that more intelligibly, he should endeavor to present to the notice of the House the laws bearing on it, exclusive of any opinions of his own. If he succeeded in getting through with the legal question before the expiration of his hour, he should then, with the leave of the House, proceed to give his own opinions on it.

Now, in order to understand the principles which ought to govern this question, he asked the House calmly to consider what it was, laying out of view many of the circumstances which it would be necessary to take into consideration, and which would take from General Jackson all pretence that the proclamation of martial law was indispensable to the preservation of the city he defended, he would present a statement of facts, according to dates, which it would be important to consider in coming to a decision on this question. The battle of New Orleans, as was known to all, was fought on the 8th of January, 1815; and, on the 8d of March following, an article appeared in the New Orleans Courier, signed "A Citizen of Louisiana, of French origin," and which article was written by a Mr. Louallier. On the 5th of March, Louallier was arrested by order of General Jackson; and, on the same day, application was made to Judge Hall, the district judge of Louisiana, for a writ of habeas corpus in his favor. The order was issued by the judge; and in issuing it, the writ was made returnable on Monday, the 6th. The Judge dated the order on the 6th. It was ascertained, before the writ was issued, or before it passed out of his control, that there was a mistake; and the Judge was called on to correct it, which was done by dating it the 6th. On the evening of that day the counsel of Louallier, at the suggestion of Judge Hall, apprised General Jackson of these proceedings, and that a writ of habeas corpus had been issued. On that day Judge Hall himself was arrested by General Jackson's order; and, on the morning of the 7th, before breakfast, a court-martial was appointed to sit on the life of Louallier. Judge Hall was kept in confinement from the 5th to the 11th or 12th, and then taken by a guard of regular soldiers without the limits of the city, and discharged. Gentlemen would find the truth of this statement in Senate Doc. No. 14 of the present session.

Now, the first question he wished to ask was this: had General Jackson any authority to declare martial law? He wished to meet this broad question, because he thought the time had arrived when it should be settled, while they could do it, instead of transferring it to posterity, when it would be more difficult of settlement. Had, then, General Jackson, or had any military officer, even in time of war, the right to proclaim martial law, and to suspend the civil proceedings of the tribunals of the country? It was important to answer this question; otherwise, it might become a precedent of the most dangerous import hereafter. He undertook to show that neither General Jackson nor any other military officer had any such authority, (and on this point he thought the country was much indebted to a writer who had been often quoted on this floor, in opposition to the right to such authority of any military power;) but he did not contend that, in time of war, a military commander might not find himself placed in circumstances as described by a gentleman from Kentucky, who had preceded him in this debate, in which an overruling necessity might compel him to invade the rights of property and of persons; but of that necessity such officer must judge, and act at his peril. He admitted that the necessity might exist for a commander to burn houses and take property; but the Government would be under the necessity of making compensation for property so destroyed or taken; and as it was overruling necessity that afforded the law for such procedure, there was not—there could not be—any provision made for it by law in advance. In illustration of this position, he showed that compensation was made for property destroyed in the defence of Baltimore.

He next quoted the 9th section of the 1st article of the constitution, which provides that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it;" and he asked who was to be the judge of that necessity? Was it the President of the United States, or any subordinate officer in command? No; it was the Legislature of the country that was the judge, and the only judge, of that necessity. He supported this position by citing the practice of Mr. Jefferson, who in 1807, as President of the United States, applied to Congress for a temporary suspension of the writ of habeas corpus for three months; which, however, was refused by the House of Representatives, where the bill was defeated, which had passed the Senate for that purpose. Where, then, was the authority found by which General Jackson proclaimed martial law? It was certainly not in the constitution; for he found no countenance for the exercise of it there; nor yet in the History of England,

JANUARY, 1848.]

The Bankrupt Law.

[27th CONG.]

whence the habeas corpus, as well as the principles of freedom, on which our system is based, was derived. The habeas corpus was one of the boons which the sturdy barons wrested from King John at Runnymede; and when had there been any attempt to suspend it there? Besides, eminent legal authority had distinctly stated that the doctrine of military or martial law, as laid down in Blackstone and Holt, had no application to England; and surely the inhabitants of this country ought to have as great protection for life and property, as was enjoyed there under that law.

The SPEAKER here announced that the morning hour had expired.

MONDAY, JANUARY 16.

The Bankrupt Law.

Mr. CLIFFORD inquired if this was not resolution day, and if resolutions were not in order from the State of Maine. As the Speaker was understood to assent, he offered a resolution to the effect that the Judiciary Committee be instructed to report forthwith the following bill to repeal the bankrupt act. [The bill referred to in the resolution simply provided that the bankrupt law "be, and the same is, hereby repealed."]

Mr. ARNOLD objected to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. TOLAND was also understood to urge some objection.

Mr. WINTHROP rose to a point of order; and inquired whether it was in order to introduce a resolution instructing a committee on a subject pending in the House.

Mr. CLIFFORD replied that this was a separate bill altogether, and essentially different from any other before the House.

The SPEAKER overruled all the objections which had been raised.

Mr. CLIFFORD moved the previous question on his resolution.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. CLIFFORD called for the yeas and nays; which being ordered, resulted as follows—yeas 81, nays 110.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The question then recurred on seconding the previous question.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for tellers, and Messrs. O. JOHNSON and JAMES were appointed; and, having taken the vote, they reported 91 in the affirmative, and 79 in the negative.

So the motion for the previous question was seconded.

The question recurred, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. BARNARD called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted—yeas 115, nays 88.

So the House ordered the main question to be now put.

The question was then taken on the resolution of Mr. CLIFFORD; and the yeas and nays having been ordered, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Landaff W. Andrews, Arrington, Atherton, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Black, Boardman, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Bronson, Aaron V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, William Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Cary, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Colquhoun, M. A. Cooper, Cross, Daniel, Garrett Davis, Richard D. Davis, Dean, Deberry, Doig, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Egbert, Ferris, John G. Floyd, G. A. Floyd, A. Lawrence Foster, Gentry, Gilmer, Goggin, Wm. O. Goode, Gordon, Green, Gustine, Gwin, Harris, Hastings, Holmes, Hopkins, Houch, Houston, Hubbard, Hunter, Jack, Cave Johnson, Keim, Andrew Kennedy, Lewis, Littlefield, Lowell, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKenna, McKeon, Mallory, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, Mathews, Mattocks, Medill, Miller, Mitchell, Morris, Newhard, Oliver, Owsley, Parmenter, Partridge, Payne, Pickens, Plumer, Pope, Proffit, Ramey, Read, Reding, Rencher, Reynolds, Riggs, Rogers, Roosevelt, Sanford, Saunders, Sewell, Shaw, Sheperd, Shields, Wm. Smith, Snyder, Sprigg, Stearod, Stokeley, Alex. H. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Summers, Sweney, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Triplett, Trotti, Truney, Ward, Washington, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, Wise, and Wood—128.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Baker, Barnard, Blair, Borden, Briggs, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burch, Calhoun, Childs, Staley N. Clarke, Cowen, Craven, Cravens, Cushing, Dawson, John Edwards, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, Gates, Giddings, Patrick G. Goode, Granger, Halsted, Henry, Howard, Hubert, Hunt, Charles J. Ingersoll, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irwin, James, Wm. Coet Johnson, John P. Kennedy, King, Lane, Linn, Thomas F. Marshall, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Maxwell, Maynard, Mow, Morgan, Osborne, Pearce, Pendleton, Powell, Benjamin Randall, Randolph, Ridgway, Rodney W. Russell, James M. Russell, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stratton, Richard W. Thompson, Toland, Tomlinson, Trumbull, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Warren, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Winthrop, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—78.

Mr. BARNARD rose for the purpose of asking some directions from the Speaker, or the House in regard to his duty in this matter. He understood the House as having passed an order that the Committee on the Judiciary should bring in a bill forthwith to repeal the bankrupt law; but there was a standing rule of the House conflicting with this order, which provided that no committee should hold its meetings while the House was in session. He wished to know how he was to act, so as to avoid a breach of one or the other of these rules.

Mr. WISE said that, in order to relieve the gentleman from New York of the difficulty he had suggested, he would move that the Committee on the Judiciary have leave to sit during the sittings of the House, till they had performed the duty assigned them.

2d Sess.]

Repeal of the Bankrupt Law.

[JANUARY, 1843.]

Mr. BARNARD. Is that motion in order, Mr. Speaker? If it is not, I shall object to it.

The SPEAKER said that the motion was not in order; and

Mr. WISE appealed from that decision. He would appeal to the House if, after the vote just given, it was not the duty of the Committee on the Judiciary to report the bill "forthwith."

Mr. THOMPSON, of Indiana, moved to lay the appeal on the table; and

Mr. CLIFFORD called for the yeas and nays on that question; which were also ordered.

The question was then taken on laying the appeal on the table, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 104, nays 91.

The SPEAKER continued the call for resolutions from the State of Maine.

Mr. LOWELL offered a resolution to authorize the Committee on the Judiciary to sit during the session of the House, for the purpose of taking the necessary steps to comply with the resolution of the House directing them to report a bill "forthwith" for the repeal of the bankrupt law. He also moved the previous question.

Mr. R. W. THOMPSON moved to lay the resolution on the table. [Loud cries of "The yeas and nays."]

Mr. FILLMORE hoped the gentleman from Maine would withdraw his resolution, as the whole subject would certainly require some discussion.

Mr. LOWELL did not comply, and the yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted as follows—yeas 87, nays 105.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The question then recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Messrs. READ and POPE were appointed tellers; and they reported 81 in the affirmative, and 79 in the negative; so there was a second.

The main question was then ordered to be now put; and the resolution was adopted by a vote of yeas 112, nays 81.

TUESDAY, January 17.

Repeal of the Bankrupt Law.

Mr. BARNARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following bill:

A BILL to repeal the bankrupt law.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved on the 19th day of August, 1841, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Provided, however, That the repeal shall not extend to or affect any case which, at the time this act goes into effect, shall be pending before any court; nor to any proceeding which, at said time, shall have been legally commenced, and which shall be then in progress, under and by virtue of the said act hereby repealed.

The bill was read a first time.

Mr. BARNARD objected to its second reading, which he said he could do under the rule, which forbade the second reading of a bill on the same day it was reported, unless no objection was made.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said that the second reading of the bill having been objected to, the question would come up before the House, "Shall this bill be rejected?"

Mr. CLIFFORD remarked that the parliamentary law was imperative in requiring the question to be taken on the rejection of the bill, after the objection made to its second reading by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. BARNARD.)

The SPEAKER said that, by reference to the 109th rule of the House, he found that, if objection was made to the first reading of the bill, the question would then ensue upon its rejection. By that rule, no bill could have its first and second reading on the same day, without a special order from the House.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON. Let us make it the special order now.

The SPEAKER said that he was clearly of opinion that the House had the right to order the bill to be read a second time now.

The bill was then read the second time; when

Mr. TURNER rose, and said that he wished to offer an amendment to the bill; but,

Mr. BARNARD rising, the Speaker awarded the floor to that gentleman.

Mr. B. then, under instructions from the Committee on the Judiciary, moved to recommend the bill to that committee, with instructions to report amendments.

Mr. WISE then asked what would be the effect of the previous question.

The SPEAKER was understood to say that it would bring the House to a vote on the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. WISE inquired whether it would cut off the proviso.

The SPEAKER replied in the negative.

Mr. WISE. Then I move the previous question. I am in favor of the proviso. [Great excitement.]

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Speaker, if this motion—

Mr. WISE (amidst much confusion). Mr. Speaker, is this in order?

The SPEAKER replied, but his voice was overpowered by the hum of excited conversation throughout the hall.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I cannot hear a word. [Great confusion.]

Mr. BARNARD. If this motion had been made in the ordinary way—

Mr. WISE again interposed, and exclaimed that he could not hear a word that was said.

The SPEAKER called the House to order.

Mr. BARNARD then resumed, and said if this motion had been made in the ordinary way, on the commitment of the bill, and the previous question was sustained, he was aware it would bring the House directly to a vote on the main proposition; but the Speaker would remember that the motion was not made by him as an individual member of the House, but as the organ of the Judiciary Committee, and in the form and shape of a report from that committee; and in such a case, he submitted, the rule did not apply; and that if the previous question was seconded, the vote must first be taken on the report of the Judiciary Committee.

The SPEAKER's reply did not reach the reporter's desk.

Mr. BARNARD inquired whether the House could cut off the report of a committee.

The SPEAKER replied that it was for a majority of the House to determine.

Mr. WISE asked the Clerk to read the bill as it would stand if the previous question was seconded.

The Clerk read the bill, as submitted yesterday by Mr. CLIFFORD, simply repealing the bankrupt law, with the proviso submitted by Mr. TILLINGHAST.

Mr. WISE said he would stick to the previous question.

The Speaker put the question on seconding the demand for the previous question, but he was unable to decide. Tellers were then demanded, and Messrs. WELLER and BRIGES were appointed; and having taken the vote, they reported 92 in the affirmative, and 88 in the negative. There was, therefore, a second.

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Speaker, has the morning hour expired? (It was 10 minutes past 1.)

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. BARNARD. Then I call for the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER. The order of the day is the further consideration of the bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law. [Roars of laughter.]

[This bill, which was now the order of the day, was the bill some time since introduced by Mr. EVERETT, to which various amendments had been offered, and on which Mr. MARSHALL was entitled to the floor from the middle of last week.]

And the state of the question was this:

Mr. BARNARD had moved the following amendment to (or substitute for) the original bill:

"That so much of the act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved on the 19th of August, 1841, as authorizing any person owing debts to apply by petition, for the benefit of said act, together with all the parts of said act which are applicable solely to the mode of obtaining the benefit of the provisions of such act, in behalf of debtors, by the voluntary petition of such debtors, without the concurrence or aid of their creditors, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That this act shall not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy already commenced, or which shall be commenced before the 4th day of July next, or any pains, penalties, or forfeitures, prescribed and incurred, or which shall be incurred, under said act."

And Mr. CUSHING had offered the following amendment to the original bill:

"In the proviso of the original bill, strike out the '5th day of December, 1842,' &c., and insert so that the proviso shall read as follows. 'Provided, That this act shall not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy commenced before the passage of this act, or any pains, penalties, or forfeitures incurred under this said act; but every such proceeding may be continued to its final consummation, in like manner as if this act had not been passed.'"

Mr. BRIGES had moved that the bill be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the following instructions:

"To report a bill to repeal that part of the existing law which authorizes the voluntary application of debtors, and to include corporations which issue paper to circulate as money, within the operation of said law."

Which proposed instructions Mr. C. JOHNS had moved to amend, so as to instruct the committee to report a bill for the immediate repeal of the bankrupt law, without limit or qualifications; [simply, in fact, striking out the proviso of the original bill of Mr. EVERETT.]

Mr. MARSHALL rose, and said he would not be responsible for any delay of the action of this House on the subject of the bankrupt law; and he moved the previous question.

Mr. CUSHING protested against the motion.

Mr. WISE inquired, if the previous question was sustained, and the main question was ordered to be put, and the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CUMING) should be adopted, whether the bill would not then be, in substance, the same as the bill to be acted upon to-morrow morning?

Mr. CUSHING. Precisely.

Some conversation ensued as to the priority of the amendments; and Tellers were demanded on seconding the motion for the previous question; and they reported 110 in the affirmative, and 88 in the negative; there was, therefore, a second.

The question recurred on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. CUMING.)

The amendment was then adopted—yeas 143, nays 62.

The question next came up upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York (Mr. BARNARD.)

Mr. MOORE asked for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The amendment was then rejected—yeas 71, nays 186.

The SPEAKER announced the question to be upon the engrossment of the bill; and it was ordered to be engrossed.

The CHAIR. When shall the bill have its third reading?

Many members. "Now."

Mr. ARNOLD rose and objected, upon the ground that the bill was not yet engrossed.

The SPEAKER said that the bill must go

3d Sess.]

The Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1848.]

over until to-morrow, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the bill be read again to-day.

The SPEAKER said that the bill not being engrossed, that could not be done but by general consent.

Mr. HOPKINS said that it could be done by order of the House.

Mr. EVERETT moved a suspension of the rule.

The question was then put on the suspension of the rules—and decided in the affirmative—yeas 143, nays 28.

Mr. GRANGER called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; which being ordered,

It was read the third time and passed, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Landaff W. Andrews, Arrington, Atherton, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Black, Boardman, Botta, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Bronson, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, W. Butler, W. O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, P. C. Caldwell, William L. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Cary, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Cowen, Daniel, Garrett Davis, Richard D. Davis, Dean, Deery, Doan, Doig, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Egbert, Everett, Ferris, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Gentry, Gerry, Gilmer, Goggin, Patrick G. Goode, William O. Goode, Gordon, Gram, Green, Gustine, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubard, Hudson, Hunter, Charles J. Ingersoll, Jack, Cave Johnson, Keim, Andrew Kennedy, Lewis, Littlefield, Lowell, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKenan, McKeon, Mallory, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, Thomas F. Marshall, Mathews, Matlocks, Medill, Mitchell, Morris, Newhard, Oliver, Osborne, Owsley, Parmenter, Partridge, Pickens, Plumer, Pope, Proft, Ramsay, Rayner, Read, Reding, Rencher, Reynolds, Rhett, Riggs, Roosevelt, Sanford, Sewell, Shaw, Shepperd, Shields, Slade, Truman Smith, Snyder, Sprigg, Stanly, Steenrod, Stokely, Alexander H. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Summers, Sumter, Wency, Tallafarro, John B. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Triplett, Trottil, Trumbull, Underwood, Van Buren, Ward, Washington, Waterson, Weller, Westbrook, Wise, Wood, and Augustus Young—140.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Ayer, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Jordan, Briggs, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Childs, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, Cranston, Cravens, Cushing, John Edwards, Essenden, Fillmore, Gates, Granger, Henry, Howard, Hunt, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, William W. Irwin, James, William Cost Johnson, Isaac L. Jones, John P. Kennedy, King, Lane, Linn, Amson Mason, Mathiot, Maxwell, Maynard, Meriether, Moore, Morgan, Morrow, Pearce, Pendleton, Powell, Benjamin Randall, Randolph, Ridgway, Rodney, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonall, Stratton, Richard W. Thompson, Toland, Omlinson, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Warren, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Thomas W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Winthrop, Yorks, and John Young—71.

So the bill was passed.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 18.

The Oregon Territory.

The CHAIR announced the order of the day to be the unfinished debate on the passage of the bill for the settlement and occupation of the Territory of Oregon.

Mr. CHOATE, being entitled to the floor, addressed the Senate for nearly two hours. The two main topics upon which he dwelt, were: first, the question of the proposed grant of lands to settlers, as an infraction of the convention between this country and Great Britain, established for ten years in 1818, and renewed in 1827, to continue from year to year until discontinued by a year's notice from either party; and next, the question of the settlement of other difficulties with England by the late treaty, without also settling that in relation to the Oregon Territory.

In the course of his remarks, he stated that his only objection to the bill was in relation to the provision making a grant of lands. If it was recommitted, and that provision was stricken out, the rest of the bill should have his hearty concurrence. Even if the bill remained in its present shape, and it could be satisfactorily proved to him that this provision, which proposes a grant of land to settlers, is not an infraction of the treaty, he would give it his support. He would go further; he would say, that if the year's notice were given of our intention to relinquish the treaty with Great Britain, he would, after the cessation of our obligations under it, most cheerfully support a bill of this kind. But he conceived the whole question, at present, was, whether this bill, in its present form, would not be a violation of our obligations under the treaty; and that it would, he had not now the slightest doubt.

Here Mr. C. went into an examination of the terms of the treaty, with a view of showing that the only occupation or settlement which could take place in good faith, was a joint occupation and settlement for purposes of trade, hunting, and trapping; and that Great Britain never had in any single instance otherwise interpreted the treaty, or acted upon it. Her encouragement of the Hudson Bay Company was for purposes of trade and hunting, strictly in conformity with the treaty. If the company had built forts and made settlements, it was in furtherance of the objects of trade, and carrying on the trapping and hunting in which it was engaged. It was perfectly open to us, under the treaty, to do the same. He denied that England had extended over the country an exclusive jurisdiction. She only applied her own laws to her own subjects. We might do the same. If it could be shown that she ever granted away a single acre of the territory, or exercised an exclusive right of that kind, he would then say that we might do the same. But no such thing could be shown, for it had not been done.

As to the allegations that England, in a communication with the ministers of our Government, had said that British interests had grown up in the territory which should and would be protected, he contended, that taking the whole context, and giving what followed in the sentence, so far from this being an assertion of exclusive right, or a threat of possession against the United States, the most direct reservation was made of the rights of the United States to joint occupation and interest in the territory under the treaty, by which both countries were bound. He read the passage in full, with a view of showing the correctness of his view of the avowal made by England.

In commenting upon the speech of the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) who had preceded him in the discussion when the subject was last up, he took occasion to remove an erroneous impression, which he conceived was calculated to do great injustice to a distinguished man, (Mr. WEBSTER,) who could not here defend himself. He alluded to the fears expressed by the Senator from Missouri, that the President's Message declining to furnish the correspondence, or informal communications, relative to the pending negotiation about the Oregon Territory, implied grounds for concluding that propositions had been made by our Secretary of State, which the Administration was ashamed or afraid to avow; that, in fact, the rumor must be correct which had got abroad, that a proposition had been made or entertained, by the Secretary of State, to settle down upon the Columbia River as the boundary line. Now, he was glad to have it in his power to undeceive the Senator, and to assure him, which he did from authority—for he had been requested by the Secretary himself to do it for him—that he never either made or entertained a proposition to admit of any line south of the 49th parallel of latitude, as a negotiable boundary line for the territory of the United States.

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 24.

Oregon Territory.

The bill for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon came up on its passage, as the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. WOODBURY, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the Senate at considerable length in support of the bill.

He considered the Oregon Territory as uncontestedly ours, as any other of our possessions. There was no more reason against our occupying it, than there could have been against our exercising jurisdiction over Iowa or Wisconsin when we placed them under our territorial government. There could be only one of two objections to our exercising the same ownership—one of which was, that we entertained some doubt of our title; and the other, that it may be inexpedient to exercise our undoubted right.

To neither of these reasons could he accede. Indeed, so far as regards the first, he was glad to find that there was not a single member of the Senate who seemed to entertain the slightest doubt of our just title to the entire of the territory. All contend that our right to all we claim is indefeasible. Why, then, should there be any hesitation about exercising our ownership over the territory? The dispute between us and England never can be about that; for she does not profess to deny our right to territory. She may reasonably confine us to the letter of the existing treaty; but, in doing this, she is necessarily bound to show that she conforms strictly to it herself. If she gives it a construction which we hitherto have not given to it, she can have no just cause of complaint should we adopt her construction. But in truth, that treaty can neither give nor withhold rights of territory, and the exercise of sovereignty; for it is expressly limited to a specific purpose—that of securing, during its continuance, the free and open intercourse of the citizens of one of the contracting parties and subjects of the other, for purposes of trade and commerce, leaving the rights of the respective parties untouched. As, then, England gains no right over our portion of the territory but that of freedom to trade, like that of our own citizens—for which she concedes an equivalent right to our citizens over her portion of territory, if she has any—what other country can dispute our exercise of jurisdiction? Not France, for she sold to us all possible claim she could have derived; not Spain, for her title is transferred to us; and certainly not Russia, for we do not propose to encroach upon her southern boundary beyond the 54th degree of northern latitude. No other country under heaven can have any pretension to our territory; and we have seen that the existing treaty with England, so far from giving her any, expressly stipulates that its obligations shall not be construed in any manner to affect title. If she was not conscious that she could set up no claim of her own, she would not endeavor to make the world believe that her object is, in contending for the narrow strip of land really in dispute north of the Columbia River, merely to keep open, for the benefit of all nations, a free port at the mouth of that river. And even this she did not think of till we made a settlement there. This is not the first time she has interfered to prevent enterprises for the advancement of our commerce. Mr. W. here mentioned several instances of like interference.

The question is, what are our rights? We derive them either by purchase, discovery, or by treaty. If she has any, she must show as good a title, or yield that ours is superior; and this sets at rest her claim. She did not purchase the undoubted title of Spain to all her rights on the North-west coast, as we did; she did not discover the Columbia River, as we did; and

3D SESS.]

The Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1848.]

with regard to treaties, it has been shown, over and over again, that she acquired no right to soil or territory under any one to which she has been a party. There is nothing of the kind in her treaty with Russia, in her treaty with Spain, or in her treaty with ourselves. In no one of these treaties has she gained an iota of claim to soil or territory. She is granted nothing but a joint use of the right to fish, hunt, trade, or navigate.

There is not a word in the treaty of 1818 about joint occupation or settlement. We do not look to that treaty for our right to occupy or to settle our territory of Oregon. We stand upon our incontestable title. Neither can she derive from it what it does not directly or indirectly mention. It is merely a treaty of trade and commerce, to be free and open to the subjects and citizens of the two powers. We might sign a treaty to-morrow, giving England an equal right with our own citizens to free trade with the port of New York, but who could be so absurd as to contend that we thereby conveyed to her a joint occupancy and joint right of settlement on the soil and territory of New York to the defeasement of our own title?

By the treaty of 1818, renewed in 1827, the citizens and subjects of both powers are undoubtedly entitled to a free and open exercise of intercourse for purposes of trade and commerce. On our part, we refrain from exacting duties on goods belonging to British subjects found on our territory; and England guarantees the same with respect to our citizens on territory claimed by her. This is the true, and only true, meaning and spirit of the treaty.

Mr. W. here entered upon a critical examination of the treaty of 1818, and its renewal in 1827, showing that no other construction could be put upon the wording of both, than that which he had given. In confirmation of this, he cited various passages in the communications from the British ministers in every convention or negotiation held with them from the time of the treaty of 1818, to the time that the renewal of the charter of the Hudson Bay Company gave a new impetus to its encroachments, and induced it to seek a pledge from the British Government for the protection of any interests which might grow up in its settlement. At the time of negotiating the renewal of the treaty of 1818, in 1826, the very propositions for additional stipulations which the British minister made, show that England never did construe the treaty as reaching to any thing but trade and commerce; and the refusal of our negotiators to admit those additional stipulations showed that we peremptorily refused to grant the right of joint occupation and settlement.

Mr. W. here quoted in full the various propositions alluded to, and conclusively established his position from concurrent testimony.

It was clear, then, that, in carrying out the provisions of this bill, we would in no wise interfere or act in conflict with our obligations by treaty, so long as we take care not to interrupt the right of British subjects to the free and open pursuits of objects of trade and commerce. The question, then, was narrowed down into a very small compass. There can be no doubt of our right to the territory: on that, all were agreed. The treaty cannot restrain us from the exercise of that right, for it has no bearing whatever upon it; and, therefore, the remaining thing to be settled is the question of expediency. That, too, he conceived, now admitted of no doubt.

That it is expedient to go as far at present as this bill proposes to go, he was perfectly satisfied—satisfied that, in doing so, we would not only give no just grounds of complaint to Great Britain, but that it would be the means of preventing future and more formidable, because more accumulated, causes of difficulty with that Government. But, independent of this consideration, there was another, which he thought imperative; and it was, that our citizens, who have cast their fortunes in the territory, claim our protection, and it is our duty to grant it. It is the duty of the United States to protect our citizens in their lawful pursuits on every portion of our territory, no matter how remote or inconvenient from the nucleus of Government. It is the duty of Congress to extend its territorial laws for the benefit of those remotely settled citizens.

It is especially expedient that all this should be done now, and quickly; seeing that the longer neglect of fulfilling this duty is laid hold of by a rival power as a ground for enlarging and strengthening pretensions which never could have arisen, had we made a timely effort to secure our rights from cavil. Besides the duty which binds us to protect our citizens in this territory, we owe it to our commercial interest, in distant seas, to provide for them a harbor of shelter, such as the Columbia alone affords, on the North-west coast. Our fleet stationed in the Pacific, for the protection of our commerce, is entitled to the facilities which we should create there for re-equipment, refitting, and re-victualling. We should have a fort there, which would serve them as a naval station, with our citizens around it ready at all times to make a market with their productions for the wants of our marine service in that distant quarter. England could not be jealous of this, for she has done the same thing. And, independent of all these considerations, there is another class of beings to whom we owe obligations which it is our duty to fulfil. He alluded to the aborigines of the territory. It is our duty to extend to them protection, and there is abundant evidence that they stand in need of it. It is our duty to introduce among them the arts of civilization, and the lights of the gospel. In no other way can we so well, so effectually, and so cheaply fulfil all these duties, as by carrying out the provisions of this bill.

Mr. PHELPS remarked that, as a member of the committee which reported the bill, he concurred in the general views taken by the committee; and in respect to the general conditions involved in the bill, he believed the committee were unanimously in favor of them. With the views of Senators he had nothing to say; but he felt it his duty, as a member of the committee, to vindicate the bill from the charge that its provisions came in conflict with the convention made between this Government and Great Britain for the joint occupation of the Territory of Oregon. He would only say that, if such was the effect of the bill, it departed very widely from the purposes of the committee in agreeing to it. There was nothing further from their purpose than to involve this country in a difficulty with the most powerful nation on the globe, by a violation of the rights of that nation under the convention alluded to. He was confident that the bill, as it stood under the new modification, did not conflict with that convention, but was in conformity with the construction Great Britain herself put upon its provisions.

JANUARY, 1848.]

The Oregon Territory.

[27th CONG.]

As the bill came from the committee, it provided that one section of 640 acres of land should be given to each white male inhabitant who might settle in that territory; but, under the new modification, it provided that provision shall be made by law for the granting of 640 acres to each settler. The provision, as it stood, made the grant of land; but the modification says that provision shall be made by law to grant it. The modification, he conceived, made no difference; for the principle at the back of it was the same. The great question, and only question, was, whether the bill came in conflict with the convention or agreement between the two countries. He believed that it was perfectly harmonious with the convention, if they put upon that convention the construction which the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. WOODBURY) showed had been placed upon it by England herself—as that of a commercial treaty only. If it did even extend so far as to prohibit the settlement of the country at all, the bill did not conflict with the convention, because it proceeded on the principle of a prospective settlement—of holding out inducements merely to our citizens to settle there. Great Britain could have nothing to do with it, even under the latter construction, until the act was carried into effect—that is, by hereafter making the grant which was guaranteed in the bill. The bill only holds out the inducement to our citizens to go and make settlements, but not to take exclusive and permanent possession of the country. The bill could not be made a subject of complaint by Great Britain, until the grant of land was actually made, and the country taken possession of, or the citizens occupying lands under title from the United States came in conflict with British subjects. There was a stronger ground still. The question raised was, as to the purport of the convention of 1818—how far did it permit citizens of this country to occupy that territory. The provisions of the convention were, simply, that any portion of the country claimed by either of the parties to the convention should, from the signing of that convention, be free and open to the subjects and citizens of both Governments; and that its provisions should not be construed to prejudice any claim of this country, or right to the territory. The joint occupation was not, in terms, for purposes of trade, or for purposes of settlement. The convention was general; and whether it allowed of permanent settlements in the country, or not, was a question of construction. If England complains of the action of Congress, it must be on the ground that we misunderstand the construction of that convention. If we follow the construction given to it by her, there can be no question as to the propriety of the passage of this bill. Mr. P. then cited from the law of Parliament resting on the convention, in favor of the Hudson Bay Company, a provision to the effect that nothing in that act should be construed to allow any body corporate to make grants, or to exercise the rights of trade with the Indians, to the exclusion of citizens of the United States of America. He then quoted further provisions of the law, which went conclusively to prove that the treaty was one of trade and commerce with the Indians merely, and that the rights of the United States were scrupulously guarded. He then quoted other provisions of the act of Parliament extending the laws of Canada over the portions of that territory at the disposal of the Hudson Bay Company, as a justification of the provision of this bill which authorized the courts of the United States to extend their jurisdiction over the American settlements in that territory.

Mr. P. then went on to say that the promise of a provision hereafter, by Congress, of a grant of lands to settlers, is of the same nature as our pre-emption rights allowed in the States and Territories of the United States. It is not necessary that the grant of lands should precede the occupancy. Our system has been to permit the occupancy first, giving a pre-emption right which is to secure the possession afterwards. The provision of this bill would act in like manner. It would be viewed in the light of a pre-emption right to such portion of territory as should belong to us.

It is not necessary for England to make such a law for the encouragement of her settlers. No one but the Crown can dispute title with them. The mere possession and continued occupancy is sufficient title to insure the grant from the Crown at some future time, and is relied upon as safely as if secured by act of Parliament. The subjects of Great Britain already have this possession and occupancy; and to place our citizens on an equal footing, it is indispensable that we give them the assurance which this bill proposes—which is the mode in which we always secure settlers in our new territories.

No man in the Senate was more opposed to war than he was. He knew that peace was

3D SESS.]

The Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1848.]

essential to the interests of this country. He knew that it suited best with the habits and pursuits of our people. He could not, therefore, lightly advocate any thing calculated to produce collision with a foreign power. But, although he would not wantonly enter into conflict, he could not, to shun it, give countenance to an act so absurd as that of a mere idle assertion of our rights without an accompanying and absolutely necessary provision for exercising them.

Mr. CALHOUN said it ought to be borne in mind, in the discussion of this measure, that there is a conflict between our claim and that of Great Britain to the Oregon Territory; and that it extends to the whole territory from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific Ocean; and from the northern limits of Mexico, in latitude 42, to the southern limits of the Russian possessions, in latitude 54. Nor ought it to be forgotten that the two Governments have made frequent attempts to adjust their conflicting claims, but, as yet, without success. The first of these was made in 1818. It proved abortive; but a convention was entered into, which provided that the territory should be left free and open to our citizens and the subjects of Great Britain for ten years; the object of which was to prevent collision and preserve peace, till their respective claims could be adjusted by negotiation. The next was made in 1824, when we offered to limit our claim to the territory by the 49th degree of latitude; which would have left to Great Britain all north of that latitude to the southern boundary of Russia. Her negotiator objected, and proposed the Columbia River as the boundary between the possessions of the two countries. It enters the ocean about the 46th degree of latitude. It follows, that the portion of the territory really in dispute between the two countries is about three degrees of latitude—that is, about one-fourth of the whole. The attempt to adjust boundaries again failed, and nothing was effected. I learn from our negotiator, (a distinguished citizen of Pennsylvania, now in the city,) that the negotiation was conducted with much earnestness, and not a little feeling, on the part of the British negotiators.

In 1827, just before the termination of the ten years, another attempt was made at an adjustment. The negotiation was conducted on our part by Mr. Gallatin. The whole subject was discussed fully, and with great ability and clearness on both sides; but, like the two preceding, failed to adjust the conflicting claims. The same offers were made respectively by the parties that were, in 1824, and again rejected. All that could be done was to renew the convention of 1818; but with the provision, that each party might, at its pleasure, terminate the agreement, by giving a year's notice. The object of the renewal was, as in 1818, to preserve peace for the time, by preventing either party from asserting its exclusive claim to the territory; and that of the insertion of the provision, to give either party the right of doing so whenever it might think proper, by giving the stipulated notice.

Nor ought it to be forgotten, that, during the long interval from 1818 to this time, continued efforts have been made, in this and the other House, to induce Congress to assert, by some act, our exclusive right to the territory; and that they have all heretofore failed. It now remains to be seen whether this bill, which covers the whole territory, as well north as south of the 49th, and provides for granting land, and commencing systematically the work of colonization and settlement, shall share the fate of its predecessors.

To determine whether it ought or ought not, involves the decision of two preliminary questions. The first is, whether the time has now arrived when it would be expedient on our part to attempt to assert and maintain our exclusive claim to the territory, against the adverse claim of Great Britain; and the other, if it has, whether the mode proposed in this bill is the proper one.

In discussing them, I do not intend to involve the question of our right to the territory, nor its value, nor whether Great Britain is actuated by that keen, jealous, and hostile spirit towards us, which has been attributed to her in this discussion. I shall, on the contrary, assume our title to be as valid as the warmest advocate of this bill asserts it to be; the territory to be, as to soil, climate, production, and commercial advantages, all that the ardent imagination of the author of the measure paints it to be; and Great Britain to be as formidable and jealous as she has been represented.

I make no issue on either of these points. I controvert none of them. According to my view of the subject, it is not necessary. On the contrary, the clearer the title, the more valuable the territory; and the more powerful and hostile the British Government, the stronger will be the ground on which I rest my opposition to the bill.

With these preliminary remarks, I repeat the question, Has the time arrived, when it would be wise and prudent for us to attempt to assert and maintain our exclusive right to the territory, against the adverse and conflicting claim of Great Britain? I answer, No, it has not; and that for the decisive reason, because the attempt, if made, must prove unsuccessful against the resistance of Great Britain. We could neither take nor hold it against her; and that, for a reason not less decisive—that she could in a much shorter time, and at far less expense, concentrate a far greater force than we could in the territory.

We seem to forget, in the discussion of this subject, the great events which have occurred in the eastern portion of Asia, during the last year, and which have so greatly extended the power of Great Britain in that quarter of the globe. She has there, in that period, terminated successfully two wars; by one of which she has given increased quiet and stability to her possessions in India; and by the other, has firmly planted her power on the eastern coast of China, where she will undoubtedly keep up, at least for a time, a strong military and naval force, for the purposes of intimidation and strengthening her newly acquired possession. The point she occupies there on the western shore of the Pacific, is almost directly opposite to the Oregon Territory, at the distance of about five thousand five hundred miles from the mouth of Columbia River, with a tranquil ocean between, which may be passed over in six weeks. In that short time, she might place, at a moderate expense, a strong naval and military force at the mouth of that river, where a formidable body of men, as hardy and energetic as any on this continent, in the service of the Hudson Bay Company, and numerous tribes of Indians under its control, could be prepared to sustain and co-operate with it. Such is the facility with which she could concentrate a force there to maintain her claim to the territory against ours, should they be brought into collision by this bill.

JANUARY, 1843.]

The Oregon Territory.

[27TH CONG.]

I now turn to examine our means of concentrating an opposing force by land and water, should it become necessary to maintain our claim. We have no military or naval position in the Pacific Ocean. Our fleet would have to sail from our own shores, and would have to cross the line and double Cape Horn in 56 degrees of south latitude; and, turning north, recross the line, and ascend to latitude 46 north, in order to reach the mouth of the Columbia River—a distance from New York (over the straightest and shortest line) of more than 13,000 miles, and which would require a run of more than 18,000 of actual sailing on the usual route. Instead of six weeks, the voyage would require six months. I speak on the authority of one of the most experienced officers attached to the Navy Department.

These facts are decisive. We could do nothing by water. As far as that element is concerned, we could not oppose to her a gun or a soldier in the territory.

But, as great as are the impediments by water, they are, at present, not much less so by land. If we assume some central point in the State of Missouri as the place of rendezvous, from which our military force would commence its march for the territory, the distance to the mouth of the Columbia River will be found to be about two thousand miles; of which much more than a thousand miles would be over an unsettled country, consisting of naked plains or mountainous regions, without provisions, except such game as the rifle might supply. On a greater portion of this long march, the force would be liable to be attacked and harassed by numerous and warlike tribes of Indians, whose hostilities might be readily turned against us by the British traders. To march such a distance without opposition would take upwards of 120 days, assuming the march to be at the usual rate for military forces. Should it be impeded by the hostilities of Indians the time would be greatly prolonged.

I now ask, how could any considerable force sustain itself in so long a march, through a region so destitute of supplies? A small detachment might live on game, but that resource would be altogether inadequate to the support of an army. But admitting an army could find sufficient supplies to sustain its march to the territory, how could it sustain itself in an uncultivated territory, too remote to draw supplies from our settlements in its rear, and with the ocean in front, closed against us by a hostile fleet? And how could supplies be found to return, if a retreat should become necessary? In whatever view the subject may be regarded, I hazard nothing in asserting, that such is the difficulty at present on our part, of concentrating and maintaining a force in the territory, that a few thousand regulars, advantageously fortified on the Columbia River, with a small naval force to support them, could, with the aid of the employees of the Hudson Bay Company, and the co-operation of the Indians under its influence, bid defiance to any effort we could make to dislodge them. If all other difficulties could be surmounted, that of transporting a sufficient battering train, with all of its appurtenances, to so great a distance, and over so many obstacles, would be insuperable.

Having now made good my first position—that the attempt, at present, to assert and maintain our exclusive claim to the territory against the adverse claim of Great Britain, must prove unsuccessful, if she resisted, it now remains to inquire whether she would resist. And here let me say, whatever might be the doubts of others, surely they who have, in this discussion, insisted so strongly on her power, her jealousy, and her determination to hold the territory, cannot doubt that she would resist. If, indeed, provoking language can excite her to resistance, or if half which has been said of her hostile disposition be true, she not only would resist, but would gladly seize so favorable an occasion to do so, while we are comparatively so weak, and she so strong in that quarter. However unfavorable the time might be for us, for her it would be the most propitious. Her vast resources and military power in the East are liberated, and at her disposal, to be directed to assert and maintain her exclusive claim to the territory against ours, if she should determine to follow our example, in case this bill should pass. Even I, who believe that the present ministry is disposed to peace; that the recent mission to this country originated in the spirit of peace; and that Sir Robert Peel has exhibited great wisdom and moderation—moderation in the midst of splendid success, and therefore more to be trusted—do not doubt she would resist, if we should adopt this measure. We must not forget, as clear as we believe our title to be, that the right to the territory is in dispute between the two countries; and that, as certain as we regard our right to be, she regards hers as not less so. It is a case of adverse conflicting claims; and we may be assured, if we undertake to assert our exclusive right, she will oppose us by asserting hers; and if the appeal should be to force, to decide between us at present, the result would be inevitable—the territory would be lost to us. Indeed, this is so incontestable, that no one has ventured to deny it; and there is no hazard in asserting that no one will, who understands the subject, and does not choose to have the soundness of his judgment questioned.

3d Sess.]

The Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1848.]

But it may be asked, What then? Shall we abandon our claim to the territory? I answer, No. I am utterly opposed to that; but as bad as that would be, it would not be as much so as to adopt a rash and precipitate measure, which, after great sacrifices, would finally end in its loss. But I am opposed to both. My object is to preserve, and not to lose, the territory. I do not agree with my eloquent and able colleague that it is worthless. He has underrated it, both as to soil and climate. It contains a vast deal of land, it is true, that is barren and worthless; but not a little that is highly productive. To that may be added its commercial advantages, which will, in time, prove to be great. We must not overlook the important events to which I have alluded as having recently occurred in the eastern portion of Asia. As great as they are, they are but the beginning of a series of a similar character, which must follow at no distant day. What has taken place in China, will, in a few years, be followed in Japan, and all the eastern portions of that continent. Their ports, like the Chinese, will be opened; and the whole of that large portion of Asia, containing nearly half of the population and wealth of the globe, will be thrown open to the commerce of the world, and be placed within the pales of European and American intercourse and civilization. A vast market will be created, and a mighty impulse will be given to commerce. No small portion of the share that would fall to us with this populous and industrious portion of the globe, is destined to pass through the ports of the Oregon Territory to the valley of the Mississippi, instead of taking the circuitous route and long voyage round Cape Horn; or the still longer, round the Cape of Good Hope. It is mainly because I place this high estimate on its prospective value, that I am so solicitous to preserve it, and so adverse to this bill, or any other precipitate measure which might terminate in its loss. If I thought less of its value, or if I regarded our title less clear, my opposition would be less decided.

Having now, I trust, satisfactorily shown, that, if we should now attempt to assert and maintain our exclusive right to the territory, against the adverse claim of Great Britain, she would resist, and that if she resisted, our attempt would be unsuccessful, and the territory be lost,—the question presents itself, How shall we preserve it?

There is only one means by which it can be; but that, fortunately, is the most powerful of all—time. Time is acting for us; and, if we shall have the wisdom to trust to its operation, it will assert and maintain our right with resistless force, without costing a cent of money, or a drop of blood. There is often, in the affairs of government, more efficiency and wisdom in non-action, than in action. All we want to effect our object in this case, is “a wise and masterly inactivity.” Our population is rolling towards the shores of the Pacific, with an impetus greater than what we realize. It is one of those forward movements which leaves anticipation behind. In the period of thirty-two years which have elapsed since I took my seat in the other House, the Indian frontier has receded a thousand miles to the West. At that time, our population was much less than half of what it is now. It was then increasing at the rate of about a quarter of a million annually; it is now not less than six hundred thousand; and still increasing at the rate of something more than three per cent. compound annually. At that rate, it will soon reach the yearly increase of a million. If to this be added, that the region west of Arkansas and the State of Missouri, and south of the Missouri River, is occupied by half-civilized tribes, who have their lands secured to them by treaty, and which will prevent the spread of population in that direction, and that this great and increasing tide will be forced to take the comparatively narrow channel to the north of that river and south of our northern boundary, some conception may be formed of the strength with which the current will run in that direction, and how soon it will reach the eastern gorges of the Rocky Mountains. I say some conception; for I feel assured that the reality will outrun the anticipation. In illustration, I will repeat what I stated when I first addressed the Senate on this subject. As wise and experienced as was President Monroe—as much as he had witnessed of the growth of our country in his time, so inadequate was his conception of its rapidity, that near the close of his administration, in the year 1824, he proposed to colonize the Indians of New York, and those north of the Ohio River and east of the Mississippi, in what is now called the Wisconsin Territory, under the impression that it was a portion of our territory so remote, that they would not be disturbed by our increasing population for a long time to come. It is now but 18 years since; and already, in that short period, it is a great and flourishing territory, ready to knock at our door for admission as one of the sovereign members of the Union. But what is still more striking—what is really wonderful, and almost miraculous, is, that another territory (Iowa) still further west, (beyond the Mississippi,) has sprung up, as if by magic, and has already outstripped Wisconsin, and may knock for entrance before she is prepared to do so? Such is the wonderful growth of a population, which has attained the number ours has, and is still yearly increasing at the compound rate it is; and such the impetus with which it is forcing its way, resistlessly, westward. It will soon—far sooner than anticipated—reach the Rocky Mountains, and be ready to pour into the Oregon Territory, when it will come into our possession without resistance or struggle; or, if there should be resistance, it would be feeble and ineffectual. We would then be as much stronger there, comparatively, than Great Britain, as she is now stronger than we are; and it would then be as idle in her to attempt to assert and maintain her exclusive claim to the territory, against us, as it would now be in us to attempt it against her. Let us be wise, and abide our time, and it will accomplish all that we desire, with far more certainty, and with infinitely less sacrifice, than we can without it.

But, if the time had already arrived for the successful assertion of our right against any resistance which might be made, it would not, in my opinion, be expedient, in the present condition of the Government. It is weak—never more so; weak politically, and from the state of the finances. The former was so ably and eloquently described by my colleague, that I have nothing to add but a single remark on the extraordinary state of parties at present. There are now three parties in the Union: of which one is in possession of the Executive Department, another of the Legislative, and the other, judging by the recent elections, of the country; which has so locked and impeded the operations of the Government, that it is scarcely able to take measures necessary to its preservation.

In turning from this imbecile political condition of the Government, and casting my eyes on the state of its finances, I behold nothing but disorder and embarrassment; credit prostrated; a new debt contracted, already of considerable amount, and daily increasing; expenditures exceeding income; and the prospect, instead of brightening, growing still more gloomy. Already the debt falls not much short of thirty millions of dollars; to which will be added, from present appearances, by the end of the year, (if the appropriations are not greatly curtailed, and the revenue improved,) not less, probably, than ten millions, when the interest would be upwards of two millions of dollars annually—a sum more than equal to the net revenue from the public lands. The only remaining revenue is derived from the foreign commerce of the country; and on that, such heavy duties are imposed, that it is sinking under the burden. The imports of the last quarter, it is estimated, will be less than nine millions of dollars—a falling off of about two-thirds, compared with what it ought to be, according to the estimate made at the last session by those who imposed the burden. But as great as it is, the falling off will, I understand, be still greater, from present indications, during the present quarter; and yet, in the face of all this, we are appropriating money as profusely, and projecting schemes of expenditures as thoughtlessly, as if the treasury were full to overflowing. So great is the indifference, that even the prostrated condition of the treasury attracts no attention. It is scarcely mentioned or alluded to. No one seems to care any thing about it. Not an inquiry is made, how the means of supplying the acknowledged deficit to meet the current demands on the treasury, or to cover the extraordinary expenditures which will be incurred by this measure, should it be adopted, is to be raised. I would ask its advocates, Do you propose to borrow the funds necessary for its execution? Our credit is already greatly impaired and our debt rapidly increasing; and are you willing still further to impair the one, and add to the increase of the other? Do you propose to raise them by increasing the duties? Can you hope to derive additional revenue from such increase, when the duties are already so high as not only to paralyze the commerce, agriculture, and industry of the country, but to diminish, to an alarming extent, the revenue from the imports? Are you prepared to lay a duty on tea and coffee, and other free articles? If so, speak out, and tell your constituents plainly that such is your intention; that money must be had; and that no other source of revenue is left, which can be relied on, but a tax on them. It must come to that; and before we incur the expense, it is but fair that our constituents should know the consequences.

But we are told the expense will be small—not exceeding one or two hundred thousand dollars. Let us not be deceived. What this bill appropriates is but the entering wedge. Let it pass, and no one can tell what it will cost. It will depend on circumstances. Under the most favorable, on the supposition that there will be no resistance on the part of Great Britain, it would amount to millions; but if she should resist, and we should make it a question of force, I hazard nothing in saying it would subject the country to heavier expenditures, and expose it to greater danger, than any measure which has ever received the sanction of Congress.

Many and great are the acts of folly which we have committed in the management of our finances in the last fourteen or fifteen years. We doubled our revenue when our expenditures were on the eve of being reduced one-half by the discharge of the public debt. We reversed that act of folly, and doubled our expenditures, when the revenue was in the course of reduction under the compromise act.

3d SESS.]

The Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1848.]

When the joint effects of the operation of the two had exhausted the treasury, and left the Government without adequate means to meet current demands, by an aptitude in folly unexampled, we selected that as the fit moment to divest the Government of the revenue from the public domain, and to place the entire burden of supporting it on the commerce of the country. And then, as if to consummate the whole, we passed an act at the close of the last session, which bids fair to cripple effectually this, our only remaining source of revenue. And now what are we doing? Profiting by the disastrous consequences of past mismanagement? Quite the reverse; committing, if possible, greater and more dangerous acts of folly than ever. When the Government and the country are lying prostrate by this long series of errors and mismanagement; when the public credit is deeply impaired; when the people and the States are overwhelmed by debt, and need all their resources to extricate themselves from their embarrassments,—that is the moment we select to bring forward a measure, which, on the most favorable supposition, if adopted, cannot fail to subject the Government to very heavy expenditures, even should events take the most favorable turn; and may—no, that is not strong enough—would probably subject it to greater than it ever has heretofore been. Where would the Government find resources to meet them? Not in its credit, for that would be extinct. Not in the impost, for that is already overburdened. Not in internal taxes; the indebted condition of the States forbids that. More than half of the States of the Union are in debt; many deeply—and several even beyond their means of payment. They require every cent of the surplus means of their citizens, which can be reached by taxes, to meet their own debts. Under such a state of things, this Government could not impose internal taxes to any considerable amount, without bankrupting the indebted States or crushing their citizens. What would follow, should this Government be compelled, in consequence of this measure, to resort to such taxes, I shall not undertake to trace. Suffice it to say, that all preceding disasters, as great as they are, which followed the preceding acts of folly, would be as nothing compared to the overwhelming calamities which would follow this. Our system might sink under the shock.

If, Senators, you would hearken to the voice of one who has some experience, and no other desire but to see the country free and prosperous, I would say, Direct your eyes to the finances. There, at present, the danger lies. Restore, without delay, the equilibrium between revenue and expenditures, which has done so much to destroy our credit, and derange the whole fabric of the Government. If that should not be done, the Government and country will be involved, ere long, in overwhelming difficulties. Oherish the revenue from the lands and the imports. They are our legitimate sources of revenue. When the period arrives—come when it may—that this Government will be compelled to resort to internal taxes for its support in time of peace, it will mark one of the most difficult and dangerous stages through which it is destined to pass. If it should be a period like the present—when the States are deeply in debt, and need all their internal resources to meet their own engagements—it may prove fatal; and yet it would seem as if systematic efforts are, and have been, making for some time, to bring it about at this critical and dangerous period. To this, all our financial measures tend,—the giving away the public lands; the crushing of the customs by high protective, and, in many instances, prohibitory duties; the adoption of hazardous and expensive measures of policy like the present; and the creation of a public debt, without an effort to reduce the expenditures. How it is all to end, time only can disclose.

But, if our finances were in ever so flourishing a state; if the political condition of the country were as strong as it could be made by an administration standing at the head of a powerful dominant party; and if our population had reached the point where we could successfully assert and maintain our claim against the adverse claim of Great Britain, there would still remain a decisive objection to this bill. The mode in which it proposes to do it is indefensible. If we are displeased with the existing arrangement, which leaves the territory free and open to the citizens and subjects of the two countries; if we are of the opinion it operates practically to our disadvantage, or that the time has arrived when we ought to assert and carry into effect our claim of exclusive sovereignty over the territory, the treaty provides expressly for the case. It authorizes either party, by giving a year's notice, to terminate its existence whenever it pleases, and without giving reasons. Why has not this bill conformed to this express and plain provision? Why should it undertake to assert our exclusive ownership to the whole territory, in direct violation of the treaty? Why should it, with what we all believe to be a good title on our part, involve the country in a controversy about the violation of the treaty, in which a large portion (if not a majority) of the body believe that we would be in the wrong, when the treaty itself might so easily, and in so short a time, be terminated by our own act, and the charge of its violation be avoided? Can any satisfactory reason be given to these questions? I ask the author of the measure, and its warm advocates, for an answer. None has been given yet; and none, I venture to assert, will be attempted. I can imagine but one answer that can be given—that there are those who will vote for the bill, that would not vote to give notice, under the delusive hope that we may assert our exclusive ownership, and take possession, without violating the treaty, or endangering the peace of the country. Their aim is, to have all the benefit of the treaty, without being subject to its restrictions; an aim in direct conflict with the only object of the treaty—to prevent conflict between the two countries, by keeping the question of ownership or sovereignty in abeyance till the question of boundary can be settled. That such is the object, appears to be admitted by all, except the Senator from New Hampshire, (Mr. WOODBURY,) whose argument, I must say, with all deference for him, was, on that point, very unsatisfactory. The other advocates of the bill, accordingly, admit that a grant of lands to emigrants settling in the territory, to take effect immediately, would be a violation of the treaty; but contend that a promise to grant hereafter would not be. The distinction is, no doubt, satisfactory to those who make it; but how can they rationally expect it will be satisfactory to the British Government, when so large a portion of the Senate believe that there is no distinction between a grant and a promise to grant lands, as it relates to the treaty, and hold one to be as much a violation of it as the other? We may be assured that the British Government will look to the intention of the bill; and, in doing so, will see that its object is to assert our exclusive claim of sovereignty over the entire territory against their adverse claim, and will shape their course accordingly. Our nice distinction between actual grants and the promise to grant will not be noticed. They will see it in the subversion of the object for which the treaty was formed, and take their measures to counteract it. The result will be, that, instead of gaining the advantage aimed at, we shall not only lose the advantage of the treaty, but be involved in the serious charge of having violated its provisions.

I am not, however, of opinion that Great Britain would declare war against us. If I mistake not, she is under the direction, at this time, of those who are too sagacious and prudent to take that course. She would probably consider the treaty at an end, and take possession adverse to us, if not of the whole territory, at least to the Columbia River. She would, at the same time, take care to command that river by a strong fortification, manned by a respectable garrison, and leave it to us to decide whether we shall acquiesce, or negotiate, or attempt to dislodge her. To acquiesce under such circumstances, would be a virtual surrender of the territory; to negotiate with adverse and forcible possession against us, would be almost as hopeless; and to dislodge her at present, would, as has been shown, be impracticable.

Such, in my opinion, would be the probable result, should this bill be passed. It would place us, in every respect, in a situation far less eligible than at present. The occupation of British subjects in the territory, as things now stand, is by permission, under positive treaty stipulation, and cannot ripen into a title, as it was supposed it would by the Senator from Illinois. (Mr. McROBERTS.)

But if their occupancy was adverse, (as it would be, should this measure be adopted,) and Great Britain should resist, then his argument would be sound, and have great force. In that case, the necessity of taking some decisive step, on our part, to secure our rights, would be imperious. Delay would then, indeed, be dangerous. But as it is, no length of time can confer a title against us; and it is that, considering what advantage Great Britain has over us at present, either to take or hold possession, which ought to give to the treaty great value in our estimation. It is a wise maxim to let well-enough alone. We can do little at present to better our condition. Even the occupation and improvement by British subjects, against which so much has been said, will, in the end, if we act wisely, be no disadvantage. Neither can give any claim against us when the time comes to assert our rights if we abide faithfully by the treaty. They are but preparing the country for our reception; and should their improvements and cultivation be extended, it would only enable us to take possession with more ease if it should ever become necessary to assert our claim by force; which I do not think probable, if we shall have the wisdom to avoid hasty and precipitate action, and leave the question to the certain operation of time.

In conclusion, I might appeal to the authority of the preceding administrations from 1818 to the present time, in support of the views I have taken. On what other supposition can it be explained, that the administration of Mr. Monroe should assent to the treaty of that year, which left the territory open and free to the citizens and subjects of the two countries for the period of ten years? Or that of Mr. Adams should revive it, with the provision, that either might terminate it by giving one year's notice? Or, still more emphatically, how can it be explained, that with this right of terminating the treaty, the administration of General Jackson, and that of his successor, should, for the period of twelve years, acquiesce in it, but on the conviction it was the best arrangement which could be made, and that any change or movement on our part would but render our situation worse instead of better, in relation to the territory? It cannot be said that the present is a more favorable period to assert our exclusive right than during either of the preceding administrations. The reverse is the fact. It is, in every view, far less favorable than either, and especially than that of General Jackson, when the treasury was overflowing, and the head of the administration possessed greater influence and power than any other Chief Magistrate that ever presided over the country. That, if ever,

3D Sess.]

The Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1848.]

was the time to assert our exclusive ownership; particularly as those who are so earnestly pressing it on the Government were then in power, and would have been responsible for its execution. How is it to be explained, that they were then so passive, and are now so urgent for the passage of this bill?

Entertaining these views, I hope that the motion of the Senator from Virginia (Mr. ARCHER) will prevail, and the bill be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The subject is one of great importance and delicacy, and ought to be carefully examined by the appropriate organs of the body. Should it be referred, I trust the committee will report amendments to strike out all the provisions of the bill which, by any reasonable interpretation, might be regarded to be in conflict with the stipulations of the treaty between the two countries, or which might incur any considerable expense in the present exhausted condition of the treasury. As at present advised, I am not indisposed to the provision, if properly guarded, which proposes to extend our jurisdiction over our citizens in the territory. It ought not, however, to be carried farther than the provisions of the act of Parliament of 1821. I am opposed to holding out exemption to our citizens to emigrate to a region where we cannot, at present, protect them; but if there be any who may choose to emigrate, I would be far from opposing them; and am unwilling that they should lose, by emigration, personally the benefit of our jurisdiction and laws.

I have now said what I intended in reference to this bill; and shall conclude by noticing some remarks which fell from the Senator from Missouri (Mr. LINN) who introduced it. When he first addressed the Senate, in reply to my former remarks, he spoke a good deal about opposition and injustice to the West, and referred to some of the acts of the Government at an early date, which he supposed partook of that character. I do not suppose that he intended it; but his remarks were calculated to make the impression (taken in connection with the time and subject) that he regarded the opposition to the passage of this bill as originating in unfriendly feelings to the West. But if he so regards it, and if he intended to apply his remarks to me, I would appeal to my acts to repel the unjust imputation.

[Here Mr. LINN disclaimed any intention of attributing to Mr. CALHOUN hostile or unkind feelings to the West.]

Mr. CALHOUN. I am happy to hear the disclaimer of the Senator. I felt assured he could not have intended to do me so much injustice as to attribute to me the slightest hostility to the West. No one knows better than he does that my opposition to the bill originates in public considerations, free from all local feeling, and that my general views of policy have ever been friendly, and even liberal, towards the West; but as there are others not so familiar with my course in reference to that great and growing section, I deem it proper to avail myself of the opportunity briefly to allude to it, in order to repel any improper imputation which may be attempted to be attributed to me, from any quarter, on account of my course on the present occasion.

I go back to the time when I was at the head of the War Department. At that early period I turned my attention particularly to the interest of the West. I saw that it required increased security to its long line of frontier, and greater facility for carrying on intercourse with the Indian tribes in that quarter, and to enable it to develop its resources—especially that of its fur trade. To give the required security, I ordered a much larger portion of the army to that frontier; and to afford facility and protection for carrying on the fur trade, the military posts were moved much higher up the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers. Under the increased security and facility which these measures afforded, the fur trade received a great impulse. It extended across the continent, in a short time, to the Pacific, and north and south to the British and the Mexican frontiers; yielding in a few years, as stated by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. LINN,) half a million of dollars annually. But I stopped not there. I saw that individual enterprises on our part, however great, could not successfully compete with the powerful incorporated Canadian and Hudson Bay Companies, and that additional measures were necessary to secure permanently our fur trade. For that purpose, I proposed to establish a post still higher up the Missouri, at the mouth of the Yellow Stone River, and to give such unity and efficiency to our intercourse and trade with the Indian tribes between our Western frontier and the Pacific Ocean, as would enable our citizens engaged in the fur trade to compete successfully with the British traders. Had the measures proposed been adopted, we would not now have to listen to the complaint, so frequently uttered in this discussion, of the loss of that trade.

But that is not all. I might appeal to a measure more recent, and still more strongly illustrative of the liberal feelings which have ever influenced me, whenever the interest of the West was concerned. I refer to the bill relating to the portion of the public domain lying within the new States, which I introduced, some time since. It is true, indeed, that I looked to the interest of the whole Union in introducing that measure; but it is not the less so that it would, if it should become a law, more especially benefit the West. In doing that, I exposed myself, in my own section, to the imputation of seeking the friendship of the West—as I do, on this occasion, to that of hostility towards that great and growing section. As the hazard of the former could not deter me from doing my duty then, so that of the latter cannot from doing my duty now. The same sense of duty which on that occasion impelled me to support a measure in which the West was peculiarly interested, at the hazard of incuring the displeasure of my own section, because I believed it calculated to promote the interest of the whole,—impels me on this occasion to oppose this measure, at the hazard of displeasing the West, because I believe, in so doing, I not only promote the interest of the Union generally, but that of the West especially.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he had examined the bill with a sincere desire to give it his support; but he felt constrained to say, after a careful examination of the treaty of 1818, that he feared it could not, consistently with good faith, become the law of the land. He would go as far as he who went farthest in maintaining the rights of this country, and asserting our claim to the Oregon Territory, and in passing all necessary laws within the limits of the just powers of this Government; but, while he was for sustaining those rights, he was also for preserving all the covenants entered into by this Government with a foreign power. The only questions to which he desired to direct their attention were, first, as to whether this bill did or did not interfere with the stipulations of the convention of 1818. When this question was satisfactorily settled, the only remaining question would be, Was it expedient to pass the bill? In order to ascertain whether the bill would conflict with the stipulations of that convention, it would be necessary to examine not only the phraseology, but the spirit and object of the convention. By the terms of the convention, it was agreed that the country, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, should be free and open, for the space of ten years, to the vessels, subjects, and citizens of the two powers. Whether the terms "free and open" were—as the Senator from New Hampshire supposed—to be confined to the sense of a mere trading establishment, leaving both parties free to assert their right to exercise jurisdiction over the territory; whether it were a mere commercial treaty or (as was supposed by other gentlemen) it were capable of a more extended construction, giving the rights of national occupancy to the subjects of each nation;—in either point of view, the same result would follow—viz: that neither Government had the right to interfere with the rights of the citizens of the other. He was now speaking of the principle involved in the words of the convention; and that was clearly that, if this Government exercise the right of granting titles to any portion of the disputed territory, it amounted to an exercise of sovereignty and jurisdiction, which might conflict with the freedom and openness provided for by the treaty. It was the highest assertion of right that could possibly be made, and would most undoubtedly operate to the disadvantage of the other contracting party. What was the principal object of the treaty? It was to prevent the occurrence of quarrels and dissensions between the parties. With the knowledge of this fact, could any Senator doubt that the design was, that no grants of land should be made by either party? Would it not serve to create those very disputes and difficulties which the convention was intended to avert?

There was not much analogy between this case and the case stated by the Senator from New Hampshire—of a treaty of commerce between this country and Russia, by which the port of Archangel should be free for American vessels. This bill provided expressly that any portion of the territory might be occupied by settlers emigrating from this country, and that a good title should be given to them; which was the highest act of sovereignty.

It had been stated that this bill proposed to do nothing more than Great Britain had already done; but if he had rightly understood the purport of the communication which was read to the Senate yesterday, they were informed by the Secretary of State that the British Government had expressly disavowed the making of any grants. He was not going to deny that Great Britain—who grasped at every advantage—would be very willing that this territory should be settled by her own subjects; but if they were to believe the assertion of her accredited agent in this case, she had done nothing which could interfere with the stipulations of the convention; and yet it was proposed by this bill to exercise the highest act of sovereignty that could be exercised by any Government. Was he not right, then, in saying that the bill would conflict with the convention? Gentlemen would ask, Did they mean to make themselves to be entirely dispossessed by the Hudson Bay Company? No such thing. He would go so far as to say it would be wise to put an end to their encroachments; but he would do it in a way which the convention would allow, by giving one year's notice of our intention. He thought it far better to take this course, than to render themselves obnoxious to the imputation of having acted in contravention of our solemn engagements.

Mr. McDUFFIE next obtained the floor, and remarked that he had been reluctant to enter into this discussion; and certainly should not have risen to take part in it, had it not appeared to him that there were other grounds than those yet advanced, which would influence him in opposing the passage of this bill. The objections he had to it seemed to him to be of greater magnitude than could at that late hour be discussed. He would therefore ask the indulgence of the Senate in moving an adjournment.

At Mr. KING's suggestion, the further consideration of the bill was postponed till tomorrow morning.

The motion to adjourn having been withdrawn,

On motion of Mr. KING, the Senate went into executive session; and after some time spent therein, adjourned.

3D Sess.]

The Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1843.]

WEDNESDAY, January 25.

The Oregon Territory.

The bill for the occupation and settlement of the Oregon Territory then came up on its passage, as the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. McDuffie rose and addressed the Senate. A wise and prudent man, (said Mr. McDuffie,) in any of the various departments of human affairs, would be very reluctant to engage in any enterprise, however thoroughly satisfied of his right to do so, until he should have well considered, first, the appropriate time for its commencement; secondly, the means by which it was to be accomplished, and its probable cost; and finally, the benefits which were ultimately to result from its accomplishment. And he must be permitted to say, if the worthy Senator from Missouri, who had, with so much zeal and ability, presented this bill to the consideration of the Senate, had violated any of the maxims of sound policy, (as he humbly conceived he had,) it had arisen from the circumstance of totally overlooking the considerations to which he had just alluded. All those Senators who had engaged in this discussion, seemed to have limited their investigations to what he was compelled to regard as the most unimportant of all the questions which this measure involves. They had confined themselves to the mere abstract question of the right of title. They had argued the question as if the Senate of the United States was the tribunal which was to adjust and determine the question of the validity of the English or the American title; and as if this was the only question to be determined. He believed no Senator, who had taken part in this discussion, had expressed the slightest doubt as to the validity of the title of the United States to the Territory of Oregon. He had investigated the subject as fully and as thoroughly as the documentary evidence to which he had been able to obtain access had enabled him to do; and, with these lights before him, he was free to declare that he regarded the title of the United States, at least as far north as the forty-ninth parallel of latitude, as one of the clearest titles that was ever the subject of national controversy. But, at the same time that he made this declaration, he would be very sorry to assume the responsibility of precipitating the nation into any measure, upon his own judgment, or the judgment of the Senate, upon questions which it did not belong to either to determine. Gentlemen seemed to have forgotten that there were two parties interested in this question; and that, however clear our title might appear to us, theirs might appear equally clear to the other party. Here was a case of joint occupancy, and an existing question as to title. The Senate had seemed, throughout the whole discussion, to assume that ours was the true title, and were proceeding upon that assumption; although the British, at the same time, claimed that theirs was the true title. By whom were these conflicting claims to be settled? By one of the interested parties? Certainly not.

A few words on the subject of the convention of 1818, which had been indefinitely prolonged by that of 1827. He concurred perfectly with those Senators who had maintained that the provision of this act, which granted, or stipulated to grant, allodial titles, or titles in fee simple, to all those citizens of this country, who might emigrate to that territory, was a palpable violation of the convention. It was in vain to disguise the fact, whatever might be determined in regard to this matter. They were about to take possession of the territory, to establish a line of American forts, and, by all the means and appliances of war, to defend that possession. They were about to invite the citizens of this country to go there—not for the purpose of carrying on the fur trade; not to do that which was consistent with a joint occupancy by the two parties to the convention; but to establish a permanent settlement. The British Government and the British nation, however we might disguise the facts in our arguments here, could not be so blind as not to perceive the palpable objects of this measure. He begged to inquire of the worthy Senators who took so deep an interest in the fate of this bill, what was the existing emergency which called upon the United States to take this step? The question, for the last twenty-four years, had been allowed to slumber, while we were in the midst of the greatest national prosperity, with a treasury so abundantly supplied that the wit and ingenuity of man could not find out a legitimate mode of disencumbering it of its superabundant treasure. He called upon Senators to state what was the existing emergency, which demanded, now, that a measure of this kind should be adopted. Why was it that they were invoked at this moment—and, he must be permitted to say, this inauspicious moment—to enter into a measure of this kind? Why had it not been done twenty years ago, or at some subsequent period prior to the present? He was decidedly averse to embark in it now. What was the condition of our affairs in relation to England? Had they already forgotten that only the other day a momentous treaty had been concluded with England, concerning one of the most embarrassing difficulties that had arisen since the termination of the late war? He would ask, how, and at whose instance, was that adjustment made? It was made at the instance of that nation, concerning whose grasping ambition, so much had been said by gentlemen on this floor. Was it her ambition, her love of conquest, and desire of the acquisition of territory, that induced England to send to us the olive branch of peace, in the form of an extraordinary mission? Great Britain voluntarily moved in this matter, and tendered to us the olive branch of peace; and he thanked God that our Government accepted it in the spirit in which it was extended to us. He was not disposed to find fault with the result of those negotiations, even if they had conceded much more territory than was conceded, had it been done with the consent of the State immediately interested, and consistently with the honor of the country. He would rather that peace should be made on almost any terms, than to go to war. The matter had been adjusted; and he must be permitted to say, that for the adjustment of this question, if for nothing else, the people of the United States owed a debt of lasting gratitude to the Administration by whom this adjustment had been effected; and he would go further, and say, that every patriot in England, and every patriot in the United States, would shake hands, and declare that the Government of each was indebted to the negotiators. He thanked God that the treaty had been brought to a successful termination. Well, sir, (said Mr. McD.) while congratulating ourselves on the termination of these great difficulties, at such a moment as this, what are we about to do? While a part of our territorial boundary remained still to be adjusted—while the question was still a subject of pending negotiation between the two countries—the Senate of the United States, a branch of the Legislature, intimately connected with the treaty-making power, is about to adopt a military movement, in order to take military possession of the territory. Now, however we may view this act, whatever interpretation we may place upon it—I will ask gentlemen to assume to themselves for a moment the position of the British ministry, and imagine what would be the natural effect upon their minds of a measure of this kind. Sir, they sent us the olive branch of peace to adjust the most important difficulty. Instead of reciprocating the amicable spirit manifested by them, we are about to send forth the flaming sword of defiance;—yes, at the very moment when our minister is instructed to negotiate for a settlement of the question, we snatch from their hands the olive branch of peace, and place the sword of defiance in its stead. This may be strong language; but, strong as it is, it is not stronger than the natural interpretation which will be placed on our conduct, if this bill be passed, by Great Britain.

JANUARY, 1843.]

The Oregon Territory.

[27th CONG.]

I have asked, what is the emergency which demands the passage of this bill? Is there any probability that we shall fail in the adjustment of the question by negotiation? If gentlemen believe we shall fail, and that we shall ultimately be under the necessity of resorting to force of arms to establish our title and maintain our occupation, this is an additional reason why we should adopt no measure which, in the estimation of the civilized world, and in our own, could possibly place us in the wrong. Let us fairly and honorably try to negotiate. Let us try to adjust this boundary, as we have done the other. And, as I think the title of the United States is infinitely more clear than that upon which the negotiation has just terminated, I think the probability of an amicable adjustment is so much the greater. But gentlemen say we must proceed in this way—we must take possession, because the British are doing the same. They are making lodgments, establishing settlements, looking forward to the exclusive possession at some future period. Now, I totally dissent from this opinion; and if there is any one conclusion to which the documents before the Senate must irresistibly bring the minds of Senators, it is that Great Britain has not the remotest idea—that she has not done a solitary act, nor uttered a solitary word, on the question, evincing the remotest desire to make permanent and exclusive settlements in that territory. All that she desired, all that they have ever claimed, is the right to prosecute the fur trade, and to make such temporary settlements as were necessary to accomplish that object. Have they done more, sir? His true the worthy Senator from Kentucky (Mr. MOREHEAD) made a formidable array of charges against England, in reference to acts which she has already done. In the first place, that she has made a fort one hundred miles from the mouth of the Columbia River; and the gentleman, with that candor which forbids him to suppress any part of the truth, read a full account of that fort, concluding with a statement that it was a mere stockade-fort, in its very character intended for no other purpose than to repel the attacks of the Indians; and so it is with all the other forts which they have established. This, then, amounts to nothing; it furnishes no evidence of an intention of establishing permanent settlements, the idea of which seems to have taken hold of the minds of Senators. The Senator from Kentucky related another very important fact. He said England has violated the convention, which stipulated the joint occupancy in the prosecution of the fur trade; because, whenever our boats ascended the Columbia River to trade with the Indians, they were immediately driven off by the English, who had the audacity to come there and sell goods to the poor Indians cheaper than the Americans did; and this was a violation of the convention. Why, sir, this harmonizes very badly with the remark of the worthy Senator from New Hampshire, (Mr. WOODBURY,) who indicated, as one important object to be gained by the passage of this bill, the civilization of the Indians. But, if we cannot afford to sell them goods at a cheap rate, it surely does not show a very Christian spirit. But all this is mere words. I put it to the Senate whether any one, in the course of this discussion, has put his finger on a solitary act which indicated an intention, on the part of Great Britain, to establish for herself an exclusive occupation. I assert that, as far as I have examined, I have discovered no evidence of any such intention.

Now, Mr. President, having pressed these brief views, tending to show the inexpediency of adopting such a measure at this time, in reference to negotiations now pending between the two countries, let me ask the Senate, what will be the natural interpretation that England will put upon our act? If we had passed the measure without debate, it might not have been regarded in any degree offensive; but you may rest assured, when this act comes to be regarded by the British ministry, particularly if they have any desire to take possession of the territory, what will be the interpretation they will put upon it? They will interpret the act by the speeches delivered here. Will they not, sir? Consult your own bosoms. What is the impression produced upon yourselves, when an English paper—not even a ministerial paper—throws out denunciations against the United States?

3D Sess.]

The Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1843.]

What, then, will be their interpretation of this act, military in its character, heralded forth to the world with denunciations against England, on account of her grasping ambition—referring to her acts in the Eastern hemisphere, in Asia, and in China, as well as on this continent? Sir, however calmly we may hear these things, the British will not hear them with calmness. Now, sir, let me tell you how many gentlemen are mistaken as to the feelings existing in England in regard to this subject. I was there for about six months during the years 1838 and 1839; and if I were called upon on my oath to declare what appeared to be the most prevailing sentiment in England, I would say it was an absolute horror of the idea of a war with America. All ranks, high and low, every person I encountered, in the highways and elsewhere, universally concurred in the sentiment that the ancient feuds that had separated the two countries had passed away—that a new era had grown up—that they were bound together by the strong ties of consanguinity, both being of the Anglo-Saxon race, differing from all the rest of the world; and I heard the language used—language in which I concurred—that if the two Governments, on a question of mere boundary, which might be intrusted to arbitrators, should involve themselves in war, they would deserve the eternal execration of the world. This was the universal sentiment.

Sir, I am not afraid of being charged with dreading the tremendous power of England. Surely, the courage of the people of the United States, illustrated in so many glorious battles by land and by sea, is not reduced to so low an ebb, that they may not venture to be just and moderate for fear of encountering the hazard of being thought to be cowardly. No, sir; no such interpretation will be put upon our conduct. I confidently believe, therefore, that if we wait with patience, and fairly employ the means of peace which are in our hands, and leave the executive department of the Government to discharge its duty, I confidently believe, from the progress already made in the adjustment of our difficulties, that this comparatively unimportant one would be adjusted. So far, sir, as regards our foreign relations.

But there are some domestic views of the subject which gentlemen have overlooked.

What do we want with this territory? What are we to do with it? What is to be the consequence of our taking possession of it? What is the act we are called on now to do? Why, it is neither more nor less than an act of colonization, for the first time proposed since the foundation of this Government. If this were a question of gradual, and continuous, and progressive settlement—if the territory, to which our citizens are invited, were really to become a part of this Union, it would present a very different question. But, sir, does any man seriously suppose that any State which can be formed at the mouth of the Columbia River, or any of the inhabitable parts of that territory, would ever become one of the States of this Union? I have great faith—no one had much greater—in the power of the representative principle to extend the sphere of government; but I confess that, even in the most sanguine days of my youth, I never conceived the possibility of embracing within the same Government people living five thousand miles apart. But, sir, the worthy Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. WOODBURY) seems to have discovered a principle much more potent than the representative principle. He refers you to steam, as far more potent. I should doubt very much whether the elements, or powers, or organization of the principles of government, will ever be changed by steam. Steam! How are we to apply steam in this case? Has the Senator examined the character of the country? What is the character of the country? Why, as I understand it, that about seven hundred miles this side of the Rocky Mountains is uninhabitable, where rain scarcely ever falls—a barren sandy soil. On the other side—we have it from a very intelligent gentleman, sent to explore that country by the State Department, that there are three successive ridges of mountains extending towards the Pacific, and running nearly parallel; which mountains are totally impassable, except in certain parts, where there were gaps or depressions, to be reached only by going some hundreds of miles out of the direct course. Well, now, what are we to do in such a case as this? How are you going to apply steam? Have you made any thing like an estimate of the cost of a railroad running from here to the mouth of the Columbia? Why, the wealth of the Indies would be insufficient. You would have to tunnel through mountains five or six hundred miles in extent. It is true, they have constructed a tunnel beneath the Thames; but at a vast expenditure of capital. With a bankrupt treasury, and a depressed and suffering people, to talk about constructing a railroad to the western shore of this continent, manifests a wild spirit of adventure which I never expected to hear broached in the Senate of the United States. And is the Senate of the United States to be the last intrenchment where we are to find this wild spirit of adventure which has involved this country in ruin? I believe that the farmers, the honest cultivators of the soil, look now only to God in his mercy, and their own labor, to relieve them from the wretchedness in which the wild and visionary schemes of adventure have involved them.

Now, it is one of the most uncalculating measures which was ever brought before the Senate. For whose benefit are we bound to pass it? Who are to go there, along the line of military posts, and take possession of the only part of the territory fit to occupy—that part lying upon the sea-coast, a strip less than one hundred miles in width; for, as I have already stated, the rest of the territory consists of mountains almost inaccessible, and low lands which are covered with stone and volcanic remains, where rain never falls, except during the spring; and even on the coast no rain falls from April to October, and for the remainder of the year there is nothing but rain. Why, sir, of what use will this be for agricultural purposes? I would not, for that purpose, give a pinch of snuff for the whole territory. I wish to God we did not own it. I wish it was an impassable barrier to secure us against the intrusion of others. This is the character of the country. Who are we to send there? Do you think your honest farmers in Pennsylvania, New York, or even Ohio or Missouri, will abandon their farms to go upon any such enterprise as this? God forbid! If any man who is to go to that country, under the temptations of this bill, was my child—if he was an honest and industrious man, I would say to him, for God's sake, do not go there. You will not better your condition. You will exchange the comforts of home, and the happiness of civilized life, for the pains and perils of a precarious existence. But if I had a son whose conduct was such as made him a fit subject for Botany Bay, I would say, in the name of God, go. This is my estimate of the importance of the settlement. Now, what are we to gain by making the settlement? In what shape are our expenditures there to be returned? When are we to get any revenue from the citizens of ours who go to that distant territory—8,800 miles from the seat of Government, as I have it from the Senator from Missouri? What return are they going to make us for protecting them with military posts, at an expense, at the outset, of $200,000, and swelling hereafter God knows how much—probably equalling the annual expenses of the Florida war. What will they return to us for this enormous expense, after we have tempted them, by this bill, to leave their pursuits of honest industry, to go upon this wild and gambling adventure, in which their blood is to be staked?

Sir, does any man suppose that, in the next twenty years, we shall derive a cent of revenue? I put it to the Senate, is there a man here who supposes that the wealth or power of the United States will be increased to the amount of one solitary cent by all the colonists that may be prevailed upon to go there? No, sir, not a cent. Well, now, make a moderate estimate; what do you think it will cost, on the scale on which you set out, during the next twenty years? Why, if you get off with ten millions of dollars, it will be about what any reasonable man would consider a proper estimate. The country is inhabited by fierce and warlike savages. It is a country abounding with recesses to which they can retreat, and in which they will be inaccessible; and if we ever get to war with them, (and we know by experience that the most certain way to get to war is to go among them,) we shall find another Florida; and every person knows how much the expenses of that unfortunate war had exceeded the anticipations of those who foreboded the worst. Sir, the interests of the people of the United States, throwing out of view the ardent and unpatriotic desire of adventurers, and consulting the solid interests of the agricultural and manufacturing interests of the country, I venture to say that, for the next twenty years, there is not a congressional district in this Union, costing the Government nothing, but, on the contrary, contributing to its support, which will not be more valuable to the United States than the whole of this territory. It never can be of any value for agricultural purposes.

All the accounts I have read concur, without any dissenting voice, in stating that the fur trade is in rapid course of deterioration. The animals which yield furs are disappearing; and the time is not remote when even the British fur company will abandon the country, if you leave them alone. So you have a prospect, by the mere lapse of time—by the mere progress of events—by the extermination of animals—of having the territory dropped into our possession. But, if the British had no claim to this territory, and there were nothing which impelled us to go with our military establishments and agricultural settlements, I would not consent—if there was an embankment of even five feet to be removed, I would not consent to expend five dollars to remove that embankment to enable our population to go there. I do not wish to tempt the people to form settlements there. I wish this to be a great empire, grown up by the natural course of civilization, and the natural extension of population. I thank God for his mercy, in placing the Rocky Mountains there. I believe, if it had not been for those mountains, we would have been already in the Pacific. You cannot civilize men if they have an indefinite extent of territory over which to spread their numbers; for, so long as they spread their numbers, instead of becoming civilized, they become semi-savage. All agree that civilization can best be effected when the country is hedged in by narrow boundaries.

Why, Mr. President, if there is any one lesson inculcated by history, beyond the possibility of doubt, it is that all nations of the world which have within the last one or two centuries sent out distant colonies, have found them to be far more expensive than profitable. There is nothing which can justify such an enterprise, but the existence of a superabundant and starving population. In our case there is no such necessity. Are we pent up within narrow limits—are we stifled for air?—are we starving for want of means of subsistence? Why, sir, we are very much distressed, to be sure; but it is from plethora, not from consumption. We are now in the condition in which a Senator from Kentucky, in discussing the tariff bill, told us we were, and that is—in a most deplorable condition. The barns were full—were breaking down with the weight of grain; the country was overburdened with a superabundance of all the means of human subsistence. This is the case now. In the history of the United States, a period was never known of such an abundance of every thing necessary to support human life—corn selling for from ten to twelve and a half cents a bushel; wheat at forty cents, and every other article of consumption in proportion—and with a country like this, and with a soil as productive as the valleys of Egypt, and so extensive that you cannot people it for a century to come,—with such a soil, and such means for rewarding the honest agricultural laborer, shall we, at an enormous expense, derived from taxes upon the labor of the industrious, indulge the whims and caprices of the adventurous portion of the population, who love to roam over the mountains? It is not proper to hold out such inducements to our citizens to engage in these adventurous pursuits. There are no advantages to be derived from them. The advantages of the fur trade have been highly extolled; but I have seen no results but the enormous wealth of John Jacob Astor, and one or two others, to justify the commendation. Are the honest mechanic and agriculturist, engaged in the honest pursuits of industry, to be taxed, that inducements may be held out to the adventurous to engage in this trade, which has enriched so few?

52d Sess.]

The Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1848.]

Have you read the account of Astor's adventures in the fur trade? You will there find that the most of his operators were foreigners and the half-breed Indians. There were no citizens of the United States employed by him; and by this bill you will induce none of your citizens to embark but those of an adventurous character—those who have nothing to lose. I cannot think any man who has a strong feeling of patriotism—who has a heart bound to his country as it ought to be, and endearing associations inseparably connected with home—would abandon his friends and family, and all endeared to him, to emigrate to that country. No, sir; captivating as it may be to one portion of the Union, this is a spirit we ought not to encourage: we ought, rather, to induce the honest and industrious classes to remain among us, and contribute to the support of their Government.

But, in the ardor with which gentlemen have been drawn into the discussion of this question, they seem to have totally overlooked a very important matter—the ways and means. Do we so abound in financial resources, as to be able, at this particular moment, to appropriate $200,000 to a scheme of this kind? Have gentlemen considered the question of ways and means? I have not heard a single individual, in the course of the debate, make the slightest reference to the pecuniary means of this country to justify such an appropriation. I must, however, except the Senator from New Hampshire. At the close of his remarks, he made a slight allusion to our finances, rather with a view of showing that, as bad as they were, we might make the appropriation necessary to carry the plan into operation. That gentleman was himself Secretary of the Treasury, at a period of great financial embarrassment; and the tribulation to which he was then exposed, no doubt, brought him to sympathize with the present Secretary of that Department, and to consider the importance of having ways and means; and the still greater importance of prosecuting this measure, whether you have the ways and means or not. Well, sir, two great political parties are now contending for power. They have both, in some degree, adopted the same watchword—economy and retrenchment. That was the sign under which the Whigs conquered in 1840; it is the sign under which the Republicans hope to conquer now. Hitherto, on this subject, we have had nothing but words. I have not seen the slightest effort to establish, in the administration of this Government, any system of economy. I have not witnessed any apparent misgiving in the minds of Senators who are favorable to the adoption of this measure, as to the deficient condition of the finances. I confidently believe that we will not have a sufficiency of means to carry on the Government, and to pay the ordinary demands which are contracted on its behalf. The expenditure which the Government is required to make will not leave, at the end of the year, any thing to be applied to the object contemplated in this bill.

I have seen a statement of the probable amount of the imports of the last quarter, purporting to come from a person who investigated the subject thoroughly, and who had the means to investigate it; and the result was, that the probable amount of the whole imports for that period would be little more than eight millions of dollars. What does this indicate? A state of things which, of all others, calls upon us to pause.

What is the condition of this Government? Who is it that rules? Who is responsible for the measures adopted here? Nobody, sir. We are in a state of interregnum. Nobody is responsible. For God's sake, let us postpone measures of this kind until there is somebody in the Government responsible. The Executive is exerting, no doubt, the best of his powers to do something; but he is not sustained by the other branches of the Legislature. Neither of the great parties seems to have any sympathy for the Executive. They stand by, and fold their arms. If you should say to either of them, you have appropriated $200,000 without having the means to meet that appropriation, they would say it does not concern us; it belongs to the other party to provide the ways and means. For God's sake, then, let us not adopt equivocal measures of this kind, when there is no party responsible for any thing. Wait a year or two. Within that period you will have a chance of having that territory gained by amicable negotiation. Within that period you will certainly have somebody at the head of this Government—whether Democratic or Whig—of sufficient power to assume the responsibility of the measures adopted for administering the Government. I beseech you now, by every consideration connected with the national welfare, to pause. The time will come when it will be proper to act. I think, of all times, this is the most inappropriate; and I say, emphatically, pause before you proceed further in this matter.

Mr. LINN remarked that it was his wish to close the debate on this subject; and, unless some other Senator desired to address the Senate then, he would move to pass over the bill, informally, till to-morrow. He made that motion, and it was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 26.

The Oregon Territory.

The unfinished debate from yesterday, on the question of passing the Oregon bill, was resumed.

Mr. LINN addressed the Senate.

With the exception of the two Senators from South Carolina, the Senators who had taken ground of opposition confined their objections to one provision of the bill—that providing a grant of lands to settlers.

One of the Senators from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) objected not only to that provision, but to other provisions, and in general to the expediency and policy of any action upon the subject at present. The other Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) who spoke yesterday, took wider ground, and objected to the bill in every particular. If his views were well-founded, we never should have any thing to do with the territory.

In answering the objections of the last Senator, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) he would meet all that had been made from every quarter.

It was, however, matter of gratification to him, that so many Senators had concurred in the propriety, policy, and expediency of the general objects of the bill, and that their objections were confined to a single provision.

If he understood the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. McDUFFIE) correctly, he conceived that Senator imputed to him a violation of the maxims of sound policy, by precipitating this measure without due consideration. If the Senator would but look to the records of Congress for the last twenty years, he would find that such an imputation was groundless. A bill of similar nature, and with the same object in view, was urged upon Congress with great ability by Dr. Floyd, in 1821. Mr. Monroe, in his last annual message, and Mr. Adams, while President of the United States, recommended, in forcible terms, the attention of Congress to be given to the subject. In 1828, Congress did take it up; and a bill for the occupation of the territory was discussed at great length in both Houses. It failed in the Senate by a bare majority of two votes. It had been repeatedly before Congress since, and almost continuously since 1838-'39. There was nothing precipitate in all this, and certainly no want of due consideration. For his own part, he had always acted with studied delicacy in the matter. When it was urged upon him that while so many difficulties were to be adjusted with Great Britain, it was inexpedient to take any decided step in relation to a minor point, he refrained from pressing the subject to a final vote. Now, the main difficulties with England were adjusted; and there were none left pending but the minor ones, of which he considered this the most important. So far, then, from being chargeable with having chosen an inauspicious and inexpedient time for urging this measure, he thought he had selected the most appropriate, and he would say, critically appropriate, period, for taking a necessary, and almost indispensable step.

He understood the Senator's objections to the bill to be three-fold. First, he objects that the bill would, in its main provisions, be an infraction of the treaty of 1818, renewed in 1827: secondly, that, if carried out, it would involve our Government in the expenses of an armed military occupation of the territory; and, thirdly, that the territory is a useless acquisition, likely to prove, not only an incumbrance, but a disadvantageous one, by inciting our population to dispersion, instead of that concentration which he considers essential to the highest state of civilization.

Mr. L. here took these points in succession, and entered upon their refutation with elaborate arguments, fortified by documentary evidence.

First, he considered the arguments of the Senators who had taken ground that the bill would be an infraction of the treaty, and examined critically that branch of the subject, concluding with a reference to the proposition made to Mr. Gallatin, in 1826, by the British ministry, when they wanted an additional stipulation in the renewal of the treaty of 1818, for the right of joint occupancy; which Mr. Gallatin refused to concede, and upon the very ground that justified this bill; and showed it was not an infraction of the treaty, and that England had put it out of her power so to regard it, by the very application which she had

3D Sess.]

The Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1848.]

made, and which she was refused by our negotiator. Mr. L., having disposed of this objection, proceeded to the next.

The second objection related to the expense of the proposed measure. In the outset, the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. McDuffie) had made a mistake in supposing the appropriation required by this bill would amount to $200,000. It only called for half that amount. This, in ten years, (if obliged to be continued so long,) would amount to but $1,000,000, instead of $10,000,000, as the Senator argued. But had not the Senator entirely overlooked the numerous losses which this country had suffered for the last thirty years, through its commerce and its industry, by being gradually supplanted in that region by British trading companies? At one time, we had a trade, in furs alone, worth half a million of dollars annually; and, through the supineness of our Government, it had been allowed to dwindle down to $2,000. Did we not, then, incur incalculably greater loss by neglect, than the annual expenditure now proposed? In the next ten years, would not the increased advantages to our commerce in the Pacific, the facilities afforded by the security of our harbors in the territory to our marine service, and all the other advantages of insuring a thriving population on the border of the Pacific, be infinitely more than the sum of one million, even if the occupation by military posts costs so much? Now, with regard to distance, inconvenience, and expense, he asked Senators only to draw a parallel between this measure and that of the establishment of the African squadron, which was to place the recaptured negroes in the colony of Liberia. He showed that this squadron was the twelfth part of the navy of the United States—to wit, 80 guns out of 940; and that the whole cost of the navy for 1848 was about $7,000,000—the twelfth part of which was near $600,000; and this was the annual cost of the African squadron, while only $100,000 was proposed for the Columbia settlement. The African squadron was to be kept up five years, at near $600,000 per annum, besides loss of lives and ships on the African coast. This was near $3,000,000; yet no objection to that! Mr. L. commented on this strange preference given to an African over an American object, and insisted that, while millions could be lavished on the African squadron, no objection should be made to $100,000 for saving the Columbia from foreign dominion.

As to the third objection—that of the country being composed of rocky mountains, regions either covered with volcanic remains or arid sands, with only a small portion of arable land, and that subject to alternate droughts and inundations of rain—he (Mr. L.) should say that the Senator (Mr. McDuffie) who entertained these opinions, must certainly be unacquainted with the vast amount of documentary evidence gained from eye-witnesses, whose testimony does not admit of a question of doubt, and all which concur in proving that, in the Oregon Territory, there are extensive valleys not inferior to our Western valleys in size, unrivalled in fertility, and blessed with a salubrity of climate scarcely equalled by that of any State in this Union. Mr. L. here read a vast accumulation of documentary evidence in proof of this position.

Having met all these arguments in detail, Mr. L. proceeded with general arguments in support of the policy and expediency of the bill; he demanded why the British wanted it, if it was so worthless; animadverted upon the inconsistency of treating the territory as not worth having, and, at the same time, dreading a war from Great Britain, if we touched it; and concluded with an exhortation to Senators, before they decided upon voting against it, to consider well the effect which a rejection of this essential step would have—not only disappointing and discouraging our own citizens, but giving countenance to the pretensions of, and leaving open and undisputed to, a rival power, every sort of encroachment upon our national rights.

Mr. BERRIEN next obtained the floor; and, on his motion,

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 27.

The Oregon Territory.

The bill for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, which still continues the special order, came up, and the debate on the question of its passage was resumed from yesterday.

Mr. BERRIEN being entitled to the floor, addressed the Senate for about an hour and a half in opposition to the passage of the bill.

His objections were chiefly: First, that the provision undertaking to make a future grant of lands to settlers, is in contravention of the spirit and meaning of the existing treaty between this Government and that of Great Britain; next, that it is an inexpedient and impolitic time to legislate upon the subject at all; and, lastly, that this bill, under existing circumstances, is an injudicious interruption or interference with the constitutional prerogative of the Executive department, which has notified Congress that a negotiation is pending in relation to this subject.

He agreed with those Senators who held that the provision guaranteeing to settlers a grant of land would be an infraction of the treaty. He agreed with the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) not only in his opposition to that provision, but also in regard to the inexpediency, under existing circumstances, of attempting to carry out other provisions of the bill. With most of what had fallen from the other Senator from South Carolina he also concurred, though he was not disposed to undervalue the importance to our commerce of our

JANUARY, 1848.]

Plan of an Exchequer.

[17th Cong.]

right to the territory, or the advantages which we might derive from its occupation and settlement. But, taking the subject in all its bearings into consideration, he could not but believe that he subverted the interests of this country best by giving his vote against the passage of the bill.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 27.

Plan of an Exchequer.

The House, upon the call of Mr. FILLMORE, resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the subject of the exchequer—the question being on the motion of Mr. CUSHING to amend the resolution concluding that report, by striking out the word “not.”

Mr. FILLMORE, who held the floor, addressed the House at length. He commenced by referring to the charge which had been put forth, that the Committee of Ways and Means, in proposing no affirmative action on the subject of the exchequer, had neglected to discharge their duty. In order to test whether they had, he should content himself by referring to the manner in which the question was presented to the committee, and in which it now stood before the House and the country, as admitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts. More than a year ago, the scheme was first submitted to Congress, and then referred to a Select Committee, a majority of whom were the friends of the President. After two and a half months of reflection, this committee reported a substitute for the plan of the Executive, dispensing with its main features. If, then, any modifications of the exchequer were wanted—if the Committee of Ways and Means had neglected to discharge their duty in reporting modifications, he referred gentlemen to those reported by the friends of the Administration. The gentleman, too, who made the objection that the Committee of Ways and Means had neglected their duty in not reporting modifications, since they could not agree to the plan itself, had given notice that he would move to substitute the bill of the Secretary of the Treasury for his own bill, for the purpose of bringing the subject before the House in every possible shape. Now, he submitted it to the consideration of the House, whether the Committee of Ways and Means had not presented the subject in every shape possible, by not favoring either of the schemes? The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CUSHING) had moved to strike out the word “not,” so as to make the resolution of the committee an affirmative proposition. He would state, in reference to that matter, that he had himself risen and proposed the word be stricken out, thereby making the resolution an affirmative instead of a negative proposition. He could not see the difference between voting in favor of a resolution declaring that the exchequer should not be adopted, and voting against a resolution declaring that it should be adopted. If, indeed, there were any in the House, who, after the many discussions which had taken place, were unprepared to say whether they were in favor of, or against, the exchequer, he was sorry for it. He could not but admire the manly independence of the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. FENDLERON,) who yesterday told the House that, although many of his constituents had petitioned for it, he must, after a close and careful examination of the subject, give his vote against the proposition. It was a determination resulting from an honest conviction of the heart, which he admired. He could not do otherwise than commend the spirit of the man who, when he found a measure to be right, resolved to hold himself ready to sustain it; and, if wrong, to condemn it. Nor could he think that there were men in the House who would take shelter of their opinions under a negative proposition. After some further remarks upon this head, he proceeded to an explanation of a position which was taken in the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, and which, he understood, was misceived by some of his friends.

He noticed the objections which had been raised to a continuance of the present regulations of the Treasury Department, on the ground that the laws in force did not provide any place of security for the public money, and also that there were not sufficient provisions of law for the punishment of embezzlement. The gentleman from Massachusetts had argued that there were no provisions for the punishment of defaulters, except such as might be contained in the act of 1789, and the resolution of 1816.

Mr. CUSHING said his proposition was more qualified; and made another remark not heard.

Mr. FILLMORE alluded to the supposition entertained by some, that the Committee of Ways and Means had omitted their duty. He feared the House had forgotten their own action on the subject.

There were already existing by law ample checks and guards for the security of the public money. In the first place, there was the law of 1789, which provides that it shall be the duty of the Treasurer of the United States to receive and keep the moneys of the United States, and disburse them upon warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury. Mark the words: “disburse them upon warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury.” Then, what next? As to the medium in which the public dues shall be paid, we have (said Mr. F.) the joint resolution of 1816, which prescribes that they shall be paid in gold and silver, treasury notes, and the bills of specie-paying banks. Thus we have (said Mr. F.) the provision designating the officers who shall keep the public money; and next, we have the medium in which it shall be paid. Now, he wanted to know what more there was in the famous exchequer bill which came from the Treasury, or that of the Select Committee of this House, to secure the public treasure from embezzlement? Instead of calling the officer who is to have the custody of the public money, the Treasurer of the United States, the bill proposes to call them a board of exchequer, though one of them is to be this same Treasurer. First, there is to be the Secretary of the Treasury; second, the Treasurer of the United States; and then there are to be three commissioners to constitute this board of exchequer. The system now in operation was but a part of that "one idea" which provides for five officers, instead of one to do the same thing, and who are to be appointed in the same manner, viz., by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. But it had been said that there was now no security for the faithful custody and disbursement of the public money, and therefore the Committee of Ways and Means neglected their duty in failing to provide for it. Let us (said Mr. F.) look a little into the law on this subject. Gentlemen seemed to have forgotten that, in repealing the independent treasury, they left the penal part of it providing for the security of the public money untouched. They repealed the act so far as it relates to the receivers general, and the public buildings for the deposit of the public money, together with the provision requiring the public dues to be paid in gold and silver; yet the penal part of the act—which secures the faithful custody, transfer, and disbursement of the public money—this House had not the folly to repeal. Not only did they retain it, but they added to it. There were the most ample and the most penal provisions against anybody who should use the public treasure. In addition to the penalty imposed by the sub-treasury act, they had also provided for the evidence by which guilt should be ascertained—which the independent treasury act did not do.

3D Sess.]

Plan of an Exchequer.

[JANUARY, 1848.]

There was the law as it now stood. Were not these provisions penal enough to satisfy the gentleman? Had the Committee of Ways and Means neglected their duty, in not imposing greater penalties? If so, he would point them to the provisions of the famous exchequer bill, and then see if that measure provided better securities for the public money than now existed. Instead of prohibiting the public officers from using, investing, or loaning the public money, they were expressly authorized to do it. He asked if the Committee of Ways and Means had neglected their duty, when they said that these penalties for the unfaithful application of the public money were ample, and far better than the exchequer bill.

But the gentleman said that this was no bank. Had he attempted to give his definition of what a bank was? He said, to be sure, that it performed the functions of a bank; but still it was no bank. Sir, (said Mr. F.), I have been somewhat puzzled myself to know what a bank was. He had a definition of a bank here, which he had transcribed from a work lately published, called "The History of Banking in the United States." According to that definition, a bank was "a commercial institution or repository for the purpose of receiving the money of individuals, and to improve it by trafficking in merchandise, bullion, or bills of exchange; and may be of a public or private nature." Now, if this was the true definition of a bank, the exchequer certainly was one.

In the first place, it was an institution or repository, in the language of the definition, for the purpose of receiving the money of individuals. This exchequer proposed a bank of deposit for the purpose of receiving the funds of individuals, and either to keep them in security professedly—how far it might do that, he would not pretend to say—or to improve them by trafficking in goods, bullion, or bills of exchange. This, it would be perceived, it was expressly authorized to do; for it was to deal in bills of exchange, by buying and selling them. There was the definition from one of the standard works of the country, which showed that this exchequer was a bank, and was from a writer who was disinterested, and, so far as he had given evidence of it, without prejudice on the subject. But Mr. F. did not press this definition of a bank. A long time ago they had a discussion on the sub-treasury, which was created for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public money, by means of the Government's own officers. This went far beyond the sub-treasury. That did not propose the buying and selling of bills of exchange; this did. That did not propose the receiving the deposits of individuals. That did not propose a board of directors; this did. That did not propose branches in the States; this did. It would, therefore, be perceived that it went beyond the sub-treasury in its likeness to a bank.

Mr. GIDDINGS moved the previous question, and reminded the House that this was private-bill day.

Mr. CAYE JOHNSON called for tellers, and they were ordered.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. CUSHING called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 66, nays 141.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The question then recurred on the previous question, and tellers were called and ordered.

Mr. CUSHING withdrew his amendment to strike out the word "not" from the resolution of the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means, which affirmed that it was "not" expedient to adopt the Executive plan of the exchequer.

Mr. BOARDMAN and READ were then appointed tellers to take the vote on seconding the demand for the previous question; and they reported 98 in the affirmative, and 75 in the

JANUARY, 1848.]

The Oregon Territory.

[2d Sess.]

negative; so there was a second. The main question was also ordered to be put. The question then recurred on the resolution of the minority of the committee, which was presented by Mr. ATHERTON, in the following words:

And that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to bring in a bill regulating the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys, in such a manner as shall, as far as possible, substitute provisions of law for executive discretion in the management of the finances; shall prevent the moneys of the people from being used for purposes of private speculation and emolument, and shall render the Government independent of the agency and influence of moneyed corporations.

Mr. PICKENS wished it to be understood that that was not a substitute for, but an addition to, the report of the majority of the committee.

The yeas and nays were called for on the amendment; and being ordered, resulted—yeas 105, nays 116.

The question then came up on the adoption of the following resolution of the Committee of Ways and Means, viz:

Resolved, That the plan of an exchequer presented to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury at the last session of Congress, entitled "A bill amendatory of the several acts establishing the Treasury Department," ought not to be adopted.

And, the roll having been called, the result was as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Ayer, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Black, Blair, Boardman, Botta, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Charles Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burke, Burnell, William Butler, William O. Butler, Calhoun, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Cary, Casey, Chapman, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, Olifford, Clinton, Coles, Colquitt, Cranston, Gravens, Cross, Daniel, Garrett Davis, Richard D. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Deberry, Doan, Doig, Eastman, John Edwards, John C. Edwards, Egbert, Everett, Ferris, Fessenden, Fillmore, John G. Floyd, Fornance, A. Lawrence Foster, Gates, Gentry, Gerry, Gilmer, William O. Goode, Gordon, Graham, Granger, Green, Gustine, Gwin, Hall, Harris, Hays, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Howard, Hubard, Hunter, Hunt, Charles J. Ingersoll, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, James, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, John P. Kennedy, King, Lane, Lewis, Linn, Littlefield, Lowell, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKennan, McKeon, Mallory, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, Samson Mason, John Thomson Mason, Mathiot, Mathews, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Medill, Meriwether, Miller, Mitchell, Moore, Morgan, Morrow, Newhard, Oliver, Osborne, Owaley, Parmenter, Partridge, Payne, Pearce, Pendleton, Pickens, Powell, Ramsay, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Randolph, Read, Reding, Reynolds, Rhett, Ridgway, Riggs, Rodney, Rogers, Roosevelt, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Saunders, Sewell, Shepperd, Shields, Slade, Truman Smith, Snyder, Sprigg, Stanly, Steenrod, Stokeley, Stratton, Alexander H. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Summers, Sumter, Sweeney, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trotti, Trumbull, Tunney, Underwood, Van Buren, Wallace, Ward, Warren, Washington, Weller, Westbrook, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Wood, Yerke, Augustus Young, and John Young—193.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Borden, Bowne, Green, W. Caldwell, Cowen, Cushing, Thomas F. Foster, Patrick G. Goode, Halsted, Hudson, William W. Irwin, William Cost Johnson, Isaac D. Jones, Morris, Rencher, Tillinghast, Thomas W. Williams, and Winthrop—18.

So the resolution was adopted.
The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 30.

The Oregon Territory.

Mr. YOUNG remarked, that it was not his intention to detain the Senate long with the few observations he had to make, as the very elaborate discussion which the subject had received did not leave much that was new to be said. He thought, however, it would not be difficult to prove that this bill would not, and, indeed, could not, be viewed by Great Britain as an infraction of the existing treaty between that Government and this. He should not attempt to travel over the same ground so ably explored by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. LEXA) in his statements of the foundation of our title. He should dwell chiefly on the fact, admitted by Senators on both sides, that our claim is prior and paramount to that of Great Britain. It would be necessary, however, to have a clear definition of what that claim is. He understood it to be based, in the first instance, on the discovery of the Columbia River by Captain Gray, in the year 1792. We have evidence of the admission of this fact, not only in the writings of British navigators, but in the recognition, by the British Government itself, of the name given by Captain Gray to the river. The discovery was followed up by that of the sources of the Columbia River by Lewis and Clarke, sent out by Mr. Jefferson for the purpose in 1806. Captains Lewis and Clarke explored the country, traced the river from its sources to its mouth, and took formal possession of the territory for the United States.

Our next claim grows out of the occupation of the country. The first settlement made in it was by John Jacob Astor, in 1811. In the war which followed, between this country and Great Britain, he was dispossessed; but in the restoration of Fort George (Astoria) to our Government in 1818, Great Britain recognised our right to that settlement, and consequently, to whatever title rose out of it. In fact, up to that restoration, and long after, we never heard of any claim to the territory on the part of Great Britain. Here, then, we had an addi-

ND SESS.]

The Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1843.]

ional claim—that which grows out of the law of nations; for although, in the first instance, the law of nations recognizes as the first claim priority of discovery, it further requires that the discovery shall be followed up by occupation; and we had fulfilled the condition. We had made the discovery by Captain Gray, and Captains Lewis and Clarke; and had followed it up by occupation, which was only interrupted by the force of war, but subsequently the possession was restored to us as our right; and from the date of that restoration, in 1818, we have never parted with the occupation. The negotiations then, and every negotiation since, show that we maintained throughout this whole period our title, rights, and occupation of the territory.

We never have abandoned one iota of our claims to its sovereignty. On the contrary, we have evinced an unwavering determination to maintain our rights. It struck him that Senators were mistaken who urged that Great Britain had exclusive occupation of the territory; or that, from the use she makes of the stipulations of the treaty, she can acquire any title. It struck him, also, that it was a mistake to think she will ever look to the territory for agricultural purposes. And herein lay a great difference between her views and ours. They are, in fact, different, and yet not conflicting. We want the territory for agricultural pursuits mainly. She looks to it for the main pursuits of her Hudson Bay Company, which is the trade in furs.

Now, it is in conformity with the laws of nations that Indians—wandering tribes like the Arabs, or persons merely traversing a country for purposes of hunting, fishing, trading, &c.—have been regarded as no impediments to those who take possession of the soil for making a permanent occupation, and converting it to agricultural purposes. It was according to this recognized law of nations that Europeans settled on this continent, though it was at the time inhabited by the aborigines.

It was on this principle that the Pilgrim Fathers took possession of the soil of New England, and turned it to agricultural purposes, without breaking the law of nations by dispossessing the Indians who would not cultivate it. So in the Oregon Territory: the Hudson Bay Company, not having for its primary object agricultural pursuits, never had encouraged more culture of the soil than necessary for the temporary support of its employes. But, with our citizens, agriculture must be the primary object. And we have already a number of our citizens there engaged in this pursuit. There is no jealousy towards them on the part of the Hudson Bay Company, so long as they make agriculture their primary pursuit. What can be more convincing than this, that it is not for agricultural purposes the British look to the country? The apprehension, then, is entirely groundless, that they would view the occupation of the soil by our citizens as an infraction of the treaty. Great Britain never will want it herself for agricultural purposes. No British company of capitalists will ever run the risk of investing their money in such a speculation.

If, as some gentlemen suppose, such a company has been formed, it must soon fall to the ground; for it never will come to any thing in practice. None but individuals living on the soil, and cultivating it for themselves, can fully realize its benefits. Our citizens are peculiarly suited for that purpose. Those who have gone there wish to remain, and others wish to follow them. They ask but the same protection of laws from us, which Great Britain affords to her subjects. They wish also to be assured of a grant of the lands they may reclaim from the wilderness. All this the Senator from Missouri proposes to do by this bill. He proposes to give them hereafter the grant they ask; to extend over them the Territorial laws of Iowa; and to establish a sufficient number of forts to give them protection from savage Indians. Now, may not all this be done without any infraction of the treaty? Mr. Y. here referred to a conversation between Mr. Gallatin and the British ministers, in the negotiation about the treaty, in which the British ministers themselves suggested that the laws of one of our organized Territories might be extended over the country, though we might not organize a new government in it. They also suggested a plan by which forts might be erected, and the soil might be cultivated. How, then, can it give Great Britain offence, that we carry out, by this bill, her own suggestions? Our citizens already there give no offence, by occupying any portion of the soil they please in agriculture. On the contrary, the most friendly feelings are evinced by the employes of the Hudson Bay Company towards them. It is only when they engage in the fur trade, that they are looked upon with jealousy. We all know that both Great Britain and her Hudson Bay Company are governed by what they consider their best interests. Their friendly disposition to our citizens engaged in agriculture shows that they do not look to that as their object. Why, then, should we suppose they would object to any number of our citizens taking up land for agricultural purposes?

Mr. Y. here read the remarks of Mr. Greenhow on the subject. He also referred to the opinions expressed by the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. MOREHEAD,) the other day, with a view of showing that the Senator was mistaken in supposing the Hudson Bay Company had any object of making a permanent location of lands for agricultural purposes or settlements. The whole matter was explained by Mr. Lea. He says the greater portion of the settlers on the lands are missionaries, who proceeded to the territory for the benevolent object of benefiting the Indians, by teaching them the truths of Christianity, and the usages of civilized life. In the pursuit of this object, it was found essential that they should occupy and farm some

JANUARY, 1843.]

The Oregon Territory.

[27th CONG.]

land—both for subsistence, and with a view of instructing the Indians in the advantages of cultivation, over the precarious means of supporting life before known to them. At the forts of the Hudson Bay Company, no more land is cultivated than is absolutely necessary to supply the wants of those engaged in the primary occupation of the fur trade. There is nothing like an effort or disposition to make permanent settlements. It is a mere temporary occupation. There is nothing even of a permanent character in the forts of the Hudson Bay Company. They are mere stockade-forts, perishable in their nature, and only calculated for defence against Indians. He mentioned all this to show there will be no difficulty in the way of our citizens settling in the country. The Hudson Bay Company can have no objection, and will make none, to agricultural settlements. Now, this being the case, what is there, really, in the present bill, to give offence? Not the appropriation of portions of the soil for agricultural purposes; for no objection is made to that now, nor will there be after this bill passes. Not the establishment of forts; for that was suggested by the British themselves, and the example has been set by them. Not the protection of our citizens by the extension of our Territorial laws over the Territory; for they also suggested that, and set the example. Suppose they should object to any one of these things: can we not say to them, "You have done it; and if the treaty authorizes you, it authorizes us?" And as to the occupation of the fort at the mouth of the Columbia River: was it not Mr. Astor who first built it? and was it not restored to us in 1818, because the right of possession was in us? Have we not kept it ever since; and may we not now either repair it, rebuild it, or enlarge it, at our pleasure, without cause of offence? What else does this bill propose to do? To establish two Indian agencies. What objection can there be to that? It is well known to the British that our practice is to appoint Indian agents to protect and control the Indians in our territories. They know we have territory in Oregon, and Indians on it. They know that the duty of our Indian agents by no means interferes with their fur trade. And with respect to the jurisdiction to be extended over the country, do we not propose to avoid any interference with British jurisdiction, by the provision that any subjects of England accused of offence under our laws shall be transferred for trial to British authority? No difficulty or objection can therefore arise out of that portion of the bill. The next provision is, that $100,000 shall be appropriated to carry out the measure. It was to be lamented that the treasury was in its present condition. But it did not seem to him to come well from the Senators of the old States to object to this small item of $100,000, and, in short, to every appropriation required for the new States and Territories. They should contrast the appropriations for the old States with those for the new; and before they object to the latter, judge fairly whether it was just or generous in them to become objectors. Yet how seldom were they disposed to mete out to the new States even the measure of justice. It was with the utmost difficulty the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CHITTENDEN) last session obtained an appropriation of $100,000 to remove some of the impediments to navigation in the Western waters. The usual annual appropriation for that object, so necessary, had been withheld for two or three years. In the just effort, too, to obtain an appropriation for the Western armory, did not the preponderance of the interests of the old States prevail to cut it down to the paltry sum of $5,000? Why should the condition of the treasury be constantly held up as an excuse for not doing justice to the West, while the most extravagant and useless appropriations are lavished elsewhere? Look at the appropriations recommended to Congress this session. May not ten times the amount required by this bill be retrenched from them? What occasion is there for such an increased and extravagant naval establishment? Does not every one see that smaller vessels of war would do more service for the country than those large and costly frigates, too unwieldy to act with celerity or effect?

When all this would be duly considered, he was in hopes the Senators of the old States would drop their objections to this appropriation of $100,000.

He trusted he had established a sufficient number of points to show that gentlemen were mistaken in supposing this bill could create any difficulty with Great Britain. He had shown that our claim to the territory is the best claim; that we have a right paramount to any that Great Britain possibly can have; that we have priority of possession, which we have never parted with; that we can give no offence to Great Britain in doing what she suggested to us we might do, and what she herself has done; that the occupation of the soil by our citizens is a legitimate occupation for agricultural purposes, to which she, merely in pursuit of commercial objects, cannot object; that we make no direct grant, and only undertake to do it hereafter—a provision which, by the uniform and undeviating practice of our Government, is never carried out till we have extinguished all other claims of title, as evinced by our uniform extinction of Indian titles; and that we are only raising objections, which, if not raised here, never would be thought of by Great Britain. It would be very well understood by Great Britain that, as a negotiation is pending for the adjustment of boundary, (and he believed that was the only question at issue in the negotiations about Oregon,) this Government would not carry out the provisions till that question was settled. The prospective nature of the provision would be so construed. The British Government could not help so con-

3d Sess.]

The Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1843.]

struing it, knowing that, according to undeveloped practice, we could not for some years (four or five at least) take the preliminary step of extinguishing the Indian title; without accomplishing which, we never make grants of lands. This is such a plain view of the case, that it seemed strange gentlemen should overlook it. Keeping it in view, they certainly could not find any provision in the bill justly meriting the objection that it could give offence to Great Britain. For his part, he viewed it in altogether a different light. He regarded it as he was sure the British themselves would regard it—as a great peace measure, instead of one calculated to produce strife. With these convictions, he should himself vote for the bill.

Mr. LINN did not rise to consume more than a very few moments of the time of the Senate. Indeed, he felt it unnecessary to do so, after the very lucid statement of the Senator from Illinois, placing the matter on the plain grounds on which it should be viewed. He (Mr. L.) should, therefore, not say another word on the subject of title, for that was conceded; nor was it necessary to recapitulate what had already been so repeatedly urged. He was sorry the proposition was made to recommit the bill, because he knew, at this late period of the session, it would be fatal; as a delay must arise which would, in all probability, bring up the subject again at too late a day to pass it through the other House, amidst the multiplicity of business at the close of the session.

This bill had been drawn up with great care, and with the special object of not leaving it obnoxious to the objection that it could be considered an infraction of the treaty with Great Britain. Indeed, so scrupulously had it been drawn up, that, instead of extending our Territorial laws over the country, merely as Great Britain suggested we might do, without being liable to objection on her part, that provision of the bill had been made to guard against any possible infringement on the rights of the subjects of Great Britain, coming under the operation of these laws; and it is provided that British subjects, accused of offences in our territory, should be handed over to British authorities for trial. The British minister told our minister how far we should not go; that is, that we should not organize a new government and laws for the territory; and the bill keeps clear of that, by taking their own suggestion of the means of accomplishing our object. With many of the positions of the Senator from Virginia he could agree, but he should draw opposite conclusions from them. For instance, they could stand upon the same ground as to what it was right to do; but, while the Senator conceived it inexpedient to do it, he would feel that, because it was right, it was expedient, and ought not, and could not, give offence. When it was done, suppose Great Britain remonstrated; what would be the natural course, but to say to her, Well, we did it because you did; you set the example; if we are wrong, you must have been first wrong; so let us both talk the matter over, like sensible people, and set it right. This would be the result, and not war. England could not help seeing that, if we committed a breach of the treaty, it was a consequence of herself having been first guilty of the same breach of the treaty. And as to her resentment being more likely to be provoked on a point of honor than on the mere question of territory, he should ask, Were we to be treated as if we had no points of honor at stake?—no appreciation of such feelings? Are we only to think of dollars and cents, and have no regard for our national honor in this matter? The Senate of the United States would be coming to a low pass indeed, if the expenditure called for by this bill were to outweigh the national honor at stake in the decision of the question. England is to jeopard her dearest interests sooner than permit her honor to be touched; but we are to do nothing to maintain ours. He never could, and never would, come to such conclusions. He knew the gallantry and the chivalry of the Senator from Virginia; and it was not, therefore, in disparagement of any thing he had said that he made these remarks. He seemed to attribute to his (Mr. L.'s) colleague and himself a very pugnacious disposition towards Great Britain.

Mr. ARONER disclaimed any thing personally applicable to the Senators. It was to the general tone of the friends of the bill he had alluded. The Senator from Missouri was the last man in this body for whom he could entertain unkind opinions.

Mr. LINN continued: What the Senator had stated amounted to this,—that it was his apprehension the British Government might make the remarks uttered here against its grasping policy, a pretext for hostile feelings; and that, taken in connection with General Jesup's letter on the subject of military posts in the territory, they could not help feeling resentment. Now, can the Senator, or any one else, suppose that Great Britain has any right to make objections to an officer of this Government freely expressing his opinions to the Executive, when officially called upon so to do; or that any Senator of the United States should be restrained from a free discussion of topics involving the interests and honor of our country, even if, in doing so, he is obliged to denounce the policy of a foreign power? Surely, any foreign power that would object to this freedom of discussion, must be only seeking for a bare pretext of quarrel. But he had no apprehension that this discussion would have any such effect. If it could have this effect, he would be glad to know how a quarrel was to be avoided. Nothing this Government could do to carry out its claims, or to assert its title to the territory, would be free from the same objections. There was no official act that could be devised—no possible step that could be taken, which would not be deemed conflicting with British interests. If we are to consult nothing but the preservation of harmony, we must remain perfectly quiet, and let British interests grow up and overspread the territory without interruption or remonstrance. Let the Hudson Bay Company go on settling the whole country, and turning its entire resources to its own advantage; let her have undisputed possession of the North-west territory from the Russian settlements to Mexico, and she will rejoice. That is the only way in which we can please and gratify that company, and conciliate the British Government. Any one step we take, no matter how trivial, to secure or promote our own interests there, must lessen their satisfaction.

FEBRUARY, 1843.]

The Oregon Territory.

[27th Cong.]

The Senator from Virginia must certainly have strangely misconceived his (Mr. L.'s) remarks, the other day, in relation to our loss of the fur trade. What he (Mr. L.) had stated was, that our fur trade, once amounting to $500,000 per annum, had dwindled down to $2,000. Not that the fur trade had been extinguished, or the fur animals exterminated, so as to make this difference; but that, to the amount of half a million of dollars annually, our fur trade in the North-west territory had been usurped by the Hudson Bay Company. Through the supineness of our Government, the Hudson Bay Company had been allowed to supplant us in our own soil. The trade is not destroyed; it has passed from our hands into those of the Hudson Bay Company. The company has undoubtedly, in some cases, trapped out the country—that is, reduced the supply of beaver. But it takes care to resuscitate such districts.

He had placed this bill on three grounds of immediate national and domestic interest to this Government: First, it will give protection to our citizens on the western frontier of the new States and Territories against the Indians congregated there for the relief of the old States; secondly, it will protect what remains of our fur trade, and have some tendency to restore what we have lost; and, thirdly, it will, by the protection and encouragement it affords to our citizens going to the territory, or there already, induce that occupation which is essential to the maintenance of our title and our rights. In relation to the system of military forts, he was fortified in his estimate of their importance, by the reports of the executive departments, and the recommendation of the subject to Congress, made by three or four Presidents of the United States. How the principles of this bill can, on any rational ground, produce war with Great Britain, he was at a loss to conceive, unless she is determined to snatch at any pretext as an occasion for war. She has herself gone beyond the point at which she can recur to the treaty for a pretext. She has said we may go so far without infraction of the treaty; and we only propose to do what she has suggested. The bill proposes nothing inconsistent with the admissions of her ministers as to what we might do, and had a right to do. If his friend from Virginia meant to press his motion for recommitment, he hoped it would be with instructions.

Mr. ARCHER said he would have no objection. The Select Committee being discharged, he was at some loss to know what committee to make the recommitment to. Perhaps the Committee of the Whole would be the best. But its recommitment might be dispensed with, if the Senate would agree to strike out the provision relating to the grant of lands. He would first try that motion, reserving the right, should objection be made, of putting the motion for recommitment afterwards.

The question was then put for unanimous assent to strike out; but objection was made.

Mr. ARCHER then said that it had been suggested to him that it would be best to recommit the bill, generally, without instructions. He would therefore move to recommit it to the Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. HUNTINGTON, the Senate then went into executive session, and soon adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 1.

The Oregon Territory

The unfinished debate on the question of passing the bill for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, came up at the special order.

Mr. RIVES recognized and adopted to the fullest extent the reasons so ably and eloquently enforced by the Senator from Missouri (Mr. LINN) in relation to the national importance of the territory. He also concurred with him in the opinion that our interests and our rights must suffer irretrievably by any further delay on the part of our Government to take the necessary steps for the occupation of the territory by our citizens. With the exception of the mere formality of taking possession of Fort George, (Astoria,) after the war, in 1818, our Government never had done any thing to obtain the occupation we claim as our right, even the joint occupation in pursuance of the treaty. For nearly thirty years—since the breaking up of Mr. Astor's establishment in 1812—we had been out of possession, and the British Hudson Bay Company had been allowed the exclusive occupation for all practical purposes. However limited the views and objects of that company were for the first ten or fifteen years of this interval, it was in vain now to escape the conviction that these views and objects have been enlarged and extended so as to embrace agricultural pursuits, and the permanent settlement of selected portions of the territory. Pending the difficulties which had so long existed between Great Britain and the United States, in relation to the North-eastern boundary and other irritating subjects, the postponement of this question of the occupation

3d Sess.]

The Oregon Territory.

[FEBRUARY, 1843.]

and settlement of the Oregon Territory was, perhaps, the best thing that could be done, under the circumstances. Now that these leading difficulties have been so happily adjusted by the late treaty, it seemed to be the proper time for taking some steps on the part of our Government to preserve our rights.

Mr. R. reviewed the whole history of our title, and showed that it took its origin in the original charters granting to our ancestors the territory from sea to sea—from the Atlantic to the Pacific. He recapitulated the history of the Columbia River, and all the arguments of title founded on discovery; and from all these, he proved that we stood on quite a different foundation from that on which Great Britain would stand. We claimed the sovereignty as ours by right of discovery. But if we neglected the condition of the law of nations, which requires that we should follow up the discovery by occupation, Great Britain might contend that our neglect was a waiver of our right. The terms of the existing treaty had, however, saved our claim on the ground of discovery; but we could no longer, with safety, refrain from some efficient act of joint occupation, consistent with our obligations and good faith under the treaty. He considered the provisions of this bill, with the exception of that proposed to be stricken out, were in strict conformity with the spirit and meaning of the convention, and such as would be perfectly unexceptionable. He therefore would vote for the recommitment of the bill; and if the provision for grants of land should be stricken out, he would give a hearty support to the bill.

Mr. SEYDER hoped the Senator from Virginia (Mr. APODHE) would modify his motion, which he now understood was to recommit the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations, so as to make it to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. APODHE then moved to recommit the bill to a Select Committee.

The Senate then went into executive session; and, after some time spent therein, Adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 2

The Oregon Territory.

The special order brought up the unfinished debate on the question of passing the bill for the occupation and settlement of the Oregon Territory—the motion pending being that of recommitting the bill to a Select Committee.

Mr. BEXTON said there was one point on which every Senator who had yet spoken concurred—that the title to the Territory was in the United States. The land being our property, we have an unquestionable right to make whatever use of it we desire. It is enough for us to know we are right, for us to do whatever we think it is our best interest to do with our own property. Nobody has a right to be offended at this. If any other power takes offence at what we propose to do with our own property, that should be no reason why we should not do it. The same arguments used on this occasion to tie up our hands from doing any thing lest it might provoke a collision with another power, had been pushed quite as far when General Jackson determined to insist upon our rights from France. Yet, because General Jackson was right, he persisted; and the result was contrary to the predictions of the timid—we obtained our right, and there was no collision. Were we now to pursue the same course, we would maintain our right too, and there would be no collision. But even if there should be war in consequence of our doing what we have an unquestionable right to do with our own property: that should not stop us. We know we are right, and we leave the consequences of maintaining our rights in the hands of Him who sides with justice.

It has been said that we should leave our cause to time—that time was our best negotiator. What had we ever gained by time? What had we ever gained by negotiation? In every instance that either had been tried between us and Great Britain, she had come off the gainer, and we the loser. It had been so with regard to the Oregon Territory: it had been so with regard to the North-eastern boundary. At first, all that England asked in relation to the North-eastern boundary, was a variation of the line, so as to give her a right of way at all seasons between Quebec and Halifax. When we would not agree to that, she offered to purchase as much territory as she wanted. That offer being rejected, her pretensions began to take root, and she had cultivated them so assiduously ever since, that at last she placed herself in a position to acquire more than ten times as much as she had at first asked. And in the treaty of 1842, our Secretary-negotiator gave her every thing she desired. So with the North-western boundary line between the Lake of the Woods and Lake Superior: she began by asking a revision of the line. Our negotiators were so astonished at even this boldness, that they had to ask the British minister to repeat the request, thinking there must be some mistake. But there was none, though the demand was made in the gentle language of a request that there might be a revision of the line. It was refused; but on that very request grew up her pretensions, till, in the Webster treaty of 1842, our Secretary-negotiator gave her every thing she demanded; brought her back fifty miles from the post to which she had retreated on her own territory in 1802, to get off our territory, and to avoid paying us duty on her goods passing through our country. After having voluntarily abandoned their position on our territory at Grand Portage, and gone fifty miles to the north, they are brought back, and allowed the joint occupancy of the Portage route in our territory, free of all duties, and forever. And we are told this treaty brings within the United State four millions of fine mineral lands—as if we made that gain by it. To be sure, those four millions of acres were within our territory, because they were always within it—they never had been beyond it. They were ours before the treaty, as well as after it. England knew that, and had fled from the emporium of the north-west—the Constantinople of that region—to a position 50 miles north, where she was sure of not being on our soil. What she had been denied by every treaty, by every negotiation, and by every ministry of the United States, from the Revolution to the time of the present Administration, she had been granted by our Secretary-negotiator in 1842. What power, what authority had he to do what all other American negotiators had uniformly declared they had neither power nor authority for doing?

He wanted to see the power and the authority for altering the boundaries of the United States, to the entire advantage of a foreign power, and to the disadvantage and irreparable loss of the United States. He wanted to see the power and authority for giving these advantages to a foreign power—and particularly to the British Government, whose chief object in such acquisitions was to prepare herself for war. These demands of hers were the progeny of the last war. She then found out what an invaluable acquisition to her would be a safe road from Quebec to Halifax. She found out how valuable to her, in a warfare against us, were the services of her allies, the Indian bloodhounds on our North-western frontier. That war had cost us one hundred and twenty millions of dollars. It took but sixty millions of this to maintain ourselves against the whole power of Britain, by sea and land, except on the North-western frontier; and there alone it cost us another sixty millions. Her Hudson Bay Company, with its 1,200 men and its Indian bloodhounds, was another Great Britain, which cost us as much to resist as the naval and military forces of the empire of Great Britain itself. And by our late treaty, she had been secured in all those positions. She had been made strong to assail, and we weak to repel. She had gained every thing; we lost every thing.

Such has always been the result of time, delay, and negotiation with Great Britain. Such would be the consequence of time and negotiation in the settlement of the question of the Oregon Territory. Some Senator had calculated the distance by sea between us and the mouth of the Columbia River at eighteen thousand miles. Twenty years ago he had calculated it at twenty thousand from Boston to the Columbia, and he then made use of the calculation as an argument of the strongest kind, to show the importance of the harbor at the mouth of that river for our commercial and military marine in the Pacific—cut off, as they were, by a sea of twenty thousand miles in extent, from shelter or retreat on their own soil—and that harbor theirs, but unprepared for their use. The distance was the strongest argument in favor of its being made a naval depot and fortification. Gentlemen also talked of the distance by land being 8,000 miles, and the expense of carrying out this bill $100,000. But they voted for the late treaty, by which Great Britain compels us to keep 80 guns aloft on the coast of Africa, at a cost of six hundred thousand dollars a year; and for what? To recapture negroes. And when we have them, what are we to do with them? Not to bring them to the United States, surely. We have no islands, like the West India islands, for taking apprentices at 40 years of age to work for our interests. But we are to colonize Liberia, where we have not a foot of territory. We are not to do any thing with our own territory of Oregon; but we are to colonize Liberia at an expense of five millions in five years! He would next year call for information as to the number of negroes our African fleet shall have recaptured; and he was pretty sure that by dividing the number into $600,000, it would be found that the colonization of Liberia by African negroes would cost us more per head than the 640 acres apiece to each of our citizens choosing to settle in the Territory of Oregon.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 3.

The Oregon Territory.

The unfinished debate on the bill for the occupation and settlement of the Oregon Territory, came up as the special order—the question pending being to recommit the bill to a Select Committee.

Mr. CHASE, being entitled to the floor from yesterday evening, addressed the Senate for about an hour, in reply to Mr. BEXFORD's remarks of yesterday.

He confined himself chiefly to that portion of the speech of the Senator from Missouri which related to the treaty lately settled between this country and Great Britain, and particularly touching the North-west boundary at this side of the Rocky Mountains, between the Lake of the Woods and Lake Superior. The force of Mr. C.'s argument was to show that the true boundary line intended by the treaty of 1783 was that adopted by the treaty of 1842. First, he held that, at the time, no other route was known than that by the Grand Portage and southern chain of water and portage communication; and that the northern water communication never had been travelled, or, if it had, that the Senator from Missouri could not produce proof that, from the creation of the world to the year 1783, a human being had ever passed from Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods by the northern route. In support of his view that the Portage route was the boundary line intended by the treaty of 1783, he adverted to various documentary and historical evidences, and referred to the English

3D Sess.]

Presentation of Washington's Sword and Franklin's Staff.

[FEBRUARY, 1848.]

maps of the day, and the writings of persons belonging to the North-west fur companies. He insisted that, where he was able to produce such a quantity of concurrent testimony in support of his position, and the Senator from Missouri had not hitherto produced a particle of evidence in proof of his, the conclusion was inevitable that the southern route was that intended by the treaty of 1783; and therefore the treaty of 1842, instead of altering the boundary line, had merely carried out, in fact, the spirit and intention of the old treaty.

Mr. CONRAD renewed the motion (which had been previously made, but withdrawn) to commit the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The question was then taken on the motion to commit, and decided in the negative—yeas 22, nays 24.

The question now recurring on the motion to strike out the clause giving a bounty, in land, of 640 acres to each individual settler,

The question was then put on striking out the land clause; and decided in the negative—yeas 22, nays 24.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clayton, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, White, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Archer, Bagby, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Calhoun, Choate, Conrad, Crafts, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, McDuffie, Miller, Porter, Rives, Simmons, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—22.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed on a count—ayes 24, noes not counted.

The Senate adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, February 6.

The Exchequer Bill.

The bill amendatory of the several acts in relation to the regulation of the treasury of the United States, was accordingly taken up, as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TALLMADGE addressed the Senate on the subject for about an hour, in explanation of the provisions and probable effects of the bill, should it become a law.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 8.

Presentation of Washington's Sword and Franklin's Staff.

Mr. G. W. SUMMERS now rose and addressed the Speaker, who recognized the honorable gentleman as in possession of the floor; and all eyes were at once turned to him, and the whole House was at once hushed into silence. The galleries were densely filled with an anxious and attentive auditory, which had collected in anticipation of the interesting proceedings which were about to be witnessed. Many Senators occupied seats amongst the members in the House, and some of the representatives of foreign powers, accredited to this Government in diplomatic relations, were ranged below the bar; and all listened with profound stillness, while the honorable gentleman from Virginia spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I rise for the purpose of discharging an office, not connected with the ordinary business of a legislative assembly. Yet, in asking permission to interrupt, for a moment, the regular order of parliamentary proceedings, I cannot doubt that the proposition which I have to submit will prove as gratifying as it may be unusual.

Mr. Samuel T. Washington, a citizen of Kanawha county, in the Commonwealth of Virginia, and one of my constituents, has honored me with the commission of presenting, in his name, and on his behalf, to the Congress of the United States, and, through that body, to the people of the United States, two most interesting and valuable relics, connected with the past history of our country, and with men whose achievements, both in the field and in the cabinet, best illustrate and adorn our annals.

One is the sword worn by George Washington, first as a colonel in the colonial service of Virginia, in Forbes's campaign against the French and Indians; and afterwards, during the whole period of the war of Independence, as commander-in-chief of the American army.

It is a plain cutlean, or hanger, with a green hilt and silver guard. On the upper ward of the scabbard is engraven "J. Bailey, Fishkill." It is accompanied by a buckskin belt, which is secured by a silver buckle and clasp; whereon are engraven the letters "G. W.," and the figures "1757." These are all of the plainest workmanship, but substantial, and in keeping with the man and with the times to which they belonged.

The history of this sword is perfectly authentic, and leaves no shadow of doubt as to its identity.

The last will and testament of General Washington, bearing date on the 9th day of February, 1799, contains, among a great variety of bequests, the following clause: "To each of my nephews, William Augustine Washington, George Lewis, George Steptoe Washington, Bushrod Washington, and Samuel Washington, I give one of the swords or cutleaux of which I may die possessed; and they are to choose in the order they are named." These swords are accompanied with an injunction, "not to unsheath them for the purpose of shedding blood, except it be for self-defence, or in defence of their country and its rights; and, in the latter case, to keep them unsheathed, and

VOL. XIV.—44

FEBRUARY, 1843.]

Presentation of Washington's Sword and Franklin's Staff.

[27TH CONG.]

prefer falling with them in their hands, to the relinquishment thereof."

In the distribution of the swords, hereby devised, among the five nephews therein enumerated, the one now presented fell to the share of Samuel Washington, the devisee last named in the clause of the will which I have just read.

This gentleman, who died a few years since, in the county of Kanawha, and who was the father of Samuel T. Washington, the donor, I knew well. I have often seen this sword in his possession, and received from himself the following account of the manner in which it became his property, in the division made among the devisees.

He said that he knew it to have been the sidearms of General Washington during the revolutionary war—not that used on occasions of parade and review, but the constant service sword of the great chief; that he had himself seen General Washington wear this identical sword, (he presumed for the last time,) when, in 1794, he reviewed the Virginia and Maryland forces, then concentrated at Cumberland, under command of General Lee, and destined to co-operate with the Pennsylvania and New Jersey troops, then assembled at Bedford, in suppressing what has been called "the whiskey insurrection."

General Washington was at that time President of the United States, and, as such, was commander-in-chief of the army. It is known that it was his intention to lead the army in person on that occasion, had he found it necessary; and he went to Bedford and Cumberland prepared for that event. The condition of things did not require it, and he returned to his civil duties at Philadelphia.

Mr. Samuel Washington held the commission of a captain at that time himself, and served in that campaign, many of the incidents of which he has related to me.

He was anxious to obtain this particular sword, and preferred it to all the others, among which was the ornamented and costly present from the Great Frederick.

At the time of the division among the nephews, without intimating what his preference was, he jocosely remarked, "that, inasmuch as he was the only one of them who had participated in military service, they ought to permit him to take choice." This suggestion was met in the same spirit in which it was made; and the choice being awarded him, he chose this, the plainest and intrinsically the least valuable of any, simply because it was "the battle sword."

I am also in possession of the most satisfactory evidence, furnished by Col. George Washington, of Georgetown, the nearest male relative of General Washington now living, as to the identity of this sword. His information was derived from his father, William Augustine Washington, the devisee first named in the clause of the will which I have read, from his uncle, the late Judge Bushrod Washington, of the Supreme Court, and Major Lawrence Lewis, the acting executor of General Washington's will: all of whom concurred in the statement, that the true service sword was that selected by Capt. Samuel Washington. It remained in this gentleman's possession until his death, esteemed by him the most precious memento of his illustrious kinsman. It then became the property of his son, who, animated by that patriotism which so characterized the "Father of his Country," has consented that such a relic ought not to be appropriated by an individual citizen, and has instructed me, his representative, to offer it to the nation, to be preserved in its public depositories, as the common property of all; since its office has been to achieve and defend the common liberty of all.

He has, in like manner, requested me to present this cane to the Congress of the United States, deeming it not unworthy the public acceptance.

This was once the property of the philosopher and patriot, Benjamin Franklin.

By a codicil to his last will and testament, we find it thus disposed of:

"My fine crab-tree walking-stick, with a gold-head, curiously wrought in the form of the cap of liberty, I give to my friend, and the friend of mankind, General Washington. If it were a sceptre, he has merited it, and would become it."

General Washington, in his will, devises this cane as follows:

"Item. To my brother Charles Washington, I give and bequeath the gold-headed cane left me by Dr. Franklin, in his will."

Captain Samuel Washington was the only son of Charles Washington, the devisee, from whom he derived, by inheritance, this interesting memorial; and having transmitted it to his son, Samuel T. Washington, the latter thus seeks to bestow it worthily, by associating it with the battle-sword, in a gift to his countrymen.

I cordially concur with Mr. Washington in the opinion that they each merit public preservation; and I obey, with pleasure, his wishes in here presenting them, in his name, to the nation.

Let the sword of the hero and the staff of the philosopher go together. Let them have place among the proudest trophies and most honored memorials of our national achievements.

Upon that staff once leaned the sage of whom it has been said "He snatched the lightning from heaven, and the sceptre from tyrants."

A mighty arm once wielded this sword in a righteous cause, even unto the dismemberment of empire. In the hand of Washington, this was "the sword of the Lord and of Gideon." It was never drawn, except in defence of the public liberty. It was never sheathed until a glorious and triumphant success returned it to the scabbard, without a stain of cruelty or dis-

3D SESS.]

Presentation of Washington's Sword and Franklin's Staff.

[FEBRUARY, 1848.]

honor upon its blade. It was never surrendered, except to that country which bestowed it.

[Loud and long-continued plaudits followed the delivery of this address.]

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS advanced to the seat of the honorable gentleman, and received into his custody the interesting relics.

Mr. ADAMS then rose to submit a resolution in relation thereto. He said:

Mr. Speaker: In presenting this resolution to the House, it may, perhaps, be expected that I should accompany it with some remarks suitable to the occasion; and yet, sir, I never rose to address this House under a deeper conviction of the want of words to express the emotions that I feel. It is precisely because occasions like this are adapted to produce universal sympathy, that little can be said by any one, but what, in the language of the heart—in tones not loud, but deep—every one present has literally said to himself. My respected friend from Virginia, by whom this offering of patriotic sentiment has been presented to the Representative Assembly of the nation, has, it seems to me, already said all that can be said suitable to this occasion. In parting from him, as after a few short days we must all do, it will on my part be sorrow, that in all probability I shall see his face and hear his voice no more. But his words of this day have been planted in my memory, and will there remain till the last pulsation of my heart. The sword of Washington! The staff of Franklin! Oh, sir, what associations are linked in adamant with those names. Washington! the warrior of human freedom—Washington! whose sword my friend has said was never drawn but in the cause of his country, and never sheathed when needed in his country's cause!—Franklin! the philosopher of the thunderbolt, the printing press, and the ploughshare.

What names are these in the scanty catalogue of the benefactors of mankind—Washington and Franklin! What other two men, whose lives belong to the 18th century of Christendom, have left a deeper impression of themselves upon the age in which they lived, and upon all after-times? Washington, the warrior and the legislator! In war contending, by the wager of battle, for the independence of his country, and for the freedom of the human race—ever manifesting, amidst the horrors of war, by precept and example, his reverence for the laws of peace, and for the tenderest sympathies of humanity. In peace, soothing the ferocious spirit of discord among his own countrymen into harmony, and giving to that very sword now presented to his country a charm more potent than that attributed in ancient times to the lyre of Orpheus. Franklin, the mechanic of his own fortune, teaching, in early youth, under the shackles of indigence, the way to wealth; and, in the shade of obscurity, the path to greatness: in the maturity of manhood, disarming the thunder of its terrors, the lightning of its fatal blast; and wresting from the tyrant's hand the still more afflictive sceptre of oppression: while descending into the vale of years, traversing the Atlantic Ocean; braving, in the dead of winter, the battle and the breeze; bearing in his hand the charter of Independence, which he had contributed to form; and tendering, from the self-created nation, to the mightiest monarchs of Europe, the olive branch of peace, the mercurial wand of commerce, and the amulet of protection and safety to the man of peace on the pathless ocean from the inexorable cruelty and merciless rapacity of war; and, finally, in the last stage of life, with fourscore winters on his head, under the torture of an incurable disease, returning to his native land, closing his days as the Chief Magistrate of his adopted Commonwealth, after contributing, by his counsels, under the Presidency of Washington, and recording his name, under the sanction of devout prayer, invoked by him to God, to that constitution, under the authority of which we are here assembled as the Representatives of the North American people, to receive, in their name, and for them, these venerable relics of the wise, the valiant, and the good founders of our great confederated Republic, these sacred symbols of our golden age.

May they be deposited among the archives of our Government; and may every American who shall hereafter behold them, ejaculate a mingled offering of praise to that Supreme Ruler of the universe, by whose tender mercies our Union has been hitherto preserved through all the vicissitudes and revolutions of this turbulent world, and of prayer for the continuance of these blessings, by the dispensations of his providence to our beloved country from age to age, till time shall be no more. (Great applause.)

Mr. Speaker, I submit the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the thanks of this Congress be presented to Samuel T. Washington of Kanawha county, Virginia, for the present of the sword used by his illustrious relative, George Washington, in the military career of his early youth, in the seven years' war, and throughout the war of our national independence; and of the staff bequeathed by the patriot, statesman, and sage, Benjamin Franklin, to the same leader of the armies of freedom in the revolutionary war, George Washington.

That these precious relics are hereby accepted in the name of the nation; that they be deposited for safekeeping in the Department of State of the United States; and that a copy of this resolution, signed by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, be transmitted to the said Samuel T. Washington.

The resolution was adopted unanimously, and with loud acclamation.

Mr. McKENZIE said, as it was evident, after the interesting scene just witnessed, that the House was not in a fit state for the transaction of business, he would now move that the House adjourn.

FEBRUARY, 1843.]

Presentation of Washington's Sword and Franklin's Staff.

[27TH CONG.]

Mr. HOPKINS requested the gentleman to withdraw the motion for a moment, in order that it might be stated on the face of the resolutions that they were unanimously adopted.

The suggestion was acceded to, and the resolutions amended accordingly.

Mr. TALIAFERRO moved that the addresses of Messrs. SUMMERS and ADAMS, this morning, be spread upon the journal; and also that a copy be transmitted to Mr. Washington, of Kanawha, Virginia.

The motion was adopted, nem. con.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 8.

Presentation of Washington's Sword and Franklin's Staff.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Matthew St. Clair Clarke, their clerk, informing the Senate that that body had passed a resolution, and had directed him to ask the concurrence of the Senate therein; and had also directed him to state that the sword and cane, which were the subject of the resolution, were also forwarded, through their Sergeant-at-arms, to be presented to the Senate.

Mr. AROHEE rose, and said he presumed that this would be the proper occasion for making the motion which he desired to make—that the Senate proceed to immediate action upon the subject of the resolution which had just been communicated to them from the House of Representatives.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of this Congress be presented to Samuel T. Washington, of Kanawha county, Virginia, for the present of the sword used by his illustrious relative, George Washington, in the military career of his early youth, in the seven years' war, and throughout the war of our national independence; and of the staff bequeathed by the patriot, statesman, and sage, Benjamin Franklin, to the same leader of the armies of freedom in the revolutionary war, George Washington.

That these precious relics are hereby accepted in the name of the nation; that they be deposited for safekeeping in the department of State of the United States; and that a copy of this resolution, signed by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, be transmitted to the said Samuel T. Washington.

Mr. A. then proceeded to address the Senate.

Mr. President: The grounds of the proceedings of the other House, in reference to these invaluable relics, not being necessarily supposed to be known to this body, it may not, perhaps, be considered improper or inappropriate, (coming, as they do, from a citizen of that State which I have the honor in part to represent,) that I should make some brief remarks before committing the resolution to the disposal of this honorable body.

Sir, it is known to all who have read the history of General Washington's life, that he left to four nephews each a sword, one of which had had the signal honor of being worn by him during the whole period of his military services, from the time he entered the army in the service of his country, then in a colonial condition, down to the memorable period when, having achieved his country's independence, and coupled his name with immortality, he resigned the high commission which he bore, and retired to the enjoyment of domestic tranquility.

Sir, it was a mark of good taste on the part of one of the nephews of General Washington to select, as a memorial of that illustrious man most worthy of being presented to the Congress of the United States, this simple sword. It is a relic of no ordinary value in the estimation of that gentleman, as I am sure it will be in the estimation of the Senate and the country—having been the battle sword of that hero during the whole period of his immortal career.

Sir, I ought, perhaps, to say that there is no question of its identity, plain and simple as it is; and if I desired evidence to show that it was really the sword which General Washington had worn throughout his glorious career of military service, I would find sufficient to convince myself, at least, in its very plainness and simplicity.

But I will not go into an argument to prove its identity, nor will I trace its history: that has been already done in the other House, by an honorable member of that body, a colleague of mine; who has added, by the manner in which he executed that duty, another wreath to his own honor, and shown how well he deserved to be made the instrument of conveying to Congress this invaluable gift.

Sir, there may be those who think it is unfitting the dignity of Senatorial bodies to pay attention to the preservation of such simple relics as this; but I confess, if there be any such, I am not of the number.

Sir, those who have been the precursors of our course in the great career of liberty, have not been of the opinion that such mementoes were valueless. We have no record of any country, in which freedom has triumphed, where illustrious men, after they have passed from their mortal career, had not statues erected to their memory, and relics and memorials such as those now lying upon your table, commemorative of their achievements, carefully preserved. They are calculated, in an eminent degree, to produce the feelings and the practice of virtue in successive generations. By associating the memorials of great achievements with the names of those who performed them, and presenting them continually to the eyes of men, they serve to inspire the same feelings which have produced such achievements.

Sir, judging from my own feelings, no statue

3D Sess.]

The National Relics.

[FEBRUARY, 1843.]

nor mausoleum can produce so great an effect as the smallest relic which is intimately associated with the person of the benefactor of his country. These are, indeed, small and inconsiderable relics; but who are the persons, and what are the names, with which they stand associated?

WASHINGTON!—when this name is mentioned, who shall be presumptuous enough to conceive that eulogy can add any thing to the feelings which the mere sound of it produces? WASHINGTON!—of whom one of the most eminent men living in the present day, and himself the subject of a monarchy, has said, and said truly, that among uninspired men, that was the greatest name of all. And it is, Mr. President; for I must be permitted to say, if it were possible that a man as heroic and as virtuous as Washington, should be permitted, by a beneficent Providence, to be placed in authority now, he could not, by possibility, be as great a man as Washington was. And why? Because circumstances must, in every case, form one of the elements of greatness. Because no living man can again be placed in circumstances where he can signalize himself as our glorious Washington has done.

Sir, we may have many founders of liberty in every country and in every clime; but never can there be another founder of the liberties of a whole race; and though we should prove recreant to his memory, and treacherously refuse to preserve the mementoes of his fame, this is the character which Washington will receive in all aftertimes, from all races of men. Yes, sir, it is receiving General Washington in a light altogether too confined to claim his benefactions as our exclusive benefactions, and his fame as our fame.

Sir, the thousands of generations which are to spring up in aftertime upon the face of the earth, under the shadow of that glorious germ of liberty which has been planted upon this continent, when it shall have extended its luxuriant branches and brought forth its fruit in full maturity, will all of them claim Washington, as we now are entitled to claim him—as their benefactor, and the author of their liberties, as he has been of ours!

And FRANKLIN!—names associated in this country's history as the greatest benefactors of the human race—FRANKLIN, scarcely less illustrious for his important discoveries in science. Names now associated by the seemingly fortuitous gift of a mere cane!—inconsiderable, indeed, in itself, but of immense value, as having belonged to him.

Sir, the discoveries of Franklin, as a philosopher, (for I mean now only to pay a passing tribute to him in that view,) will hereafter be considered as most extraordinary benefactions to the cause of science—greater than those of any man that has lived in any age of the world.

Such are the names which are here associated by these trifling gifts! And what is it that the Senate is now called upon to do by this resolution? To pay a passing tribute of homage or admiration? No; that is not the word to be employed in speaking of either of these men: it is not homage—it is not admiration; there is but a single word in our language that will express it—the tribute of our veneration.

Sir, it was the simplicity of the style of our venerated Franklin which distinguished him as much as his eminent virtues, and his profound knowledge, and his glorious contributions to the cause of liberty as well as science. He said of General Washington—the friend of liberty and the friend of mankind—that he deserved a sceptre. Sir, that great man not only merited, but he gained a sceptre. It was thought, at the period of his demise, not too great praise to say that he was enthroned in the hearts of his countrymen. And thus it is that he is destined to be sceptred in the estimation and the admiration of all succeeding ages.

Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate no longer. The inconsiderable meed of praise which I feel proud to bestow upon those illustrious names shall no longer be an interruption or impediment to the expression which I know the Senate is ready to make—of that tribute of veneration so justly due to the benefactors of mankind.

The resolution having been unanimously adopted,

On motion of Mr. ARCHER, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 8.

The National Relics.

Mr. TALIAFERRO submitted the following resolution, prefaced with a few observations, which were inaudible at the reporter's desk:

Resolved, That 20,000 copies of the full journal of the proceedings of the House on the presentation of the sword of Washington, be printed for distribution by the members of this House.

Mr. BRIGGS begged permission to amend the journal before that resolution was agreed to. He begged to move an amendment to the journal, by the addition of the following letter of Mr. Samuel T. Washington to Mr. SUMMERS, accompanying the sword and cane, which were yesterday presented to Congress:

COAL'S MOUTH, KANAWHA COUNTY, (Va.)

January 9, 1843.

MY DEAR SIR:—With this you will receive the war-sword of my grand-uncle, General George Washington, and the gold-headed cane bequeathed to him by Doctor Benjamin Franklin.

These interesting relics I wish to be presented through you, my dear sir, to the Congress of the United States, on behalf of the nation.

Congress can dispose of them in such manner as shall seem most appropriate, and best calculated to keep in memory the character and services of those two illustrious founders of our Republic. I am, with esteem, yours,

SAMUEL T. WASHINGTON.

To HON. GEORGE W. SUMMERS,
House of Representatives.

FEBRUARY, 1848.]

State of the Finances.

[27TH CONG.]

The motion to amend was agreed to; and the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia was then adopted.

MONDAY, February 18.

State of the Finances.

Mr. WISE called for the reading of the Message from the President, received in the course of the morning; and it was read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith transmit to the House of Representatives a report made to me on the 9th instant, by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the subject of the present and prospective condition of the finances.

You will perceive from it, that even if the receipts from the various sources of revenue for the current year shall prove not to have been over-rated, and the expenditures be restrained within the estimates, the treasury will be exhausted before the close of the year; and that this will be the case, although authority shall be given to the proper department to reissue treasury notes. But the state of facts existing at the present moment cannot fail to awaken a doubt whether the amount of the revenue, for the respective quarters of the year, will come up to the estimates; nor is it entirely certain that the expenditures which will be authorized by Congress may not exceed the aggregate sum which has hitherto been assumed as the basis of the treasury calculations. Of all the duties of the Government, none is more sacred and imperative than that of making adequate and ample provisions for fulfilling with punctuality its pecuniary engagements, and maintaining the public credit inviolate. Any failure in this respect, not produced by unforeseen causes, could only be regarded by our common constituents as a serious neglect of the public interests. I feel it, therefore, to be an indispensable obligation, while so much of the session yet remains unexpired as to enable Congress to give to the subject the consideration which its great importance demands, and most earnestly to call its attention to the propriety of making further provision for the public service of the year.

The proper objects of taxation are peculiarly within the discretion of the Legislature; while it is the duty of the Executive to keep Congress duly advised of the state of the treasury, and to admonish it of any danger which there may be ground to apprehend of a failure in the means of meeting the expenditures authorized by law.

I ought not, therefore, to dissemble my fears that there will be a serious falling off in the estimated proceeds both of the customs and the public lands. I regard the evil of disappointment in these respects as altogether too great to be risked, if by any possibility it may be entirely obviated.

While I am far from objecting, under present circumstances, to the recommendations of the Secretary, that authority be granted him to re-issue treasury-notes as they shall be redeemed, and to other suggestions which he has made on this subject; yet it appears to me to be worthy of grave consideration whether more permanent and certain supplies ought not to be provided. The issue of one note in redemption of another, is not the payment of a debt; which must be made, in the end, by some form of public taxation.

I cannot forbear to add that, in a country as full of resources—of such abundant means, if they be but judiciously called out—the revenues of the Government, its credit, and its ability to fulfil all its obligations, ought not to be made dependent on temporary expedients or on calculations.

The necessity of further and full provision for supplying the wants of the treasury will be the more urgent if Congress, at the present session, should adopt no plan for facilitating the financial operations of the Government, and improving the currency of the country. By the aid of a wise and efficient measure of that kind, not only would the internal business and prosperity of the country be revived and invigorated, but important additions to the amount of revenue accruing from importations might also be expected. Not only does the present condition of things in relation to the currency and commercial exchanges produce severe and distressing embarrassments in the business and pursuits of individuals, but its obvious tendency is to create also a necessity for the imposition of new burdens of taxation, in order to secure the Government and the country against discredit from the failure of means to fulfil the public engagements.

JOHN TYLER

WASHINGTON, February 13, 1843.

The contents of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the President of the United States, may be summed up as follows:

The Secretary estimates the receipts during the year 1843 at $20,483,358 36, to be derived from the following subjects:

Customs	-	-	$13,000,000 00
Lands	-	-	2,500,000 00
Miscellaneous sources	-	-	100,000 00
Loans and treasury notes	-	-	4,883,358 36
To which he adds the balance in the treasury on the 1st of January, so far as can be ascertained
	-	-	2,840,041 72

Aggregate of means - - $23,323,400 00

The expenditures during the same period as follows:

Civil and Miscellaneous	-	$4,445,122 00
Military service, &c.	-	9,286,425 00
Naval service	-	7,881,223 00
Interest on loan and treasury notes	-	1,320,000 00

$23,932,770 00

Estimated balance on 1st Jan. 1844 $390,627 00

The Secretary then states that this estimate does not include private bills, and other items of appropriations not contained in the official estimates. Of treasury notes, there are $11,068,977 69 outstanding; of which the whole except $2,402,890 16, carry interest after maturity. To provide for these, the Secretary recommends that authority be given to place them on the same footing with other treasury notes. The letter then concludes with a recommendation that a duty be imposed upon

3d Sess.]

Assumption of State Debts.

[FEBRUARY, 1843.]

tea and coffee, and such objects not now taxed, as would increase the revenues of the Government.

Mr. FILLMORE moved to refer the Message and Report to the Committee of Ways and Means, and to print them; and on this motion he moved the previous question.

Mr. WISE asked the gentleman from New York (Mr. FILLMORE) to accept, as a modification of his motion, certain instructions to the Committee of Ways and Means, which he read from his place. They were, in substance, instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to examine into the state of the finances, and to report to the House whether, in their opinion, the revenues of the Government will be sufficient to sustain its operations through the coming year; and, if not, what measures ought to be adopted to provide the necessary ways and means for carrying on the Government.

Mr. FILLMORE refused to accept the modification.

Under the operation of the previous question, the reference was made, and the printing ordered, as moved by Mr. FILLMORE.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 14.

Financial Statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting, in further compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 28th of December last, the following statement, showing the amount of accruing duties during the 3d and 4th quarters of the past year, and the value of the imports and exports for the last quarter, as follows:

Accruing duties during the 3d quarter	- - -	$3,205,506 81
Accruing duties during the 4th quarter	- - -	2,579,889 28
		$5,884,895 59
Value of Imports and exports during the 4th quarter of 1842—
Imports free of duty	$6,450,601
“ paying duty	7,197,493
		$12,648,094
Exports of foreign goods—
Free of duty	1,023,569
Paying duty	1,219,532
	2,243,101
Ex'pts of domestic produce	25,229,818
		$27,472,919

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 14.

The District Banks.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, said he was instructed to report a resolution to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill for the recharter of the District banks. He wished the vote on the resolution to be made a test vote.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill to extend the charters of the banks of the District of Columbia, being House bill No. 876.

Mr. CAYE JOHNSON moved that the resolution be laid on the table, and asked the yeas and nays on the motion.

They were taken, and resulted—yeas 87, nays 108.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

Mr. WELLES demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution. He said to extend the charter of six banks in this District for ten years, without one moment's consideration or debate, was an outrage upon all propriety in legislation.

The resolution was then adopted—yeas 114, nays 98.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 16.

Assumption of State Debts.

The resolutions submitted by Mr. RIVES yesterday came up for consideration.

Mr. RIVES stated the circumstances under which these resolutions came up as a substantive proposition, distinct from the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina, and the additional resolutions offered by the Senator from Maine, to which they were intended to be offered as an amendment, so soon as the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey should have been disposed of one way or the other, had not these other propositions been laid on the table by the vote given yesterday. But the question of the debts of the States, and the interference of the General Government on that subject, having been once brought before the Senate by the Senator from Maine, he (Mr. RIVES) considered it his duty to present these resolutions for the purpose of obtaining a direct and unequivocal vote of the Senate. It was of the greatest importance to set at rest the idea which had got abroad, that this Government can have any constitutional power to saddle itself, in addition to its own debts, with a debt of two hundred millions of dollars, incurred by a portion of the States of the Union in their individual capacities, and for their own local purposes, and in the prosecution of their own local policy. The very suggestion of such an idea appeared to him so monstrous, and tending so obviously to a course of policy subversive of every principle upon which this Union had its existence, that he considered Congress was bound in duty to itself, and to the country, to put upon it promptly and at once the seal of its condemnation.

It would not do for gentlemen to deny that any question of assuming the debts of the States had been mooted to Congress. If it was not done directly, and in a substantive form, the way was paved for the proposition, and in a manner so plain and obvious, that no one could be left an instant in doubt as to the end to be attained. The proposition was, at the present moment, before the other branch of Congress, in a direct form, to grant to the State Governments scrip, based on the public lands, for the avowed purpose of relieving them from their indebtedness. The Senator from Maine, in his resolutions offered as amendatory of the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina, had in this chamber, but a day or two since, promulgated the doctrine that it is the duty of Congress, by every constitutional and proper means in its power, by the adoption of measures to restore and preserve a currency of uniform value throughout the United States, by the collection and disbursement of the public revenue, and the regulation of the administration of the public finances, and in such a way as shall be least burdensome to the people, &c., to render every practicable aid and encouragement to the people of the several States in their efforts to meet their engagements, and to discharge the obligations into which they have entered. What did all this mean, if it did not mean that it was the duty of the General Government to assist the indebted States in the payment of their debts? Mr. R. here entered at large into the history of the origin of this suggestion, and alluded to the recent action of the Legislatures of two of the indebted States renouncing this idea. He argued that now was the time to extinguish all delusive hopes of aid from the General Government. Let Congress convince the States, by a decisive and unanimous vote, that nothing of the kind will be entertained, and they will at once apply themselves to their own resources for liquidating their indebtedness. It was not his intention to enter at large into a discussion of the various topics bearing upon this subject. He had merely risen to explain his motives in offering these resolutions as a distinct measure, and would conclude by recommending that a vote be taken on them, and such amendments as might be offered, with a desire to avoid discussion as much as possible, and to express the sense of the Senate at the same time, promptly and unequivocally, without further interruption to the business of the session.

Mr. ALLEN begged the Senator from Virginia would accept an amendment which he would send to the Chair, to come in after the word "States" in the eighth line of the second resolution.

The amendment was read.

Mr. MERRICK could not conceive why there was such an overweening anxiety at this time of general embarrassment—why there was such a constant effort—such relentless zeal—on the part of the General Government to join in the out-door and foreign denunciations of the indebted States; States which had incurred their responsibilities for the public good; which had not invoked the interference of the General Government; and into whose domestic arrangements the General Government had had no invitation to obtrude itself. While he disclaimed and denounced as impolitic and unwise the assumption of the State debts by the General Government, he claimed for his own State, as he would for each of the States, its right to its distributive share of the public domain, which, having subserved the purposes for which it was intrusted to the General Government, he contended should now be restored to the States; that they, in their turn, might be relieved from their embarrassments when they most needed them. He concluded by offering an amendment, to come in its proper order, after the pending question on the motion to amend should be disposed of. [For this amendment see proceedings of February 18.]

Mr. WOODBURY said he did not rise to debate these resolutions, but to express an earnest wish that a direct vote would be taken by the Senate on both the material propositions. An evasion, or go by, by postponement or laying them on the table, was derogatory to the deep importance of the question involved. This course need not lead to any protracted discussion or delay of the public business. The first question, relating to the assumption of the State debts, had been fully argued in this body on a former occasion. His mind had been long made up upon it. The State he partly represented had no doubts in respect to it. It was his belief that such an assumption was as fatal a measure in its effects, as a measure formally to dissolve the Union. It destroyed all the limitations between the powers and duties of the Federal Government, and those of the separate States. It was consolidation, and of the rankest and worst character, because it was indirect and insidious.

But he would not now be tempted into the argument upon the subject. It was proper, however, to repel suggestions which had recently been thrown before the public, that such an assumption had before been made by the General Government. This was a wretched misconception. It was not such an assumption at the close of the revolutionary war, or since the late war, of debts incurred by the States in the prosecution of those glorious struggles which achieved and maintained our independence. By that assumption, we then paid only our own debts—only what the States had paid or expended for us in the prosecution of those wars. We paid—or assumed, if you please—only debts incurred in prosecuting the wars of the Confederation and Union, in objects belonging to the central and General Governments. But all these

3D SESS.]

Assumption of State Debts.

[FEBRUARY, 1848.]

debts, the assumption of which was now the subject of discussion, have been incurred for State objects; for local purposes; and many even for banking and other purposes most injudicious and ruinous; and none of them either by the request of Congress, or under its legislation, or under any responsibility to its authority.

The other question was connected with the distribution of the public lands—either directly, or by an issue of stock founded on them.

The objections to the principles involved in such a course—whether in reference to the constitution or expediency—had been fully discussed, in recent sessions, in both Houses of Congress. He would not go into any of them; and he thought the Senate need not be delayed much, if any, in their discussion.

But, in the present condition of the finances, to talk of giving away two or three millions, which the treasury estimates from the public lands; or to talk of imposing six millions more on the treasury, for three per cent. interest on two hundred millions of stock, seemed to him to be perfect insanity.

The Secretary of the Treasury and the chairman of the Committee on Finance both think that, with all the receipts from the lands, and the use of near seven millions more of borrowed money, we may be barely able to make the ends of this calendar year meet.

Do any gentlemen, under these circumstances, propose to borrow six millions more?—or to levy direct taxes for that sum, in order to issue this famous two hundred millions of stock?

Talk about this stock—for what sir? To injure State credit, and not strengthen it. This talk discredits the character and means of the States, which, if let alone, are perfectly competent in time to redeem their own obligations. We thus intimate that they are unable; while, if we step in, we also become spendthrift, bankrupt, and all are discredited together. No, sir. Our conduct is not, as the Senator supposes, that of a harsh or hard-hearted parent. On the contrary, the States are our parents—we, their children: they created us, and not we them; and, as children, we should abide by the constitution, and orders and powers they have prescribed for us.

Let us, then, speak openly, decidedly, manfully, on questions so momentous; and set the public mind, at home and abroad, at rest on this subject. It is due to the occasion, and to the expectations of the world; and can be accomplished with little or no loss of time.

Mr. MILLER submitted the following amendment for consideration, that, when in order, it might be appended to the resolutions:

That, while we disclaim all obligation on the part of the General Government to assume the debts of the several States, the justice, wisdom, and policy of making distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the several States, according to the federal population, is hereby admitted and affirmed.

Mr. CONRAD moved a postponement of the subject to Tuesday next.

Mr. KING said the subject involved questions on which every Senator had made up his mind; for he could safely assert that no one question of general policy had ever received a more thorough discussion than that of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands to the States; and there was nothing in the new idea of an assumption of the State debts, or the power of Congress in the matter, that could not be fully considered in one night; so that gentlemen could come to-morrow as well prepared to vote, as they could on any day next week. If put over till Tuesday, either the resolutions or bill for the repeal of the bankrupt act will have to be laid on the table; whereas both subjects may be disposed of by proceeding with the resolutions to-morrow, and voting on them before Monday; leaving that day free to proceed with the subject of the bankrupt law.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked that he was not among those who believed that these resolutions are mere abstractions. He held them in a very different light. The subject involved was one of the greatest magnitude ever presented to the consideration of the Senate of the United States. It was fraught with consequences, that no man who anticipated the worst, anticipated half as bad as the reality will be. As the question was presented, in his opinion they were under the highest obligations to themselves, to the public credit, to the States, to the country, and to the world, to have a free and direct expression of the opinion of the Senate on the subject of these resolutions. Considering this, as he did, he held the repeal of the bankrupt law—as obligatory as he felt that to be on the Senate, both on account of its unconstitutionality and inexpediency—as nothing compared to an expression of an opinion on these resolutions—absolutely nothing. If it depended upon his vote to decide between the two, he would not hesitate the hundredth part of a moment. He would consider the time well consumed, if they devoted every moment of the remaining time of the session to the discussing of that subject, except what was necessary to be devoted to the consideration of the appropriation bills; and even these should not stand in its way. But he did not deem it necessary to occupy so much time upon it; for there was scarcely a single aspect of the question which was not fully understood by the country. The only one which had not been fully discussed, and public attention strongly called to, was the proposition alluded to by the Senator from Maryland, of issuing $200,000,000 of stock, founded on the public domain, or its proceeds.

That was the only aspect in which the question was not thoroughly discussed; but it was an aspect which required full and ample discussion—such discussion as, from the nature of the question, it ought to receive. That was the only practical form in which it could be presented to the country; and if there were any in the Senate who concurred in that proposition—which, he must say, was one pregnant with the greatest disasters, involving, as it did, the sovereignty of the States, the purity of the constitution, the permanency of the Federal Union, and the happiness of the people,—he must say that, if there was any Senator in favor of the scheme, he hoped he would move a specific proposition; if not, that some one would present it in a negative form, that a direct vote might be taken upon it. The two parties (those in favor of assumption, and those opposed to it) stood in very different positions. The postponement of action would be on the side of those in favor of assumption; for it would be considered as a decision against us. He claimed, as a matter of fairness, (which, he was sure, gentlemen would accord,) to give those who were opposed to assumption in any form an express vote upon it, that the country might truly understand what were the impressions of that body upon a subject full of such momentous consequences. They were now standing in the midst of extraordinary times; the consequences of which would run far beyond the days of the youngest amongst them. Decide the question one way or the other. All that he wished was, that an early day should be appointed for taking the vote upon the subject; for the longer it was put off, the more improbable it would be that they would get an expression of opinion. And as the subject was not unfamiliar to Senators, he hoped they would go on with it to-morrow: that would afford ample time to investigate and mature their judgments. With this view, he concurred that the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. WALKER) had the right to make the motion that it be postponed till to-morrow.

Mr. CONRAD said this is a novel question—one that has arisen in the public mind within the last eighteen months. He concurred with the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) in viewing it as a most important and momentous question; and the more he viewed it in that light, the more impressed he was with the conviction that time should be given for its deliberate consideration. Mr. C. proceeded at considerable length to show why it was necessary to make the postponement till Tuesday.

Mr. HENDERSON called to the attention of the Senate a fact, (which it seemed to him had been overlooked,) that the first time the question of the assumption of the debts of the States was publicly mooted, was in the Senate in the session of 1839 and 1840, when a lengthy and elaborate discussion arose on resolutions, which he read from the journal. These resolutions he considered as full and declaratory on the part of Congress as any that could be now adopted.

Mr. WALKER said his colleague was greatly mistaken in supposing that this question of assumption originated in this Senate, or in this country. No, sir, it is of foreign birth; it is of British origin. It crossed the Atlantic in 1839, in the form of an authentic circular, from British bankers, calling for that "more comprehensive guarantee" of the assumption of the debts of the States by this Government. The assumption was a British, and not an American proposition; and, as such, it was encountered by the resolutions of the Senate in 1839. But this British proposition is now re-echoed on this continent—it has been solemnly introduced by a distinguished member of the other House at this session—it appears, in part, in the resolutions now before us of the Senator from Maine, (Mr. EVANS,) and of the Senator from Maryland, (Mr. MERRICK.) The proposition we must now meet, is that proposed in the other House—to distribute two hundred millions of a stock debt of this Government among the States, to enable them to pay their debts. This stock is to bear an annual interest of 8 per cent., and professes to be based, in whole or in part, upon the public lands. This Government is now in debt twenty-eight millions; and this is to add two hundred millions to that debt. We have now a national debt of twenty-eight millions, we will have this year a further deficit of at least six millions, even including the sales of the public lands; and now, when we cannot meet the existing debt and existing expenditures, we are asked to add six millions per annum to that debt. How is this to be paid? The public lands yield but a million of net revenue; and yet we are asked to derive from them a net revenue of six millions of dollars—that is, we must increase six-fold the revenue to be derived from the public lands. The lands are now sold at $1 25 per acre; and we are now asked, if this stock is, in fact, to be based on the public lands, to increase the price six-fold; or, in other words, to sell them at $7 50 per acre. If, then, the basing of this stock upon the public lands be not a mere delusion, you must raise their price from $1 25 to $7 50 per acre; or, in other words, that the old States are to pay their debts by increasing six-fold the burdens of the people of the West and of the new States. The West—the oppressed and neglected West—the West, where scarcely one dollar of the public moneys is expended—is to be burdened with the payment of the debts of those States which monopolize all, or nearly all, the expenditures of this Government, by augmenting six-fold the price of the public lands. This is the result, if this stock is, in fact, based upon the public lands. But is it so based? If, with hundreds of millions of acres of the public lands, now subject to entry, you sell but eight hundred thousand acres per annum, at $1 25 per acre; how much of the same lands would you sell at $7 50 per acre? Why, not enough to pay the expenses of the land system; and, in place of deriving six millions per annum, you would not receive one dollar of net revenue. How then, without looking at the great question of the payment of the principal, are you to pay the six millions of annual interest? Is it by direct taxation by this Government? How would this alleviate the burden, unless you made the tax unequal and unjust, by taxing all the States to pay the debts of but a part of the States? And if not derived from the public lands, or direct taxation, what is the only remaining resource? Why, to derive an additional revenue of six millions per annum, to meet the interest alone, by increasing the tariff; and, ultimately, many millions more to discharge the principal. Can you do it when you have an existing debt of twenty-eight millions, and cannot pay the interest of that debt, much less the principal, and your annual expenditures from the lands and tariff combined? This, then, is a proposition to bankrupt this Government. But, if you could grind out of the people an additional revenue of six millions per annum, by increasing the tariff, would it be constitutional, just, or proper? What! tax the people of all the States, and the commerce and exports of all, to pay the debts of some of the States? The proposition is one of spoliation and plunder. But this proposition of assumption professes to be based on a horror of repudiation by the States. And is not this proposition an open and wholesale repudiation of all their debts by the States that are indebted?

3D Sesa.]

Assumption of State Debts.

[FEBRUARY, 1843.]

Mr. BAILEY combated as unfounded the assertion that this was a question not entertained by the opposite party until lately; and referred to his own inaugural message, as Governor of Alabama in 1837, in which he denounced the incipient proposition in such terms as had attracted the notice of a distinguished editor, who, in commenting on it, contrasted that message with the messages delivered to the Legislatures of thirteen other States, every one of which had passed over the subject.

He referred to the letter of a celebrated British banker to General Harrison, when President of the United States, and asked,—would any British banker have dared to make such a proposition to General Jackson or Mr. Van Buren? But that letter was addressed to a party in power, which the writer considered pledged to the views he urged; and it was followed up by a more definite proposition to the new Secretary of State. British stock-jobbers, and money-changers then undertook to teach the Government of the United States the line of political and national morality.

Mr. ALLEN would take occasion to say, that he regarded the question involved in these resolutions as something more than a mere abstract question, the decision of which would be of no import—as something more than the vague abstractions of human reasoning, which could produce no effect upon human affairs.

Sir, (said Mr. A.,) these resolutions, if voted on, will test the opinions of Senators, acting under the highest human responsibility, upon a question of the deepest moment to the whole United States; and by that expression of opinion they will be bound in future, or else they will subject themselves to censure by departing from it in their future action regarding this project of issuing two hundred millions of Government stock. If it were merely a question as to wasting that much of the public money, it would be one of less importance than it now is. But it is a question involving the power of taxation—that power which is considered the supreme power under every form of government, and upon which all other powers are predicated. The question here involved is, whether you will stretch the powerful arm of this Government over the several States, and permit it to engulf in its voracious maw all the taxing power, both national and State; in other words, it is a question of expunging the State constitutions and Governments through the agency of taxation. It is the assumption of a power on the part of this Government which was never contemplated by those who participated in the formation of the Federal Constitution. An abstraction, indeed! Why, you might say, with equal propriety, that the declaration of American independence was a mere abstraction; inasmuch as that declaration did not accomplish the result which it contemplated, but imposed the necessity of resorting to arms in order to accomplish it. Was that a mere abstraction? No, sir, it was ranked with the highest of political acts; yet it was as much an abstraction as the resolutions before you. It was the Senator from Maine who introduced this all-exciting topic, and at a moment when Congress is almost at its last gasp—when it is just about to expire. It was that gentleman who has thrown this firebrand amongst us—for a firebrand, I fear, it will be to the whole country. He spoke with some degree of censure of the resolutions of the gentleman from Missouri. Why, nobody dreamed two years ago of the assumption of State debts by the General Government; but now we find it is openly proclaimed in one branch of the Government, and advocated in the Legislatures of several of the States. It was intimated upon this floor, in the discussion this morning, as being a question on which the Senate would soon have to act efficiently and affirmatively. The idea seems to have travelled with locomotive rapidity.

These resolutions will show to the country what are the sentiments of her public men. If the gentleman from Maine, with his standing in this body and before the country, as one of the leading lights of the Whig party,

FEBRUARY, 1848.]

Fine on General Jackson.

[27th CONG.]

would declare it to be his opinion that the Government possesses no power to pay the debts of the States; and that, if we did possess the power, it would be highly impolitic to do so;—if he would thus cut off the hopes of the British capitalists, he would accomplish two important objects. Should his example be followed by the able men of his party, he will have accomplished the great object of turning the attention of the States to the means of their own relief; and he will have accomplished another important object, namely: warning the country against the exercise of British influence upon American politics in the struggle of 1844. Without this, that influence is as natural and certain as the succession of one day to another.

And I desire to proclaim it now, that, if the Government do not take a decided and unequivocal stand upon this question, and say to these scrip-holders, You have nothing to hope for from either party, be the result of the election what it may;—if, instead of saying this, you continue to stand in an ambiguous position, this moneyed influence will be brought to bear—will unquestionably be brought to bear upon this country, and to contaminate the freedom of our elections. Does any man believe that the Democracy of this country—the pulsations of whose patriotic hearts are felt to the extremities of the Union—does any one suppose they will allow such a law to remain un repealed? No, sir; we give you warning in advance. I do not believe that it will be in the power of the Senate to do an act which will tend more to establish the honor and credit of this country, and to ward off the insidious influences of foreign capitalists, than by the passage of these resolutions. Believing this, I shall continue to press upon the Senate the propriety of taking a specific vote.

The question then came, on Mr. CONRAD's motion to postpone the further consideration of the subject to Tuesday next.

Mr. WALKER renewed his call for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The vote was then taken by yeas and nays, and resulted in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, and Tallmadge—19.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Phelps, Rives, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeons, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—22.

The question next came up on the motion to postpone till to-morrow; which was carried in the affirmative without a count.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, February 16.

Oregon Territory.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which had been referred the bill from the Senate for the adoption of measures for the occupation and settlement of the Oregon Territory, and for extending the laws of the United States over the same, together with the House bill on the same subject, reported them without amendment, with the recommendation that they do not pass.

IN SENATE

FRIDAY, February 17.

Fine on General Jackson.

The bill to indemnify Major-General Andrew Jackson for damages sustained in the discharge of his official duties, came up in order as in the Committee of the Whole, on the amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LINN said the very best argument he could offer against the introduction of the proposed amendment, and in favor of the original bill, would be found in the report made by the Committee of the House of Representatives to which this subject had been referred. It was recommended, in that report, that the money should be granted to General Jackson in consideration of his distinguished military services, and the gratitude due to him for his successful defence of New Orleans.

If it was to be put upon the ground of a reward for his military services, it was evidently inadequate. No one could question the patriotism, the valor, and the distinguished nature of the military services of Major-General Andrew Jackson, as displayed throughout the whole course of the late war, and particularly at the closing scenes of that war. If, therefore, the act of restoration of the sum of $1,000 was to be taken to be in consideration of the distinguished military services of General Jackson in the defence of the country, it would be perceived at once that no friend of the General could vote for the bill, nor could General Jackson himself accept the money upon any such terms.

He had hoped that the vote would have been taken upon the bill without discussion, as had been done in the case of Matthew Lyon. It seemed to be otherwise ordained, however; and he would proceed to make a few remarks upon the subject. In all such cases as the one they were now considering, the law was necessarily silent. Necessity had no law. The question was, whether this was a case of that description; and upon this point there seemed to be no difference of opinion in the minds of those who were not biased by strong party feelings. They all agreed that his conduct was justified by stern necessity; that he acted, at all events, upon the motive

8D SESS.]

Fine on General Jackson.

[FEBRUARY, 1848.]

of the purest patriotism. The President of the United States, as well as Congress, at that time, was aware of every step taken by General Jackson. The President had it in charge to see the laws of the country faithfully executed. Did the conduct of General Jackson, on that occasion, meet with any rebuke from President Madison? If his conduct had been an outrage or a violation of the laws, why did not the authorities take the necessary steps to arrest his course? No, sir; there was scarcely a dissenting voice throughout this broad land, from the opinion that he had acted correctly; and the only question that could come up now was, whether he carried his measures beyond the point which necessity absolutely required. In no point of view in which you can examine the subject, could his conduct be regarded in a more exalted light than that which exhibited him continuing his vigilance until there was not even the appearance of danger remaining. But this was a point about which gentlemen would differ. In one of his official reports, made in January, 1815, General Jackson told the administration that, notwithstanding the enemy had disappeared from the coast, yet he would continue the same measures for the security of the country which he had heretofore had in operation. There had not been quoted by gentlemen who had entered into this contest, either in Congress, or through the newspapers, any thing to controvert the truth of the declaration, wherein General Jackson announced to the world that he would continue, until every shadow of danger had disappeared, to use the most vigilant measures for the protection of the country. Was not this determination right? Was it not prudent? Was it not commendable?

The rumor of peace, which arrived through the British fleet, was near disorganizing his army. This was the reason, and the sole reason, why General Jackson thought it necessary to relax no effort, no exertion, for the safety of the place. But to revert to the position that necessity has no law, (Mr. L. said,) he would point out to Senators the instance where, under the old articles of the confederation, the States violated the constitution by raising an army in time of peace. It was justified alone on the ground of necessity. And for fear that his mere assertion would not be sufficient, (Mr. L. said,) he would, with permission of the Senate, read from the 25th number of the Federalist. [He here read the passage referred to.] The charter of the Bank of the United States had, on various occasions, been justified exclusively on the ground of necessity. It was inferred that the power to create such a charter, if it did not exist in the constitution, at all events ought to exist; and it was, therefore, argued to be lawful, on the ground of necessity. The invasion of our territory, the burning of the Caroline, and the murder of Durfee, were defended, on the ground of the necessity of the case, on the part of Great Britain. Well, sir, (continued Mr. L.,) the present President of the United States, in refusing to sign the bills for a United States bank, which Congress presented to him, was condemned by many persons for not yielding up his constitutional scruples; and with the permission of the Senate, I will read a few remarks in this connection, from a speech delivered in this chamber, on that occasion, by a very distinguished Senator from Kentucky, long celebrated for his unsurpassed eloquence. [Mr. L. here read extracts from the speech of Mr. Clay, to which he referred.]

Sir, you must well recollect the thrilling effect produced by the Senator I have quoted when he said, in his own emphatic manner, "I am not brave enough to throw myself down in the way of the prosperity of my country." All recollect, sir, that that Senator clearly intimated that if the President had constitutional objections to signing the bank bill, he should have permitted the bill to become a law, notwithstanding those objections. Mr. L. referred to many other instances in point, showing that the party which now opposed this bill on constitutional grounds, had uniformly waived such scruples when other officers in the public service were to be relieved from the consequences of assuming arbitrary power over civil rights, in the conscientious discharge of their official duty.

Why, he asked, was General Jackson to be made a solitary exception to this general rule? Why was he alone less worthy of a fair, just, and impartial consideration, than others whose services were less momentous to the country? Why was this bill alone to be denominated "a bill for the relief of Major-General Andrew Jackson?" Who asked for "relief" for General Jackson? Not himself—not one of his friends. It was an indemnity for damages which he sustained in the performance of a military duty, which saved the country from an invading enemy. The original bill, as he (Mr. L.) had introduced it last year, and this session, studiously kept clear of any reference to Judge Hall. It might have been passed without a word of debate. It was not by its friends that any allusion or unnecessary introduction of Judge Hall's conduct had been brought up. They had been forced into the question of its propriety; but they were, and still are, satisfied to have the bill in a form so simple as to make no mention whatever of the Judge. All they want is to do an act of even-handed justice towards General Jackson, such as had always been extended to other officers in the public service, under similar circumstances.

Mr. MILLER desired to state the circumstances under which the fine had been imposed, with a view of showing that it was for a contempt of court, in resisting the authority of the writ of habeas corpus, and suspending the civil functions of the law, by an unconstitutional and arbitrary exercise of military

FEBRUARY, 1843.]

The State Debts.

[27TH CONG.]

power. He contended that General Jackson himself claimed the restoration of this fine, on the bold and open grounds that the judgment of the court was iniquitous and unlawful. He referred to his letter of the 1st of August, 1842, addressed to Jacob Gibson, in proof of this; and contended that, if the friends of General Jackson could not now show that the course taken by Judge Hall was iniquitous and unlawful, the claim must fall to the ground. That they could not do this, was the position he assumed; and in support of the assumption, he referred to the history of that constitution, of martial law, (which he considered undefinable, unless by negation,) and to the history of the writ of habeas corpus, from the act defining its power in the reign of Charles II., down to the present day.

If it had been either a pecuniary grievance, or a blot upon the escutcheon of his name, why did his friends, while so long in power—why did the Congresses fresh in the recollection of the transaction—why did the Van Buren administration, keen to catch at any thing to do justice to, or gratify, the military chieftain who appointed the succession—neglect the duty which now has sprung up so suddenly, and appears so urgent? Why let this act of duty sleep for a quarter of a century? It was because they had no conviction that it was necessary, either in support of General Jackson's character, or of their own continuation in power. But now there was a necessity to catch at every thing calculated to have a bearing on the presidential election of 1844. It was for this that it was now proposed to take back the hero of New Orleans to the scene of his military glory, with all Congress at his heels, and sanction, by an official act of national legislation, an outrage on the constitution and the laws of the country—and that, too, over the grave of Dominic Hall, who had faithfully discharged his duties, and left the only monument the country had to appeal to of an independent judge braving an arbitrary power such as he had to contend with. He should vote against the bill in any form.

Mr. McROBERTS said he was somewhat surprised that this question should be considered in any way connected with politics; and that the State Legislatures were pouring in instructions, with a view to control the votes of Senators in relation to this subject, for political purposes.

They had been asked, "Why the necessity for acting upon it now? What new motive had prompted the measure?" He would tell the Senate. It was because it must be acted upon at an early period, if it was to be done in the lifetime of the distinguished man who was the subject of it. It was for the purpose of letting him see and read upon the statute-book of this country that the fine had been restored to him, that its passage was asked for now.

They were told that, if they restored this money, it would amount to a damning reflection upon the character of Judge Hall. How, he would ask, could the character of the Judge be involved in the decision of the Senate upon this question? He had called General Jackson before him, and imposed the fine: the fine was paid; and, by its payment, the offence was atoned for. Was it not? The mandate of the court had been obeyed. Where, then, was there cause of complaint? No; it was not this. The reputation of Judge Hall was not implicated; there was some other reason by which gentlemen were actuated. As for the alleged contempt of court, he would say a few words upon that point. What was meant by a contempt of court? It would be recollected that a judge of a district court had been impeached before this body some years ago, for acting in his own case, (and, by-the-way, though he was not cashiered, he narrowly escaped—there being more than twenty votes in favor of his condemnation,) and the subject having in this way been brought to the attention of the Senate, a law was passed declaring what the law should be in reference to contempt; and the principles of the common law upon the subject were embodied in the act. What was considered a contempt of court? It was some act done in the presence of the court—some act which reflected directly upon the court as a court. Was it pretended that such was the case here? Judge Hall himself admitted that no court was held from the time martial law was declared until the army was disbanded. It could have been, therefore, no contempt of court; and if it were held that Judge Hall could punish for a mere contempt of his person, he must be permitted to say it was a new doctrine. No such case had ever occurred. He would challenge any man to produce an adjudicated case of the kind. General Jackson might, he would admit, have been prosecuted in a civil action; but he could not be punished for a contempt of court.

Mr. MoR. then referred to the record of the court, to show that no contempt of court had ever been alleged by Judge Hall himself. He was at a loss to know how it could be contended that a military commandant was not the absolute master of his camp. True, there was nothing expressed in the constitution or the laws in regard to this matter. But the very power to declare war, it seemed to him, carried with it necessarily the power of the General to command his own camp; and the General must be himself the judge as to the limits of his camp.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 17.

The State Debts.

Mr. W. COST JONKSON claimed the floor upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL) to print 10,000 extra copies of the majority and minority reports from the Committee of Ways and Means on the proposition to issue $200,000,000 Government stock to the States.

3D SESS.]

The Question of Assumption.

[FEBRUARY, 1848.]

Various points of order were raised, all questioning the right of this subject to take precedence of all others during the morning hour, and discussed by Messrs. FILLMORE, SMITH of Virginia, BRIGGS, WELLER, and J. R. INGERSOLL.

The SPEAKER overruled all objections, and gave the floor to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON then addressed the House up to the conclusion of his hour, in commenting on the report of the committee, and advocating his project for the issue of two hundred millions of Government stock.

Mr. FILLMORE called for the orders of the day.

Several gentlemen endeavored to get the floor on the subject which had been discussed by the gentleman from Maryland; but the Speaker decided that the morning hour had expired.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 18.

The Question of Assumption.

The CHAIR then announced that the resolutions of the Senator from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) were before the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That another of the prominent causes which tend to prolong and increase the financial embarrassments of the country, and to retard the ultimate restoration of public and private credit, is the uncertainty and suspense thrown over the policy of this Government, in regard to the debts of the States, by the agitation of projects for the virtual assumption of those debts by the authorities of the Union; that while this uncertainty is permitted to exist, its mischievous effect is to foster delusive hopes of relief from a quarter whence it can never legitimately proceed, and to divert the attention of the indebted States from that timely and energetic application of their own resources to the fulfillment of their engagements, which they would otherwise make, and which is the sole natural and proper reliance for the liquidation of their respective liabilities; and it is, therefore, urgently demanded by the interests of the parties immediately concerned, as well as by those of the country at large, that Congress should now explicitly and unequivocally declare the views it entertains of the appropriate and constitutional sphere of its powers and duties in relation to this subject.

Resolved, That, in the fundamental division and allotment of political power established by the constitution between the Government of the Union and those of the several States, there is no power or authority given to the former to provide for the payment of the debts incurred by the latter, in virtue of their undoubted competence, and within their separate and exclusive jurisdiction; that any attempt by the General Government thus to assume, and impose upon the people of the Union, the debts of individual States, would be not merely a gross perversion of the trusts confided to it, but an utter annihilation of that wholesome and necessary relation between power and responsibility, which is the vital principle of all representative government; that such an arbitrary and unauthorized transfer of burdens, from those who created, and should alone be responsible for them, to others who are alien alike to their origin and their benefits, involves so flagrant a violation of the principles of justice, that it could not but most seriously impair the harmony, and ultimately jeopard the union of the States; and that any expectation, therefore, that this Government will at any time, now or hereafter, assume or provide for the payment of the debts of the individual States, directly or indirectly, is wholly unwarranted and illusory.

Resolved, That a just sentiment of respect for the character of sovereign States, incurring pecuniary obligations by a deliberate act of the public will, and a solemn pledge of the public faith through their constitutional and appointed organs, forbids the apprehension that any of the States of this Union will fail to call forth their utmost resources for the final redemption of their engagements; preferring every sacrifice to dishonor, and proud to illustrate that jealous spirit of independence which belongs to free republican States, by a stern and strenuous reliance on their own faculties for deliverance from their present temporary embarrassment.

Which Mr. ALLEN had proposed to amend, by inserting after the word "States," in the 9th line of the second resolution, the following words:

By the appropriation or pledge of any part of its revenue or other income; or by the issue, transfer, or pledge of any stock or other securities; or by the pledge of any part of the public domain; or by the pledge, appropriation, or diversion, or deposit of any part of the proceeds arising from the sales of the public domain, to such States, or to the holders of the obligations of such States, or by any other means, direct or indirect.

For the whole of which Mr. MERRICK offered the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That governments are rightfully instituted solely for the happiness of the governed, and, consequently, that Government is derelict in its duty, which shall refuse or neglect the full exertion of its legitimate powers for the relief of its citizens, whenever evils destructive of their happiness exist, which such legitimate exertion of the powers of government are competent to remove or alleviate.

Resolved, That evils of the most grave and distressing character do now affect a very large portion of the people of these United States, which it is fully within the competency of this Government greatly to alleviate, if not entirely to remove; and from which there is no relief to be expected, unless from the timely interposition of Government, till after long and protracted suffering.

Resolved, That the most prominent among these evils, are the great disorders of the currency; the unexampled depreciation of money, as compared with the products of industry, and all kinds of property; the consequent destruction of credit, and paralysis of trade and commerce; the large indebtedness of many of the States of the Union; and the pressure of direct taxation upon their people.

Resolved, That a fair and equal distribution among all the States of that vast amount of their common property, the public lands, held by this

FEBRUARY, 1848.]

The Question of Assumption.

[27TH CONG.]

Union, is called for by the present necessities of many of the States, would be eminently beneficial to all, and would greatly promote the happiness and welfare of the whole people.

Resolved, therefore, That it is the duty of the Government of the United States, without further delay, to exercise its unquestionably constitutional power over this subject, and to make such provisions for a distribution of the public lands, or a portion of the value thereof, among all the States, as will best tend to the relief of both the States and the people from the distresses and embarrassments under which they are suffering.

Mr. BARROW said he had too much respect for that body, and for himself, to enter into a discussion of the great principles involved in the resolutions and amendments, without proper investigation; but, being called upon to vote, it devolved on him, unprepared as he was, to say a few words in relation to the principles involved in the resolutions. A false issue was presented to the American people, through the press; and by a few remarks which had been made in the Senate since the introduction of the resolutions, a false issue was also presented as to the action which had been proposed in the other House. The question discussed there, and through the public journals, was, whether there should be an issue by the Federal Government of stock based upon the public lands, for the relief of the States; and not, as was represented by the remarks of the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES,) as a proposition for the Federal Government to assume the debts of the States. Now, he would not stop to discuss at large the abstract proposition of the power of the Federal Government to assume the debts of the States, without reference to the nature of those debts and the condition of the country, when the question shall be presented. He asserted that, if the action of this Government was sufficient to settle any constitutional question, the power of this Government even to assume the debts of the States has been, by the action of this Government, settled affirmatively. Whether the decision was correct or not—whether the action of Congress was a usurpation of power—was a question he would not then undertake to discuss; but he would call the Senate to the case and the occasion.

In 1790, during the administration of General Washington, Congress did assume the debts of the States—amounting to more than $31,000,000; and $4,000,000 of that amount was paid to the State which the honorable Senator (Mr. RIVES) who introduced these resolutions in part represents. He (Mr. B.) knew that Senators on the other side would say, in reply to this, that that was an assumption of debts contracted by the States during our revolutionary war, in a struggle which was the common cause of all. This did not affect at all the question of the constitutional power of the Government. And this case, as well as that, was to be settled on grounds of expediency alone; and it was the expediency of the measure then, and nothing else, that settled the question. South Carolina was indebted $3,500,000, and the Government assumed the debt, to that extent, for her. Whether the exigencies of these States were such now as to make it expedient to interfere in any manner, was a question of expediency, and not of constitutional power, as he viewed, and as he thought the Senate would view it, when he presented it in connection with another subject. He did not wish to be understood as expressing an opinion that the Government had the power to assume, when the majority of Congress pleased, whether the debts were contracted for any and every purpose. He would only refer to one other instance of the assumption of debts—not of the States, but of individuals—on the part of the Government. The Government assumed the debt of individuals to the amount of £800,000, when the great leader of the State-rights party was at the head of the Government. In the treaty of 1803, between Lord Hawkesbury and Mr. King, the United States Government agreed to pay £800,000. For what purpose, and when? To British merchants for debts due to them by American merchants; not for debts in aiding in struggles for independence, but debts due by American citizens to English citizens when the war broke out. It was a subject of correspondence between the two Governments for a long time, when this Government finally obligated itself to pay the debts of these individuals. But, to pass by that, and come to the grounds in this matter. He held, in reference to this question, which was presented to the American people—the power and duty of the Federal Government to assume, in some form or shape, and to assume them speedily, to relieve the States, the heavy debts which were weighing them down—that it was the duty of the Government to interfere in some way. The public domain belonged to the States of this Confederacy. This was the platform on which he stood. The question was not whether this Government had the power to assume the debts of the States, but whether they ought to be assumed. He thought it was the duty of Congress, in this time of pressing need, to come forward and relieve the States, by appropriating to their use the proceeds of the public lands; and if it became necessary to anticipate those proceeds by the issue of stock, he could see no good reason why it should not be done; but he was inclined to think this would not be necessary.

Mr. RIVES said: The Senator from Ohio the other day, had made an appeal to him to accept the proposition which he had submitted as an amendment of his resolutions. This he could not do, in the manner and form in which it was offered; but he had prepared a modification of that amendment, so as to make it applicable to the issue of the two hundred millions of Government stock. He had no objection so to modify his resolutions as to make them applicable to the mode of assumption. If this met

3d SEM.]

General Jackson's Fine.

[FEBRUARY, 1848.]

the views of the gentleman from Ohio, he would adopt the modification.

The modification proposed by Mr. RIVES was then accepted as a substitute for Mr. ALLEN's amendment.

Mr. CONRAD moved to postpone the subject to the 1st day of December next.

Mr. WALKER wished an expression of the judgment of the Senate to be made in this case, that there might be no misconception in the public mind in reference to the subject. And he would say to the Senate, that, by refusing such expression, they would assuredly occasion repudiation on the part of the Legislatures of the States. He hoped that a direct vote would be taken, believing it, as he did, of far greater importance than any other subject which could possibly engage the attention of Congress.

Mr. CALHOUN was decidedly of opinion that a response ought to be given to the numerous petitions which had been presented to them, and to the resolutions offered by the Senator from Maine. They ought to put upon record a vote, declaring that it would be contrary to every consideration of expediency to adopt such a measure, in order to let the public creditors understand the true state of the question.

The motion to postpone was then decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—25.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—22.

MONDAY, February 20.

General Jackson's Fine.

Mr. LINN's motion to proceed with the unfinished business then brought up his bill to indemnify Major-General Andrew Jackson for damage sustained in the discharge of his official duty.

It was placed under consideration as in Committee of the Whole; the question pending being on the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to strike out the original bill and insert:

That, in consideration of the distinguished military services of Major-General Andrew Jackson in the defence of the city of New Orleans, and of the desire expressed by sundry citizens and Legislatures of this Union, in divers petitions and legislative resolutions submitted to the Congress of the United States, the fine of one thousand dollars imposed upon Major-General Andrew Jackson by the honorable Dominic A. Hall, be, and the same is hereby, restored; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay to Major-General Andrew Jackson the said sum of one thousand dollars, with interest at six per cent. thereon, from the day of its payment by him, out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

VOL. XIV.—45

The Judiciary Committee also proposed to change the title of the bill to that of "A bill for the relief of Major-General Andrew Jackson."

The question recurred on the amendment of the committee—being the substitute for the original bill; which question was taken by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Huntington, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, and Smith of Indiana—16.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Choate, Cuthbert, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Mangum, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—27.

Mr. ARCHER moved to strike out the original bill, and to substitute in its stead the bill which was voted down in the Senate at the last session, as follows: "That there be remitted and refunded to General Andrew Jackson, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount of a fine and costs imposed upon him by the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, for an alleged contempt of court, with interest at the rate of six per centum per annum; provided always that this act shall not be construed as an expression of the opinion of Congress upon any judicial proceeding or legal question growing out of the declaration of martial law by General Jackson during the defence of New Orleans."

Mr. LINN demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment proposed; which were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD said he would vote now against the amendment, as he intended to vote against a bill in any form for the restoration of the fine.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 17, nays 26.

The bill was then reported back to the Senate, and the amendments of the Committee of the Whole were concurred in; and the question now being, "Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?"

Mr. LINN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 21.

General Jackson's Fine.

Mr. LINN's bill to indemnify Major-General Andrew Jackson for damage sustained in the discharge of his official duty, came up as an engrossed bill, and was read a third time.

The question then being, "Shall the bill pass?"

FEBRUARY, 1843.]

Intercourse with China.

[27TH CONG.]

Mr. DAYTON addressed the Senate for about half an hour in opposition. There were principles involved in the bill which he considered of such consequence, as to induce him to call the attention of the Senate to them before they voted for its passage. It had been urged by the friends of the bill that there was no other principle involved in it than that which had been acted on repeatedly in regard to other officers of the Government. He had looked into this matter, and found that such was not the fact. In the first place, with respect to the title, he found that the bills passed by Congress to restore fines to other officers, inflicted on them for violations of law in the performance of their duties, were all entitled acts for the relief of those individuals. In the next place, there was nothing in the bodies of those acts in the slightest degree tending to cast imputation, directly or indirectly, on the tribunals which had inflicted those fines. In these two respects, he argued at some length, that this bill differed altogether from the principle of the bills claimed as analogous cases.

After Mr. D. had delivered his views in support of this position,

The question was taken by yeas and nays; and the bill was passed, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Mangum, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—28.

NAYS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Huntington, Kerr, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, White, and Woodbridge—20.

Mr. GRAHAM now moved to change the title to that of "A bill for the indemnity of Major General Andrew Jackson."

This motion was concurred in without a division.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 21.

Electro and Animal Magnetism.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY, of Maryland, the committee took up the bill to authorize a series of experiments to be made, in order to test the merits of Morse's electro-magnetic telegraph. The bill appropriates $80,000 to be expended under the direction of the Postmaster-General.

On motion of Mr. K., the words "Postmaster-General" were stricken out, and "Secretary of the Treasury" inserted.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON wished to have a word to say upon this bill. As the present Congress had done much to encourage science, he did not wish to see the science of Mesmerism neglected and overlooked. He, therefore, proposed that one-half of the appropriation be given to Mr. Fisk, to enable him to carry on experiments, as well as Professor Morse.

Mr. HOUSTON thought that Millerism should also be included in the benefits of the appropriation.

Mr. STANLY said he should have no objection to the appropriation for Mesmeric experiments, provided the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. CAVE JOHNSON) was the subject. [A laugh.]

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said he should have no objection, provided the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. STANLY) was the operator. [Great laughter.]

Several gentlemen called for the reading of the amendment; and it was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Provided, That one-half of the said sum shall be appropriated for trying Mesmeric experiments, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. S. MASON rose to a question of order. He maintained that the amendment was not in order, and that such amendments were calculated to injure the character of the House. He appealed to the Chair to rule the amendment out of order.

The CHAIRMAN said it was not for him to judge of the motives of members in offering amendments; and he could not, therefore, undertake to pronounce the amendment not in order. Objections might be raised to it on the ground that it was not sufficiently analogous in character to the bill under consideration; but, in the opinion of the Chair, it would require a scientific analysis to determine how far the magnetism of Mesmerism was analogous to that to be employed in telegraphs. [Laughter.] He, therefore, ruled the amendment in order.

On taking the vote, the amendment was rejected—ayes 22, noes not counted.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported.

Intercourse with China.

Mr. ADAMS moved that the committee take up bill 720, for the establishment of future commercial intercourse with China.

The motion was agreed to—yeas 83, noes 51—and the bill was taken up and read.

Mr. ADAMS moved to amend the bill, by striking out the words "under the restrictions and."

Mr. MERIWETHER opposed the amendment. If he understood its effect, it would be to leave the mission without any restriction. The bill, as it came from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, placed this mission on the same footing as other missions. The Secretary of State, however, wished the whole sum placed at his own disposal and control—wished it left to him to pay as much as he pleased. He (Mr. M.) did not consider this mission to China as a matter of so much importance as had been claimed for it. He thought it would be difficult to persuade the people of that country to change their policy, give up their aversion to foreigners, and enter into commercial inter-

3D Sess.]

British Construction of the Treaty of Washington.

[FEBRUARY, 1848.]

course with other nations. He wished, at any rate, to have this mission placed on the same footing as other missions.

Mr. EVERETT was understood to advocate the postponement of legislation upon this subject, until it could be ascertained what the policy of China would be with respect to the diplomatic agents of foreign powers.

Mr. ADAMS said he did not think it necessary to waste the time of the House in arguing the propriety of a mission to China. The Message of the President was sufficient on that point.

Mr. HOLMES said he was one of those on the Committee of Foreign Relations who had voted to introduce this bill. In the present state of the commerce of the world, he regarded the proposed mission to China as more important than were all our other missions together. The trade of South America and Europe was fixed on an established basis. But, by the opening of intercourse with China, three hundred and twenty millions of people (hitherto shut out from the rest of the world) would be brought within the circle of commercial republics—for it was commerce that republicanized and civilized men.

Mr. McKENNA said there was nothing so very peculiar in the case of China, that Congress should depart from the usual restrictions of law, which applied to diplomatic appropriations generally. He thought it would be better to take the matter quietly, and go about it in a quiet business manner. Should the bill pass as reported by the committee, it would authorize a minister at a salary of $9,000, and $9,000 outfit. Pass it according to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS,) and $40,000 would thereby be placed at the disposal of the Executive—more than he (Mr. McK.) was willing to see placed in the hands of any President.

Mr. ADAMS called for the previous question on the passage of the bill; which was seconded by the House, and the main question ordered; and the main question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 59.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 22.

Assumption of State Debts.

The resolutions introduced by Mr. WALKER on Monday last, were taken up and read, as follows:

Resolved, That the assumption of the debts of the States, contracted by them separately, and for local purposes, would be a palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States, a consolidation of all power in the Federal Government, and a final and total overthrow of the sovereignty of the States.

Resolved, That Congress having no power to assume such debts, any act attempting such assumption would be utterly null and void; that it would not be obligatory upon the States, nor could the people of the States be lawfully required by Congress to pay the debt so assumed; nor could any taxes imposed by them for such purposes be collected; and it would be the duty of a succeeding Congress to restore the supremacy of the constitution, by the entire repeal of the act of assumption.

Mr. WALKER remarked that he did not intend to address the Senate on the subject of the resolutions. He would not consume a moment of its time; but if it met the views of Senators on both sides to permit a direct vote to be taken on them, he would content himself by simply asking for the yeas and nays on their adoption.

Mr. TALLMADGE said he did not think they had any more time to spend on these resolutions at this late period of the session; he, therefore, with a view to end the whole matter, moved to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. WALKER remarked that, inasmuch as it was asserted by the Senator from New York, that he made the motion with the view to put an end to the matter, he (Mr. W.) had a right to consider it a test vote, and, therefore, asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question, then, being put on the motion to lay on the table, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—25.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—18.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 22.

British Construction of the Treaty of Washington.

Mr. C. J. INGERMOLL again offered his resolution; which was in these terms:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House (if not, in his opinion, improper) whatever correspondence or communication may have been received from the British Government respecting the President's construction of the late British treaty concluded at Washington, as it concerns an alleged right to visit American vessels.

Mr. WISE objected to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. C. J. INGERMOLL moved a suspension of the rules for the reception of his resolution; and on this he called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; but, before the vote was taken, he wished an extract to be read by the Clerk from a speech delivered by Sir Robert Peel in the British Parliament on this subject, which was of infinitely more importance than any other that could be brought before the House.

The extract was in the following terms:

I rejoice that the honorable gentleman has given

FEBRUARY, 1843.]

Right of Search—The Construction of the Ashburton Treaty.

[27TH COSO.]

me an opportunity of making some observations on the late message of the President of the United States. The sincere and earnest desire I have always entertained for the maintenance of a good understanding between this country and the United States, and the spirit in which I have always spoken of America, makes it a doubly painful duty to me to have to refer to that message, which, I am sorry to say, does not give a correct account of the negotiations relative to the right of visit.

Perhaps I may do right to confirm what the honorable gentleman has said, that there is nothing more distinct than the right of visit is from the right of search. Search is a belligerent right, and not to be exercised in time of peace, except when it has been conceded by treaty. The right of search extends not only to the vessel, but to the cargo also. The right of visit is quite distinct from this, though the two are often confounded. The right of search, with respect to American vessels, we entirely and utterly disclaim. Nay, more; if we knew that an American vessel was furnished with all the materials requisite for the slave-trade—if we knew that the decks were prepared to receive hundreds of human beings within a space in which life is almost impossible, still we should be bound to let that American vessel pass on. But the right we claim is, to know whether a vessel pretending to be American, and hoisting the American flag, be bona fide American.

There must be some great misunderstanding upon the subject; but, considering the importance of maintaining this right—a right not peculiar to England; considering that we are contending for a right which is the only security against fraud, against the grossest abuses by parties interested in this iniquitous traffic; considering that we are now the advocates of a principle necessary for the interests and security of all maritime nations,—it is my duty to state, in the face of the House of Commons, that the claim to the right of visitation contended for in the despatch of Lord Aberdeen has not been relinquished; that, on this subject, there was made no concession whatever; and that to the principles laid down in the despatch of Lord Aberdeen we adhere at this moment. [Cheers from both sides of the House.]

With respect to the treaty which we have entered into with the United States: in signing that treaty, we consider that we have abandoned no right of visitation. We do not understand from the United States that they entered into that treaty with any engagement from us to abandon the right of visitation, which, if not necessarily connected with the question of the slave-trade, we thought that it was a step in advance when the United States professed a readiness to despatch a naval force to the coast of Africa for the purpose of suppressing the slave-trade. We did not accept the detachment of that naval force as an equivalent for any right which we claimed; yet, still we thought that, for a great country like the United States to take that step with us on the coast of Africa, although the power of visitation is limited under the treaty in such case—although we claim no right to visit slavers, bona fide American, and the right is to be exercised by vessels of the United States—we thought it, I say, a step in advance towards the ultimate suppression of the slave-trade to accede to the proposition of the United States.

But in acceding to that, we have not abandoned our claims in the slightest degree; nor did it ever make any part of our intention, during the controversy, to abandon the right to which we lay claim in the despatch I have mentioned. [Hear, hear, hear.] We have not contented ourselves, sir, with leaving this fact to become known by a declaration in this House; but since the appearance of the President's message, we have taken an opportunity of intimating to the United States the construction we place on the treaty. [Cheers.] I trust, sir, that I have said enough to satisfy the House on this point. I trust, also, that although compelled to avow a material difference of opinion between the two Governments upon this material question, I have stated this difference of opinion with the respect which I wish to maintain towards the high authorities of the United States. [Hear, hear.]

Objections were still made; and the Clerk began to call the roll on the question of suspension of the rules, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered—great anxiety being manifested through the House in relation to the matter.

Mr. WISE rose when the Clerk had called a few names, and said, if it was the desire of the House to adopt the resolution, he would withdraw his objection.

The call was, therefore, suspended, and the resolution was adopted.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 23.

Right of Search—The Construction of the Ashburton Treaty.

Mr. AROHER rose and said it would be in the recollection of the Senate, that the Senator from Missouri gave notice last evening of an inquiry which he desired to make to-day, founded upon the recent speech of Sir Robert Peel, in reference to the construction put upon the late treaty. Despatches had since been received from our minister in London, a portion of which related to this topic. He read that portion of the despatch, that the Senator from Missouri might be the better enabled to frame his inquiry.

Mr. A. read as follows:

Extract of a despatch from Mr. Everett to Mr. Webster, dated London, February 3, 1843.

"Parliament was opened by commission yesterday. The Queen's speech, and the very interesting debates upon the addresses in the two Houses, will be found in the papers of to-day, which accompany this despatch. I attended the debate in the House of Commons. You can judge of the surprise with which I listened to the remarks of Sir Robert Peel on the alleged fact that Lord Aberdeen's letter to me of the 20th of December, 1841, remained to this day 'unacknowledged and unanswered.' It was acknowledged by me in a note dated two days afterwards, (23d December, 1841,) which, however unimportant, was transmitted to Mr. Fox by Lord Aberdeen, and afterwards communicated to Parliament, and printed.

"In this note of acknowledgment, I informed Lord Aberdeen that I should avail myself of an early opportunity of making some remarks on the very important topics treated in this letter. I pursued this course of an immediate acknowledgment of the receipt of Lord Aberdeen's note, with notice of a purpose of replying, in due season, to its contents; because being just arrived at my post, I had not received the instructions which you had informed me I might soon expect on this topic, and which, as Lord Aberdeen's note modified the ground and disclaimed the language of its predecessor, it was my duty to await. Such instructions I should no doubt, in due time, have received; but, on the 27th of December, Lord Aberdeen informed me that the special mission had been determined on; that Lord Ashburton would go to America, with full power to settle every point in discussion, including what was called the right of search, which he deemed the most difficult; and expressed the opinion that it would be hardly worth while for us to continue the correspondence on matters in dispute between the two countries; and though he was willing to consider and reply to any statement I might think proper to make on any subject pending the negotiation that might take place at Washington, he supposed no benefit would result from a simultaneous discussion here.

3D SESS.]

Right of Search—The Construction of the Ashburton Treaty.

[FEBRUARY, 1843.]

"Such was Lord Aberdeen's observations, as reported by me in my despatch of December 31.

"The negotiation took place; and a mode of dealing with and settling the question was happily agreed upon, which made it unnecessary to resume the discussion, so long continued, upon the subject. In fact, from the moment the special mission was announced, I considered the discussion as at an end; and as little likely to be resumed, in reference to search and visitation, as the boundary or the 'Caroline.'"

He merely desired to say to the Senator from Missouri, that he was now prepared to go into any explanation which the Senator might desire, of the views of this Government in relation to this matter. The honorable Senator, however, would understand, that he was not pressing him for the motion; the Senator would, of course, choose his own time for making it.

Mr. BENTON said he was quite prepared with his inquiry. It was already "out and dried."

Mr. AROHER. I know that is the habit of the honorable Senator.

The bill making appropriations for the naval service for the half calendar year of 1843, and the fiscal year of 1844, having been engrossed, was read the third time and passed; and the question now being on the adoption of the title to the bill,

Mr. BENTON rose and moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to strike out so much of the appropriations as related to the African squadron.

The CHAIR remarked that the bill was now passed, and the question was merely on the title; and it would, therefore, be necessary to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill before the motion to recommit could be considered.

The motion was then made to reconsider, and carried in the affirmative; when

Mr. BENTON remarked that the point of inquiry was, whether the Government of the United States had received any intimation of a different construction having been put upon the treaty by Great Britain in relation to the right of visit, from that given to it by this Government? As to whether the despatch of Lord Aberdeen had been replied to or not, although it might be a point of some moment between the parties concerned, it was not, however, the point to which he directed his inquiry. There did not appear to be, in the despatch of the American minister from London, (from which Mr. B. here read an extract,) a single word upon the subject of the construction given to the treaty by the British Government in reference to the right of visitation and search. This was the point of inquiry which he desired to make.

Mr. AROHER observed that, as the honorable Senator had signified his intention to make an inquiry, without anticipating the nature of that inquiry, and, inasmuch as a despatch had been since received, he (Mr. A.) deemed it but fair and proper that the attention of the Senator should be called to that despatch, that he might be the better able to shape his inquiry.

Mr. BENTON said he would read from an English newspaper published at Liverpool, an extract, purporting to be a speech of Sir Robert Peel, in which it was declared that there was no relinquishment, in his opinion, of the right of visitation of American ships upon the coast of Africa; that the late treaty conceded nothing upon this point; and that Great Britain would adhere to the principle which she had assumed in reference to that subject.

Mr. AROHER said the honorable Senator from Missouri would recollect that it had not been assumed by the Executive of the United States, in the Message communicating the treaty to the Senate at the last session of Congress, that Great Britain had renounced her right of visitation. As to the right of search, that had been renounced, according to the distinct declaration of Lord Aberdeen..

[Mr. A. here read from the President's Message.]

He asked the particular attention of the Senator to the passage. And he asked the honorable Senator how he could affect to suppose that it was ever contemplated, on the part of the executive Government of the United States, that there had been any renouncement of the right of visitation on the part of the British Government? How was that gentleman, with the Message of the President before him, authorized to suppose that there had ever been any such expression on the part of this Government, or of renunciation on the part of the British? Not only was this never contemplated, or asserted upon the formation of the treaty, but it was expressly stated, in more than one part of the Message, that the keeping of a squadron upon the coast of Africa was, of itself, to put an end to the occasion for the right of visitation. It was not possible to obtain from either party a direct and explicit renunciation

FEBRUARY, 1843.]

Right of Search—The Construction of the Ashburton Treaty.

[27th CONG.]

of this right; and it was not considered advisable in such case that the Government of the United States, (which, as well as the British negotiator, had earnestly at heart to adjust, as far as practicable, all the points in dispute,) because they could not come to an arrangement which would be absolutely satisfactory upon this point, should, as the Senator seemed to imply by his remarks, not attempt to do any thing. A renunciation of the right of visit not having been obtained, it was thought advisable to obtain what was considered the next best thing. And, accordingly, an arrangement was made which tended to remove the necessity for the exercise of that right. We had as many as 80 guns dispersed in small vessels upon the coast of Africa; and he put it to the Senator from Missouri to say whether there was a probability that there would be any occasion for the exercise of that right. Although Great Britain might be unwilling to abandon the right; although we could not extinguish the claim of Great Britain to the right of visitation, the exercise of which was so obnoxious to us—it was highly improbable that any occasion would arise between the two Governments for the exercise of the right of visit, or for any collision upon that subject.

Mr. BENTON observed, that the extract read from his place by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, (Mr. AUCHINCLOSS,) only referred to a subordinate point of Sir Robert Peel's letter—that of the neglect to answer Lord Ashburton's despatch of December, 1841. The extract read, only referred to that point; while his inquiry was wholly directed to the question of difference or no difference on the essential point of the meaning of the treaty. Sir Robert Peel declares that difference, and professes himself doubly pained to say that the President's Message is not correct. He says the right of visitation is not given up—that England will not concede it: the President, in his Message of last December, informs the two Houses that search, visit, and visitation, are all obviated by the treaty; and congratulates the country upon it. This is the point of difference between the two Governments; and it is vital! It is a question of treaty or no treaty! For, if the parties misunderstand it on this great point, there is an end of concord, and dissension must immediately arise.

The Senator from Virginia read from the President's Message of August last. Sir Robert Peel was remarking upon the Message of December last; and that Message shows the difference which the British minister announces. The President, in that Message, states the mischief, to wit: that our vessels had been subjected to visitation (as the British called it) in the African seas; that this visitation was only search in different words, and in a new form; and then refers to the treaty as putting an end to all pretence for this practice, call it what you may, in time to come. The evil of this visitation is, then, according to the President, now terminated. According to Sir Robert Peel, it is not terminated. And here is the difference—and a serious one.

Mr. B. would not go into the question of right or wrong, or extend the basis of the discussion, by opening questions of maritime rights. He would confine himself to the question he had made—that of a difference in the meaning of the treaty. If there is a difference, it is necessary to understand it, and to settle it. It must be settled; and the sooner the better. The declaration of the British minister declares a difference; and that is a point on which each Government judges for itself. They have no common superior to judge between them. The declaration of a difference makes a difference; and it is immaterial, so far as consequences are concerned, which is right or which is wrong. In all national, as in all individual disputes, one party must be in the wrong; but that does not prevent a fight or a war. The party in the wrong may fight; and from the formal manner in which the British minister has stated this difference, it is very clear that he intends that our vessels shall be searched in the African seas hereafter, just as heretofore. What then! Shall our Government go on blindfold with the treaty, until the case occurs—until an American vessel is searched by a British cruiser, and then negotiate, or fight? Shall the Government do this—and it is the fate of weakness to wait for events, instead of guiding them—or shall it stop, and clear up the difference at once? He (Mr. B.) was in favor of stopping all action under this clause of the treaty, until the two Governments agreed as to its meaning.

Mr. B. said we now had a practical commentary upon the improvidence of entangling ourselves with foreign alliances. Washington warned us against it: for fifty years we have kept clear of such alliances; in August last, we entered into one of these alliances; and now, in February, we have a difference as to the meaning of an article in this alliance—a difference which cannot go to a present result, without involving the honor or the peace of the country.

Mr. B. said there was nobody to celebrate the gigantic intellect of General Jackson; yet in the answer which he directed Mr. Forsyth to give to Sir Charles Vaughan, in October, 1834, in relation to this very point of a convention with England for the suppression of the slave-trade, there was wisdom, which, compared to the wisdom which offered this convention, was as the pyramid of Cheops is to a grain of mustard. President Jackson, at that time, positively refused to enter into any convention on the subject. He directed him to say to Sir Charles Vaughan, that the Government of the United States was "definitely formed not to become a party to any convention on the subject of the slave-trade." This was the answer of General Jackson. It is the American answer; and it put an end to these propositions.

3d Sess.]

Right of Search—The Construction of the Ashburton Treaty.

[FEBRUARY, 1848.]

for a convention until the present Administration came into power.

Mr. B. said he did not go into the question of identity between search and visitation. The President treated them as identical; Sir R. Peel as different. He (Mr. B.) did not entertain the question. It was clear there was a difference as to the execution of the treaty; and whether the ship was to be stopped on the high seas for the purpose of being searched, as for the purpose of being visited, a preliminary objection arose, and that was, the arrest of the ship itself! The arrest of the ship on the high seas, like the arrest of an individual on the high road, was itself an act incompatible with freedom; and in the case of English naval officers, (to use the language of the London Times.) if there was any doubt in the case, they took the trick. This was the language of the Times, in February last, in relation to impressment; and it will apply in all cases where they have a right to arrest an American vessel: they will take the trick, if they have doubts; and doubts can easily be raised, where he that raises them is the authority to solve them, and has an interest in solving them all in their own favor. Stopping a vessel on the high seas, Mr. B. understood to be firing ahead of her, and over her, and then through her, if she does not stop. This was a rude process, even if for an innocent purpose; and he was against subjecting American vessels to be so stopped by British cruisers.

Mr. B. concluded his remarks by reading the passages from Sir Robert Peel's speech, and the President's Message, which showed the difference between the two Governments in relation to the meaning of the treaty; and which must lead to collision between the two countries, if not prevented by an immediate understanding.

Mr. AROHER remarked that he had cause to congratulate himself, and the Senate, that it would not be necessary to reply to all the discursive observations of the Senator from Missouri; for the time of the Senate would not be much delayed by the few words he should find sufficient to prove that there was no such difference of opinion between Sir Robert Peel and the President of the United States as the Senator supposes; and if this should be demonstrable, the Senator's arguments must of course fall to the ground. The extracts he should now read from the President's Messages, and from the speech of Sir Robert Peel, would justify him in asserting that there was no contrariety of opinion between them on the subject of the treaty. Sir Robert Peel asserted nothing new on the part of the British Government; and what he did assert had been fully admitted by the President of the United States. He (Mr. A.) had told the Senator that it was because no answer could be obtained from the British Government during the progress of the negotiations upon that particular point, and because the British negotiator was not instructed to yield all we desired, that this Government thought it expedient to do what was considered the best thing—and that was to render it improbable that those collisions which had grown out of the exercise of the right of visitation should again occur.

It was not because the two Governments differed; it was because they agreed that it was considered expedient, on the part of this Government, to take the course it did. The views of this Government and of the Government of Great Britain not only agreed in themselves, but they agreed also with the views of the Senator from Missouri himself, if he would sincerely acknowledge them; but he greatly feared that the honorable Senator would renounce his own views rather than agree with the Executive. The Senator had said that the President had intimated, in both his Messages, that he regarded the right of search and the right of visitation equivalent to one another; and that it was because the President so regarded them, that he had been induced to procure the adoption of the treaty. Why, he would have procured the renunciation of the right of visitation also, if it had been in his power to do so; but, as that could not be obtained, an effort had been made to prevent the practical operation of that right, and, consequently, to prevent all collision that might possibly grow out of its exercise.

Mr. BENTON said the real question was the disagreement between this Government and that of Great Britain as to the true interpretation of the treaty. To show that there was a difference, he would first read the language of the President of the United States, and then that of Sir Robert Peel. The President of the United States, in his annual Message to Congress at the beginning of this session, says, (and it is to that Message Sir Robert Peel alludes:)

"In the enforcement of the laws and treaty stipulations of Great Britain, a practice had threatened to grow up, on the part of its cruisers, of subjecting to visitation ships sailing under the American flag; which, while it seriously involved our maritime rights, would subject to vexation a branch of our trade which was daily increasing, and which required the fostering care of the Government. And although Lord Aberdeen, in his correspondence with the American envoys, at London, expressly disclaimed all right to detain an American ship on the high seas, even if found with a cargo of slaves on board, and restricted the British pretension to a mere claim to visit and inquire; yet it could not well be discerned by the Executive of the United States how such visit and inquiry could be made without detention on the voyage, and consequent interruption to the trade. It was regarded as the right of search, presented only in a new form, and expressed in different words."

"From this it will be seen that the ground assumed in the message has been fully maintained, at the same time that the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent are to be carried out in good faith by the two countries, and that all pretence is removed for

FEBRUARY, 1848.]

Right of Search—The Construction of the Ashburton Treaty.

[27th CONG.]

interference with our commerce, for any purpose whatever, by a foreign Government."

He should now turn to what Sir Robert Peel said in his late speech in Parliament:

"I rejoice that the honorable gentleman has given me an opportunity of making some observations on the late message of the President of the United States. The sincere and earnest desire I have always entertained for the maintenance of a good understanding between this country and the United States, and the spirit in which I have always spoken of America, makes it a doubly painful duty to me to have to refer to that message; which I am sorry to say, does not give a correct account of the negotiations relative to the right of visit."

He then goes on to state the difference between the right of search and the right of visitation, and then says:

"I trust, sir, that I have said enough to satisfy the House on this point. I trust, also, that although compelled to avow a material difference of opinion between the two Governments upon this material question, I have stated this difference of opinion with the respect which I wish to maintain towards the high authorities of the United States."

There is another part in which he declares expressly that the right of visitation, claimed in Lord Aberdeen's despatch, has not been relinquished, and will not be relinquished. Now, here is palpable evidence that there is a difference of opinion as to the construction of the treaty, between Sir Robt. Peel and the Executive of the United States. That was the point at issue.

Mr. AROHER observed, that all the speech said was, that the British Government had not renounced the right of visitation contended for in Lord Aberdeen's despatch; and the President of the United States says it was because the British Government could not renounce the right of visitation that the arrangement became necessary for placing a squadron in the African seas to carry out our own laws, and supersede the necessity for the exercise of the right of visitation adhered to by the British Government. There is no difference of opinion in Sir Robert Peel's views and those of the President of the United States, as to the adherence of the British Government to the right of visitation.

Mr. ALLEN said, as far as he himself was concerned, he did not intend to vote for a dollar of appropriation in furtherance of the treaty—not even to pay the $300,000 to the States. He would not do it, because he considered the treaty worse than a war. But he would not go into the character of the treaty now. Other gentlemen viewed it in a different light—gentlemen of more experience, and who had better means of judging, perhaps. This, however, was his view; and he should continue to act upon it. He desired to know what it was that we had received as compensation for sending out those 80 guns, if there was not to be at least a suspension of the right to visit our vessels. The President manifestly considered that there was to be a suspension of that right, when he penned his Message to Congress; and he asked, if it was true that we had gained so much in reference to the right of visitation upon the coast of Africa, what had they gained upon the general principle? The British still assert that they have a right to visit any vessel for any purpose whatever. They were about to pay half a million of dollars under what they supposed to be, some time ago, a compact by which peace had been purchased; and before Congress had had an opportunity to execute in part of the contract, by appropriating the money, it was discovered to have been no guarantee of peace at all. The proper time to meet this question was the present; and he was prepared, if any one would introduce a bill for that purpose, to instruct the President to take possession of every foot of the disputed territory. If the construction put upon the treaty by Sir Robert Peel was right, there were still more pregnant consequences to grow out of it; because it showed a disposition on the part of the British Government to promote a quarrel, by holding up our Government to the world as putting one construction upon the treaty, whilst they held another, and a different one.

Mr. EVANS stated that, in rising, it was not his purpose to prolong the discussion, but to entreat the Senate to put an end to a debate which, to say the least of it, was premature, and wholly out of place. If the Senator from Missouri, and those who concur with him in hostile feelings to the treaty, would but have patience, a bill from the other House would, in a day or two, come before the Senate, on which they could bring up the subject, and discuss it to their heart's content—he meant the bill making provision for carrying out the treaty. How much time to-day had been wasted in unprofitable discussion, leading to no practical result? Enough, he would venture to say, to pass forty bills now awaiting the action of Congress. The Senator from Missouri has moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to strike out all appropriations for the African squadron. Now, what use would it be for the committee to take into consideration what was not in the bill at all?

There was not a word in it about the African squadron. And, although he would not pretend to say that some part of the money appropriated in the bill was not to be applied to the expenses of the squadron to be kept on the coast of Africa for the protection of our commerce and shipping there, and in furtherance of the provisions of the treaty; yet he would say that it would make no difference as to the amount of the appropriations whether any portion of the navy was to be kept on that station or not.

Mr. OUTHBERT did not consider the information furnished by the despatch from our minister at London, nor the speech of Sir Robert Peel, sufficient to warrant immediate action on the subject. In the various reports of that speech, there were evident obscurities, leaving it uncertain if the remarks of Sir Robert Peel did not exclusively relate to the general right of visitation, and not to the visitation on the coast of Africa in reference to the slave-trade.

3D Sess.]

The Bankrupt Act.

[FEBRUARY, 1848.]

Mr. OALHOUN said that it was impossible for any man to read the treaty, and say that the right of visitation was not superseded by the provisions of that treaty. It was superseded; and he had so treated it in his speech on the treaty; and no man could read that treaty without being thus satisfied that each party was to take supervision of its own vessels. When they looked at the object of the negotiation on this point, no doubt could be entertained. What was the immediate object? Was it not this—to enter into stipulations with Great Britain, such as she had made with all European powers? He believed they had the supervision, not only of their own vessels, but of all European vessels. What was the result of this state of things? The result was, that our flag was used by all persons engaged in the slave-trade. Great Britain then threw herself on the five European powers. She wished to make it a question, not of municipal regulation, but of international law. All the great Christian powers agreed to accept it but this country alone.

Mr. KING said he did not pretend to say that a newspaper report of Sir Robert Peel's speech could be taken as a correct version of the speech itself. There were evidently obscurities in the version read by the Senator from South Carolina. He (Mr. K.) had seen the version in the London Times, and he could not help saying that it was more likely to be correct; but, in that version, it appeared to him that Sir Robert Peel took still stronger ground than that assumed in the other. It bore the impression that he maintained, not only the British right of visitation in the general sense, but in a sense which would extend it to the coast of Africa. If it should turn out that such was his meaning, it would be a subject of infinite surprise to him; for he would consider it a palpable violation of the treaty. We had agreed to do what, as an independent nation, we were bound to do—to carry into execution our own laws; and, therefore, there remained no longer a pretence for England to persevere in her claim of a right of visitation. Had he not considered this point clearly settled, he never would have voted against striking out that article in the treaty. He firmly relied on its being a suspension of the British claim, and that it was so stipulated by Lord Ashburton. He was satisfied of this, because he so understood it from Lord Ashburton himself. There was a bare possibility that the new state of circumstances in England, and in the intoxication resulting from recent successes, Sir Robert Peel, in his speech, had given way to the national excitement, and expressed himself in a manner not justified by the original understanding of the treaty.

Mr. BENTON said the discussion had taken a turn which he did not expect—that of a question as to the correctness of the report of Sir Robert Peel's speech. True, there were the usual variations in the details of the reports, but they agreed in the main point; and all America and all Europe must see that we had received a slap in the face—that the President's Message was flatly contradicted—and principles avowed from which collisions must arise. The difference of opinion amounted to treaty or no treaty on this point! The difference between the two Governments nullified this part of the treaty; and he thought it the part of common prudence to stop now, and remove the difference, before collision resulted. The treaty was ratified in this chamber, upon the President's view of it. Senators voted upon that view, as they now declare, and as we know; and now, if there shall be any attempt on the part of the Administration to equivocate, and to reconcile the President's Message to Sir Robert Peel's speech, by making the Message yield to the speech, it will be a fraud upon the Senators who voted for the ratification.

The question was then taken on Mr. BENTON's proposition, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Linn, and Smith of Connecticut—4.

NAYS.—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Calhoun, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dayton, Evans, Fulton, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, King, McDuffie, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Talmadge, Tappan, White, Wilcox, Woodbridge, and Woodbury—36.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 28.

Electro-Magnetic Telegraph.

On motion by Mr. J. P. KENNEDY, the bill making appropriations to test the value of Morse's electro-magnetic telegraph, was taken up, and, under the operation of the previous question, passed—ayes 89, noes 83.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 26.

The Bankrupt Act.

The unfinished business of yesterday was then resumed; being the further consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the House bill for the repeal of the bankrupt act.

Mr. BENTON moved to strike out the proviso, which is in the following words:

Provided, That this act shall not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy commenced before the passage of this act, or any pains, penalties, or forfeitures incurred under the said act, but every such proceeding may be continued to its final consummation, in like manner as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. BERRIEN would not question the decision of the Senate on the Judiciary Committee's amendment; but, he did hope the proviso in the House bill would not be stricken out. To all the class of cases protected by this proviso, its excision would be the most manifest injustice.

Mr. BENTON proposed the same proviso as a substitute, which he had offered upon a former occasion upon the Senate's bill, making the pending cases subject to constitutional restrictions, and requiring the consent of a majority in value and number of the creditors necessary for the discharge of the bankrupts. On moving this amendment, he urged the same arguments in its favor which he had used on a former occasion alluded to.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had not intended to trouble the Senate with a single word on the bankrupt bill, at this late period of the session; but as he had determined to vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) and would differ from some of his most valued political friends on this question, he felt it to be a duty which he owed both to them and himself to make a very few observations on the subject. Should the amendment prevail, and the proviso be stricken from the bill, it would deprive all those bankrupts of the benefit of the law whose cases were now pending, and who had not yet obtained their certificates of discharge.

He should be extremely sorry if his constitutional opinions would deprive him of the power of voting in favor of this proviso. In what condition would both the bankrupts whose cases were now pending, and their creditors, be left, in case it should not be retained?

The first class of desperate insolvents or bankrupts, who stood ready and eager to take the benefit of the law immediately after its passage, had already passed through the mill, and had been discharged from their debts. There were many individuals who had been crushed to the earth, and whose circumstances had been rendered desperate, by the discharge of their debtors and the consequent loss of debts honestly due to them, under this unjust and impolitic law. It was such individuals who would chiefly suffer, should the amendment be adopted. They had struggled with misfortune as long as they could; and had finally, at the last hour, applied for the benefits of the bankrupt law. The proceedings in their cases were now in different stages of their progress; and he should consider it unequal, unfeeling, and unjust to deprive the courts of the power of bringing them to a conclusion. It would be an extreme case, indeed, which could justify Congress in declaring, after an individual had put himself to the trouble and the expense of instituting any proceedings under the faith of their own laws, that he should be arrested midway; and that, too, when he could not by possibility be restored to his former condition.

But again: There was one State of the Union (he referred to the State of Missouri) where the district judge had decided the bankrupt law to be unconstitutional, and had refused to discharge any of the applicants for the benefit of its provisions. Strike out this proviso; and then, whilst debtors in all the other States had been discharged under the provision of the law, no debtor in Missouri had ever enjoyed, or could enjoy, its benefit.

Again: He asked what would become of the property of bankrupts now in the hands of their assignees, or under the custody of the law. This would present a scene of confusion were confounded. Strike out the proviso, and no distribution of it could take place among their creditors; because the law under whose provisions it would have been made, had ceased to exist. This would lead to great injustice and endless litigation.

In view of these circumstances, if he ever entertained serious doubts of the constitutionality of the bankrupt law, he would suffer these doubts to operate in favor of retaining the proviso, and would leave it to the Supreme Court to decide the constitutional question in the last resort. Nothing but a clear conviction that the law was a violation of the constitution, could induce him to sanction all these evils.

He considered that it would be a very narrow construction, indeed, to confine our power over the subject of bankruptcies, which had been conferred in the broadest and most general terms, to the passage of just such a bankrupt law as existed in England at the date of the Federal Constitution. All the lights of experience, and all the improvements in the science of legislation, must then be disregarded; and while the world was in a state of constant progression, we must make a dead stand at the point where we found the English bankrupt law half a century ago. Surely the framers of the constitution never intended any such absurdity. For his own part, he firmly believed that no bankrupt law, based upon the English model, could ever exist for any length of time in this country. It would always destroy itself, after a brief experience. Such a law was not applicable to a country of the vast extent of our own, where the Federal judicial tribunals were at such remote distances from each other, and when it was acknowledged that Congress did not possess the power of conferring jurisdiction in cases of bankruptcy on the State courts. If they were ever to have a permanent and beneficial bankrupt system, they must look to other models than the English. Fortunately, under the decision of the Supreme Court, each State now possesses the unquestionable power of passing bankrupt laws which will relieve its own citizens from the obligation of debts contracted with other citizens of the same State subsequent to the passage of such laws. Nay, more: a discharge under a State bankrupt law is valid even against the citizens of other States, or foreigners, who may accept a dividend of the debtor's effects; and this will always be acceptable in cases where any considerable dividend exists. Several of the States now have such bankrupt laws. But enough, and more than enough of this.

3D Sess.]

The Bankrupt Act.

[FEBRUARY, 1848.]

The present law was said to be unconstitutional, because it was an insolvent, and not a bankrupt law; and that it applied, not only to traders, but to all other persons. But it would be extremely difficult to draw any line of distinction between insolvency and bankruptcy. Both signified the inability of a debtor to pay his debts. This was the meaning of both terms, in the abstract. There was this difference between a bankrupt law and an insolvent law—that, whilst the latter discharged the person of the debtor only, the former discharged both the debtor and the debt. Bankruptcy was a general term: and even in England, although nominally none but traders were entitled to the benefit of the bankrupt laws; yet, in reality, these laws had been extended, long before the adoption of the Federal Constitution, to many, very many persons, who could not, with any propriety, be denominated traders. Different acts of Parliament, and the most liberal judicial construction of the term "traders," had extended their provisions to almost every class of the community. He might cite numerous instances to prove this assertion, if time would permit, and if they were not familiar to every Senator. The policy of England had always been to extend still further and further the operation of their bankrupt laws to new classes of individuals. Whilst, therefore, he would be utterly opposed to the passage of any such bankrupt law for this country, he could not regard such a law as a violation of the constitution, merely because its benefits or its injuries were not confined to persons who might technically and appropriately be called traders. The power conferred upon Congress by the constitution was not limited to any class of persons, but extended to the whole subject of bankruptcies; and wherever bankruptcy existed—whether among merchants, or farmers, or tradesmen—Congress might subject them to the operation of a bankrupt law.

But it had also been contended that this law was unconstitutional, because it embraced cases of voluntary bankruptcy. Now, it was perfectly well known to every person acquainted with the history and operation of the English bankrupt law, that voluntary bankruptcy had existed in that country in fact, though not in form, for more than a century before the act of 6th George IV.; and this act did no more than to recognize a practice which had long prevailed. Insolvent debtors in England, before the passage of this act, were in the constant practice of concerting with some one of their creditors to commit an act of bankruptcy, who was thereupon to sue out a commission of bankruptcy. It was very true that, if this concert were established, the commission would be avoided. But, in the nature of things, it was almost impossible to prove the fact; and, at last, the statute of George IV. expressly legalized such a proceeding. A debtor might now make a declaration of his insolvency in the prescribed form, and this was an act of bankruptcy; and it was expressly enacted "that the bankrupt, and any creditor, or other person, concerting such a declaration shall not invalidate the commission." Here, then, was voluntary bankruptcy, to the same extent which it now existed under our present law. The difference between them was in form, not in fact. In both cases, the bankruptcy was equally voluntary; and in both, the debtor chose his own time to make his application. He could not, then, say that our law was unconstitutional, because it recognized voluntary bankruptcy.

Neither could he agree with the Senator from Missouri, that the law was unconstitutional because it did not provide that, in order to procure his discharge, the bankrupt must obtain the consent of a majority of his creditors in number and value. He agreed entirely with him, that it would be unwise and inexpedient to pass a bankrupt law without such a provision; but that it would be unconstitutional, was altogether a different question. A bankrupt law was a law to discharge an insolvent debtor from his debts, on the condition that he fairly and honestly surrendered all his property for the benefit of his creditors. The mode and the manner of this discharge must necessarily be left to the discretion of Congress. These must necessarily vary, according to the varying opinions of the Legislature. In England, formerly, four-fifths in number and value of the creditors must have consented. It was now reduced to three-fifths; and the prevailing opinion, even there, now seemed to be, that it would promote the interest both of the debtor and the creditor, not to require the assent of any portion of the creditors to the debtor's discharge. Under our old bankrupt law of 1800, two-thirds in number and value of the creditors were required to consent. The Senator from Missouri would now be satisfied with a majority. This was a mere incidental question, in passing any bankrupt law, which did not enter into its essence. And he could not say that such a law would not be a bankrupt law under the constitution; although it might not require the consent of any portion of the bankrupt's creditors to obtain the debtor's discharge.

Whilst every feeling of his heart was in favor of relieving those unfortunate debtors whose property had already been removed from their own control, and placed in the hands of assignees, and who had incurred the trouble and expense of commencing proceedings, he was truly rejoiced that no

FEBRUARY, 1843.]

Right of Search Question.

[27TH CONG.]

constitutional barrier interposed to prevent him from performing an act of humanity and justice.

He would suggest another consideration: he, in common with his political friends, was anxious that this law should be repealed before the close of the present session; that it should no longer be a blot upon our statute-book; that it should no longer produce the injustice, iniquity, and fraud which had startled the minds of a vast majority of the American people, and caused them to demand its repeal. If the proviso from the present bill were stricken out, and it were sent back to the House thus amended, the probability was, that it would be lost altogether, and that the law would neither be amended nor repealed. Was it not wiser, then, for Senators to make the trifling concession of suffering those who had already applied for its benefits to obtain their discharge, than to leave the law in full force for another year?

The question was then taken on Mr. BEN-
TON's amendment, and decided in the negative: so the motion to strike out the proviso did not prevail.

The bill was then passed in the form in which it came from the House, without any amendment, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bagby, Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Crafts, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dayton, Fulton, Graham, Huntington, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Mangum, Merrick, Morehead, Phelps, Rives, Sevier, Sprague, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—32.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Evans, Kerr, Miller, Porter, Smith, of Indiana, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—18.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 27.

Right of Search Question.

The following Message was received from the President of the U. States, in reply to a resolution of the House of the 22d instant, communicating a report from the Secretary of State on the subject of the claim set up by the British Government to visit American vessels, together with the correspondence between Lord Aberdeen and Mr. Everett on the subject:

WASHINGTON, February 27, 1843.

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 22d instant, requesting me to communicate to the House "whatever correspondence or communication may have been received from the British Government respecting the President's construction of the late British treaty concluded at Washington, as it concerns an alleged right to visit American vessels," I herewith transmit a report made to me by the Secretary of State.

I have also thought proper to communicate copies of Lord Aberdeen's letter of 20th December, 1841, to Mr. Everett; Mr. Everett's letter of the 23d December, in reply thereto; and extracts from several letters of Mr. Everett to the Secretary of State.

I cannot forego the expression of my regret at the apparent purport of a part of Lord Aberdeen's despatch to Mr. Fox. I had cherished the hope that all possibility of misunderstanding as to the true construction of the 8th article of the treaty lately concluded between Great Britain and the United States, was precluded by the plain and well-weighed language in which it is expressed. The desire of both Governments is to put an end, as speedily as possible, to the slave-trade; and that desire, I need scarcely add, is as strongly and as sincerely felt by the United States as it can be by Great Britain. Yet it must not be forgotten that the trade, though now universally reprobated, was, up to a late period, prosecuted by all who chose to engage in it; and there were unfortunately but very few Christian powers whose subjects were not permitted, and even encouraged, to share in the profits of what was regarded as a perfectly legitimate commerce. It originated at a period long before the United States had become independent; and was carried on within our borders, in opposition to the most earnest remonstrances and expostulations of some of the colonies in which it was most actively prosecuted. Those engaged in it were as little liable to inquiry or interruption as any others. Its character, thus fixed by common consent and general practice, could only be changed by the positive assent of each and every nation, expressed either in the form of municipal law or conventional arrangement. The United States led the way in efforts to suppress it. They claimed no right to dictate to others, but they resolved, without waiting for the co-operation of other powers, to prohibit it to their own citizens, and to risk its perpetration by them with condign punishment. I may safely affirm that it never occurred to the Government that any new maritime right accrued to it from the position it had thus assumed in regard to the slave-trade. If, before our law for its suppression, the flag of every nation might traverse the ocean unquestioned by our cruisers, this freedom was not, in our opinion, in the least abridged by our municipal legislation.

Any other doctrine, it is plain, would subject to any arbitrary and ever-varying system of maritime police, adopted at will by the great naval power for the time being, the trade of the world in any places or in any articles which such power might see fit to prohibit to its own subjects or citizens. A principle of this kind could scarcely be acknowledged, without subjecting commerce to the risk of constant and harassing vexations.

The attempt to justify such a pretension from the right to visit and detain ships upon reasonable suspicion of piracy, would deservedly be exposed to universal condemnation; since it would be an attempt to convert an established rule of maritime law, incorporated as a principle into the international code by the consent of all nations, into a rule and principle adopted by a single nation, and enforced only by its assumed authority. To visit and detain a ship upon suspicion of piracy, with probable cause and in good faith, affords no just ground either for complaint on the part of a nation whose flag she bears, or claim of indemnity on the part of the owner. The universal law and

3D SESS.]

Lieutenant Fremont's Expedition to the Rocky Mountains.

[MARCH, 1848.]

tions, and the common good requires, the existence of such a rule. The right, under such circumstances, not only to visit and detain, but to search a ship, is a perfect right, and involves neither responsibility nor indemnity. But, with this single exception, no nation has, in time of peace, any authority to detain the ships of another upon the high seas, on any pretext whatever, beyond the limits of the territorial jurisdiction. And such, I am happy to find, is substantially the doctrine of Great Britain herself, in her most recent official declarations, and even in those now communicated to the House. These declarations may well lead us to doubt whether the apparent difference between the two Governments is not rather one of definition than of principle. Not only is the right of search, properly so called, disclaimed by Great Britain; but even that of mere visit and inquiry is asserted with qualifications inconsistent with the idea of a perfect right.

In the despatch of Lord Aberdeen to Mr. Everett, of the 20th of December, 1841, as also in that just received by the British minister in this country, made to Mr. Fox, his lordship declares that if, in spite of all the precaution which shall be used to prevent such occurrences, an American ship, by reason of any visit or detention by a British cruiser, "should suffer loss and injury, it would be followed by prompt and ample remuneration;" and in order to make more manifest her intentions in this respect, Lord Aberdeen, in the despatch of the 20th of December, makes known to Mr. Everett the nature of the instructions given to the British cruisers. These are such as, if faithfully observed, would enable the British Government to approximate the standard of a fair indemnity. That Government has, in several cases, fulfilled her promises in this particular, by making adequate reparation for damage done to our commerce. It seems obvious to remark, that a right which is only to be exercised under such restrictions and precautions, and risk, in case of any assignable damage, to be followed by the consequences of a trespass, can scarcely be considered any thing more than a privilege asked for, and either conceded or withheld on the usual principles of international comity.

The principles laid down in Lord Aberdeen's despatches, and the assurances of indemnity therein held out, although the utmost reliance was placed on the good faith of the British Government, were not regarded by the Executive as a sufficient security against the abuses which Lord Aberdeen admitted might arise in even the most cautious and moderate exercise of their new maritime police; and, therefore, in my message at the opening of the last session, I set forth the views entertained by the Executive on this subject, and substantially affirmed both our inclination and ability to enforce our own laws, protect our flag from abuse, and acquit ourselves of all our duties and obligations on the high seas. In view of these assertions, the treaty of Washington was negotiated; and upon consultation with the British negotiator as to the quantum of force necessary to be employed, in order to attain these objects, the result to which the most deliberate estimate led was embodied in the 8th article of the treaty.

Such were my views at the time of negotiating that treaty, and such, in my opinion, is its plain and fair interpretation. I regarded the 8th article as removing all possible pretext, on the ground of mere necessity, to visit and detain our ships upon the African coast, because of any alleged abuse of our flag by slave-traders of other nations. We had taken upon ourselves the burden of preventing any such abuse, by stipulating to furnish an armed force regarded by both the high contracting parties as sufficient to accomplish that object.

Denying, as we did and do, all color of right to exercise any such general police over the flags of independent nations, we did not demand of Great Britain any formal renunciation of her pretension; still less had we the idea of yielding any thing ourselves in that respect. We chose to make a practical settlement of the question. This we owed to what we had already done upon this subject. The honor of the country called for it; the honor of its flag demanded that it should not be used by others, to cover an iniquitous traffic. This Government, I am very sure, has both the inclination and the ability to do this; and, if need be, it will not content itself with a fleet of eighty guns; but, sooner than any foreign Government shall exercise the province of executing its laws and fulfilling its obligations—the highest of which is to protect its flag alike from abuse or insult—it would, I doubt not, put in requisition for that purpose its whole naval power. The purpose of this Government is faithfully to fulfil the treaty on its part; and it will not permit itself to doubt that Great Britain will comply with it on hers. In this way, peace will best be preserved, and the most amicable relations maintained between the two countries.

JOHN TYLER.

The Clerk had read but a small portion of the Message, when the reading was arrested; and,

On motion of Mr. BOTTS,
The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 8.

Lieutenant Fremont's Expedition to the Rocky Mountains.

A communication was received from the War Department, in answer to a call heretofore made for the report of Lieutenant Fremont's expedition to the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. LINN moved that it be printed for the use of the Senate; and also that one thousand extra copies be printed.

In support of his motion, Mr. L. said, that in the course of the last summer a very interesting expedition had been undertaken to the Rocky Mountains, ordered by Colonel Abert, chief of the Topographical Bureau, with the sanction of the Secretary of War, and executed by Lieutenant Fremont of the topographical engineers. The object of the expedition was to examine and report upon the rivers and the country between the frontiers of Missouri and the base of the Rocky Mountains; and especially to examine the character, and ascertain the latitude and longitude of the South Pass, the great crossing-place in these mountains on the way to the Oregon. All the objects of the expedition had been accomplished, and in a way to be beneficial to science, and instructive to the general reader, as well as useful to the Government.

Supplied with the best astronomical and barometrical instruments, well qualified to use them, and accompanied by twenty-five voyageurs enlisted for the purpose at St. Louis, and trained to all the hardships and dangers of the prairies and the mountains, Mr. Fremont left the mouth of the Kansas, on the frontiers of Missouri, on the 10th of June; and, in the almost incredibly short space of four months, returned to the same point, without an accident to a man, and with a vast mass of useful observations, and many hundred specimens in botany and geology.

In executing his instructions, Mr. Fremont proceeded up the Kansas River far enough to ascertain its character, and then crossed over to the Great Platte, and pursued that river to its source in the mountains, where the Sweet Water (a head branch of the Platte) issues from the neighborhood of the South Pass. He reached the pass on the 8th of August, and describes it as a wide and low depression in the mountains, where the ascent is as easy as that of the hill on which this Capitol stands, and where a plainly-beaten wagon road leads to the Oregon, through the valley of Lewis's River, a fork of the Columbia. He went through the Pass, and saw the head-waters of the Colorado, of the Gulf of California; and, leaving the valleys to indulge a laudable curiosity, and to make some useful observations, and attended by four of his men, he climbed the loftiest peak of the Rocky Mountains, until then untrodden by any known human being; and, on the 15th of August, looked down upon ice and snow some thousand feet below, and traced in the distance the valleys of the rivers which, taking their rise in the same elevated ridge, flow in opposite directions to the Pacific Ocean and to the Mississippi. From that ultimate point he returned by the valley of the Great Platte, following this stream in its whole course, and solving all questions in relation to its navigability, and the character of the country through which it flows.

Over the whole course of this extended route, barometrical observations were made by Mr. Fremont, to ascertain elevations both of the plains and of the mountains; astronomical observations were taken, to ascertain latitudes and longitudes; the face of the country was marked as arable or sterile; the facility for travelling, and the practicability of routes, noted; the grand features of nature described, and some presented in drawings; military positions indicated; and a large contribution to geology and botany was made in the varieties of plants, flowers, shrubs, trees, and grasses, and rocks and earths, which were enumerated. Drawings of some grand and striking points, and a map of the whole route, illustrate the report, and facilitate the understanding of its details. Eight carts, drawn by two mules each, accompanied the expedition; a fact which attests the facility of travelling in this vast region. Herds of buffaloes furnished subsistence to the men; a short, nutritious grass, sustained the horses and mules. Two boys, (one of twelve* years of age, the other of eighteen,†) besides the enlisted men, accompanied the expedition, and took their share of its hardships; which proves that boys, as well as men, are able to traverse the country to the Rocky Mountains.

The result of all his observations Mr. Fremont had condensed into a brief report—enough to make a document of some ninety or one hundred pages; and, believing that this document would be of general interest to the whole country, and beneficial to science, as well as useful to the Government, I move the printing of the extra number which has been named.

In making this motion, and in bringing this report to the notice of the Senate, I take a great pleasure in noticing the activity and importance of the Topographical Bureau. Under its skilful and vigilant head, (Colonel Abert) numerous valuable and incessant surveys are made; and a mass of information collected of the highest importance to the country generally, as well as to the military branch of the public service. This report proves conclusively that the country, for several hundred miles from the frontier of Missouri, is exceedingly beautiful and fertile; alternate woodland and prairie, and certain portions well supplied with water. It also proves that the valley of the river Platte has a very rich soil, affording great facilities for emigrants to the west of the Rocky Mountains.

The printing was ordered.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 8.

The Speaker's Administration.

Mr. WELLER, of Ohio, on leave given, had presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be offered to the Hon. JOHN WHITE, for the able, impartial, and dignified manner in which he has discharged the duties of Speaker during the 27th Congress.

The question was taken, and the vote resulted—yeas 141, nays 17.

Mr. PROCKEN then moved that the House adjourn sine die; which being carried,

The SPEAKER addressed the House as follows:

GENTLEMEN: Before I declare, for the last time, your adjournment, allow me to tender to each and every one of you, my grateful thanks for the attention and respect I have invariably received as your presiding officer; and especially for the flattering

* Randolph Benton, son of Senator Benton.

† Henry Brant, son of Col. Brant, of St. Louis, Mo.

3d Sess.]

Adjournment.

[MARCH, 1843.]

expression of favorable opinion contained in the resolution ordered to be entered on your journal this night. Yet I cannot but feel that I am more indebted to the kindness of this House, than its justice, in the adoption of this resolution.

I trust, however, I shall ever cherish all those emotions of gratitude and affection which so signal an instance of your generosity ought to inspire. Whilst the censure of this body cannot be considered a trivial punishment, its praise can never be esteemed an ordinary compliment. Next to the satisfaction arising from a consciousness of having discharged my duty, is the approbation of those who have been constant witnesses of my official conduct. It was with diffidence and hesitancy, knowing well the high but just responsibility of this station, that I persuaded myself to engage in the discharge of its delicate and arduous duties. Nothing but the hope that I should receive the cordial support of the liberal of all sides in this House, could have induced me to undertake so difficult a task.

I take pleasure in stating that my most sanguine expectations of candor and favor have been more than realized. Amidst all the excitement growing out of animated debates upon the great interests of the country, which have so often and so deeply impressed all our minds, and enlisted the warmest feelings of the heart, I have experienced a uniform politeness from every quarter of this House. When, in the trial of opinion upon questions of importance and difficulty, this House has been equally divided, and my vote has been demanded by the rules, I have invariably found, in that half of the members from whose judgment I have differed, a disposition to allow me the same freedom of deliberation and independence of thought which they asserted for themselves.

The position I have occupied since my elevation to this Chair has made it my duty to scan closely the progress of business in this House; and I owe it to truth and justice to declare, without reference to party, that I have witnessed an industry, a patriotism, and independence, a series of information and eloquence, that would have done honor to any deliberative assembly in any age or country.

Well am I convinced, in despite of the recent efforts that have been made, in various quarters, by misrepresentation and traduction, to weaken the public respect and confidence in the immediate Representatives of the people, that the scrutiny of time will prove this House to be the sanctuary of the constitution—the citadel of civil liberty—the palladium of this republic. It is here—it is here, in this grand inquest of the nation—here, if anywhere, that resistance will be made to the silent arts of corruption, or to the daring encroachments of power; and if the constitution, the sacred charter of American freedom, be destined to perish by the ruthless hand of the demagogue or the usurper, (which God avert!) here, upon this floor, it will breathe its last agonies—its dying gasp.

In the course of our deliberations, in a moment of commotion and excitement, I am sensible I may, at times, have wounded the feelings of members. I have never arrested the progress of business, to enter into explanations. My position in this chair made it impossible for me to do so, without endangering the order and dignity of this House. Besides, the moment of irritation is not the most propitious time for satisfactory explanations. I have chosen, at the hazard of injustice to my motives, to leave my justification to the calm and sober reflection of members. On my part, I have no wrongs to complain of from any individual upon this floor. If any have been intended or done, they have long since been forgiven and forgotten. I thank my God I have no memory for injuries.

We are now about to part—many, very many of us, never to meet again. Let us separate as social, moral beings should separate—as friends, as brothers. May the honor of this House, and the honor of this nation, be the paramount ambition of us all. No matter what may be our future destiny—whether in private or public life—let all the ends we aim at be our country's, God's, and Truth's.

With cordial wishes for your health and happiness, and fervent prayers for the peace, prosperity, and lasting liberty of our common country, I pronounce this House adjourned without day.

The address was received with loud expressions of gratification.

And the House, sine die, adjourned.

INDEX TO VOL. XIV.

A

A. B. Plot, the.—See Index, vol. 8, Edwards, Natan, address of.

ADAMS, JOHN QUINCY, Representative from Massachusetts, 3, 881; relative to the North-eastern boundary, 104; moves to rescind the 51st rule, 145; on the Amistad Africans, 155; on commercial relations with China, 165; on navy pensions, 176; on the 51st rule, 389; on the relief of Mrs. Harrison, 393, 399; on the decease of Lewis Williams, 406; on the decease of Wm. B. Hastings, 445; on the tariff veto, 469; on amending the constitution relative to the veto power, 504; on the President's protest, 597; on the fine on General Jackson, 698; on the presentation of the sword of Washington and staff of Franklin, 691. See Index, vols. 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 18.

Addresses of the Senate and House in answer to President's Messages.—See Index, vol. 1, 2.

Adjournment of Congress.—See Index, vol. 7, 10.

Admirals in the Navy.—See Index, vol. 2, 12.

African Slaves and Slavery.—See Index, vol. 1, 2, and Index, vol. 6, Slavery.

Africans Captured.—See Index, vol. 2.

Agriculture, committee on.—See Index, vol. 8.

Alabama, vote for President in 1840, 250.

ALFORD, JULIUS C., Representative from Georgia, 4, 281. See Index, vol. 12.

Algerine War.—See Index, vol. 1.

Allegiance, foreign.—See Index, vol. 1; also Index, vols. 2, 5, 6, Expatriation.

ALLEN, WILLIAM, Senator from Ohio, 3, 290; on printing the President's Message, 17; on the Maine boundary, 40; on the assumption of State debts, 60; on the north-eastern boundary, 110; on the prospective pre-emption bill, 201; on disturbance in the galleries, 253; on naval schools, 473; relative to the British treaty, 712. See Index, vol. 12, 18.

ALLEN, ELMER H., Representative from Maine, 281.

ALLEN, JOHN W., Representative from Ohio, 3. See Index, vol. 12, 18.

ALLEN, JUDSON, Representative from New York, 2.

ALLEN, THOMAS, chosen printer of the House, 293.

Amelia Island.—See Index, vol. 6.

Amendment of the Constitution.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, 3, 5, 7, 8, 9, 12.

Amendment of the Journal of the House.—See Index, vol. 7.

Amistad Africans.—In the House, a resolution of inquiry relative to the discrepancy in certain documents offered, 155; report of the committee in the House, 193.

Amy Dardin's Horse.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 11.

ANDERSON, HUGH B., Representative from Maine, 1. See Index, vol. 12.

ANDERSON, SIMON H., Representative from Kentucky, 2. decease of, 157.

ANDERSON, ———, Senator from Tennessee, 290; on duties and drawbacks, 123; on repeal of the Independent Treasury, 163; on the decease of Felix Grundy, 177; on the prospective pre-emption bill, 204.

ANDERSON, JOHN, the case of, see Index, vol. 6, Erbery.

ANDREWS LANDAFF W., Representative from Kentucky, 4, 281.

ANDREWS, SHEKLOCK J., Representative from Ohio, 31.

Appointments, Executive.—See Index, vol. 6.

Apportionment.—See Ratio of Representation.

Appropriations.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, 3, 5, 7, 8, 11.

ARONER, WILLIAM B., Senator from Virginia, 239; on the Fauquier Co. proceedings, 835; on the tariff, 43; on naval schools, 473, 479; on the African squadron, 51; on assumption of State debts, 626; on the presentation of the sword of Washington, 693; relative to the British treaty, 708, 711.

Ardent Spirits in the Navy.—See Index, vol. 10.

Arkansas, admission of.—See Index, vol. 12.

Arkansas Territory.—See Index, vol. 6, Territories.

Arkansas, vote for President in 1840, 250.

Arkansas Western Boundary.—See Index, vol. 7, 8.

Armory, western.—See Index, vol. 8.

Army.—See Index, vol. 1, 2, 4, 5, 7, 10.

Army Desertion, prevention of.—See Index, vol. 2, and Index, vol. 9, Desertion.

ARNOLD THOMAS D., Representative from Tennessee, 21.

ARRINGTON, ARTHUR H., Representative from Ind. Carolina, 281.

Assassination of President Jackson attempted.—See Index, vol. 12.

Assault on the President's Secretary.—See Index, vol. 12.

Assumption of State Debts.—In the Senate, resolutions relative to, offered, 17; a report from the committee, 3; recommitted, 50; report, 50; considered, 51-53; motion to lay on the table, 54; motion to print carried, 54; extra number voted, 54; resolutions of the committee, 5; substitutes proposed, 59; shall the Federal Government depart from the sphere of its powers? 60; the question proposed, 61; to establish a free government is the most difficult of all human efforts, 61; the British revolution of 1688, 61; borrowing the most dangerous mode of borrowing contributions on a people, 62; resort of William III. to borrowing, 62; origin of the Bank of England, 61.

consequences of its creation, 62; attendant incidents, 63; drew interest from both Government and people, 63; whole moneyed wealth of the empire drawn into this reservoir, 63; consequences of the paper system, 64; principles of Hamilton and his party, 64, 65; facts relative to the manner in which the Government went into operation, 66; Hamilton's arrangement with the banks, 66; his Treasury order, 66; first open infraction of the Constitution, 66; the commencement of Hamilton's system, 66; his plans hurried through Congress, 67; further proceedings, 67; why this hurry? 67; who owned the stock? 67; the first bank a branch of the English system, 68; founded on a national debt, 68; has not the paper system expanded from one bank to a thousand? 69; paralyzed the energies and resources of the country, 69; the banks of the two countries receive impulses from the central power where capital is aggregated, 69; with regard to currency Great Britain and this country consolidated, 70; are not these things true? 70; how the resolutions declaring the unconstitutionality of assuming these debts, received, 70; where is the pretext for the objection urged to the proceeding? 71; when did these Senators become the guardians of public credit? 71; the insurrection of 1867, 71; one feature tending to discredit the indebted States, 72; what is the proposition contained in the substitute? 73; the distribution of the land proceeds a distribution of revenue generally, 73; further debate, 75; resolutions, 78, 79; motion to postpone indefinitely lost, 80.

Manner in which the report has been received, 80; disregard of denunciations from political opponents, 81; the proposition made in the most formidable and imposing shape, 81; the scheme proclaimed, 81; the manner, 82; distribution is providing means of payment to the States, 82; it is asked, what right we have to notice the proceedings of State Legislatures? 83; terms of the cession by Virginia of her public land, 83; the letter and spirit of the cession are complied with in the present mode of disposing of the revenue, 84; a fraud on the Legislature of Kentucky, 84; it is said I did not stand the first fire, 85; I am charged with being in favor of an exclusive metallic currency, 85; what we desire is safe banking, 86; effect of distribution on the tariff, 86; it is urged, a part of the army might be discharged, 86; that our diplomatic corps might be reduced, 87; further debate, 88, 89; amendments moved and voted upon, 92, 93, 94; resolutions agreed to, 94.

In the House, notice given of an intention to ask leave to bring in a bill, 489; bill reported, 489; motion to suspend the rules, &c., lost, 489.

In the Senate, a resolution of inquiry whether any proposition was made by the special minister of Great Britain relative to, 696; message in answer to the resolution, 699; resolutions relative to, 696; great importance to set at rest the idea that this Government can have any constitutional power to assume these debts, 696; the proposition now before the other branch of Congress, 696; history of the origin of the suggestion, 696; why such relentless effort to denounce the indebted States? 696; a fatal measure in its effects, 696; not such an assumption at the close of the Revolutionary War, 696; further debate, 697, 698, 699; motion to postpone lost, 700.

The resolution, 708; amendments, 708; a false issue presented to the people, 704; the power of the Government on this point settled affirmatively, 704; the question is, ought these debts to be assumed? 704; motion to postpone, 706; other resolutions laid on the table, 707.

In the House, motion to print reports, 703.

VOL. XIV.—46

ATHERTON, CHARLES G., Representative from New Hampshire, 2, 281; relative to the documentary history, 183.
Attack on the Carolina.—See Index, vol. 12.
Attorney-General, office of.—See Index, vol. 10.
Attorney-Generals, a list of. 269.
 ATRIDGE, JOHN B., Representative from New Jersey, 2, 281.

B

BABCOCK, ALFRED, Representative from New York, 281.
 BAGBY, ———, Senator from Alabama, 289; on the apportionment bill, 404; on the tariff, 471; on the assumption of State debts, 699.

Bahama Banks.—See Index, vol. 9.

Baltimore & Ohio Railroad.—See Index, vol. 10.

Baltimore & Washington Railroad.—See Index, vol. 11.

Bank Notes, law on.—In the Senate, a motion for leave to bring in a bill relative to, 168; nothing more reasonable than to require the moneyed interest to contribute to the support of Government, 169; in other countries the banking interest subject to taxation, 169; formerly taxed in this country, 169; manner of levying the bank tax in Great Britain, 169; taxation of the circulation of the Bank of England for the last fifty years, 169; extract from a recent history of the Bank, 170; equity of this tax, 170; the tax in 1818 in this country, 170; a petition of Stephen Girard, 170; details of the bill and probable amount of the tax, 171; the bill a measure simply of revenue, 171; effect on small notes, 173; objections anticipated to the bill, 173; infractions of the Constitution, 173; origin of the idea of this bill, 173; extract from Gallatin's essay on currency, 173.

All revenue measures should originate in the House, 173; not within the powers of the Constitution, 174; the compromise act originated in the Senate, 174; further debate, 174, 175.

Bank of the United States.—In the Senate, resolutions relative to the circulation of the dead notes of, offered, 19.

In the House, a resolution to inquire into the expediency of establishing a National Bank offered, 300.

In the Senate, a bill reported, 300; amendment offered, 304.

Who caused the delay of the bill? 309; what are the measures proposed? 309; it is said the country is in an agony, crying for action, 309; motives of Senators, 309; is it the intention to pass the gag-law of the other House? 310; a fair and open opposition only is meant, 310; Senators conceive they are following the path of duty in trying to defeat the measure, or if they cannot do that, in rendering it odious as possible, 310; a measure should be brought forward that would give the majority the control of the Senate, 310; the relationship of the proposed measure to the alien and sedition law, 311; what does the minority question but their undoubted right to examine every measure which they believe inimical to the interests of the country? 311; what is the situation of parties here? 311; from whom are we to get this ten millions? 311; what right has Congress to lend money at all? 311; the Whigs, during the late administration, had brought to bear against the party in power a vexatious and frivolous system of assault, 312; the course attributed to the opponents of the bill would be unjust and improper, 312; the amendments, 313.

The defalcation of Swartwout took place under the deposit bank system, 318; the Government is invoked to become a speculator in stocks, 318; the power to repeal charters exists not only in this particular case under the constitution, but was sanctioned by judicial decisions, 318; can Congress annihilate the sovereign powers conferred upon them for the benefit of the whole people by transferring them to a corporation? 813; is this bank a public or private corporation? 813; the case of Gaszler and the corporation of Georgetown, 814; this power should be exercised only in an extreme case, 814.

These threats of repeal pass as the idle wind, 814; a monstrous proposition, 814; then the liberties of the nation may be bartered away without their consent, 814; what is the proposition fairly stated? 814; to state it is to answer it, 814; the subject of contract is a sovereign power of Government, and not a mere private right, 815.

Why had not the loan bill been taken up in the other House before the land bill? 815; how has the House got before the Senate, except by the gag-law? 815; some measure will be introduced to give to the majority the control of the business, 816; look at the facts in the case, 816; the majority have consumed the time, 816; the freedom of debate has never yet been abridged in this body, 816.

The rights of Senators relative to debates, 817; the nature of amendments, 817; the people want discussion, 818; the old sedition law and the previous question are measures of the same character, 818; here was a palpable attempt to infringe the right of speech, 819; let the gag be brought on, 819; threatened people live longest, 819; the Senator from Kentucky in a very trying situation, 819; pass these measures if you can, 819.

Amendments, 821; directors prohibited from borrowing more than $10,000, 821; better restrain them altogether, 822; the restraint on members of Congress should be preserved, 823; restriction on directors struck out, 823; proviso inserted that no note shall be discounted for any member of Congress, 828; the banner of repeal will be unfurled, 828; idle to speak of the incorruptibility of members of Congress, 828; sums loaned to members by the former bank, 824; amendment carried, 824; bill passed, 824.

In the House, the Senate bank bill read and referred, 824.

Veto message read in the Senate, 848; excitement in the galleries, 850; hisses, 850; motion that the Sergeant-at-Arms arrest the offenders, 851; better pass the disturbance over, 851; an American President insulted by bank ruffians, 851; a national bank not yet our master, 851; hisses distinctly heard, 851; one of the offenders arrested, 852; all is accomplished that the motion intended, and let him be discharged, 852; time for the consideration of the Message fixed, and the Message ordered to be printed, 853.

Motion to further postpone, 854; carried, 855; considered, 859; bill lost, 859.

In the House, a bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Fiscal bank, &c., considered, 861; difference between this bill and the one recently before the House, 863; resolution to terminate debate offered, 862; objections to the resolution, 863; a new measure, 863; a measure "to head Captain Tyler," 863; further reasons to be excused from voting, 864; resolution adopted, 864.

Motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, 864; the veto gave evidence this bill would be signed, 865; motion to strike out lost, 865; bill passed the House, 865.

In the Senate, the House bill received, 866; moved to refer to a Select Committee, 866; bill referred, 866.

Bill on its third reading, 866; unlimited power to loan money under this bill, 866; mode of discounting at the West, 866; bill passed, 867.

Referred to in the annual message, 876; two points presented in the plan wholly unconstitutional and dangerous, 876; to emit bill of credit and to authorize the Government to deal in exchanges, 876; the British debt began on the issue of exchequer bills, 876; identity of this policy with that of Walpole, 876; first time a proposition has been made to change our hard-money government into a paper-money machine, 877.

Board of Exchequer.—Administration of Walpole the fountain head of British woes, 878; corporations brought into existence by Walpole, 878; corporation credit raised in England by the explosion of banks and companies, 878; our administration stands now where Great Britain stood one hundred and twenty years ago, 878; the origin of our Exchequer scheme in the British act, 879; design to substitute Government credit for corporation credit, 879; manner in which the Exchequer system has worked in England, 879; issues of Exchequer bills, 881; British debt the fount of the Exchequer system, 881; the English people bound for two-fifths more of capital and pay two-fifths more of interest on account of their debt than they ever received, 880; shall we adopt this system? 881; at the adoption of the constitution it was established that the new Government was a hard-money Government, 881; proceedings in the convention, 881; inherent baseness and vice of paper money, 881; policy with which an industrious country can supply itself with hard money, 889; metallic currency in Cuba, 889; Ireland and Cuba have the best currencies in the world, 888; different manner in which this plan is received now from what it was a few years ago, 888; answer of the French merchants to Colbert, 884.

Bank of the United States.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 9, 11, 12, 13.

Bank Notes in Payment of Duties.—See Index, vol. 1, 12.

Banks Deposits.—See Index, vols. 7, 12, 13.

Bank of England.—See Index, vol. 11.

Bankrupt Bill.—In the Senate, the Bankrupt Bill considered, 846; amendment to include banking and trading corporations moved, 846; banks established by swamp authority in Alabama, 846; remarks of Senator Van Buren in former years, 846.

Amendment modified to take effect Jan. 1st, 1848, 847; does it make any difference whether it was a State or a member of the State that held the stock in banks? 847; high time the banks should be brought under some such provision, 847; if we can interfere with any portion of the sovereignty of the States, we can with it all, 846; we cannot touch banks incorporated by the State Legislatures, 848; expediency of the measure, 848; a State as New York, may place her banks under the operation of the bankrupt law, 848; does the State of Alabama acknowledge herself bound to pay the notes of her banks? 849.

In the House, a petition for, presented, 867; referred to the Judiciary Committee with instructions to consider the expediency of bringing in a bill, 867; a message from the President communicating a petition relative to, 865; referred, 866; a voluntary bankrupt law soon beginning to end, and retrospective in its operation on all obligations, 880; former experiments of such law, 820; the machinery of the General Government incompetent for such a system, 880; this bill will be repealed in a short time, 880; the passage of this bill will not have a tendency to expand credit, 880; further debate, 881; bill passed, 881.

Its provisions explained, 882; failure of previous efforts to pass this law, 882; are the people any more in favor of it? 882; distinction of the terms bankrupt and insolvent, 882; the law should be prospective and not retro-active, 882; injurious operation of the bill, 882; petitioners in favor of the law, 882; inherent difficulties in the case, 883; whole country covered with debt, 883;

the law of 1800 only prospective, 333; not being uniform in its operation, it is not constitutional, 334; motion to strike out the enacting clause, 333; power and obligation of Congress to maintain such a law at all times, 333; emphatically a measure of relief, 339; defects of the bill, 339; objections to including State corporations, 340; none but natural persons contemplated in the provisions of the constitution, 340; none of the motives which applied to a law for individuals applied to the case of corporations, 340; the compulsory bankruptcy clause, 341; the voluntary bankruptcy, 341; the debtor will be able to control the creditor, 341.

Motion fixing a time to close the debate, 344; lost, 344; policy of granting a full discharge to the insolvent debtor, 344; the voluntary portion of the bill in hostility to the constitution, 345; a bill for the relief of lawyers, commissioners, &c., 345; differences of opinion as to the extent of the power in the constitution, 346; assumes jurisdiction over the whole relations of debtor and creditor throughout the country, 346; no bankrupt bill passed this session, 346; its repeal will be more popular than its passage, 346; state of parties, 346; Congress bound to exercise this power whenever a case arises to require it, 347; it enjoins unreasonable preferences in certain cases, 347; other objections, 348.

Laying the foundation stone of a system that will not benefit the people in any manner, 354; bankrupt laws designed to give more efficient remedy to creditors, 354; relief laws of Kentucky, 354; motion to strike out the enacting clause lost, 354.

Motion to fix the time for the bill to take effect, 355; be repealed before it takes effect if there is opportunity, 355; enough to destroy any Administration, 355; further debate on the time of operation, 356; motion to postpone, 356; motion to reconsider the vote by which this bill was laid on the table, 356; carried, 356; motion to fix the time for the operation of the bill in February carried and bill passed, 357; signed by the President, 359; leave asked to bring in a bill to repeal the law of the last session, 377; committee instructed to bring in a bill instant, 384; confusion, 384; a new case, 384; appeal from the decision, 385; disorder, 388; bill reported, 388; popular opinion in favor of the passage of the bankrupt law, 389; the law correct in principle and detail, 389; the law practicable, 390; number of bankrupts exaggerated, 390; Massachusetts in favor of the law, 390; moral right of Government to pass such a retrospective law, 390; a part of public duty to relieve humanity, 391; a measure that absorbed and swallowed party distinction, 391; all its provisions and enactments have for their object abolition of contracts of debt, 391; extension of the bankrupt law to corporations just and constitutional, 400; what the true character of a debtor corporation, 400; is there any thing to exempt this class of debtors in the constitution? 400; no State shall pass a law impairing contracts violated, 400; amendment offered, 400; motion to lay on the table lost, 400; amendment lost, 461.

In the Senate, leave to introduce a bill to repeal, &c., asked, 433; motion for leave made, 437; its constitutionality, 457; points of unconstitutionality, 457; its object the abolition of debts, 457; for this two main positions necessary to establish, 457; the civil law, the Scottish law, the English law, 457; leave not granted, 458; notice of a bill to repeal, 493; the bill, 610; motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary, 613; public opinion opposed to the voluntary portion of the law, 613; a suitable law can be passed, 614; to refer tantamount to a rejection, 614; delusion that insolvency and bankruptcy are the same thing, 614; the present law undertakes to expunge the insolvent laws of the States, 614; the mere question of reference not such a vital one, 615; cannot the law be so modified as to conform to the interests of the country, 615; bill referred, 615.

In the House, a bill to repeal introduced, 618; the law is destroying confidence between man and man, 630; proves the charge that the legislation of this country is unstable, 630; Vermont, a creditor State, demands the repeal, 630; it is said the law has performed its office, 631; better let it be repealed, because it is inexpedient, 631; why should this law be repealed, 631; moved to instruct the committee, 631; duty of Congress to exercise its power to pass a bankrupt law, 632; the strong language of the constitution, 632; monstrous injustice of an immediate and unconditional repeal of the law, 632; the eyes of all the commercial world turned on us, 632; motion to strike out part of the instructions, 632; the repeal should take effect from the passage of the act; 632; better try to amend and include corporations, 632; many made bankrupts by the effects of the law, 632.

The question stated, 630; no evidence that public opinion demands its repeal, 630; loudly in favor of the law, 631; better hold on as it is than see it repealed, 631; it should be further tested by public judgment, 631; never been a law more misunderstood and more misrepresented than this, 632; two views of the law, 632; its operation as beneficial to debtors and as affecting creditors, 632; effect of its prospective operation, 632; the law was passed under extraordinary circumstances, 632; circumstances of its passage, 632; two bankrupt laws since the organization of the Government, 634; the first law, 634; the present law so framed that the debtor can be discharged without the assent of his creditors, 634; it is urged that the law should be continued for the relief of those it has made bankrupt, 634.

A broad distinction between insolvency and bankruptcy, 636; insolvent law intended for the benefit of the debtor, the bankrupt law for the benefit of the creditor, the present law unconstitutional, 636; much said to excite commiseration for these unfortunate persons, 637; resolution instructing the Judiciary Committee to report forthwith a bill to repeal, &c., 656; resolution carried, 656; further proceedings, 659; bill reported, 659; read second time, 659; orders of the day, 660; state of the question, 660; further proceedings, 660; bill passed, 661.

In the Senate, a petition praying for the repeal of, 634; unconstitutional in abolishing debts without the consent of creditors, 634; how far Congress can go, 634; the English law, 634; the forms the highest evidence of the law, 635.

A petition for the repeal of, 645; the English system does not contain the voluntary principle, 645; the English insolvent system, 646; explanation, 646; the House bill considered and passed, 712, 714, 715.—See Index, vols. 2, 3, 7.

Bankruptcy, law of, applicable to banks.—See Index, vol. 12.

BANKS, LINN, Representative from Vermont, 2, 231; on the decease of P. P. Barbour, 254.

BARBOUR, P. P., decease of, 254. See Index, vols. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11.

BARNARD, DANIEL D., Representative from New York, 2, 231; on the bankrupt law, 239; on repeal of the bankrupt bill, 374; on the fine of Gen. Jackson, 455; on the provisional tariff veto, 451; on the laws for the collection of duties, 462; relative to the tariff laws, 507; on the bankrupt law, 620.

Barracks at New Orleans.—See Index, vol. 9.

BARROW, ALEXANDER, Senator from Louisiana, 290; on the assumption of State debts, 704.

- BANTON, RICHARD W., Representative from Virginia, 281; on the occupation of Oregon, 687.
- BATES, ISAAC, Senator from Massachusetts, 290; on the decease of Wm. S. Hastings, 444; on the tariff, 467.
- Batters at New Orleans.*—See Index, vol. 4; do. at St. Louis.—See Index, vol. 6.
- BAYARD, RICHARD H., Senator from Delaware, 2, 280; on a fiscal bank, 306; on repeal of the bankrupt law, 290; on the apportionment bill, 408, 416; on the enlistment of blacks, 464; on the reorganization of the Navy, 527; on the fine on Gen. Jackson, 627. See Index, vols. 12, 13.
- BRADY, WILLIAM, Representative from Pennsylvania, 2.—See Index, vol. 12.
- Beaumarchais, claim of.*—See Index, vols. 2, 5, 6, 7, 8.
- BENSON, H. W., Representative from Pennsylvania, 226.
- Belgium, mission to.*—See Index, vol. 11.
- Belgium, trade with.*—See Index, vol. 12.
- BELL, JOHN, Representative from Tennessee; votes for as Speaker, 4; on the New Jersey election, 21.—See Index, vols. 7, 10, 11, 12, 13.
- BENGAMAN, A. L., Representative from Mississippi, 261.
- BENTON, THOMAS H., Senator from Mo., 2, 290; offers resolutions on the assumption of State Debts, 17; on circulating dead notes of the United States Bank, 19; on the regulation of foreign commerce, 56; on bloodhounds against the Indians, 59; on the salt tax, 74; on the salt duty, 79; on drawback on refined sugar, 100; on British liberation of slaves, 117; on duties and drawbacks on sugar, etc., 118; on the expenses of Government, 128; on a tax on bank notes, 168-175; on the decease of Felix Grundy, 178; asks leave to introduce pre-emption bill, 184; introduces the bill, 185; remarks, 187, 192, 208; on Treasury notes, 261; on re-organization of Judicial circuits, 261; on the relief of Mrs. Harrison, 290-295; on a fiscal bank, 317; on land distribution, 348; on the Fauquier County proceedings, 365; relative to the repeal of the Sub-treasury, 387; on disturbance in the galleries, 390-392; on the President's message, on the exchequer, 376, 377; on Treasury notes, 383; on repeal of the bankrupt law, 391; introduces a bill to repeal the bankrupt law, 428; proposes a tax on bank notes, 478; on the tariff, 465-475; on regulating commerce with foreign nations, 515; on the British treaty, 545; introduces a bill to repeal the bankrupt law, 611; on the repeal of the bankrupt law, 611; on the African squadron, 618, 619; on the bankrupt law, 624, 645; on the Oregon bill, 651; on the construction of the British treaty, 710. See Index, vols. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13.
- BERRICK, WM. C., Senator from Ga., 290; on repeal of the bankrupt law, 289; on the apportionment bill, 414, 416; on the tariff, 471; on the mandamus to the States, 512; on the repeal of the bankrupt law, 618; on the decease of R. W. Habersham, 616; on the occupation of Oregon, 679.
- BETTS, THADDEUS, decease of, 102.
- BIDDLE, RICHARD, Representative from Pennsylvania, 2; resigns his seat, 155.—See Index, vol. 12.
- BIDLACK, BENJAMIN A., Representative from Pennsylvania, 281; on the decease of D. Dimmock, Jr., 287.
- BIRNEY, ANDREW, Representative from Virginia.
- Bills, money.*—See Index, vol. 1.
- BIRDSEYE, VICTORY, Representative from New York, 261.
- BISHOP, FLAGET. See Index, 11.
- BLACK, EDWARD J., Representative from Georgia.
- BLACKWELL, JULIUS W., Representative from Tennessee.
- BLAIR & RIVES, chosen Public Printers, 50, 258.
- BLAIR, BERNARD, Representative from New York, 281.
- Blank Ballots, shall they be counted?*—See Index, vol. 4.
- Bloodhounds in Florida.*—Communications on, 76.
- Blue Lights as Signals to the Enemy.*—See Index, vol. 1.
- BOARDMAN, WILLIAM W., Representative from Connecticut, 2, 145, 251.
- BORD, WILLIAM K., Representative from Ohio.—See Index, vol. 12.
- Books, printing of.*—In the Senate, a motion to strike out the appropriation to print the Documentary History of the United States, 124; time for Congress to know the amount of this expense, 124; the work one of past value, 124; progress of the work, 124; amount asked, 124; is there no supervisory power, 125; something wrong in this matter, 125; terms of the act, 125; report of the Secretary of State, 126; it is in the power of Congress to refuse this appropriation, 126; a continuation of the book-making business of Congress, 127; amendment agreed to, 126.
- Joint resolution submitted, 127; the point of legal obligation in Congress, 127; this contract entered into under an express act of Congress, 127; let us pay them fairly, 127; resolution passed, 128.
- In the House, the amendment of the Senate, striking out the appropriation for the Documentary History, considered, 128; motion that the House concur, 128; a provision for extending the distribution to the present or future Congresses, 128; inquiry whether the contract was legal and proper should be made, 124; Congress bound by the contract, 124; no reason why the sum now justly due should not be appropriated, 124; expense incurred by other nations, 124; memorial of the contractors, 124; suffering for the money due them, 124; fairness with which they have acted, 125; the act of more importance than any published in the English language, 125; amendment concurred in, 125.—See Index, vols. 12, 13.
- BORDEN, NATHANIEL R., Representative from Massachusetts, 251.—See Index, vol. 12.
- BORN, JOHN M., Representative from Virginia, 2, 231; on the impeachment of the President, 642.
- Bounty for Fishing Vessels.*—See Index, vol. 12.
- BOWEN, SAMUEL S., Representative from New York, 21; on the fine of Gen. Jackson, 625.
- BOYD, LYNN, Representative from Kentucky, 2, 251.—See Index, vol. 12.
- BRAXTON, REV. MR., chosen Chaplain of the House, 124.
- Brazil, affairs with.*—See Index, vol. 12.
- Breach of Privilege.*—See Index, vols. 2, 4.
- Brookwater on the Delaware.*—See Index, vol. 2.
- BROCKENRIDGE, HENRY M., Representative from Pennsylvania, 150.
- Brood Bank.*—See Index, vol. 9.
- BREWSTER, DAVID P., Representative from New York, 2, 267.
- Brbery.*—See Index, vol. 6.
- Brig Enterprise.*—In the Senate, resolutions relative to considered, 80.
- BROOKS, GEORGE N., Representative from Massachusetts, 128; on the claim of Matthew Lyon's heirs, 126; on the bankrupt law, 247; on the provisional tariff vote, 424.
- British Aggressions on Commerce.*—See Index, vol. 1.
- British Colonial Trade.*—See Index, vols. 2, 12.
- British Intrigues.*—See Index, vol. 4.
- British Invasion of American Soil.*—See Index, vol. 12.
- British Minister, conduct of.*—See Index, vol. 4.
- British Outrage at Schlosser.*—In the House, a resolution of inquiry offered, 165; a message from the President, communicating a correspondence relative to, 126; the first official avowal that the outrage on the Caroline was authorized by the British Government, 124; message from the President to the House, communicating correspondence relative to, 126; real facts in the case, 124; the act how regarded under the laws of New York, 124;

- what are the principles involved in the correspondence? 195; report referred, 195.
- British West India Trade.*—See Index, vol. 5.
- BROCKWAY, JOHN H., Representative from Connecticut, 3, 261.
- BROWN, DAVID, Representative from Maine, 261.
- BROWN, AMOS, Representative from New York; decease of, 141.
- BROWN, AARON V., Representative from Tennessee, 3, 261; on the decease of Felix Grundy, 181; on the tariff, 437.
- BROWN, BENJAMIN, Senator from North Carolina, 260.—See Index, vols. 11, 12, 13.
- BROWN, CHARLES, Representative from Pennsylvania, 261; on the fiscal corporation, 365; on the bankrupt law, 622.
- BROWN, G. A., Representative from Mississippi, 3.
- BROWN, JAMES, descendants of.—See Index, vol. 12.
- BROWN, JEREMIAH, Representative from Pennsylvania, 261.
- BROWN, MILTON, Representative from Tennessee, 231; on the bankrupt law, 344, 622.
- BUCHANAN, JAMES, Senator from Pennsylvania, 3, 236; on the Maine Boundary, 35-40; on bloodhounds against the Indians, 60; on the assumption of State Debts, 78; on north-eastern boundary, 103, 109; on printing the documentary history, 157; on a pension to Hannah Leighton, 165; on the prospective pre-emption law, 191-197; on the prospective pre-emption bill, 198-200; on the extravagance of Van Buren's administration, 224; on re-organization of judicial circuits, 263; on relations with Great Britain, 268; on a fiscal bank, 512-522; on the bankrupt bill, 330; on land distribution, 343; on disturbance in the galleries, 351; on referring the fiscal corporation bill, 365; on the decease of David Dimmock, jr., 393; on printing the message, 398; on the apportionment bill, 410; on the provisional tariff, 435, 449; presents a tariff memorial, 449; on the tariff, 467; on naval schools, 479; on the amended tariff bill, 517; on the British treaty, 536; on the fine on Gen. Jackson, 626; on the bankrupt law, 714.—See Index, vols. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13.
- Bugle and New Orleans Road.*—See Index, vol. 11.
- BURKE, EDWARD, Representative from New Hampshire, 3, 261.
- BURNETT, BARKER, Representative from Massachusetts, 261.
- Burning of the Library of Congress.*—See Index, vol. 5.
- BUTLER, SAMUEL H., Representative from South Carolina, 261.
- BUTLER, WILLIAM, Representative from South Carolina, 3, 261.
- BUTLER, WILLIAM O., Representative from Kentucky, 4, 261; on the claim of Matthew Lyon's heirs, 187.
- BYNUM, JOHN A., Representative from North Carolina.—See Index, vols. 12, 13.
- CALDWELL, GREEN W., Representative from North Carolina, 261.
- CALDWELL, PATRICK O., Representative from South Carolina, 261.
- CALDWELL, JOHN C., Senator from South Carolina, 3, 260; on slavery petitions, 76; on British liberation of American slaves, 114; on repeal of the Independent Treasury, 161; on a pension to Hannah Leighton, 165; on a tax on bank notes, 174; on the prospective pre-emption bill, 200; on the bankrupt bill, 248; on printing the message, 266; on the repeal of the sub-Treasury, 268, 264, 236; on a fiscal bank, 308, 311, 315, 319; on land distribution, 339, 339; on the Isle of Wight petition, 334; on the Gooseland county petition, 359; on treasury notes, 369; on the case of the Creole, 365; on the pension laws, 456; on the enlistment of blacks, 466; on the tariff, 474; on the mandamus to the States, 512; on the duty on cotton bagging, 514; on the amended tariff bill, 534; on the British treaty, 579; on the Oregon bill, 636, 635; on the occupation of Oregon, 671; on the assumption of State debts, 697; on the British treaty, 712. See Index, vols. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13.
- CALHOUN, WILLIAM B., Representative from Massachusetts, 3, 261; on the decease of J. C. Alford, 20.
- CAMPBELL, JOHN, Representative from South Carolina, 3, 261; on the New Jersey contested election, 21. See Index, vol. 12.
- CAMPBELL, THOMAS J., Representative from Tennessee, 261.
- CAMPBELL, WILLIAM B., Representative from Tennessee, 3, 261.
- Canadian Refugees.*—See Index, vols. 2, 5.
- Canal around Muscle Shoals.*—See Index, vol. 9.
- Canal in Illinois.*—See Index, vol. 9.
- CARR, JOHN, Representative from Indiana, 3. See Index, vols. 11, 12, 13.
- Caraccas, relief of.*—See Index, vol. 4.
- CARROLL, J., Representative from Maryland, 3.
- CARTER, WILLIAM B., Representative from Tennessee, 3. See Index, vol. 12.
- CARTWRIGHT, ROBERT F., Representative from Tennessee, 261.
- CART, GEORGE W., Representative from Virginia, 261.
- CASEY, ZADOCK, Representative from Illinois, 2, 261; votes for as Speaker, 4. See Index, vols. 12, 13.
- Caucus, Congressional.*—See Index, vol. 5, and Index, vol. 7, Amendments of the Constitution.
- CHAPMAN, R., Representative from Alabama, 3, 261. See Index, vol. 12.
- Charges d'Affaires, appointment of.*—See Index, vol. 9.
- Charitable Objects.*—See Index, vol. 1.
- Chase, Judge, official conduct and trial of.*—See Index, vol. 2.
- Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.*—See Index, vol. 10.
- Chesapeake Frigate, attack on.*—See Index, vol. 2.
- Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.*—See Index, vols. 2, 9, 10.
- CHILDS, TIMOTHY, Representative from New York, 261. See Index, vol. 12.
- China, relations with.*—In the House, a resolution calling for information offered, 164; desirable to know whether our consul had been recognized or not, 165; true ground of the war now raging in China, 165; a bill to establish, considered, 706; amendment, 706; this mission should be placed on the same footing as other missions, 706; further remarks, 707; bill passed, 707.
- CHINN, EDWARD, Representative from Louisiana, 4.
- CHITTENDEN, THOMAS C., Representative from New York, 3, 261.
- CHOATE, EUFY, Senator from Massachusetts, 260; on repeal of the bankrupt law, 390; on the amended tariff bill, 519; on the Oregon bill, 640, 661; on the occupation of Oregon, 663.
- Choctaw Lands, encroachment on.*—See Index, vol. 2.
- Cholera, Asiatic.*—See Index, vol. 11.
- Claim Agencies.*—See Index, vol. 11.
- CLARK, JOHN C., Representative from New York, 3, 261. See Index, vol. 12.
- CLARK, MATTHEW ST. CLAIR, chosen clerk, 232.
- CLARK, STALEY N., Representative from New York, 261.
- CLAY, HENRY, Senator from Kentucky, 3, 260; on the Maine boundary, 40; on abolition of slavery, 75; on north-eastern boundary, 108, 111; on British liberation of slaves, 112, 115; on repeal of the Independent Treasury, 156; on prospective pre-emption, 191; on relations with Great Britain, 264; on the retirement of the Vice President, 267; on printing the message, 268; on repeal of the

- sub-Treasury, 290, 291, 292, 295, 296; on a fiscal bank, 290, 210, 214, 216, 218, 221, 222; on land distribution, 222, 242; on the veto message, 222; on the decease of Lewis Williams, 401. See Index, vols. 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 11, 12.
- CLAY, CLEMENT C., Senator from Alabama, 2, 290; on the armed occupation of Florida, 22; on the admission of Florida, 74; on the North-eastern boundary, 109; on the prospective pre-emption law, 184; on the bankrupt bill, 244, 248; on reorganization of judicial circuits, 260.
- CLAYTON, THOMAS, Senator from Delaware, 2, 260. See Index, vol. 12.
- Clerk of the House.*—See Index, vol. 10.
- CLIFFORD, NATHAN, Representative from Maine, 2, 261.
- CLINTON, JAMES G., Representative from New York, 261.
- Co'd Fisheries.*—See Index, vols. 1, 2, and Index, vol. 5, Duties.
- Coinage, silver.*—See Index, vol. 12.
- Coin, gold.*—See Index, vol. 12.
- Coin, foreign silver.*—See Index, vols. 6, 7, 11.
- COLLES, WALTER, Representative from Virginia, 2, 261. See Index, vol. 12.
- Collection Districts, western.*—See Index, vol. 8.
- Colombia, minister to.*—See Index, vol. 11.
- Colonization Society.*—See Index, vols. 9, 11, 12.
- COLQUITT, T. W., Representative from Georgia, Columbia River.—See Index, vols. 7, 8, 10.
- Columbus, portrait of, presented to the House, 404.
- Commerce and Navigation.*—In the Senate, a report from the Secretary of the Treasury relative to, submitted, 142.
- Commerce of the United States.*—See Index, vols. 1-8.
- Commerce of the West.*—See Index, vol. 10.
- Committee on proceedings of respect to the late President,* 290.
- Compensation of Members.*—See Index, vols. 5, 10, Pay of Members.
- Compensation of President and Vice President.*—See Index, vols. 1, 2.
- Congress.*—First session of the 26th, 2; 2d session of 26th convenes, 145; extra session of 27th convenes, 290; 2d session of 27th convenes, 296; adjourns at close of 2d session of 27th, 529; 2d session of 27th convenes, 600; 2d session of 27th adjourns, 719.
- Connecticut, vote for President in,* 184, 250.
- CONFOR, HENRY W., Representative from North Carolina, 261.
- CONRAD, ———, Senator from Louisiana, 290; on the British treaty, 541.
- Constitution not applicable to Territories.*—See Index, vol. 12.
- Contempt, judicial.*—See Index, vol. 11.
- Contested Election.*—See Index, vols. 1, 8, 7.
- Contingent Expenses.*—See Index, vols. 2, 8.
- Contracts, Government.*—See Index, vol. 2.
- Controversies between States.*—See Index, vol. 5.
- Convoy System.*—See Index, vol. 4.
- COOKMAN, REV. MR., elected chaplain of the Senate, 157.
- COOPER, JAMES, Representative from Pennsylvania, 2, 261; on the decease of Charles Ogle, 296.
- COOPER, MARK A., Representative from Georgia, 4.
- Copyrights to Foreigners.*—See Index, vol. 12.
- Cordage, drawback on.*—See Index, vol. 7.
- CORWIN, THOMAS, Representative from Ohio, 2. See Index, vols. 11, 12, 13.
- Costs of Suits by Patentees.*—See Index, vol. 7.
- COWEN, BENJAMIN S., Representative from Ohio, 261; on the tariff, 429.
- CRAB, GEORGE W., Representative from Alabama, 4.
- CRAFT, SAMUEL C., Senator from Vermont, 602.
- CRAIG, ROBERT, Representative from Virginia, 4.
- CRANSTON, ROBERT B., Representative from Rhode Island, 2, 261. See Index, vol. 12.
- CRARY, ISAAC C., Representative from Michigan, 2.
- CRAYVEN, JAMES H., Representative from Indiana, 261.
- Creek Indian Negotiation.*—See Index, vol. 2.
- Crooks, the case of.*—In the Senate, a motion to refer to the Committee on Foreign Relations the message on the subject, 295; not a step has been taken to bring the guilty to justice, 296; attempt made to condemn the case with that of a criminal fleeing from the country, 296; such the importance of the subject that it should be referred, 296; referred, 297.
- Crimes against the United States.*—See Index, vol. 2, Penal Laws.
- CRITTENDEN, JOHN J., Senator from Kentucky, 2, 261; on the armed occupation of Florida, 27; on the prospective pre-emption law, 195, 198, 199, 207; on the provisional tariff, 442; on the tariff, 449; on the mandate to the States, 512; on the amended tariff bill, 522. See Index, vols. 6, 12, 13.
- CROCKETT, JOHN W., Representative from Tennessee, 2. See Index, vol. 12.
- CROSS, EDWARD, Representative from Arkansas, 261.
- Cuba, emigrants from.*—See Index, vol. 4. Re importance to the United States.—See Index, vol. 9, Panama Station.
- Cumberland River.*—See Index, vol. 6.
- Cumberland Road.*—See Index, vols. 2, 4, 5, 7, 10, and Index, vols. 7, 8, Appropriations.
- CURTIS, EDWARD, Representative from New York, 2; on the decease of Amos Brown, 142. See Index, vol. 12.
- CURNING, CALER, Representative from Massachusetts, 261; on Chinese affairs, 99; on the avowal of the burning of the Caroline, 184; on the provisional tariff, 429; on the tariff veto, 435; on the fine on General Jackson, 62. See Index, vol. 12.
- CUTCHNET, ALFRED, Senator from Georgia, 2, 260; relative to the British treaty, 712. See Index, vol. 12, 13.

D

- DANA, AMASA, Representative from New York, 2.
- DANIEL, JOHN R. J., Representative from North Carolina, 261.
- DAVER, THOMAS, Representative from Maine, 2. See Index, vol. 12.
- DAVIES, EDWARD, Representative from Pennsylvania, 2. See Index, vol. 12.
- DAVIES, JOHN, Representative from Pennsylvania, 2.
- DAVIS, GARRET, Representative from Kentucky, 2, 261.
- DAVIS, JOHN W., Representative from Indiana, 2. See Index, vol. 12.
- DAVIS, JOHN, Senator from Massachusetts, 2; on the Maine boundary, 41; on printing the documentary history, 52. See Index, vols. 8-12.
- DAVIS, RICHARD D., Representative from New York, 261.
- DAVISON, JOHN B., Representative from Louisiana, 261.
- DAWSON, JOHN B., Representative from Louisiana, 261.
- DAWSON, WILLIAM C., Representative from Georgia, 2, 261; votes for as Speaker, 4; on the bankrupt law, 221. See Index, vol. 12.
- Day of Humiliation.*—See Index, vol. 11.
- DAYTON, WILLIAM L., Senator from New Jersey, 261; on the fine of General Jackson, 704.
- Deaf and Dumb Institutions.*—See Index, vols. 4, 11, 12, 13.
- DEAN, EMMA, Representative from Ohio, 261; on the will of Mrs. Harrison, 298.
- Debates, register of.*—See Index, vols. 2, 11.
- Debates, reporting of.*—See Index, vol. 2.
- DEHERRY, EDWARD, Representative from North Carolina, 2, 261. See Index, vol. 12, 13.

DECATUR, MRS. SUEAN.—See Index, vols. 9, 11, 12, 13.
Defensive Measures against Great Britain under John Adams.—See Index, vol. 2.
Delaware and Chesapeake Canal.—See Index, vol. 8.
Delaware, vote for President in 1840, 250.
Delegates from Territories.—See Index, vol. 1.
DENNIS, JOHN, Representative from Maryland, 8. See Index, vol. 12.
Deposit Banks.—See Index, vols. 12, 13.
Deposits with the States.—See Index, vols. 12, 13.
Deserters, bounty to.—See Index, vol. 5.
DICKINS, ASHLEY, chosen Secretary of the Senate, 281.
DILLETT, JAMES, Representative from Alabama, 2.
DIMMICK, DAVID, JR., Representative from Pennsylvania, 281; decease of, 386.
Diplomatic Addresses.—See Index, vol. 9.
Diplomatic Expenses.—See Index, vol. 10.
Diplomatic Intercourse.—See Index, vol. 2.
Disbursements of Public Money.—See Index, vol. 7.
Disbursing and Accounting Officers.—See Index, vol. 10.
Dismal Swamp Canal.—See Index, vols. 8, 9.
Distress, public.—See Index, vol. 12.
Distribution of Revenue.—See Index, vols. 10, 12.
District Banks.—In the House, a resolution relative to extending the charter of, passed, 695.
District of Columbia.—See Index, vols. 2, 3, 6, 7, 12.
Disturbances in the Galleries and at the President's House.—In the Senate, resolutions relative to, offered, 357; the Committee of the District have general supervision of the concerns of the District, 357; nature of the outrages, 358; motion to postpone, 358.
Divorces in the District of Columbia.—See Index, vols. 2, 4, 7.
DIXON, NATHAN F., Senator from Rhode Island, 390; decease of, 392.
DOANE, WILLIAM, Representative from Ohio, 3, 281.
DODGE, AUGUSTINE C., Delegate from Iowa, 381.
DODGE, HENRY, Delegate from Wisconsin, 381.
DOE, NICHOLAS B., Representative from New York, 145.
DOIN, ANDREW W., Representative from New York, 3, 281.
Domestic Manufactures.—See Index, vol. 5.
Drawback on Refined Sugar.—See Index, vol. 10, Duties on Imports.
DROMGOOLE, GEORGE C., Representative from Virginia, 8. See Index, vol. 12.
Duelling.—See Index, vols. 6, 11, 12.
DUNCAN, ALEXANDER, Representative from Ohio, 3; on Treasury notes, 233. See Index, vol. 12.
Duties, discriminating.—See Index, vol. 10.
Duties on Imports.—In the House, a bill reported to continue in force the present tariff laws to August 1st, 417.
 Provisional tariff considered, 437; moved to strike out the proviso that nothing shall interfere with the distribution of the land proceeds, 437; what is the operation of this bill? 438; relates to other questions than the tariff, 438; its provision, 438; has other relations than those of a financial character, 438.
 Will be some curious developments in the course of the debate, 439; many willing to vote a tariff greater than twenty per cent., 439; it is said, if we will not give distribution we shall not have protection, 439; no principle of legislation by which one Congress can bind its successors, 439; better that this bill should not pass, and trust to the consequences, than stop the distribution, 439; no man believed the bill could have been passed without the proviso, 439.
 A bill totally different from what its title imports, 431; three bills reported proposing to raise revenue, 431; effect of this bill to throw the Government into chaos, 431; it violates the compromise acts, 432; the question now is, whether Congress shall re-enact the distribution law without the twenty per cent. provision, 432.

 Was the proposition in the bill true, that in the event of the passage of this bill the laws in force on the 30th June would be continued precisely as they existed? 433; what is the consequence of passing this bill? 433; the time when the compromise received the sanction of Congress, 433; one party has kept its faith with the country, 433; the South has kept its part of the engagement during the nine years, 433; vote on the amendments, 434; bill passed, 434.
 In the Senate, the provisional tariff bill taken up, 435; moved to read the second time, 435; an attempt to force the Senate to violate a promise made to the country, 435; the distribution law would never have passed but for the understanding the compromise should not be disturbed, 435; bill read the second time, 435; referred, 435.
 The revenue receipts for the year will fall short of the expenditures, 439; a necessity exists to increase the means of the Treasury, 439; necessity of this temporary bill, from the doubt if any duties can be collected after June 30th, 440; it should not be left a matter of doubt, 440; present rate of duties continued by the adoption of the home valuation, 440; the present object, 440; amendment proposed, 440.
 The amendment postpones the distribution till August 1st, 441; fifteen millions all that can be got under existing laws, 441; nothing so indefensible as the assumption that the public lands are the property of the States, and not of the United States, 441; was it right that this temporary act should be allowed to suspend the operation of a great national distribution act so long agitated and so solemnly enacted? 442; it is vain to attempt to evade the question of principle, 442; a revenue bill demanded at this session, 442; amendment carried, 443; bill passed, 443; House concurs in the amendment, 443; veto message, 443.
 In the House, the message considered, 443; reasons of the President entirely insufficient, 443; use of the veto power dangerous in the extreme, 443; nothing to justify the course of the President, 443; all knew this veto would come, 443; issue now presented between the President and the representatives of the people, 443; charges against the President, 443; a bargain with the Democratic party, 450; unworthy imputations, 450; unable to find out what the President meant, 451; act of 1833, 451; act of 1841, 451; the manufacturing interest told, that, unless you hold on to distribution you will get no protection, 451.
 Condition of the country under which this bill was passed, 452; tendency of this system of measures, 452; return the proceeds of the lands to the Treasury, or adopt direct taxation, 452; vote on the bill, 452; not carried, 453.
 The bill to provide revenue from imports considered, 452; moved to strike out the first section and insert the bill reported by the Committee on Manufactures, 453; this is a revenue bill, 453; amount of revenue necessary, 453; the probable expenditures of the Government for years to come, 453; sources whence the receipts were drawn, 453; what had been the history of raising the revenue of a country by excise, 453; complicated legislation necessary, 454; instances of the impolicy of excise duties, 454; is this bill sufficient to supply the wants of the Treasury? 454; needless to discuss protection, 455; cases in which protection should be given, 455; how shall the duties be levied? 456; should be collected in cash, 456.
 Bill to provide revenue from imports considered, 457; amendment to insert the bill from the Committee on Manufactures, 487; the specific duties and the minimums the most objectionable features of the bill, 487; objections to minimums, 487; the bill will produce great dissatisfaction, 487; this bill violates a solemn instrument of compromise, 487; these bills were for the purpose of protection, 487; no legislative perfidy in relation to the subject, 488; protection the true policy of the country, 488; a tariff for protection unconstitutional, 488; a few questions asked the advocates of protection, 489.

Intention to propose a plan for the issue of Government stocks to be given to the States, 484; also a tariff for protection to domestic manufactures, 484; bill ordered to be engrossed, 486; passed, 486.

In the Senate, the House bill received and read twice, 487; reported with amendments, 489; general principles of the bill, 488; difficulty of making discrimination, 488; twenty-six millions required, 488; effect of repealing the proviso of the distribution act, 488.

In the Senate, a petition from citizens of Pittsburg in favor of a protective tariff, 448; a most propitious moment for adjusting the tariff question, 449.

Motion to change the duties on cotton bagging from 5 to 8½ cents, 465; the whole of the bill protection, 465; the bill should discriminate between luxuries and necessities, 465; three great branches of industry, 466; what is the revenue duty? 466; thirty-three and a third per cent. a maximum duty, 466; cotton bagging, how made, 466; its cost, 466; a change of thirty per cent. on the foreign cost, 467.

What constitutes a revenue bill? 467; motion to strike out the sixth section relative to land distribution, 467; this section proposes that the distribution shall continue, although the duties exceed twenty per cent., 467; is it wise to distribute the land fund and impose additional duties? 468; amount distributed, 468; shall we suffer the national faith to be violated for the purpose of retaining that clause? 468; return of the land fund requisite to prevent direct taxation, 468; if not restored, a tax on tea and coffee must follow, 468; this like a poll tax, 469.

The true question was, whether the right of taxation should remain with the representative body or be entirely controlled by the Executive, 469; it is urged that this bill cannot become a law, 470; what is the great objection to the 27th section? 470; an open attempt made on the part of the Executive to defeat legislation, 470; acknowledged the Government is in the midst of a revolution, 470; the Government must be left destitute of means because a portion of both Houses conflict in opinion with the Executive, 470.

No difference between the power to distribute the proceeds of the public lands and any other revenue, 471; all efforts unavailing to amend or improve this bill, 471; the section proposed to be stricken out makes a new distribution bill, 473; better defer this grave measure, 473; no right to vote a tax in this form for distribution among the States, 473; motion to strike out lost, 478; motion to put a stamp duty on the issue and a tax on the circulation of paper money, 473; the amendment, 478; lost, 474.

This bill worse than the tariff of 1828, 474; a return to the protective system, 474; difference between a revenue and protective tariff, 474; the real competition is not with foreigners, but with our own community, 474; the fallacy of protection, 475; by prohibiting imports it diminishes exports, 475; interests that will suffer, 475.

The act of 1828 did not produce the surplus revenue, 475; the old principles of the Democratic party found in the act of 1789, &c., 476; the bill is for direct protection, 476; extract from the Edinburgh Review, 476; party divisions, 476; retrenchments made, 476; appropriations of the late Administration, 477; duties now lower than they ever have been, 477; great test of the prosperity of the country, the high price of wages, 477; further debate, 478; bill passed, 478.

In the House, the veto message received, 480; ordered printed, 483; if the President had yielded his opinion and signed the bill, every thing would have been given, 483; that hope blasted, 484; the issue complete, 484; examination of the reasons assigned by the President, 484; motion to refer the message to a committee of thirteen, 484.

The constitution points out the course to be pursued, 484; the above motion should not be entertained, 484; just as much the action of the House, 484; will the House pass the bill notwithstanding the President's objections? is the question, 485; reference constitutional, 485; further debate, 485; motion to refer carried, 485; the committee, 486; reports, 489; protest and counter report, 494; report in opposition to the majority, 501; action on the message, 508; vetoed bill lost, 508.

Resolution recommended by the committee to amend the constitution, &c., considered, 504; majority report and resolution adopted, 505.

In the House, a resolution that it is expedient to pass another tariff bill, offered, 505; lost, 506; House in committee, 506; bill to supply a temporary defect in revenue laws, taken up, 506; amendment moved, 506; the bill proposes to reach imports since July 1st, 506; retroactive, affecting civil transactions, 506; the President has proceeded to levy duties, and it is a case like that of "ship-money" in England, 506; an ex post facto bill, 506; no authority to levy duties, 506; discipline should be yielded rather than fail to secure the passage of a necessary revenue bill, 506.

Motion to amend by striking out all after the enabling clause and inserting the vetoed bill, excepting section 27, 509; amendment carried, 510; bill passed, 511.

In the Senate, the tariff considered, 514; effect of high duty on cotton bagging would be to exclude every species of foreign, 514; cotton planters driven to the necessity of adopting expedients which will ruin the Kentucky manufacturers, 514; a duty of three cents amounts to a prohibition, 514; rate fixed at three and a half cents, 515; amendment for reciprocity, 515; contains an old principle, 515; recommended by Jefferson and Madison, 515; lost, 516.

The only alternative, whether we shall pass this bill or leave the country in its present deplorable condition, 517; the two alternatives considered, 517; every dollar now paid is paid under protest, 517; our credit shrank, 518; the worst not yet arrived, 518; consequences to a large class of our citizens, 518; distress that would be produced among the laboring classes, 518; the bill extravagant in the protection it affords, 518.

A purely Whig measure, 519; the Whigs will succeed in carrying one measure, 519; the great work the country expected of the Whigs, 519; a bill to tax the interests of the agriculturists for the benefit of the manufacturers, 520; the bill must pass in its present form or we shall have no revenue, 520; in this emergency form should yield to substance, 521; objects of the friends of the bill, 521; why this log-rolling and haggling? 521; different views respecting the bill, 521; how can one hostile to the protective system vote for the bill? 521; what are Senators compelled to abandon? 522.

Reasons for voting the bill, 523; a large portion of the party in power much embarrassed how they should vote on this bill, 523; every article manufactured in the country subject to high protective duties, 523; gives the greatest amount of protection with the least revenue, 524; the effect of high duties is not to decrease the necessity for them, but the reverse, 524; easy to put on this burden, but it will prove hard to take it off, 524; what are the motives for the support of this bill? 524; reasons assigned for supporting the bill, 525; bill ordered to be engrossed, 526; passed, 526.

Reported back to the House, 526; motion to concur in amendments of the Senate, 527.

Drawback on Refined Sugar.—In the Senate, previous action on the subject, 100; an additional cent a bounty on exportation, 100; injury to the Treasury and the country, 101; answer to objections, 101; objections justified by the event, 101; annual increase of drawback on sugar, 101; snuff, drawback in 1798, 101; origin of the sugar drawback, 102.

Collection of.—In the House, a report and bill relative to the laws for the collection of duties, 462; a bill to legalize duties already levied, 462; printing ordered, 462.—See Index, vols. 1-12.

Duties on Tonnage.—See Index, vol. 1.

Duties, Taxes, &c., abolition of.—See Index, vol. 10.

E

EARL, NATHAN H., Representative from New York, 2.
EAVERMAN, IRA A., Representative from New Hampshire, 2, 262.

Education, committee on.—See Index, vol. 10.

EDWARDS, NATHAN, address of.—See Index, vol. 8.

EDWARDS, JOHN, Representative from Pennsylvania, 2, 261.

EDWARDS, JOHN C., Representative from Missouri, 261.

EGBERT, JOSEPH, Representative from New York, 261.

Election of President.—See Index, vols. 1, 12, and Index, vol. 8, Presidential election.

Electoral vote for President.—See Index, vol. 10.

Electro-Magnetic Telegraph.—In the House, a bill to authorize a series of experiments with, 706; amendment offered and lost, 706; bill passed, 712.

Eligibility of a Resident in Washington to a Seat in the House from Massachusetts.—See Index, vol. 7.

ELY, JOHN, Representative from New York, 2.

Embargo.—See Index, vols. 2, 4, 5, and Index, vol. 1, Great Britain.

Enlistments, Black and White.—In the Senate, the bill regulating enlistments in the naval service and marine corps considered, 463; the Hooe case, 464; motion to exclude all but white men from enlistment, except for cooks, &c., 464; employment of negroes in the public service never proved injurious, 464; prove detrimental to the service, 464; greater portion of McDonough's sailors black, 464; amendment adopted, 465.

Enlistments, encouragement of.—See Index, vol. 5.

EVANS, GEORGE, Representative from Maine, 2; Senator from Maine, 260; relative to the documentary history, 124; on the provisional tariff, 459; on the tariff, 462, 476; relative to the British treaty, 712. See Index, vols. 10-12.

EVERETT, HORACE, Representative from Vermont, 2, 261; on the provisional tariff, 459; introduces a bill to repeal the bankrupt law, 612. See Index, vols. 10-12.

Exchange of Stocks.—See Index, vol. 7.

Exchequer Bill.—In the Senate, notice of a motion to postpone the general orders for the purpose of taking up the exchequer bill, 422.

In the House, a report on the plan submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, 641; report of the committee considered, 650; charge that the committee have neglected their duty, 650; objections to the present regulations of the Treasury department, 650; checks and guards for the security of the public money, 650; further debate, 651, 652; resolution against the adoption of, carried, 652.

Excise on Liquors.—See Index, vols. 1, 5.

Executive Administration.—See Index, vol. 12.

Executive Department.—See Index, vol. 1.

Executive Patronage.—See Index, vol. 12.

Executive Powers.—See Index, vol. 2.

Expiration.—See Index, vols. 2, 5, 6.

Expedition against Porto Rico.—See Index, vol. 7.

Expenditures, reduction of.—See Index, vol. 7.

Expenses of Government.—In the Senate, a report from the Secretary of the Treasury relative to, 128; character and contents of the tables, 128; the years 1824 and 1827 compared, 128; aggregate payments, 128; different items of deduction to be made, 129, 130; eighteen heads of extraordinary expenditures, 121; this Administration and that of Gen. Jackson ready for a comparison with any that preceded it, 129; increased expenditure of the last few years, 129; motion to print an extra number of copies passed, 128. Note, 270.

Exploring Expedition.—See Index, vols. 10, 12, 12.

Expunging Resolution.—See Index, vols. 12, 12.

F

FAIRFIELD, JOHN, letters relative to the Maine boundary, 42.

Faneuil Hall Resolutions.—See Index, vol. 12.

Federal Judges.—See Index, vols. 4, 5, and Index, vols. 2, 2, Amendments of the Constitution.

FERRIS, CHARLES G., Representative from New York, 261; on the bankrupt law, 277, 602.

FESSENDEN, WM. P., Representative from Maine, 261.

FILLMORE, MILLARD, Representative from New York, 2, 261; relative to the burning of the Caroline, 194; on the loan bill, 207; on repeal of the bankrupt law, 265; on the Treasury Note bill, 261; on the tariff, 422; on the plan of an exchequer, 600. See Index, vols. 12-14.

FIRE, JOHN, Representative from New York, 2.

Finance, state of the.—In the House, a message relative to, 674.

Fiscal Year, the.—In the Senate, a bill passed fixing the commencement of the fiscal year on July 1st, 429.

FISKE, CHARLES, Representative from North Carolina, 2.

Fishing Bounties.—In the Senate, a resolution relative to, considered, 102.

Flag of the United States.—See Index, vol. 1.

FLINTHURST, ISAAC, Representative from Vermont, 2. See Index, vol. 12.

Florida, armed occupation of.—In the Senate, a bill relative to, considered, 22; views entertained of this bill, 22; now said to be inefficient and ineffectual, 22; inconsistency of these views, 22; censure of Gen. Jessup, 22; ready to defend himself, 22; praise of Gen. Scott, 22; the facts, 22; what ground for saying Scott would have terminated the war in another campaign, 22; the conduct of the Creek War, 22; the facts, 22; the Administration censured for the results of the Florida War, 24; who but the commanding General directed and controlled the operations of the army? 24; notwithstanding the number of battles the ferocity and desperation of the enemy not diminished, 25; the plan of operations hitherto has entirely failed, 25; Gen. Taylor now despairs of success, 25; force of the army, 25; whole country should be covered by a force, 25; facts stated by the Secretary are arguments in favor of this bill, 26; its provisions are the best calculated to terminate this long-protracted war, 26; the proposition is to give three and a quarter of the twenty-six million acres occupied by Indians to those who have to conquer all before they get a right of possession, 26; no difficulty in finding men if the bill passes, 27; the plan is worth an experiment, 27.

Not one good result to be anticipated from this measure, 28; every consideration of honor and humanity requires this war to be terminated, 28; how far is this bill calculated to effect this object? 28; the settlers are to occupy block houses, 28; a hundred fortifications necessary to be constructed, 28; in what sense are they settlers? 28; a miscalculation to suppose these garrison settlers resemble the hardy pioneers of the West, 28; results of the bill, 28; inefficiency of this measure, 29; what should you expect from this measure? 29; the bounty offered in the last war, 29; its effect, 29; every thing asked for has been given by Congress, 29; who is accountable for this disastrous war? 30; what are the plans of the Secretary, 30; best to call on the Secretary at War, 31.

The extraordinary course of argument pursued on the other side, 31; nature of the territory and character of the foe, 31; country wholly unexplored, 31; want of success has arisen from natural causes, 32; where is the evidence of the Secretary's impotence and want of energy? 32; what has he done? 32; the paramount obstacles to success are in the climate, nature of the country, and character of the enemy, 32; further details, 32; the Secretary has made the best of the means in his power, 32; measures for the future, 34; the bounty is not to be granted until the work is performed, 34.

Peculiar attitude of affairs in Florida at this time, 34; those who have been engaged in Florida do not deem this plan efficacious, 35; what method have we, by which to estimate measures, but their result? 35; is this a measure of peace or war? 35; the land would be taken up for cotton and rice, 36; men with families would in the mean time have no means of supporting them, 36; further debate, 38-41; bill passed, 41.

Bloodhounds.—In the Senate, a resolution relative to the use of bloodhounds in the Florida War offered, 59; the Government contemplates no such thing, 59; the impression that these animals were imported by the Government, 60; misinformation of these petitioners, 60; no objection to the use of the animals, 60; memorials referred, 60; communications from the Secretary at War, 74.

In the Senate, a memorial praying for the admission of Florida, 74; moved to refer to a Select Committee, 74; memorial for a division of the Territory, 74; a free and a slave State must come in together, 74; referred to a Select Committee, 74.

Florida Affairs.—See Index, vol. 7. Canal.—See Index, vol. 8. Claims.—See Index, vols. 10-12. Government of.—See Index, vol. 6. Spanish Treaty, Occupation of.—See Index, vol. 4. Purchases of.—See Index, vol. 8. War.—See Index, vol. 12. Wreckers.—See Index, vol. 8.

FLOYD, CHARLES A., Representative from New York, 281.
FLOYD, JOHN G., Representative from New York, 3, 281; on the naval appropriation bill, 254.

Foot's Resolution.—See Index, vol. 10, Public Lands.

Foreign Commerce, regulation of.—In the Senate, a motion to reprint certain resolutions relative to foreign commerce, 56; reason for revising them, 56; expiration of the compromise act, 56; two distinct powers granted to Congress by the constitution, relative to foreign commerce, 56; attempts of Jefferson and Madison to execute this power of regulation, 57; consequences of defeating Madison's resolution, 57; object of introducing the resolutions now, 57; the resolutions, 58.

Foreign Exchange.—In the House, a bill to fix the value of the pound sterling, 461.

Foreign Ministers, abuses of Privilege.—See Index, vol. 1.

Foreign Relations.—See Index, vols. 4, 8.

Foreigners, petition from.—See Index, vol. 2.

FORRANCE, JOSEPH, Representative from Pennsylvania, 1, 261.

FORSTY, JOHN, letter to the British Minister, 44-45.

Fortifications.—In the House, the bill relative to, considered, 264; useless to erect new fortifications and then leave them unarmed, 264; supply of ordnance in the country, 264; necessity of placing our entire coast in a state of defence, 264; no correspondence of an unpleasant character has taken place in the McLeod case, 265; our present system utterly unsuitable for the wants of the country, 265; the system introduced by Gen. Bernard, 265; England will never think again of invading us by the Canadas, 265; better to appropriate for forts already begun and appoint a commission to report whether they were or were not worthy of being ruled on, 266. See Index, vols. 12, 18.

FORSTER, LAWRENCE A., Representative from New York, 281.

FORSTER THOMAS A., Representative from Georgia, 251; on the provisional tariff, 430; on the tariff veto, 464.

Fourth Instalment of Deposits.—In the House, leave to introduce a bill for the payment of, asked and refused, 252. See Index, vol. 18.

FOX, H. S., letter to Secretary Forsyth relative to the Maine boundary, 45-47.

France, claims on.—See Index, vol. 12. Convention with.—See Index, vol. 11. Relations with.—See Index, vols. 2, 5, 12.

Franking Privilege.—See Index, vol. 1, 2.

Franklin's Staff.—In the House, presentation of, 62.

Freedom of Conscience.—See Index, vol. 1.

Free Trade of the West.—See Index, vol. 7.

FREMONT, LIEUT.—In the Senate, a motion to print the report of, 717; carried, 718.

French Colonial Trade.—See Index, vol. 9.

French Decrees.—See Index, vol. 5.

French Refugees.—See Index, vol. 1.

French Spoilation.—In the House, a report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in relation to, 877. See Index, vols. 2, 3, 7, 12, 18.

FRENCH, J. W., chosen Chaplain of the House, 294.

Frontiers, protection of.—See Index, vol. 1.

Fugitives from Justice.—In the Senate, resolutions of the Legislature of Georgia presented, 94; pending controversy between Georgia and Maine, 95; the modernism of Georgia in this case has been censured by some, 95; if the Federal Government has no right to interfere to prevent these conflicts the States must of necessity act for themselves, 97; power to regulate foreign commerce, 97; power of the States to regulate internal commerce, 98; motion to refer the resolutions, 98.

The question is whether the persons charged are fugitives from justice, 98; statement of the case, 98; 427 of the Governor of Maine, 98. See Index, vol. 1.

Fugitives Slaves.—See Index, vols. 5, 6, 7, 18, 20.

FULTON, WILLIAM S., Senator from Arkansas, 4, 154, 264.

G

GALBRAITH, JOHN, Representative from Pennsylvania, 1. See Index, vols. 12, 18.

GAMBEL, ROGER L., Representative from Georgia, 251; on the decease of R. W. Habersham, 417.

GAELAND, HUGH A., chosen Clerk of the House, 5. See Index, vol. 12.

GARLAND, JAMES, Representative from Virginia, 2. See Index, vol. 12.

GARLAND, RICH, Representative from Louisiana, 8; on the New Jersey election, 22; resigns his seat, 165. See Index, vols. 12, 13.

GATES, SEYM. M., Representative from New York, 2, 281. General Commissary.—See Index, vol. 12.

General Welfare.—See Index, vol. 1.

GENTRY, MEREDITH P., Representative from Tennessee, 2, 281.

Georgia Claims.—See Index, vol. 10. Land Claims.—See Index, vol. 2. Militia Claims.—See Index, vol. 3, 6, 7, 8, 9. Protest.—See Index, vol. 10.

Georgia, vote for President in 1840, 250.

German Language, laws in.—See Index, vol. 2.

GERRY, JAMES, Representative from Pennsylvania, 2, 281.

GIDDINGS, JOSHUA R., Representative from Ohio, 2, 281. See Index, vol. 12.

GILMER, THOMAS W., Representative from Virginia, 281; on the relief of Mrs. Harrison, 299; on provisional tariff, 431; makes a counter report on the tariff veto, 494.

GOGGIN, WILLIAM L., Representative from Virginia, 2, 281.

Goodland County Petition.—In the Senate, resolutions of the citizens on important questions agitating the country, 359; the veto power a high conservative power, 359; views upon the veto message, 360; all the measures of the session point to the common object of building up a great overruling money power, 360.

GOODE, PATRICK G., Representative from Ohio, 2, 281. See Index, vol. 12.

GOODE, WILLIAM O., Representative from Virginia, 281.

GORDON, SAMUEL, Representative from New York, 281; on the loan bill, 307; on the bankrupt law, 332. See Index, vol. 12.

GRANGER, FRANCIS, Representative from New York, 2, 268; votes for as speaker, 4. See Index, vol. 12.

GRAHAM, JAMES, Representative from North Carolina, 2, 281. See Index, vols. 12, 13.

GRAHAM, WILLIAM R., Senator from North Carolina, 154; on the apportionment bill, 406; on the decease of Lewis Williams, 399.

GRAVES, WILLIAM J., Representative from Kentucky, 2. See Index, vol. 12.

Great Britain and China—Non-Interference.—In the House, proceedings relative to, 99; how viewed in England, 99; one spirit in the committee to guard the interests and maintain the honor of the country, 99; views of the committee on co-operation with England, 100.

Great Britain, relations with.—In the Senate, the Committee on Foreign Relations requests to be discharged from considering the resolution respecting publishing the correspondence relating to the north-eastern boundary, 263; the project of a convention has been submitted, 264; views of the President, 264; no possibility of a war thought of, 264.

Great Britain, retaliatory measures in.—See Index, vol. 1.

Greeks, aid to the.—See Index, vols. 7, 8.

GREENE, WILLIS, Representative from Kentucky, 2, 281.

GRIFF, JOHN, Representative from New York, 281.

GRIFFITH, JOHN K., Representative from South Carolina, 2.

GRINNELL, MOSES H., Representative from New York, 2.

GRUNDY, FELIX, Senator from Tennessee, 2; on the assumption of State debts, 60; decease of, 177. See Index, vols. 10, 11, 12.

Guatemala, mission to.—See Index, vol. 11.

Guineas.—See Index, vol. 1.

GUSTINE, AMOS, Representative from Pennsylvania, 281.

GWYN, —, Representative from Mississippi, 281; on the fine on Gen. Jackson, 667.

H

Habeas Corpus, suspension of.—See Index, vols. 2, 8.

HANDEMAN, W. R., Representative from Georgia, 2, 281; on the tariff, 437; decease of, 616.

HILL, JOHN T., Representative from Virginia, 2.

HALL, HILAND, Representative from Vermont, 2, 281. See Index, vol. 12, 13.

HALSTED, WILLIAM, Representative from New Jersey, 2, 281. See Index, vol. 12.

HAMILTON, ALEXANDER, his order to collectors of the revenue, 66; report of, as Secretary of the Treasury.—See Index, vol. 1, Treasury.

HAMMOND, ROBERT H., Representative from Pennsylvania, 4.

HARD, AUGUSTUS C., Representative from New York, 2; relative to the north-eastern boundary, 103.

HARLEY, W. R., Representative from Mississippi, 281.

Harmony in Indiana.—See Index, vol. 8.

HARRISON, WM. H., votes for as President in 1840, 250; reply on notice of his election as President, 250; inauguration of, 271; his address, 271.

In the Senate, a letter of Gen. Harrison relative to the compromise act read, 459; a solemn declaration of his not to change the compromise act, 459; printing ordered, 459. See Index, vols. 2, 3, 9, 12.

HARRISON, MRS., bill for the relief of, 298.

In the House, a bill for the relief of, considered, 296; the bill, 296; $93,000 moved to fill the blank, 296; some provision should be made for the family of the late President in the nature of an indemnity for expenses incurred, 296; particulars, 296; this sum in accordance with public opinion, 296.

An extraordinary proposition, 296; was Congress convened for this purpose? 299; no authority under the constitution thus to invest money, 299; the late President had not drawn a dollar of his salary, 299; we have no right to be generous with the money of the people, 299; cannot this bill be placed on the basis of indisputable justice, 300; bill passed, 300.

In the Senate, the bill considered, 300; a bill to make a grant of money, 300; a new case, 300; carries no justification along with it, 300; it was said at the last session that a new set of books were to be opened, 301; difference between Federal and State constitutions, 301; this is a gift, gratuity, present, 301; restrictions relative to persons holding office, 302; nothing in the constitution to warrant this proceeding, 302; as a question of policy and expediency it is utterly condemned, 302; difference between military and civil service, 302; evils of the system of civil pensions, 302; the point to which it has arrived in England, 302; the aid of precedent is invoked in vain, 302; case of the widow of Gen. Brown, 302; reasons for not voting for the bill, 304; motion to recommit, lost, 304.

The appropriation founded on the justice of paying a debt, 304; the bill should have passed with the solemnity of a funeral, 305; former Presidents who have gone out of office poor, 305; bill passed, 305.

HARRIS, WILLIAM A., Representative from Virginia, 281.

HARVEY, J., Major-Gen., letter on movement of British troops, 45.

HASTINGS, JOHN, Representative from Ohio, 2, 281.

HASTINGS, WILLIAM S., Representative from Massachusetts, 2, 281; decease of, 444. See Index, vol. 12.

HAWKINS, MICHAEL J., Representative from North Carolina.

HAYS, SAMUEL L., Representative from Virginia, 281.

Heathens, propagating the Gospel among.—See Index, vol. 7.

Hemp, American.—See Index, vol. 7.

HENDERSON, FRANCIS, JR., the case of.—See Index, vol. 7.
HENDERSON, JOHN, Senator from Mississippi, 280; on the bankrupt bill, 248; on the assumption of State debts, 693.

HENRY, THOMAS, Representative from Pennsylvania, 3, 281.
HILL, JOHN, Representative from North Carolina, 2.
HILLEN, S., JR., Representative from Maryland, 3.
HODGSON, REBECCA, Petition of.—See Index, vol. 5.
HOFFMAN, OGDEN, Representative from New York, 2.
HOLLEMAN, JOHN, Representative from Virginia, 3.
HOLMES, ISAAC E., Representative from South Carolina, 3, 281; on intercourse with China, 707.

HOLT, HENRY, Representative from Georgia, 240.

Home Department.—See Index vol. 5, and Index, vol. 1, Executive Department.

Home Manufactures in the House.—See Index, vol. 3.

Home Squadron.—In the House, a report relative to, 206; a bill making appropriation for, 390.

In the Senate, bill reported, 525.

Honors to the Brave.—See Index, vol. 6.

HOOK, ENOS, Representative from Pennsylvania, 3.

HOPKINS, GEORGE W., Representative from Virginia, 3, 281.
See Index, vol. 13.

Hornet, the sloop of war.—See Index, vol. 10.

Horses lost in the Seminole War.—See Index, vol. 7.

HOVEY, JACOB, JR., Representative from New York, 281.

Houses convenes at 1st session of 26th Congress, 2; adjourns at close of 2d session of 26th Congress, 270.

HOUSTON, GUN SAMUEL, the case of.—See Index, vol. 11.

HOUSTON, GEORGE S., Representative from Alabama, 281.

HOWARD, A. D., Representative from Indiana, 3.

HOWARD, JACOB M., Representative from Michigan, 281.

HOWES, RICHARD, Representative from Kentucky, 3.

HUBBARD, DAVID, Representative from Alabama, 3.

HUBBARD, EDMUND W., Representative from Virginia, 281.

HUBBARD, HENRY, Senator from New Hampshire; on printing the documentary history, 124; on duties and drawbacks, 124; on bankrupt bill, 247; on repeal of the independent treasury, 163. See Index, vols. 10, 11, 12, 13.

HUDSON, CHARLES, Representative from Massachusetts, 281.

HUNT, HIRSH P., Representative from New York, 3, 281; on repeal of the sub-treasury, 326; on the fine on Gen. Jackson, 657.

HUNTER, ROBERT M. T., Representative from Virginia, 3, 281; chosen speaker, 4; address, 5; letter to the Governor of New Jersey, 55; reply to the vote of thanks, 269; on the provisional tariff veto, 453. See Index, vol. 13.

HUNTINGTON, JAMES W., Senator from Connecticut, 280; on a tax on bank notes, 173; on the fine on Gen. Jackson, 626; on the warehousing system, 625; on the occupation of Oregon, 672.

Huron, proposed territory of.—See Index, vol. 10.

I

Illinois, admission of.—See Index, vol. 6.

Illinois, vote for President in 1840, 250.

Impeachment of the President.—In the House, a proposition to introduce certain charges against the President, 648; declaration of one hundred members of this House, 643; the charge read, 643; resolution, 644; rejected by the House, 645.

Impeachment.—See Index, vols. 3, 10.

Imports.—See Duties on Imports.

Imprisonment for Debt.—See Index, vols. 7, 8, 9, 12, 13.

Incendiary Publications.—See Index, vol. 13.

Indemnification of Foreigners.—See Index, vol. 9.

Indemnity for Spoiliations.—See Index, vol. 1, Great Britain.

Independent Treasury.—In the Senate, the bill ordered to be engrossed, 41; further discussed, 41, 42; a resolution for the repeal of the Independent Treasury considered, 156; the ordinary course in such cases, 153; occasions in which dispensed with, 158; discussion now unnecessary and misplaced, 158; effect of a repeal of this measure, 158; what has been the operation of this system, 159; what it is understood to be, 159; operation exceedingly limited, 159; a work of supererogation in a short session like this to pass the resolution and instruct a committee to bring in a bill for repeal, 159; the first election, when the principles of the dominant party were not declared, 159; what was the judgment of the people on this measure? 160; it is said the result of the late election is a triumphant condemnation of this measure, 160; what is the argument in favor of this precipitate repeal? 160; that there had been but little salutary influence from the practical operation of this law, 160.

The country just passed through one of the most agitating canvasses it ever had, 161; what course will the administration of Harrison pursue? 161; this resolution calculated to keep up the excitement of the late canvass, 161; the election decided nothing but that Harrison should be President, 161; idle to attempt to extend it to a decision against this measure, 161; if a majority of the people are opposed to this measure, are they in favor of the alternate measure? 163; time enough to consider a National Bank when the President died comes in, 163; another appearance of the banks in the political arena would overthrow the whole system, 163; it is said the repeal would make no practical change, 163; the practice spoken of contrary to law, 161.

It is said the recent election of General Harrison has implied instruction to Senators against this measure, 163; denied, 163; other questions had a much more powerful effect in the contest, 163; declaration of the convention at Harrisburg, 163.

This proposition to repeal will be debated, and fully debated, 163; what are the reasons that induced the offering of this resolution? 163; those asserted are not correct, 164; amendment to the resolution offered, 164; resolution for the repeal of, laid on the table, 223.

A resolution instructing the Committee on Finance to report a bill for the repeal of, offered, 290; motion to amend by requiring the Committee to report a substitute, 291; motion lost, 291; resolution carried, 291; bill reported, 291; the first section provides for the repeal, 292; the second section defines embezzlement, 292; the passage of this bill will revive the act of 1838, establishing the State Bank system, 292; the third section, 293; object of the third section, 293; it might leave the public money at the disposal of the Executive, 293; the law of 1799, 293; why propose now to undo what has cost such strenuous efforts? 293; amendment moved, 293.

Two odious features in the sub-Treasury law, 293; the proper course now simply to repeal the sub-Treasury, 294; three substitutes to choose from, 294; the only question, one of time, 294; one restraint should not be removed until another was imposed in its place, 294; if this law is repealed the Treasury must be left unexpended, or the law regulating it be so full of embezzlements that it could not get along, 294; amendment rejected, 295.

A substitute of some description will be passed, 295; bill ordered to be engrossed, 295.

In the House, leave asked to introduce a bill for the repeal of, 297.

In the House, the bill to repeal considered, 297; this bill and its antagonist measure, a bank, involve principles deeply affecting the distribution of wealth and the wages of labor, 325; Government credits exported, brought foreign goods back, 325; circumstances under which the previous bank was created contrasted with the present, 325; a bank unable to regulate the exchanges, 326; causes of the revulsion in 1837, 326; the fiscal bank a political measure, 326.

Condemnation of this measure pronounced by the whole American people, 326; expense incurred under the sub-Treasury, 327; bill passed, 327; reconsideration moved, 327; lost, 328.

In the Senate, report on the House bill to repeal the Independent Treasury, 326; debate as to the order of business, 326; amendments stated, 326; an attempt to coerce the Executive, to present the alternative that if he did not sign the bank bill the Treasury would be left without legal protection, 326; motion to postpone, 326; further reasons for postponement, 327; doubtful if the bank bill becomes a law, 327; by passing this act we perform the will of the people, 327; the President will sign this measure, 327; the feast of the Centaurs began with a wedding and ended with a fight, 327; note, 327; no reasonable consideration for postponing action, 328; amendments adopted, 328. See Index, vol. 12.

Indian Affairs.—See Index, vols. 4, 11. Agencies.—See Index, vol. 10. Department.—See Index, vol. 7. Factory System.—See Index, vol. 7. Land within a State, rights over.—See Index, vol. 1. Relations.—See Index, vol. 7. Title west of the Rocky Mountains.—See Index, vol. 8. Tribes.—See Index, vol. 8.

Indiana, Cherokee.—See Index, vol. 10. Do. Chickasaw and Choctaw.—See Index, vol. 9. Do. emigration of.—See Index, vol. 10. Do. Florida.—See Index, vol. 9. Do. protection of.—See Index, vol. 12. Do. Quapaw.—See Index, vol. 9. Do. removal of.—See Index, vols. 10, 11. Do. Southern.—See Index, vol. 10.

Indian War Volunteers.—See Index, vol. 11. Indiana, admission of.—See Index, vol. 5. Indiana Canal.—See Index, vol. 5. Indiana, vote for President in 1840, 250.

INGERSOLL, CHARLES J., Representative from Pennsylvania, 281; on the fine of Gen. Jackson, 435; makes a protest to the majority report on the tariff veto, 500; offers a revenue bill, 507; relative to the British Treaty, 707.

Insolvent Debtors.—See Index, vol. 11. Intercourse, Commercial, do. Foreign, do. Non.—See Index, vol. 4.

Interest due to certain States.—See Index, vol. 10. Internal Improvements.—See Index, vols. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11. Invalid Corps.—See Index, vol. 5.

IRVIN, JAMES, Representative from Pennsylvania, 281. IRVIN, WILLIAM W., Representative from Pennsylvania, 281.

Isle of Wight County Memorial.—In the Senate, a memorial presented against a bank, &c., &c., 324; the memorial, 324; motion to print lost, 324; first time so respectable a memorial was ever refused the usual courtesy, 324; reasons urged for refusing to print, 325; discussion, 325; House gagged, an attempt to gag the Senate, and now the people, 326; proceedings laid on the table, 326.

J

JACK, WILLIAM, Representative from Pennsylvania, 281.

JACKSON, GEN., Five on.—In the House, leave asked to report a bill for the relief of, 435; reported, 435; a minority report, 435; ordered printed, 436.

In the Senate, notice for leave to bring in a bill to indemnify Gen. Jackson, &c., 613; bill postponed, 613; a bill reported, 623; necessity for reference to a committee, 626; the committee at the last session had no documentary evidence, 626; the question at the last session, 627; copy of the record of the court, 627; not in the power of Congress, much less of an officer, to declare martial law affecting every class of the community, 627; a state of war does not give the right of declaring martial law, 627; the question simply whether Gen. Jackson shall have the same measure of justice extended to him which had been extended to other officers, bill not urged on constitutional grounds, 628; he stood justified, as his exercise of power was the means of saving the city, 628; in the history of every nation at war cases of extreme necessity occur, 628; Gen. Jackson's situation at New Orleans presented such a case, 628; by what means did he achieve the victory? 629; placed in a position of awful responsibility, 629; a record of the trial ordered printed, 629; bill referred, 630.

In the House, a resolution to instruct the Committee on the Judiciary to report a bill, 634; again submitted, 634; the resolution is one of instruction, 637; how stands the question now? 638; should not be viewed as a party question, 638.

In the House, a truly party measure, 638; should not employ the public money to testify approbation of those acts for which a fine was levied by the regular officers of the law, 639; what are the grounds for pressing this bill? 639.

Statement of facts, 637; had Gen. Jackson any authority to declare martial law? 637; who was to be the judge of the necessity to suspend the writ of habeas corpus? 637.

In the Senate, a majority and minority report on the bill, 641; resolution to print lost, 647; an inadequate reward for his military services, 700; necessity has no law, 700; did President Madison rebuke the conduct of Gen. Jackson? 701; the rumor of peace near disorganizing his army, 701; why is Gen. Jackson less worthy of a fair and impartial consideration than others? 701; why did the Van Buren administration neglect this matter? 702; it is asked, why the necessity of voting now? 702.

Motion to strike out the original bill and insert a substitute lost, 705; bill passed, 706.

JACKSON, THOMAS B., Representative from New York, 2. Tattle of States.—See Index, vol. 1.

JAMES, FRANK, Representative from Pennsylvania, 2, 281. JAMISON, on the decease of A. G. Harrison, 20; on the claim of Matthew Lyon's heirs, 123.

JENNIFER, DANIEL, Representative from Maryland, 2. JOHNSON, CARL, Representative from Tennessee, 281; on the magnetic telegraph, 704. See Index, vols. 10, 12, 13.

JOHNSON, CHARLES, Representative from New York, 2. JOHNSON, JOSEPH, Representative from Virginia, 2. JOHNSON, R. M., presides in the Senate as Vice President, 17; votes for as Vice President, 256; remarks on retiring as Vice President, 266. See Index, vols. 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12.

JOHNSON, WILLIAM COYT, Representative from Maryland, 2, 281; on the fortifications, 264; on the decease of Lewis Williams, 406; on the tariff, 456; on assumption of State debts, 459; on the one hour rule, 611; relative to State debts, 702. See Index, vols. 12, 13.

JONES, ISAAC B., Representative from Maryland, 281. JONES, JOHN W., Representative from Virginia, 4, 281; votes for as speaker, 4; on the naval appropriation bill, 258; on the provisional tariff, 438; on the judicial circuit bill, 438. See Index, vol. 12.

JONES, NATHANIEL, Representative from New York, 2. Journal of the old Congress.—See Index, vol. 6. Journal of the Federal Convention.—See Index, vol. 7. Judges, Federal, removal of.—See Index, vols. 2, 4.

Judicial Circuits, reorganization of.—In the Senate, an amendment offered to the bill for, &c., 259; object to abolish the ancient circuit of North Carolina and Virginia, 259; reasons assigned for the measure, 259; what objection can be made to this proposition? 260; this arrangement now proposed, 260; better increase the number of Judges, 261; circuit Judges regarded in a two-fold character, 261; the question simply whether we shall prolong a district east of the mountains which is not required, or abolish it and establish a new one in the South-west, 262; the number of Judges greater than desirable, 262; what utility in continuing the Virginia circuit? 262; amendment adopted, 263; bill passed, 263.

In the House, a bill relative to the judicial circuits, 486; amendment moved, 486; proposition to abolish the judicial circuit of Virginia and North Carolina, 487; to create a new circuit in the South-west, 487; considerations relative to the bill, 488; bill passed, 488.

Judiciary.—See Index, vols. 2, 3, 9, 10, 11, 12.

K

KELLY, GEORGE E., Representative from Pennsylvania, 3, 281; votes for as speaker, 4. See Index, vol. 18.

KEMBLE, GOVERNOR, Representative from New York, 4. See Index, vol. 12.

KENNEDY, ANDREW, Representative from Indiana, 281.

KENNEDY, JOHN P., Representative from Maryland, 281; on the tariff, 488.

Kentucky, contested election.—See Index, vol. 12.

Kentucky, vote for President in 1840. 250.

Kenyon College.—See Index, vol. 9.

KING, THOMAS BUTLER, Representative from Georgia, 3, 281; on a home squadron, 306.

KING, WILLIAM R., Senator from Alabama, 280; on the documentary history, 197; on a fiscal bank, 316; elected President pro tem. of the Senate, 144; address, 144; remarks, 268; on disturbances in the galleries, 258; on the decease of Samuel L. Southard, 445; on the tariff, 514; on the assumption of State debts, 697; on the British treaty, 712. See Index, vols. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13.

KNIGHT, NEREMIAN R., Senator from Rhode Island, 3. See Index, vols. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13.

L

Lafayette, gratitude to.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, 7, 8.

Lake Superior Copper Mines.—See Index, vols. 2, 7, 8.

Land Claims, confirmation of.—See Index, vol. 10.

Land Purchasers, relief of.—See Index, vol. 11.

Land Titles in Louisiana, do. Missouri.—See Index, vol. 7.

Lands, western.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, 4, 6, 7, Public Lands.

Lands for Education.—See Index, vol. 7.

LANE, HENRY S., Representative from Indiana, 145, 281; on the provisional tariff veto, 449.

LAWRENCE, JOSEPH, Representative from Pennsylvania, 281.

LAWRENCE, ABRAHAM, Representative from Massachusetts, 3. See Index, vol. 2.

LEADBETTER, E. D., Representative from Ohio, 3.

Lead Mines, reserved sale of.—See Index, vols. 7, 9.

Lead Mines of Missouri.—See Index, vol. 10.

LEET, ISAAC, Representative from Pennsylvania, 3, 281.

LEIGHTON, HANNAH, pension to.—In the Senate, a bill to grant, taken up, 165; note, 165; this bill establishes a precedent for the extension of the pension list, 165; the widow of the first officer who fell in the war of the Revolution, 165; if they departed from rule in one case, where were they to stop? 165; the last man that fell in the war equally meritorious with the first, 166; Congress has from time to time extended the pension law, 166; the pension list no more than a great system of charity, 166; a case that stands by itself, 166; the last man killed in the war, 166; the circumstances of the present case, 166; a strong case, 167; what has been the basis assumed as the basis of pensions hitherto, 167; length of service, 167; the previous acts, 167; principles to which confined, 167; could their sympathies induce them to yield this claim and not to yield others? 168; an old national principle in every country to grant pensions to widows of men who had rendered service to their country, 168; this case compared with others, 168; bill ordered to be engrossed, 168.

LETTEREDORFER, COL.—See Index, vol. 10.

LEONARD, S. B., Representative from New York, 2.

LEVY, DAVID, Delegate from Florida, 281.

LEWIS, DIXON H., Representative from Alabama, 2, 281; votes for as speaker, 2. See Index, vol. 12.

Liberation of American Slaves by British authorities.—See Index, vol. 12.

Liberia Agency.—See Index, vols. 2, 3.

Library of Congress.—See Index, vol. 2.

Library of Mr. Jefferson.—See Index, vol. 5.

Lieutenant-General.—See Index, vol. 5.

Light House Duties.—See Index, vol. 2.

Limitation, statutes of.—See Index, vols. 2, 4.

LINCOLN, LEVI, Representative from Massachusetts, 1. See Index, vol. 12.

LINE, ACHOBALD, Representative from New York, 281.

LINE, LEWIS F., Senator from Missouri, 2, 280; relative to the Oregon territory, 268; on the prospective pre-emption bill, 269; on a fiscal bank, 319; on land distribution, 321; on the Oregon convention notice, 242; on the Pension laws, 458; on the tariff, 470; on the madame to the States, 513; on the occupation of Oregon, 513, 68; on the fine of Gen. Jackson, 700; on Fremont's expedition, 717. See Index, vols. 12, 13.

LITTLEFIELD, NATHANIEL S., Representative from Maine, 281.

Live Oak Plantations.—See Index, vols. 7, 9.

Loan of Twelve Millions.—In the House, a bill relative to considered, 306; motion to strike out the emending clause, 307; provisions of the bill, 307; is such a loan necessary, or any part of it, 307; entirely unnecessary, 307; or if the affairs of the Government were properly managed there would be no need of a loan, 307; the proposition was to create a debt and lay the foundation for a bank, 307; wiser to lay duties than to borrow money, 307; the deeds of omission of Virginia and New York intended the public lands as a revenue for the Government, 306; this source of revenue to be cut off, 306; the result of the course of the Administration would be a high tariff or direct taxes, 306; contrast of the sub-treasury and a National Bank, 306.

Loan Bill.—See Index, vol. 5.

Lot, public, in Washington.—See Index, vol. 7.

Louisiana, vote for President in 1840. 250.

LOWELL, JOSHUA A., Representative from Maine, 2, 281.

LUCAE, WILLIAM, Representative from Virginia, 2.

LUMPKIN, WILSON, Senator from Georgia, on blood-money against the Indians, 60; on fugitives from justice, 55; a prospective pre-emption, 224.

LYON, LUCIUS, Senator from Michigan, 2. See Index, vol. 12.

LYON, MATTHEW, The case of.—In the House, the report of the committee on the petition of the heirs of 124; length of time elapsed since the claim was first presented, 126; motion to lay on the table last, 127; ordered to be engrossed, 127; what is the information before the House? 187; time wanted to examine into the real state of the facts, 187; disgrace to the country that a claim of this character had remained unpaid, 187; can the Government conscientiously retain money paid into the Treasury under such circumstances? 187; no evidence on the books that the money was ever paid into the Treasury, 188; further debate, 189, 240; bill passed, 140. See Index, vols. 2, 3, 4, 6.

M

Madison Papers.—See Index, vol. 12.

Mail Theft.—See Index, vol. 7.

Maine, admission of.—See Index, vol. 6.

Maine, vote for President in 1840, 250.

Maison Rouge, claim of.—See Index, vols. 8, 10.

Major-General, office of.—See Index, vol. 10.

MALLOY, FRANCIS, Representative from Virginia, 3, 281.

See Index, vol. 12.

MALLOY, MEREDITH, Representative from New York, 3, 281.

Mandamus to the States.—In the Senate, the bill to regulate the taking of testimony in certain cases, considered, 512; details of the bill, 512; violation of the constitution, 512; a prominent object of the bill to enforce the district clause of the apportionment bill, 512; each House to judge of its elections, 512; amendment, 512; bill ordered to be engrossed, 514.

MANSUM, WILLIE P., Senator from North Carolina, 154, 280; on the prospective pre-emption bill, 206; on the retirement of the Vice President, 267; answer to vote of thanks of the Senate, 539; president pro tem. of the Senate, 600. See Index, vols. 11, 12.

MARCHAND, ALBERT G., Representative from Pennsylvania, 3, 281.

MARIGNY, D'AUTERIVE.—See Index, vol. 9.

Marine Service.—See Index, vol. 10.

MARSHALL, ALFRED, Representative from Maine, 281.

MARSHALL, THOMAS F., Representative from Kentucky, 281.

MARTIN, RICHARD P., Representative from New York, 3, 281. See Index, vol. 12.

Maryland, memorial on the state of affairs.—See Index, vol. 5.

Maryland, vote for President in 1840, 250.

Massachusetts, memorial on the war of 1812.—See Index, vol. 5.

Massachusetts Militia Claims.—See Index, vols. 8, 9, 10, 11.

Massachusetts, vote for President in 1840, 250.

MASON, JOHN THOMPSON, Representative from Maryland, 281; on the repeal of the sub-Treasury, 835; on the decease of James W. Williams, 600.

MASON, SAMSON, Representative from Ohio, 3, 281. See Index, vol. 12.

Mother of Com. Perry.—See Index, vol. 7.

MATHNOT, JOSHUA, Representative from Ohio, 281.

MATTHEWS, JAMES, Representative from Ohio, 281.

MATTOCKS, JOHN, Representative from Vermont, 281.

MAXWELL, JOHN P. B., Representative from New Jersey, 3, 281. See Index, vol. 12.

MAYNARD, JOHN, Representative from New York, 281.

Mayville Road.—See Index, vols. 10, 11.

MCCLELLAND, ABRAHAM, Representative from Tennessee, 4, 281. See Index, vol. 12.

MCCLELLAND, ROBERT, Representative from New York, 281. See Index, vol. 12.

MCCLECK, CHARLES, Representative from Pennsylvania, 145. See Index, vol. 12.

MCCULLOUGH, —, Representative from Pennsylvania, 4.

McDUFFIE, GEORGE, Senator from South Carolina, 281; on the occupation of Oregon, 673. See Index, vols. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11.

McKAY, JAMES, Representative from North Carolina, 4, 281; on the bankrupt law, 245. See Index, vols. 11, 12, 12.

McKEAN, SAMUEL, Senator from Pennsylvania, 280. See Index, vol. 12.

McKENNAM, THOMAS M. T., Representative from Pennsylvania, 281; on the tariff laws, 508; his motion, 509. See Index, vols. 12, 12.

McKEON, JOHN, Representative from New York, 4, 281; on intercourse with China, 707. See Index, vol. 12.

McROBERTS, SAMUEL, Senator from Illinois, 280; on land distribution, 280; on the line of Gen. Jackson, 762.

MEADE, RICHARD W., claim of.—See Index, vols. 9, 10, 12, 12.

MEDILL, WILLIAM, Representative from Ohio, 4, 281.

Mediterranean Trade.—See Index, vol. 2.

Members of Congress, appointments of.—See Index, vol. 8.

Memorial of British Subjects on Colonization.—See Index, vol. 11.

MESCHER, CHARLES F., Representative from Virginia, 4; resigns his seat, 12. See Index, vols. 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 12.

Merchants' Boards.—See Index, vol. 12.

MERTWEATHER, JAMES A., Representative from Georgia, 281; on intercourse with China, 704.

MERRICK, WILLIAM H., Senator from Maryland, 3, 280; on the decease of John S. Spence, 154; on disturbances in the galleries, 358; on the assumption of State debts, 604.

Message, at 1st session of 26th Congress, 5; relative to the North-eastern boundary, 43; relative to slaves in the brig Comet, &c., 50; on presents from the Imam of Muscat, 140; relative to the North-eastern boundary, 143; at 2d session of 26th Congress, 146; on the outrage at Schlosser, 183; on the burning of the Caroline, 192; on the claims of Hayti, 268; on the opinions of the Attorney-General, 268, at extra session, 238; relative to a bankrupt law, 206; vetoing the Fiscal Bank bill, 248; annual to Congress, 269; vetoing the tariff bill, 430; on the British treaty, 530; at 3d session of 27th Congress, 603; on the state of the finances, 604; relative to the right of search, 716.

Mexico.—In the Senate, a resolution calling for information respecting the recent correspondence relative to Texas, 454; letter of the Secretary of State of Mexico, 454; extract, 454; the correspondence, 455. See Index, vols. 12, 12.

Michigan, admission of.—See Index, vols. 12, 12.

Michigan, vote for President in 1840, 250.

MIDDLETON, ARTHUR, presents portrait of Columbus, 404.

Mileage of Members.—See Index, vol. 11.

Military Academy and Academics.—See Index, vols. 2, 5, 7.

Military Roads.—See Index, vol. 7.

Militia Courts-Martial.—See Index, vols. 9, 10.

MILLEN, JACOB W., Senator from New Jersey, 280; on the decease of Samuel L. Southard, 444; on the relief of Mrs. Harrison, 304.

MILLEN, JOHN, Representative from Missouri, 4, 281. See Index, vol. 12.

Minister to England.—See Index, vol. 12.

Mints.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, 10, 12, 12.

Miranda's Expedition.—See Index, vol. 4.

Mississippi Election.—See Index, vol. 12. State.—See Index, vol. 5. Do. Territory.—See Index, vol. 4. Territories.

Mississippi River, free navigation of.—See Index, vol. 2.

Mississippi, vote for President in 1840, 250.

Missouri.—See Index, vols. 4, 5, 6, 7.

Missouri Land Claims.—See Index, vol. 10.

Missouri, vote for President in 1840, 250.

MITCHELL, CHARLES F., Representative from New York, 4. See Index, vol. 12.

MONROE, JAMES, Representative from New York, 8; claim of.—See Index, vol. 9, 11.
Monroe Doctrine.—See Index, vol. 8, 9, 18.
MONTAGUE, JAMES DE LA, Representative from New York, 4.
MONTGOMERY, WILLIAM, Representative from North Carolina, 4. See Index, vol. 18.
MOORE, JOHN, Representative from Louisiana, 166, 281.
MORSEHEAD, J. J., Senator from Kentucky, 280; on the apportionment bill, 409; on the duty on cotton bagging, 615.
MORGAN, CHRISTOPHER, Representative from New York, 4, 281.
MORGAN, WILLIAM, the case of.—See Index, vol. 10.
Mormons.—In the Senate, proceedings relative to, in Missouri, ordered to be printed, 253.
MORRIS, CALVART, Representative from Ohio, 4, 281. See Index, vol. 18.
MORRIS, SAMUEL W., Representative from Pennsylvania, 4. See Index, vol. 18.
MORROW, JEREMIAH, Representative from Ohio, 145, 281.
Motion in Committee to strike out the Enacting Clause—Appeal.—In the House, motion to strike out in Committee not in order, 297; appeal, 297; this a motion to destroy the bill, 297; debate on the appeal, 298; decision of the chair sustained.
Mounted Infantry.—See Index, vol. 4, 10, 11.
MOUTON, ALEXANDER, Senator from Louisiana, 2, 280.—See Index, vol. 18.

N

National Observatory.—See Index, vol. 2, 5.
National Printing Office.—In the Senate, a committee appointed to consider the propriety of establishing a national printing office, 51; the committee, 51.
Naturalization Laws.—See Index, vol. 1, 2, 4, 10, 12.
Naval Appropriation Bill.—In the House, a motion to strike out and insert increased amount of appropriation, 256; the amount already appropriated in the bill, 256; the navy has performed every duty that has been required of it, 256; our flag has not been insulted for want of sufficient maritime force, 256; it is said our commerce was not protected in the China seas, 256; our navy has been compared with that of Great Britain, 257; the present state of our foreign relations is urged as a reason for this amendment, 257; no cause for collision with England, 257; vessels in commission, 258; no necessity to legislate as if in prospect of war, 258; amendment lost, 258.
Naval Establishment.—See Index, vol. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 10.
Naval Exploits.—See Index, vol. 7.
Naval Pension Fund.—See Index, vol. 7, 12.
Naval Schools.—In the Senate, a bill to provide for, 478; an attempt to establish five will fail, 478; one more successful, 478; degenerate like West Point, 478; how can young men be qualified to be able officers? 479; it is said the measure will cost but little, or save money, 479; way in which all such schemes originate, 479; "five" stricken out, 480; location fixed at or near Fortress Monroe, 480; bill passed, 480.
Naval School.—See Index, vol. 8, and Index, vol. 9, Naval Establishment.
Navigation Laws.—See Index, vol. 4.
NATLOR, CHARLES, Representative from Pennsylvania, 4. See Index, vol. 18.
Negroes, free, in the District of Columbia.—See Index, vol. 9.
Negroes, kidnapping of.—See Index, vol. 2.

NEMERZ, EUGENIUS A., Representative from Georgia, 4, 281.
Neutral Relations.—See Index, vol. 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 12.
New Hampshire, vote for President in 1840, 282.
NEUCHARD, PHIZEN, Representative from Pennsylvania, 1, 281.
New Jersey Contested Election.—In the House, the subject considered, 21; this House a high constitutional duty to perform, 21; one of the States nearly unrepresented here, 21; moved to suspend the rules in order to offer resolutions, 21; the resolutions, 21; five persons have claiming seats and exercising the franking privilege, 21; duty of the House to decide if they are members or not, 21; further resolutions, 21; is this a privileged motion or not? 22; not a privileged motion, 22; those persons willing to submit to a decision of the House, 22; communication from the Governor and Council to the Speaker, 54; declines to present it, 54; reasons, 54; communication from the minority of the Legislature, 54; explanation of the Speaker, 55; correspondence read, 55; report of the Committee on Elections presented, 59.
New Jersey, vote for President in 1840, 280.
New Mexico and Missouri Inland Trade.—See Index, vol. 8, 12.
New Orleans, defence of.—See Index, vol. 5.
New York, vote for President in 1840, 280.
Niagara Buffers.—See Index, vol. 5, 6.
NICHOLAS, R. D., Senator from Louisiana, 2, 281.
Nicollet's Topographical Map.—In the Senate, a resolution for printing the map and report offered, 23; description of the map and contents of the report, 23.
NILES, JOHN M., Senator from Connecticut, 4.
Non-exportation in Foreign Bottoms.—See Index, vol. 1.
Non-importation.—See Index, vol. 2, 4.
Non-intercourse.—See Intercourse.
NORVELL, JOHN, Senator from Michigan, 2; on the assumption of State debts, 79. See Index, vol. 12, 13.
North Carolina, vote for President in 1840, 280.
North-eastern Boundary.—In the Senate, a resolution offering for information, considered, 39; one sentiment is the country relative to the action of the President, 39; no steps taken to repel an invasion, and no invasion is repel, 39; a protest against the military occupation, 39; prudence and firmness of the President on the boundary subject, 39; apprehension of difficulties, 39.
 The resolution one of simple inquiry, 39; apprehension relative to the movements of the commission in survey, 39; a violation of the arrangement entered into by the mediation of Gen. Scott, 40.
 What is the character of this resolution? 40; not the slightest imputation on the President in the resolution, 40; sentiment of the country unanimous in favor of the right of Maine, 41; time for the controversy to be brought to a close, 41; resolution adopted, 41; message in answer to the resolution, 42.
 In the House, resolution relative to, offered, 106; a substitute, 106; embraces an entire system of national defence, 106; our condition worse than if we had never spent a dollar on fortifications, 106; not the slightest danger of a war, 106; reasons for this opinion, 106; another possibility that might induce collision, 106; course of the Government of Maine, 106; the people of Maine will submit to another reference, 106; her territory now occupied by foreign troops, 106; military operations by Maine, it is said, would be rash and late, 106; rights of Maine duly regarded by the administration, 106; Maine never consent to a reference, 107; the question to which the resolution leads, 107; war impossible, 107; idea of invasion repelled, 107; resolution adopted, 107.
 In the Senate, a report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, 107; motion to print an extra number of copies, 108; extra number unnecessary, 109; excitement along the frontier, 109; the report a peace document, 109; reasons for not making a detailed report, 110; views of the committee, 110; the only question before the committee, 110; reasons for their report, 110; can Great Britain be blamed for pushing her claims, when so little prospect of resistance by this Government? 111; never expect submission to our rights till we give substantial indications of a determination to vindicate them, 111.

If there is any party in this country for war with Great Britain, it is a criminal party, 112; two modes of obtaining the rights of Maine, 112; negotiation or war, 112; two securities for the continuation of peace, 112; a treaty stipulation on this subject, 112; the military preparations of the British no cause of alarm, 112; the Administration desirous of peace, 112; motion to print an extra number agreed to, 112.

Messages relative to, 142.

North-eastern Boundary.—See Index, vols. 8, 10, 12, 13; also Index, vol. 14, Treaty with Great Britain.

Northern Frontier.—See Index, vol. 12.

North-west Coast.—See Index, vols. 7, 8.

Nullification.—See Index, vol. 12.

①

Oaths.—See Index, vol. 1.

Occupying Claimant Lands.—See Index, vol. 8.

Office, a certain, inquiry respecting.—See Index, vol. 5.

Officers, removal of.—See Index, vol. 1.

Officers, plurality of.—See Index, vol. 8.

Officers of the Customs.—See Index, vol. 7.

OGLE, CHARLES, Representative from Pennsylvania, 4; decease of, 290. See Index, vol. 12.

Ohio Canal, land grant to.—See Index, vol. 11.

Ohio Northern Boundary.—See Index, vol. 12.

Ohio River, improvement of.—See Index, vol. 11.

Ohio State Government.—See Index, vol. 2.

OHIO, vote for President in 1840, 250.

OLIVER, WILLIAM M., Representative from New York, 281.

One Hour Rule.—In the Senate, debate on, 310, 315.

In the House, a motion to rescind the one hour rule, 611; no party benefited by its adoption, 611; rule rescinded, 612.

Ordinance of 1787.—See Index, vols. 3, 4, and Index, vol. 6, Missouri.

Oregon Territory.—In the Senate, resolutions relative to the title to, offered, 18; leave to introduce a joint resolution to authorize measures for the occupation and settlement of the territory, 208; present action of the Hudson's Bay Company, 208; further remarks, 208; leave granted, 204; bill for the occupation and settlement of, reported, 625.

Resolution calling for information relative to any informal communications respecting the claim to, 625; reason for the resolution, 625; resolution adopted, 625; bill ordered to a third reading, 625.

Question on the passage of the bill, 629; no intention that the provisions of the bill should conflict with the provisions of treaties, 629; statement of the three grounds upon which this Government sustains its title, 629; the promise of a grant of land to settlers not in conflict with the treaty, 640; we have a right to extend jurisdiction over our citizens residing in the territory, 640; action of England, 640; to grant land is to exercise ownership inconsistent with treaties, 640; there may be mutual occupation and jurisdiction, 640.

Views taken of the treaty relative to Oregon, 647; case of the north-eastern boundary, 647; the Select Committee aimed to effect two objects, 648; the preservation of our national faith and of our territory west of the Rocky Mountains, 648; claim of the United States, 648; views of Mr. Gallatin, 648; treaty of cession with Spain, 649; recommendation of Mr. Jefferson, 649; what do we now propose to do? 649; what are the objections to the passage of this bill, 650; possession of the country highly important to this Government, 650; views of Mr. Monroe, 650.

VOL. XIV.—47

Explanation of the treaties of 1806 and 1809 the proposition of Mr. McKenzie, 651; action of the English relative to the line of 49 degrees of latitude, 652; further details, 652; nullity of the British pretensions, 652; the claim of the British as disclosed in 1818, 652; their right to the Columbia now rests on the Northern Sound Convention, 654; statement of this treaty, 654; the British diplomacy, 655; they have the possession, while it belongs to us, 655; the objections to this bill grow out of the mutual occupancy clause of the treaty, 656; what are the claims of each at this time? 656; what has been the conduct of the British under this article? 656; it is time to terminate this convention of 1818, 656.

The only objection relates to the provision making grants to settlers, 661; joint occupation the only one that can take place in good faith, 661; the territory incontestably ours, 662; why should we hesitate to exercise ownership? 662; what are our rights? 662; not a word in the treaty of 1818 about joint occupation, 662; critical examination of the treaty of 1818, 662; it is expedient to go now as far as the bill proposes to go, 663; its provisions do not come in conflict with the terms of the convention, 664; how far did the terms of the convention permit citizens of this country to occupy the territory? 664; the provisions of the bill viewed in the light of a pre-emption, 664.

Frequent attempts made to adjust our claims, 665; has the time arrived when it will be wise and prudent to assert our exclusive right to the territory? 665; no, 665; the events which have occurred in Asia, 665; our means of concentrating an opposing force if necessary, 666; impediments by land, 666; would Great Britain resist our claim? 666; but shall we abandon our claim to the territory? 667; how shall we preserve our claim? 667; by the action of time, 667; if the time had arrived to assert our claim, it would not be expedient in the present weak condition of our Government, 668; state of the finances, 668; follies in the conduct of our finances, 668; our present danger lies in the finances, 669; the mode in which the bill proposes to assert our claim indispensable, 669; result of the passage of this bill, 669; authority of preceding administrations, 670; friendship to the West in former years, 671.

Does this bill interfere with the stipulations of the convention of 1818? 672; what was the principal object of the treaty? 672; it is said the bill proposes to do nothing more than Great Britain has already done, 672; two parties interested in this question, 672; by whom are the conflicting claims to be settled? 672; the convention of 1818, 672; what is the emergency that demands the passage of this bill? 674; what will be the natural interpretation that England will put on our act? 675; some domestic views of the subject which have been overlooked, 675; for whose benefit are we bound to pass this measure? 676; shall we derive a cent of revenue in the next twenty years? 676; the fur trade in rapid course of deterioration, 676; distant colonies far more expensive than profitable, 676; the ways and means overlooked, 677; condition of this Government, 677.

The objection that the bill will be an infraction of the treaty, 678; the expense of the proposed measure, 679; the objection as to the nature of the country, 679; our claim prior and paramount to that of Great Britain, 689; its history, 689; we never have abandoned one iota of our claim, 688; law under which Europeans settled on this continent, 688; how can it give Great Britain offence, if we carry out by this bill her own suggestions? 684; this bill cannot create any difficulty with Great Britain, 684.

The bill drawn with special care not to be considered an infraction of the treaty by Great Britain, 685; this discussion have no effect, 685; bill placed on three grounds of immediate national and domestic interest, 686; our Government never done any thing to obtain the occupation we claim, 686; origin of our title, 687; it is enough to know we are right, 687; what have we ever gained by leaving our cause to time? 687; the result of time, delay, and negotiation with Great Britain, 688; the true boundary line intended by the treaty of 1783, 688; motion to commit lost, 689; motion to strike out the land clause lost, 689; bill passed, 689.

Senate bill reported in the House, 700. See Index, vol. 18.

Orleans Territory.—See Index, vols. 4, Territories.

OSBORNE, THOMAS B., Representative from Connecticut, 8, 261; on the decease of Thaddeus Betts, 103.

OSWLEY, BRYAN Y., Representative from Kentucky, 261.

P

Pointing of the Principal Events of the Revolution.—See Index, vols. 5, 9, 10.

PALEN, EUFUS, Representative from New York, 4.

Panama Manifesto, instructions to.—See Index, vol. 10.

Panama Mission.—See Index, vols. 8, 9.

PARKE, ISAAC, Representative from Ohio, 4.

PARMENTER, WILLIAM, Representative from Massachusetts, 8, 261. See Index, vol. 18.

PARR, VIRGIL D., Representative from Maine, 8.

PATRIDGE, SAMUEL, Representative from New York, 261.

Patent Office.—See Index, vol. 10.

Pay of Members.—See Index, vols. 5, 6, 10, 11.

Payment of Interest to States.—See Index, vol. 9.

PAYNE, —, Representative from Alabama, 261; on the bankrupt law, 241, 622.

PAYTHER, LEMUEL, Representative from Pennsylvania, 4.

PEABOE, JAMES A., Representative from Maryland, 261.

PECK, Judge, the case of.—See Index, vols. 10, 11.

PECK, LUTHER C., Representative from New York, 8.

Penal Code in the District of Columbia.—See Index, vol. 12.

Penal Code of the United States.—See Index, vol. 8.

PENDLETON, N. G., Representative from Ohio, 261; on the bankrupt law, 620.

Pentitentiary in the District of Columbia.—See Index, vol. 8.

PENNINGTON, WILLIAM, letter to the Speaker of the House, 55.

Pennsylvania Insurgents.—See Index, vol. 1.

Pennsylvania, vote for President in 1840, 250.

Pension Laws.—In the Senate, an act for the relief of Sarah Beely considered, 458; many similar bills passed this session, 458; is the principle of this bill a settled question? 458; danger of opening a new door to claims on the pension list, 458; previous laws, 458; enormous evils grown out of small beginnings, 458; bill passed, 458. See Index, vols. 10, 11, 12.

Pension Bill, Revolutionary.—See Index, vol. 7.

Pensions, Naval.—In the House, a bill relative to, reported, 175; the bill, 175; document from the Secretary of the Navy, 175; explanation of the acts relating to the bill, 176; the law of 1837, 176; would the Government now make good a deficiency in the pension fund of 1837? 176; proceedings of the Secretary relative to this fund, 176; the investment of money in State stocks by the Government was in fact assuming the State debts, 177; bill passed, 177.

Reconsideration moved, 179; reasons for the motion, 179; how was the act of 1837 passed? 179; note, 179; view of the whole ground of controversy, 179, 180.

Pension to Wounded Officers of the War of 1812.—See Index, vol. 6.

Perry, Commodore.—See Index, vol. 10.

Petition, the right of.—See Index, vol. 12.

Petitions, reception of.—See Index, vol. 2, and Index, vol. 1, 6, 12, Slavery.

PETERLIN, DAVID, Representative from Pennsylvania, 4. See Index, vol. 12.

PHILIPS, SAMUEL, Senator from Vermont, 290; on the enlistment of blacks, 464; on the Oregon bill, 628.

Philadelphia Frigate, capture of.—See Index, vol. 2.

PICKENS, FRANCIS W., Representative from South Carolina, 4, 261; votes for as Speaker, 4; on Chinese affairs, 180; on the naval appropriation bill, 258; on the fortifications, 265; on repeal of the sub-Treasury, 325; on the provisional tariff, 427; on the bankrupt law, 624.

PIBBON, FRANKLIN, Senator from New Hampshire, 4, 290; on the armed occupation of Florida, 31; on a pension to Hannah Leighton, 165, 166; on repeal of the bank charter, 823. See Index, vols. 12, 13.

Piracy in the West Indies.—See Index, vol. 7, 8.

PLUMER, ARNOLD, Representative from Pennsylvania, 261. See Index, vol. 12.

PODRETT, J. E., letter on the employment of bloodhounds in Florida, 76.

Polish Bibles.—See Index, vol. 12.

POLK, JAMES K., votes for as Vice President, 250. See Index, vol. 8, 9, 10, 11.

Poor of Georgetown, wood for.—See Index, vol. 11.

PORG, JOHN, Representative from Kentucky, 4, 261; on the claim of Matthew Lyon's heirs, 140; on the bankrupt law, 245. See Index, vol. 18.

Pontchartrain Canal and Louisiana College.—See Index, vol. 10.

PORTER, —, Senator from Louisiana, 4; on British Emancipation of American slaves, 115; on the prospective pre-emption bill, 202.

Portugal, commerce with.—See Index, vol. 7.

Postage of Newspapers.—See Index, vol. 2.

Postage, reduction of.—See Index, vol. 12.

Postmaster-General, salary of.—See Index, vols. 8, 9.

Post Office.—See Index, vol. 1.

Post Office Department Investigation.—See Index, vol. 11.

Post Office Patronage.—See Index, vol. 5.

Potomac River Bridge.—See Index, vol. 2.

POWELL, CUTHBERT, Representative from Virginia, 261.

Power of the President to originate Missions.—See Index, vol. 11, Turkish Missions.

Powers of the Government.—See Index, vol. 12.

Pre-emption Law, a permanent prospective.—In the Senate, a notice of an intention to ask leave to bring in a bill relative to, 154; the bill introduced, 155; former laws temporary, 155; the friends of the pre-emption laws always looked to a permanent system, 155; the favorable conjunction of parties and circumstances, 156; the bill, 156; postponed and ordered printed, 157.

Statement of the principles and enactments of the bill, 184; not a new convert to this policy, 184; not wild and uncultivated land that constitutes the wealth or strength of a country, 185; no sacrifice of pecuniary interest by the Government in the plan proposed by this bill, 185; average prices per year, 185; result under the pre-emption policy, 186; greater expense incurred by auction sales, than under pre-emption, 186; money about the last consideration that should influence our policy in relation to the public domain, 186; the bill merely a measure to change the mode of sales from auctions to private entry, 186; it is free from the objections urged against previous bills, 187; impartial and liberal, 187.

Views of the President, 188; extracts from messages, 188; high praise accorded to him, 189; experience of thirty-two years, 189; questions relative to provisions of the bill, 190; motion to exclude persons of color, 190; carried, 190.

Motion to exclude aliens from the benefits of the bill, 190; this point solemnly decided three years ago, 191; the uniform practice of selling the public land to foreigners, interferes with no right of any State, 191; aliens should not be invited from every quarter of the globe to take possession of the public domain on the favorable terms of this bill, 191; a man owing allegiance to a foreign power ought not to exercise the right of franchise in this country, 191; what was this privilege of pre-emption, after all? 191; why make an odious distinction against foreigners in this particular case? 192.

No new reason for bringing this motion forward now, 192; reasons for the motion examined, 192; the alien banker may acquire unlimited millions, 192; motion lost, 193.

Amendments moved requiring the alien to declare his intention, and excluding all persons possessing more than five hundred dollars, 195; if Congress proposes to recognize any distinction between foreigners and natives, the amendment was proper and reasonable, 196; otherwise foreigners might form colonies in the midst of our country, 196; this should not be a law to make rich men richer, but to furnish a home to the industrious man, 196; movement taking place at the West in anticipation of this bill, 196.

The foreigner who settles on Western land presents the clearest proof of an intention to become a citizen, 197; the opposition manifested to foreigners not understood, 197; our interest to permit them to establish a line of defence on the Western border, 197; said to be degrading to Americans to resort to such a defence, 197.

Reversing the liberality of the constitution by offering pre-emption to foreigners, that they might form a defence for us against Indians, 198; if actual settlement is the best evidence of intention to become a citizen, we had better repeal our naturalization laws, 196; what, after all, is this great privilege of pre-emption? 199; the question to be decided is whether we will put the foreigner who makes no declaration of intention to become a citizen, upon the same footing with our own citizens, 200; further remarks, 200.

Amendment moved requiring a declaration of an intent to become a citizen, 200; amendment modified, 201; what is the privilege proposed to be conferred by this bill? 201; is there any reason for changing all our legislation in reference to the public lands? 201; if the foreigner does not choose to become a citizen, what is the consequence? 201; the lands escheat, 201; when sold, the land is subject to State institutions, 202; policy of the Government to stimulate these people by every laudable inducement, to change their allegiance, 202; explanation, 202; amendment rejected, 203.

Further amendment moved, 204; the bill can have no unfavorable financial effect, 204; what it proposes, 204; what is the great policy of this measure? 205; it is denounced as a system of rewards and punishments applied between the Atlantic and the West, 205; this charge examined, 205, 206; resolutions submitted, 207; amendment moved, 207; the resolutions indicative of the policy of the new Administration, 207.

This proposition goes to destroy the bill, 208; the distribution policy commenced years ago, 208; denounced then, 208; this Government settled on the pre-emption system from the beginning, 209; the movement of the people will be onward, 209; amendments moved, 209; the question of the public lands, next to that of the currency, the most dangerous and difficult of all that demand the attention of the country, 209; amendment to cede the lands to the States in which they lie, 209; the system originally admirably adapted to effect its object, 209; a mighty change since taken place, 210; some deep disorder in the land system, 210; the amendment before proposed inappropriate and inadequate, 210; what remedy can correct the disease? 210; cession would reach the evil, 210.

No question of so much interest to some of the States as this, 211; what the bill proposes, 211; one of the reasons of opposition is to prevent the emigration to and improvement of the new States, 211; opposed by the old States because they are jealous of the new, 212; it is said pre-emptioners are an unworthy class, 212; these settlers constitute the best part of the population of the new States, 212; a description of them in Hall's Magazine, 212; it is said the bill allows more than one pre-emption, 212; it is represented as a revival of the credit system, 212; it is objected that settlers on the unsurveyed lands are placed on an equal footing with those on the surveyed lands, 212; the distribution bill offered as a substitute, 214; the cession bill, 214; it embraces the pre-emption and graduation clauses, 214; it is objected that this bill changes our admirable land system, 214; public sentiment in the new States requires a change in the disposition of the public lands, 215.

The different propositions that have been made for the disposition of these lands, 215; objections urged against the graduation bill, 215; vote against excluding foreigners, 216; objections to pre-emption, 217; it is said the principle of granting prospective pre-emption is a departure from previous laws, 218; an examination of the cession bill, 218; diversity of the condition of the nine new States, 218.

The bill and amendments contemplate a permanent and conclusive adjustment of our interest in the domain, 219; settlement and occupancy seem to have been the object of the Government, 219; grounds of objection to the pre-emption policy, 220; it injures our exchequer, 220; it is called a bounty, 220; it produces an unnatural drain on the population of the old States, 221; engenders a spirit of insubordination, 221; arguments in favor of pre-emption, 221; commerce has its costly defences, and manufactures a protection, 222; claims of the West, 222; antagonistic measures to this bill, 222; objections to the cession scheme, 223; votes on the amendments, 223, 224.

Question on the motion to recommit, with instructions to report a bill for the distribution of the proceeds, 226; the best disposition of the public domain is to sell to actual settlers at a fair price, 226; male and female over twenty-one years of age should be allowed this right, 226.

We are charged with voting for a proposition that would give away 100 million acres belonging to Ohio for eight hundred thousand, 226; explanation, 227; changes by the opposition, 227; power of Congress over the public lands, 228; this bill proposes to make permanent in the place of temporary laws, 228; a gift of the land would seldom pay the first settler, 229; further debate, 229.

Amendment moved, 240; what is proposed by it, 240; what is comprehended in the proposition? 241; how carried out? 241; advantages supposed to result to the new States, 242; it is asked, if we will break up an old and well-tried system? 242; the system of pre-emptions commenced in 1812, 242; remarks of Mr. Webster in 1823, 242; it is proposed to grant pre-emptions exclusively to persons worth less than $1,000, 242; further debate, 244; votes on the amendments moved, 245, 246.

Pre-emption Rights.—See Index, vols. 7, 10, 11.

PRENTISS, JOHN H., Representative from New York, 2.

PRENTISS, SAMUEL, Senator from Vermont, 2, 230. See Index, vols. 11, 12, 13.

Present to Ministers.—See Index, vol. 2.

Present from Foreign Powers.—See Index, vol. 12.

Present from the Imam of Muscat.—In the Senate, a message relative to, 140.

Presidency, vacancy in.—See Index, vol. 1.

Presidential Document.—See Index, vol. 12.

Presidential Election in the House.—See Index, vols. 8, 12, 13.

PRESTON, WILLIAM C., Senator from South Carolina, 4, 230; on the armed occupation of Florida, 24; on bloodhounds against the Indians, 60; on the repeal of the sub-Treasury, 294; relative to the repeal of the sub-Treasury, 297; on disturbance in the galleries, 251; on the case of the Creole, 297. See Index, vols. 12, 13.

Previous Question.—See Index, vols. 1, 4, 5.

Printing old Journals.—See Index, vol. 12.

Printing, public.—See Index, vol. 12.

Privateer Pension Fund.—In the House, a resolution relative to, submitted, 207.

Privateers.—See Index, vols. 4, 5.

Private Losses in Service.—See Index, vol. 5.

Privileges of Senate Officers.—See Index, vol. 7.

PROCTOR, GEORGE H., Representative from Indiana, 4, 281; on the provisional tariff, 420; on the provisional tariff veto, 449.

Propagating the Gospel among the Heathen.—See Index, vol. 7.

Prosperity of the Country.—See Index, vol. 12.

Protective Duties.—See Index, vol. 1, and Index, vols. 5, 6, 14, Duties.

Protest of the President.—In the House, a message from the President received, 527; resolutions relative to, offered, 527; remarks, 528; passed, 527, 528. See Index, vol. 12.

Public Buildings.—See Index, vols. 5, 7.

Public Debt.—See Index, vol. 8.

Public Defaulters.—See Index, vol. 7.

Public Documents, suppression of.—See Index, vol. 7. Do reprinting of.—See Index, vol. 10.

Public Expenditures.—See Index, vols. 11, 12.

Public Land Distribution.—In the Senate, the bill from the House reported, 209; amendments proposed, 209.

Amendment moved, 222; the bill to take effect when the country is out of debt, 223; if this bill is passed, it will be necessary to raise the rate of duties, 223; burden falls on Southern States, 223; would the North now set aside the compromise? 223.

The bill of the House will yield sufficient revenue without violating the compromise, 229; it was the understanding the revenues were to be derived from duties, 229; order of business of the session reversed, 229; the friends of protection will not yield home valuation, 229; the probable expenditures, 229; amendment lost, 230.

Other amendments offered, 230; object to preserve the pre-emption to settlers, 230; the surveys have never kept pace with the population, 230; there should be some limit, 231; amendment lost, 231; motion to strike out the clause excluding aliens, lost, 231; motion to apply the proceeds to the national defence, 242; posture of the Government in relation to the common defence, 242; causes of quarrel, 242; exposed condition of the country, 242; necessity of defence now, 242; motion lost, 242.

Motion to strike out the ten per cent given to new States, 242; reasons for the votes of the Senators from Pennsylvania, 242; amendments lost, 244.

The question, stripped of all delusion, is whether money raised by taxes for the administration of the Government was to be distributed to the several States? 260; the States have to be bribed to wink at taking money out of the Treasury, 261; a grand display of the resources offered by this immense fund, the public domain, 261; amendments offered and lost, 261.

In the House, a bill to repeal the 6th section of the distribution act, 516; reported to the House and passed, 516.

In the Senate, the bill read, 516; read second time, 526; read third time and passed, 526.

Public Lands.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, 10, 12. Origin of.—See Index, vol. 12. Distribution of Proceeds.—See Index, vols. 10, 11, 12, 13. Pre-emption.—See Index, vols. 12, 14. Purchasers of.—See Index, vol. 12. Gratification of the Price.—See Index, vols. 3, 2.

Public Money.—See Index, vol. 12.

Purses in the Navy.—See Index, vol. 10.

Q

Quakers, memorial of.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, 2.

Quartermaster's Department.—See Index, vol. 4.

Quintuple Treaty.—In the Senate, a resolution relative to, 616; considered, 617; the Government had received no official information, 618; no facts in possession of the Executive which are not in possession of the Senate, 618; the inquiry founded on the message relating to the treaty, 618; object of the call for information, 617; resolution postponed, 620; call for correspondence, 621.

R

Railroads, old to.—See Index, vol. 10.

Railroad from Baltimore to Washington.—See Index, vol. 11.

RANNEY, ROBERT, Representative from Pennsylvania, 251; on the New Jersey election, 22.

RANNEY, WILLIAM S., Representative from Pennsylvania, 4; decease of, 157.

RANDALL, ALEXANDER, Representative from Maryland, 22.

RANDALL, BENJAMIN, Representative from Maine, 2, 22.

RANDOLPH, JOSEPH F., Representative from New Jersey, 4, 281; on the New Jersey election, 54. See Index, vol. 12.

Ransom, prohibition of.—See Index, vol. 5.

RARDEN, JAMES, Representative from Indiana, 4. See Index, vol. 12.

RAYMON, KENNETH, Representative from North Carolina, 4, 281; on the decease of Lewis Williams, 401.

Real Estate and Slaves, valuation of.—See Index, vol. 1.

READING, JOHN E., Representative from New Hampshire, 261.

REED, JOHN, Representative from Massachusetts, 4. See Index, vol. 18.

REESIDE, JAMES, his memorial presented in the Senate, 454.

REMPHALL, THOMAS, Representative from New York, 4.

RENCHEE, ABRAHAM, Representative from North Carolina, 4, 281. See Index, vols. 12, 13.

Reports on the fine of Gen. Jackson, 641.

Representation, ratio of.—In the Senate, a motion to amend the bill considered, 404; the proposition to elect by districts wholly unconstitutional, 404; operation of the district system will destroy the balance of interests in the national Legislature, 404; visionary to hope to represent minorities as well as majorities, 405; bill unconstitutional in details, every qualified voter a right to vote for every member of Congress to which a State was entitled, 405; another step towards Federal encroachment, 405.

District system adopted by most of the States immediately after the adoption of the constitution, 405; every country which possessed freedom to any extent the people elected their agents by districts, &c., 405; the representative should have an opportunity to meet the people he represents, 405; evidences of public sentiment in favor of the district system, 407; if the Legislatures fail to district the States, Congress will be obliged to declare the election null and void, 407; the election takes place in Mississippi before her Legislature can meet to pass a law on the subject, 407; the bill a return to the principles of the old confederation, 408; every law which Congress has power to pass, it must have power to execute, 408; another Congress may repeal this law and establish the general ticket system, 408.

Manner of forming the constitution, proceedings relative to elections, 409; the very question of power now under discussion came up, 409; the constitution explicit, 409; a power to be exercised at the discretion of Congress, 409; it does not contemplate anything mandatory, 409; the enumerated powers of Congress may be either dormant or active, 410.

The provision requiring districting ought not to have been embraced in the bill, 410; can Congress exercise this power by a mandamus to the States? 410; a great abuse to exercise this power under present circumstances, 411; all dangerous collisions have arisen from the exercise of doubtful powers, 411; confusion from some States not following this course, 411.

This question free from doubt, 411; duty of the States to conform to the time, manner, and place set by Congress, 412.

This is said to be a war waged by the small States upon the large ones, 412; further debate, 412-416; amendment lost, 417; bill passed, 427; House non-concur, 431; Senate insist, 432; House recede, 436; bill signed, 444.

Representation, ratio of.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, 4.

Resolutions.—On the assumption of State debts, 17, 58, 73, 79, 92, 93, 94, 626; on the title to Oregon, &c., 18; on circulating dead notes of the United States Bank, 19; on the decease of A. G. Harrison, 30; on the decease of J. C. Alford, 30; on the New Jersey election, 31; of the Tennessee Legislature, 36; on the Maine boundary, 38; on steamboat liabilities, 55; on military posts on the route to Oregon, 55; on the regulation of foreign commerce, 56; respecting the brig Enterprise, 80; of the Legislature of Georgia on fugitives from justice, 94; on British liberation of slaves, 99, 113; on the fishing boundaries, 102; on the decease of Thaddeus Betts, 102; on the north-eastern boundary, 108; relative to the documentary history, 127; on the decease of Anson Brown, 141, 142; on the decease of John S. Spence, 154; on repeal of the Independent Treasury, 158; on the decease of S. H. Anderson, 157; on the decease of Wm. S. Ramsey, 157; on relations with China, 164; on the decease of Felix Grundy, 173, 182; on the pre-emption law, 207; on the privateer pension fund, 207; on counting the electoral vote, 240, 246; to notify the President and Vice President of their election, 249; relative to Nicollet's map and survey, 253; of thanks to Vice President Johnson, 267; of thanks to Speaker Hunter, 268; of thanks to W. R. King, as president pro tem. of the Senate, 279; relative to rules and orders, 288; of respect to the memory of Gen. Harrison, 289, 292; on the decease of Charles Ogle, 290; on repeal of the Sub-treasury, 290; on the business of the session, 291; on the election of printer, 297; relative to a national bank, 300; to close debate on the bankrupt law, 344; on disturbances in the galleries, 357; on the decease of D. Dimmock, Jr., 383; on the decease of Senator Dixon, 394, 395; on the decease of Lewis Williams, 401; on the decease of Hastings, 444, 446; on the decease of Southard, 445; relative to Mexico, 454; relative to the President's protest, 523; on the decease of J. W. Williams, 601, 610; relative to the Quintuple Treaty, 616; relative to the African squadron, 617; on the mutiny on the Somers, 630; on the exchequer plan, 641; of thanks to Samuel T. Washington, 691; on the district banks, 695; relative to the construction of the British treaty, 707; relative to the State debts, 707; on the Amistad Africans, 155; of thanks to the Speaker, 713.

Retrenchment.—See Index, vol. 10.

Revenue Collection Bill.—See Nullification.

Revenue Cutters.—See Index, vol. 4.

Revenue, reduction of.—See Index, vol. 12.

Revenue, surplus.—See Index, vol. 12.

Revolution, soldiers of.—See Index, vols. 10, 11, and Index, vols. 2, 3, 6, Soldiers.

Revolution, surroting officers of.—See Index, vol. 2.

Revolutionary Bounty Lands.—See Index, vol. 8.

Revolutionary Claims.—See Index, vol. 12.

Revolutionary Pension System.—See Index, vol. 8.

REYNOLDS, JOHN, Representative from Illinois, 4, 231. See Index, vol. 12.

RHEET, BARNWELL B., Representative from South Carolina, 4, 231; on the fiscal corporation, 364; on the provisional tariff veto, 450. See Index, vol. 13.

Rhode Island, admission of.—See Index, vol. 1.

Rhode Island, vote for President in 1840, 250.

RIDGWAY, JOSEPH, Representative from Ohio, 4, 231.

RIGGS, LEWIS, Representative from New York, 231.

RIVER, FRANCIS C., Representative from Virginia, 4. See Index, vol. 12.

RIVER, WILLIAM C., Senator from Virginia, 4, 230; on the repeal of the sub-Treasury, 228; on land distribution, 329; relative to the repeal of the sub-Treasury, 357; on disturbance in the galleries, 351; on the apportionment bill, 408; on the provisional tariff, 441; on the occupation of Oregon, 636; on the assumption of State debts, 695, 704. See Index, vols. 12, 13.

Roads and Canals, surveys for.—See Index, vol. 7.

Road from Detroit to Chicago. Do. from Pensacola to St. Augustine. Do. from Georgia to New Orleans.—See Index, vol. 8. Do. in Arkansas.—See Index, vol. 9.

Roads, post.—See Index, vols. 2, 7. Repair of in Mississippi.—See Index, vol. 8.

Roads in States or Territories, difference between.—See Index, vols. 9, 10.

ROANE, WILLIAM H., Senator from Virginia, 4; on the decease of P. P. Barbour, 254; on judicial circuits, 258.

ROBBINS, ASHER, Senator from Rhode Island, 2.
 ROBINSON, JOHN M., Senator from Illinois, 2. See Index, vol. 12.
 ROBINSON, THOMAS, Representative from Delaware, 4.
 RODNEY, GEORGE B., Representative from Delaware, 261.
 ROGERS, EDWARD, Representative from New York, 2.
 ROGERS, JAMES, Representative from South Carolina, 4, 261. See Index, vol. 12.
 ROOSEVELT, JAMES J., Representative from New York, 261; on the bankrupt law, 232, 459; on the provisional tariff, 427; on the veto power of the constitution, 504.
 RUGGLES, JOHN, Senator from Maine, 8; on the Maine boundary, 39; on the North-eastern boundary, 109, 111, 112. See Index, vol. 12, 13.
 Rules, amendment of.—See Index, vols. 9, 10, 11.
 RUSSELL, DAVID, Representative from New York, 2. See Index, vol. 12.
 RUSSELL, WILLIAM, Representative from Ohio, 261; on the claim of Matthew Lyon's heirs, 137.
 Russian Treaty in the North-west, contraventions of.—See Index, vol. 10.

S

Salt Tax, &c.—In the Senate, communications presented relative to the salt tax and fishing bounties, 74; subject been up for ten or twelve years, 74; referred to the Finance Committee, 75; further papers presented, 79.
 Fishing Bounties.—Are they founded on the salt duties? 121; report of the committee, 123; communication relative to the fisheries, 123; injury to the Treasury from a failure to reduce the bounties in proportion to the reduction of salt duty, 123; details, 123; Massachusetts fisheries not dependent upon national bounties, 123; further remarks, 123, 124.
 Salt Duty and Fishing Bounty.—See Index, vol. 5, Duties.
 SALTONSTALL, LEVERETT, Representative from Massachusetts, 4, 261; on the bankrupt law, 690. See Index, vol. 12.
 SAMUEL, GEORGE B., Representative from Virginia, 4.
 SANFORD, JOHN, Representative from New York, 261.
 SAUNDERS, ROMULUS M., Representative from North Carolina, 261.
 Savannah, relief of.—See Index, vol. 2.
 Scenes in a Committee Room.—See Index, vol. 12.
 School Lands.—See Index, vol. 10.
 Seamen, foreign merchant.—See Index, vol. 6.
 Seamen, protection of.—See Index, vols. 2, 4.
 Seat of Government.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, 3, 5.
 Secret Proceedings, publication of.—See Index, vol. 4.
 Sedition Law of 1798.—See Index, vols. 4, 6, 9, and Index, vol. 2, Defensive Measures and Seditions Practices.
 Seminole War.—See Index, vols. 4, 12.
 Senate, adjourns at close of 1st session of 36th Congress, 145; extra session of, 271.
 SERGEANT, JOHN, Representative from Pennsylvania, 4, 261; on the fiscal corporation bill, 362. See Index, vols. 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 12, 13.
 SEVIER, AMBROSE H., Senator from Arkansas, 2, 260; on the admission of Florida, 74; on the prospective pre-emption bill, 211; on the bankrupt bill, 247; on the tariff, 465; on the Oregon bill, 642. See Index, vols. 10, 11, 12, 13.
 SHAW, THURSTON, Representative from New Hampshire, 2, 261.
 SHEPHERD, AUGUSTINE H., Representative from North Carolina, 261; on navy pensions, 179. See Index, vols. 9, 10, 12, 13, 15.

SHEPARD, CHARLES, Representative from North Carolina, 4. See Index, vol. 12.
 SHIELDS, BENJAMIN G., Representative from Alabama, 261.
 Silk, culture of.—See Index, vol. 11.
 Silver Coinage.—See Index, vol. 12.
 SIMMONS, JAMES F., Senator from Rhode Island, 260; on the decease of Senator Dixon, 262.
 SIMONTON, WILLIAM, Representative from Pennsylvania, 4, 261.
 Skating Pond.—See Index, vol. 10.
 SLADE, WILLIAM L., Representative from Vermont, 2, 261; on the claim of Matthew Lyon's heirs, 140. See Index, vol. 12.
 Slavery, action of Indiana.—See Index, vol. 2, Ordinances. Do. in the District of Columbia.—See Index, vols. 2, 10, 11, 12, 13. Do. negro in South America.—See Index, vol. 2. Do., resolutions relative to, in new Spain.—See Index, vols. 2, 6, and Index, vol. 2, Territories.
 Slavery in the District of Columbia.—In the Senate, petitions relative to, from Ohio, 61; the petitioners can have no particular interest in this matter, and no claims to a hearing on that account, 69; relation of Congress to the District, 69; the will and wishes of the people to be consulted, 69; the States are, next after the people of the District, more immediately interested, 69; the female signers of the petition, 69; petitions not presented, 69; further petitions presented, 75; remarks, 76.
 In the House, a notice of a motion to rescind the 21st rule relative to abolition petitions, 145.
 A motion to adopt the standing rules and orders, 268; amendment excepting the 21st rule moved, 268; very little consequence what the rules were, the rule was and would be the will of the majority, 237; history of the 21st rule, 269; further remarks, 268.
 A resolution to rescind the 21st rule, 612; laid on the table, 612.
 Slaves, British liberation of.—In the Senate, resolutions relative to, considered, 99; the resolutions of, 99.
 Resolutions further considered, 112; what good can result by the introduction of these resolutions? 114; the principle involved is one of profound interest, 114; silence would be construed into an abandonment of the claims of our citizens, 114; shall the rights of the South be placed beyond the pale of protection? 114; the South immediately interested, 115; who could believe Great Britain would interfere with our coasting trade? 115; effect of her decision on the transportation of slaves by water from one portion of the Union to another, 115.
 Difficulties attending the question, 115; effect of the last resolution, 116; consequence of the right of the British Government to abolish slavery in her colonies, 116; precarious tenure of slave property, 116; adoption of the resolutions premature, 117; motion to lay on the table, 117; lost, 117; citizens of Western States interested in the resolutions, 117; resolutions adopted, 117.
 Slaves, coast, transportation of.—See Index, vol. 7. Do. deported.—See Index, vols. 6, 9. Do. fugitives.—See Index, vols. 5, 6, 7. Do. importation of.—See Index, vol. 6, and Index, vol. 2, Duties. Do. indemnity for.—See Index, vol. 6. Do. migration of.—See Index, vol. 6. Do. petitions.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, 4, 5. Do. liberation of, by British authorities.—See Index, vol. 12. Do. their right to petition.—See Index, vol. 12.
 Slave Trade.—See Index, vols. 2, 6, 7, 9.
 Slaves in the brig Comet, &c.—Message on, 59.
 Sloop of War.—See Index, vol. 7.
 Small Armed Vessels.—See Index, vol. 2.
 Small Notes in the District of Columbia.—See Index, vols. 12, 13.

SMITH, ALBERT, Representative from Maine, 4; on the North-eastern boundary, 106.
 SMITH, JOHN, Representative from Vermont, 8.
 SMITH, JOHN, the case of.—See Index, vol. 2.
 SMITH, OLIVER H., Senator from Indiana, 4, 290; on the prospective pre-emption bill, 215; on land distribution, 209, 231. See Index, vol. 12.
 SMITH, PERRY, Senator from Connecticut, 3, 260.
 SMITH, THOMAS, Representative from Indiana, 4.
 SMITH, THOMAS, Representative from Connecticut, 3, 261; on the decease of Thaddeus Betts, 102; on the bankrupt bill, 242.
Smithsonian Institution.—See Index, vols. 12, 13.
 SNYDER, JOHN, Representative from Pennsylvania, 261.
 SOLIERA, AUGUSTUS A., Representative from Maryland, 261.
Soldiers of the Revolution.—See Index, vols. 3, 4.
Somers, the brig.—In the House, a resolution of inquiry relative to, offered, 690.
South American States.—See Index, vols. 6, 7.
South American and other Missions.—See Index, vol. 12.
 SOUTHWARD, SAMUEL L., Senator from New Jersey, 3, 290; decease of, 444. See Index, vols. 12, 13.
South Carolina Claims.—See Index, vols. 9, 11.
South Carolina, ordinance of.—See Index, vol. 12. Do. resolutions.—See Index, vol. 12.
South Carolina.—Proceedings of her Legislature in approval of Van Buren's administration, &c, report and resolutions submitted in the Senate, 228; note, 228.
South Carolina Protest.—See Index, vol. 10.
South Carolina, vote for President in 1840, 260.
Spain, ratification of the treaty of 1819.—See Index, vol. 7.
Speaker, vote for at 1st session of 26th Congress, 2.
Spente Payments.—See Index, vols. 5, 12.
Specie, transportation of, in public armed vessels.—See Index, vol. 7.
 SPENCER, JOHN S., Senator from Maryland, 3; decease of, 154. See Index, vol. 12.
 SPRIGG, JAMES C., Representative from Kentucky, 261; on the bankrupt law, 254.
 STANLY, EDWARD, Representative from North Carolina, 4, 261. See Index, vol. 12.
 STARKWEATHER, A. D., Representative from Ohio, 3, 261.
State Balances.—See Index, vol. 2.
St. Domingo.—See Index, vols. 2, 7.
Steam, its application to navigation.—See Index, vol. 12.
Steamboats, law and liabilities of.—In the Senate, resolutions relative to, offered, 58.
 STEINSON, LAWRENCE, Representative from Virginia, 4, 261; on the repeal of the sub-Treasury, 237.
 STEWART, JOHN T., Representative from Illinois, 4.
Stock, see million, note.—See Index, vol. 3.
 STOKELY, SAMUEL, Representative from Ohio, 261.
 STORES, WILLIAM L., Representative from Connecticut, 4.
 STRANGE, ROBERT, Senator from North Carolina; resigns his seat in the Senate, 154. See Index, vol. 12.
 STRATTON, CHARLES C., Representative from New Jersey, 3, 261. See Index, vol. 12.
 STROSS, SEARON E., Representative from New York.
 STUART, ALEXANDER H. H., Representative from Virginia, 261.
 STUART, JOHN T., Representative from Illinois, 261; on the provisional tariff vote, 442.
 STURGESON, DANIEL, Senator from Pennsylvania, 3, 260.
Stability of States.—See Index, vol. 2.
Sub-Treasury.—See Independent Treasury.
Supplies in War.—See Index, vol. 6.
Supplies at Alexandria, relief of.—See Index, vol. 2.
Sugar Cane.—See Index, vol. 10.
Sugar, drawback on.—In the Senate, a bill to reduce considered, 118; settlement of the tariff adjourned to 1842, 118; abuse of the sugar drawback commenced in 1839, 118; operation of the compromise on refined sugar, 118; details, 119; testimony of the collector at Philadelphia, 119; amount unjustly and unduly drawn from the Treasury, 120; letter from sugar refiners, 120.

Sugar, drawback on refined.—See Index, vol. 10, Duties.
 SUMMERS, GEORGE W., Representative from Virginia, 261; presents the sword of Washington and staff of Franklin, 669.
 SUMPTER, THOMAS R., Representative from South Carolina, 4, 261.
Sunday Malls.—See Index, vols. 5, 7, 10, 11.
Supreme Court.—See Index, vol. 10.
Surgeon-General of the Navy.—See Index, vol. 10.
 SWARTWOUT, SAMUEL.—In the Senate, the bill to authorize a compromise with the sureties of, ordered to be engrossed, 80; the bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise with the sureties of, ordered to a third reading, 456.
 SWARINGER, HENRY, Representative from Ohio, 4.
Sweden, commercial intercourse with.—See Index, vol. 9.
 SWEENEY, GEORGE, Representative from Ohio, 3, 261.
 SWIFT, BENJAMIN, Senator from Vermont, 3.

T

Tucudayo Mission.—See Index, vol. 9.
 TALIAFERRO, JOHN, Representative from Virginia, 4, 261. See Index, vol. 12.
 TALLMADGE, NATHANIEL P., Senator from New York, 3, 290; on the decease of Anson Brown, 141; on the bankrupt bill, 220; on the apportionment bill, 411-414; on the Exchequer bill, 453; on the tariff, 469. See Index, vols. 12, 13.
 TANEY, CHIEF JUSTICE, administers the oath to President Harrison, 279.
 TAPPAN, BENJAMIN, Senator from Ohio, 3, 290; on abolition petitions, 51; on the admission of Florida, 74; on printing the documentary history, 127; on prospective pre-emption, 226; on the fiscal corporation, 266; on the enlistment of blacks, 464; on the distribution bill, 528; on the Oregon bill, 647.
Taxes, direct.—See Index, vols. 2, 5, 6. Do. War.—See Index, vol. 6.
 TAYLOR, JONATHAN, Representative from Ohio, 4.
 TAYLOR, GENERAL Z., on the use of bloodhounds in Florida, 77.
 TAKENWELL, LITTLETON W., votes for as Vice President, 250.
Tennessee, admission of.—See Index, vol. 1.
Tennessee Land Claims.—See Index, vol. 10.
Tennessee Resolutions.—In the Senate, resolutions of the Legislature of Tennessee against a bank, in favor of the Independent Treasury, &c, presented, 26; resignation of Senator White in consequence, 68.
Tennessee, vote for President in 1840, 250.
Territorial Governments.—See Index, vol. 4.
Territories.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 6.
Texas Independence.—See Index, vol. 12. Do. Recognition of.—See Index, vol. 12.
Thanks to the Speaker.—See Index, vol. 12.
 THOMAS, FRANCIS, Representative from Maryland, 4; votes for as Speaker, 4; on navy pensions, 176. See Index, vols. 11, 12, 13.
 THOMAS, F. F., Representative from Maryland, 4.
 THOMPSON, JOHN, Representative from Mississippi, 4.
 THOMPSON, JOHN B., Representative from Kentucky, 145, 261; on the decease of Anderson, 157.
 THOMPSON, RICHARD W., Representative from Indiana, 261.
 THOMPSON, WADDEY, Representative from South Carolina

281; on the north-eastern boundary, 107; on the claim of Matthew Lyon's heirs, 188. See Index, vol. 18.

TIFFANY, REV. MR., elected chaplain of the House, 615.

TILLINGHAM, JOSEPH L., Representative from Rhode Island, 4, 281; on the claim of Matthew Lyon's heirs, 188; on the decease of Senator Dixon, 894. See Index, vol. 18.

TIPPOON, JOHN, Senator from Indiana, 3. See Index, vol. 18.

Title of President.—See Index, vol. 1.

TOLLAND, GEORGE W., Representative from Pennsylvania, 4, 281.

TOMLINSON, THOMAS A., Representative from New York, 281.

Topographical Surveys.—See Index, vol. 11.

Torpedo Experiment.—See Index, vol. 7.

Treason, punishment of.—See Index, vol. 5.

Treason and Sedition defined.—See Index, vol. 2.

Treasury.—See Index, vol. 6.

Treasury Circular.—See Index, vol. 13.

Treasury Notes.—In the House, a reply to the various charges of extravagance, 283; always two parties under a Government, 283; it is asked, what necessity there is for the issue of Treasury notes, with a balance in the Treasury, 284; charges against the Administration, 284; further debate, 285.

If money is needed, it is better to vote for a loan or increased duties, 251; circumstances of the Treasury note issue in 1837, 251; progress since, 251; periods when these acts have passed, 251; tendency to draw specie from the South and West, 252; bill passed, 253.

In the Senate, the Treasury Note bill considered, 288; amendment offered, 288; should provide for the payment of a debt whenever it was created, 288; tax on bank notes, rate of, 289; taxed in England and had been in the United States, 289; as things are going on, loans and Treasury notes will soon fail, 289; object of the mover of the amendment, 289.

In the House, a motion to concur in the Senate's amendments, 291; concurred in, 292. See Index, vol. 13.

Treaties, are they supreme over State laws?—See Index, vol. 12.

Treaty with Great Britain.—In the Senate, proceedings relative to, 580; message from the President, 580; vote on the ratification, 583; three objects embraced in the stipulations of the treaty, 584; history of the controversy, 584; action under the treaty of Ghent, 585; award of the King of the Netherlands, 585; the justice and validity of the American claim, 586; too late in the day to plant ourselves sternly and inflexibly on the ground of a clear, manifest, and incontrovertible right to the precise line we claim, 586; the time passed for making it a sine qua non, 586; doubtful if the documents discovered by Mr. Sparks of sufficient weight to shake the American title, 586; the map from Jefferson's collection, 587; a question attended with constant danger to the peace of two nations, 587; nothing in the arrangement incompatible with the character of a fair and just compromise, 588; its details, 588; as a national question, 588.

The part of the treaty relating to the suppression of the slave trade, 539; a mutual concession of the right of search the only means of putting an end to the traffic, 539; recent pretension of Great Britain, 539; message of the President, 540; our flag shamelessly abused, we should give to the world assurance of our determination to cleanse it, 540; the arrangement of the treaty, 540; the surrender of fugitives, 541; only obligation to surrender rises from a positive and precise compact, 541.

The three stipulations of the treaty, 541; the line agreed upon falls far short of our pretensions, 541; the second is a concession on our part to Great Britain, 541; the third is as advantageous to Great Britain as to us, 542; one, and not the least important question of difference, left precisely as it was, 542; the seizure of slaves unnoticed, 542; resolutions of the Senate on the subject, 542; their effect on the country, 542; the cases, 542; what reason assigned for this omission, 542; the diplomatic notes, 544; note of Lord Ashburton, 544; the negotiation should have been broken off, 544.

The treaty not a settlement of all the questions, 542; the question in discussion between the two countries, 545; this confederacy classed in three sections, each had its grievance, 545; these grievances, 545; other general objections, 546; details, 546; the northern boundary, 546; the grants and equivalents examined, 547.

Suppression of the African slave trade, 543; motives of this alliance, 543; the price we have agreed to pay for the privilege of going unsearched, 542, 549; the consequences of this entanglement are beyond the reach of human foresight, 549; immediate practical effects, 550; in what circumstances do we undertake all this fine work, 551; an act wholly without the pale of our constitution, 551.

Surrender of fugitives, 552; views of Jefferson, 552; Webster treaty and Jay treaty compared on this point, 553; better leave things as they are, 554; remarks of the message, 554; the article improper and unequal, 554.

General objections, 555; employment of a sole negotiator, 555; the assumption to treat the boundaries established by the war of the Revolution as matter of bargain and sale, 556; the omission to keep protocols, 557; assumption of the American negotiator to act for the British in presenting the British proposition for the Maine boundary, 557; mixing up incongruous matter in the treaty, 559; irregular manner in which the ratification has been sought, 559; want of instruction from the President to guide the negotiation, 560; fear of war, 560; letters of Sparks concerning a certain map, 560; this map, 561; Jefferson's map, how obtained, 561; remarks on the treaty as a whole, 562.

Omitted subjects are four, 563; the Columbia River, 563; impressment, 563; the case of the Creola, 564; other cases, 565; letter to Mr. Everett, 566; the resolutions of the Senate, 567; this offence against our ships of recent origin, but of increasing frequency, 567; case of the Caroline, 568; the whole negotiation one of shame and injury, 568; conduct of Van Buren's administration, 568; national character brought to the lowest point of contempt in the affair of the Caroline, 569.

The great question of the north-eastern boundary is the essential part of the instrument, 570; the doubt attempted to be cast upon our claims repelled, 570; circumstances at the time of the formation of the first treaty, 571; it should not be ratified in consequence of any just doubt raised by old maps, 572; the proposition to deviate from a due north line, 572; Lord Palmerston's recent letter, 573; motion to recommend the treaty with instructions to report resolutions, 573; withdrawn, 574.

This not the entertainment to which the State of Maine was invited, 574; Legislature of Maine called together, 574; its declaration previous to the treaty, 574; Maine has always insisted upon her absolute right to all the territory claimed by her, 575; her preamble and resolutions, 575; proceedings of her commissioners, 576; their action, 577; the title of Maine, 578; this treaty unjust to her, 579.

The boundary of Maine can only be settled by compromise, 579; are the objections to the boundary actually agreed on such as to cause its rejection? 573; it is said the assent of Maine has been coerced, 590; condition in which we would be left if the treaty was rejected, 581; Maine acted wisely in assenting to the treaty, and should not we do so in ratifying it? 581; the boundary from Maine to the Rocky Mountains, 581; provisions of the treaty in reference to this boundary, 582; the points regarding the slave trade, 582; proceedings on the subject, 583; it is objected that the arrangement is virtually an acknowledgment of the right of search, 588; the treaty is opposed not only for what it contains, but for what it does not contain, 584; cases of liberation of slaves, what has been done, 584; what state has the negotiation left these matters? 585; the reasons for the ratification greatly preponderate, 585, 586.

The treaty is destined to be ratified by a large majority, 586; mission of Lord Ashburton hailed as the olive branch of peace, 587; favorable time for the treaty, 587; the question of imprisonment, 588; is the claim abandoned? 588; case of the Caroline, 589; the Creole question, 589; the stipulation wholly inadequate to afford a remedy, 590; the squadron on the coast of Africa, 591; price paid to Great Britain for the relinquishment of her claim, 591; stipulations in the treaty of Ghent, 592; the two squadrons, it is said, are to act independently, 592; north-eastern boundary, 593; what course ought Mr. Webster to have pursued? 593; history of the negotiations, 594-596; thus have we yielded to a foreign power an ancient highland boundary, for which our fathers fought, 597; equivalents to excuse this surrender, 598; we bound to pay Maine and Massachusetts, 598; north-western boundary, 598; not a subject of negotiation, 599; injunction of secrecy removed, 599.

In the House, a resolution of inquiry relative to the British construction of the treaty, 707; extract from the speech of Sir Robert Peel in the House of Commons, 707.

In the Senate, extract from despatches from our minister at London on this question, 708; motion to strike out so much of the appropriation bill as relates to the African squadron, 709; the point of inquiry, 709; right of visitation and search, how treated, 710; a commentary on the improvidence of entangling ourselves with foreign alliances, 710; answer of General Jackson to Sir Charles Vaughan, 710; the real question is the disagreement between this Government and Great Britain as to the true interpretation of the treaty, 711; extract from the President's Message, 711; further debate, 712; message relative to, 716.—See Index, vol. 1.

Treaty with Spain.—See Index, vol. 6.

Treaty of Ghent, commission under.—See Index, vol. 8.

Treaty, new, Creek.—See Index, vol. 2, and Index, vol. 8, Creek Indian Negotiation.

TRIPLET, PHILIP, Representative from Kentucky, 4, 281.

TROTTER, JAMES, Senator from Mississippi, 4.

TRUMBULL, JOSEPH, Representative from Connecticut, 4, 281; on the bankrupt law, 329.

Turkish Commission—power of the President to originate missions.—See Index, vol. 11.

TURNER, JAMES, Representative from Maryland, 4; on the claim of Matthew Lyon's heirs, 187.

TURNER, HOPKINS L., Representative from Tennessee, 4, 281. See Index, vol. 18.

TURTIN, STEPHEN, chosen chaplain of the Senate, 297, 610.

Two-thirds' vote.—See Index, vol. 4.

TYLER, JOHN, votes for Vice President, 250; address as President of the Senate, 271; President of the United States, 253. See Index, vols. 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13.

U

UNDERWOOD, JOSEPH R., Representative from Kentucky, 4, 281; relative to the burning of the Caroline, 195; on the provisional tariff, 428; on the tariff veto, 485; on the district banks, 695. See Index, vol. 13.

Union, dissolution of.—See Index, vol. 4.

United States and Georgia.—See Index, vol. 2.

Unsettled Balances.—See Index, vol. 5.

V

Vaccination of Indians.—See Index, vols. 7, 11.

VAN BUREN, JOHN, Representative from New York, 281.

VAN BUREN, MARTIN, votes for as President in 1840, 250.

Van Buren's Administration, extravagance of.—In the Senate, answer to the charges made, 294; "log cabins" not introduced in debate here, 294; no foundation for the charge of extravagance, 295; report of the Secretary of the Treasury, 295; the extraordinary expenses have been very large, 296; they must vary with the changing condition of the country, 296; causes that swelled the expenditures, 296; extinguishing the Indian title, 297; indemnities, 297.

VANDERPOOL, AARON, Representative from New York, 3; on the fortifications, 266. See Index, vols. 12, 13.

VAN RENSBURG, HENRY, Representative from New York, 281.

Vermont, vote for President in 1840, 250.

Vessels, registering and clearing.—See Index, vol. 1.

Veto, of the fiscal bank, 348; of the provisional tariff, 446; of the tariff bill, 490; reports on, 499.

Vice Presidency.—In the Senate, a resolution submitted to inquire whether any further legislation was necessary, 277.

Vice President's Appeal.—See Index, vol. 2.

Vice President, powers of the.—See Index, vol. 2.

Vice and Rear Admirals.—See Index, vol. 5.

Virginia Land Warrants.—See Index, vols. 4, 5, 7. Do. Claims.—See Index, vol. 11.

Virginia, vote for President in 1840, 250.

Vote for a Committee on a Public Printing Office, 51.

W

Wabash and Miami Canal.—See Index, vol. 8.

WAGNER, DAVID D., Representative from Pennsylvania, 4. See Index, vol. 12.

WAGNER, PETER T., Representative from New York, 4.

WALKER, ROBERT J., Senator from Mississippi, 4, 280; on the admission of Florida, 74; on Nicollet's survey, 203; on a fiscal bank, 512; on the bankrupt bill, 329; on disturbance in the galleries, 359; on the apportionment bill, 407, 408, 412; on the tariff, 470; on the mandamus to the States, 512; on the assumption of State debts, 695. See Index, vols. 12, 13.

WALLACE, DAVID, Representative from Indiana, 281.

WALL, GARRET D., Senator from New Jersey, 3. See Index, vols. 12, 13.

War, conduct of the.—See Index, vol. 5.

WARD, AARON, Representative from New York, 281. See Index, vols. 12, 13.

Warehousing System.—In the Senate, a memorial on the subject, 625; object to give the importers the benefits that under a cash system they do not enjoy, 625; the English system secures a home market at the expense of all other countries, 625; pre-eminently a system of finance, 625.

- WARREN, LOT, Representative from Georgia, 4, 261.
Washington's Birthday.—See Index, vol. 11. Do. Monument.—See Index, vols. 5, 6, 7. Do. Portrait.—See Index, vols. 8, 11, 12. Do. Remains.—See Index, vol. 11. Do. Statue.—See Index, vol. 11.
- WASHINGTON MONUMENT SOCIETY.—See Index, vol. 12.
- WASHINGTON CITY, capture of.—See Index, vol. 5.
- WASHINGTON'S SWORD.—In the House, the presentation of, 692.
- WASHINGTON, WILLIAM H., Representative from North Carolina, 261.
- WASHINGTON, SAMUEL T., presents the sword of Washington and staff of Franklin to the nation, 692; letter of, 692.
- WATKINSON, HENRY M., Representative from Tennessee, 4, 261.
- WEBSTER, DANIEL, Senator from Massachusetts, 8; on a pension to Hannah Leighton, 166; on a tax on bank notes, 174; resigns his seat in the Senate, 254. See Index, vols. 5, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13.
- WELLES, JOHN B., Representative from Ohio, 4, 261; on the claim of Matthew Lyon's heirs, 129; on the bankrupt law, 682.
- WHITBROOK, JOHN, Representative from Pennsylvania, 261.
- Western Armory.*—See Index, vols. 7, 9, 10.
- Western Rivers, navigation of.*—See Index, vol. 8.
- West Point Academy.—In the House, a bill making appropriations for the army, considered, 417; motion to refer, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of abolishing West Point, 417; established in violation of the constitution, 417; action of State Legislatures on the subject, 417; opinion of Jefferson, 418; recommendation of Washington, 418; it is founded on principles extremely obnoxious to the people, 419; its history, 419; an order of nobility established at West Point, 419; the cadets have the monopoly of the offices of the army, 419; the principles on which the institution is founded destroy the patriotism and ambition to become qualified for stations in the army, 420; what inducement for a private soldier to enter the service? 421; no necessity for this academy, 421. See Index, vols. 7, 10, 12. Do. Cadets.—See Index, vols. 6, 10. Do. Vessels.—See Index, vol. 9, 10.
- WHITE, ALBERT B., Senator from Indiana, 260; on the prospective pre-emption bill, 319; on the amended tariff bill, 622. See Index, vol. 12.
- WHITE, EDWARD D., Representative from Louisiana, 4, 261.
- WHITE, HUGH L., Senator from Tennessee, 8; presents resolutions from Tennessee Legislature, 86; resigns his seat in the Senate, 28. See Index, vols. 8, 12, 13.
- WHITE, JOHN, Representative from Kentucky, 4, 261; chosen Speaker, 282; his address, 292; reply to a vote of thanks, 712. See Index, vol. 12.
- WHITE, JOSEPH L., Representative from Indiana, 261; on the bankrupt law, 347.
- Whites, their intrusion on Indian reservations.—See Index, vol. 8.
- Whitney's Patent Right.—See Index, vol. 4.
- WHITNEY, R. M., the case of.—See Index, vol. 4.
- WICK, WILLIAM W., Representative from Indiana, 4.
- Widows and Orphans, pension to.—See Index, vol. 6.
- WILCOX, LEONARD, Senator from New Hampshire, 420.
- WILDER, RICHARD H., the case of.—See Index, vol. 10.
- WILLIAMS, CHRISTOPHER H., Representative from Tennessee, 8, 261. See Index, vol. 12.
- WILLIAMS, HENRY, Representative from Massachusetts, 8.
- WILLIAMS, JAMES W., Representative from Maryland, 261; on the bankrupt law, 348; decease of, 600.
- WILLIAMS, JARED W., Representative from New Hampshire, 2.
- WILLIAMS, JOSEPH L., Representative from Tennessee, 4, 261. See Index, vol. 12.
- WILLIAMS, LEWIS, Representative from North Carolina, 4, 261; decease of, 262. See Index, vols. 7, 12, 13.
- WILLIAMS, EVAN, Senator from Maine, 2, 299; on naval schools, 478; on the British treaty, 574. See Index, vol. 12.
- WILLIAMS, THOMAS W., Representative from Connecticut, 8, 261.
- WINTHROP, ROBERT C., Representative from Massachusetts, 124, 261; on the bankrupt law, 622.
- WIRE, HENRY A., Representative from Virginia, 4, 261; relative to the north-eastern boundary, 166; on the repeal of the sub-Treasury, 321; on the bankrupt law, 346; on the provisional tariff, 420; on the tariff vote, 425. See Index, vols. 12, 13.
- Witnesses, payment of, in impeachment cases.—See Index, vols. 8, 11.
- WOOD, FERNANDO, Representative from New York, 261.
- WOODBRIDGE, ———, Senator from Michigan, 260; on the decease of Senator Dixon, 262.
- WOODBURY, LEVI, Senator from New Hampshire, 260; on land distribution, 239; on disturbances in the galleries, 257; on naval schools, 420; on the mandamus to the States, 512; on the amended tariff bill, 521; on the British treaty, 570; on the Oregon bill, 623; on the assumption of State debts, 624.
- WORTHINGTON, J. T. H., Representative from Maryland, 4. See Index, vol. 12.
- WRIGHT, SILAS, JR., Senator from New York, 2, 299; relative to the north-eastern boundary, 166; on printing the documentary history, 194; on repeal of the Independent Treasury, 159; on a pension to Hannah Leighton, 16-167; on the prospective pre-emption bill, 321; on land distribution, 360; on the apportionment bill, 412; on the tariff, 472; on the mandamus to the States, 512; on the amended tariff bill, 520; on the warehousing system, 625. See Index, vols. 9, 10, 12, 13.

Y

Yasco Purchase.—See Index, vols. 5, 8, 9.

Yates and Nays.—In the Senate, on the Independent Treasury, 41; on the armed occupation of Florida, 41; on the assumption of the State debts, 54; on petitions for the admission of Florida, 74; relative to the assumption of State debts, 80, 92, 93; relative to British liberation of slaves, 117; relative to the documentary history, 127, 128, 129; relative to prospective pre-emption, 120, 122; relative to the pre-emption bill, 302, 223, 224, 245; relative to Treasury notes, 252; on repeal of the Independent Treasury, 262; relative to the reorganization of judicial circuits, 263; on amendment relative to the repeal of the sub-Treasury, 291; on ordering the bill to be engrossed, 295; on recommitting the bill for the relief of Mrs. Harrison, 304, 305; on the bankrupt bill, 321; as an amendment to the bank bill, 322, 324; on the bill, 324; on printing the Lie of Wight petition, 324; on the bank vetoed bill, 355, 356; relative to land distribution, 342, 361; on the fiscal corporation, 367; on the provisional tariff, 425, 443; against leave to introduce a bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law, 458; relative to the enlistment of blacks, 465; relative to a tax on bank notes, 474; on the tariff, 478; relative to naval schools, 480; on the amended tariff, 526; on the distribution bill, 526; relative to the fine on General Jackson, 627; on the Oregon bill, 629; on postponing the State debt scheme, 700, 702, 705; relative to General Jackson's See 705, 706; on resolutions relative to State debts, 717; relative to the British treaty, 712; on repealing the bankrupt law, 714.

In the House, on repeal of the sub-Treasury, 227; on the bankrupt bill, 357; relative to the fiscal corporation, 364, 365; on the Treasury Note bill, 392; on the provisional tariff, 484; on the apportionment bill, 496; relative to the provisional tariff, 448; on the vetoed provisional tariff, 458; on the tariff, 456; relative to the bankrupt law, 460, 461; on reference of the tariff veto message, 496; on the judicial circuit bill, 498; on the vetoed tariff bill, 504; relative to the veto power, 505; on the amended tariff, 511; on the repeal of the distribution act, 516; relative to the one hour rule, 619; relative to the 51st rule, 619; relative to the impeachment of the President, 645; relative to the bankrupt law, 658, 661; relative to the Krahequer plan, 662.

YORKE, THOMAS G., Representative from New Jersey, 4. See Index, vol. 12.

YOUNG, AUGUSTUS, Representative from Vermont, 261.

YOUNG, JOHN, Representative from New York, 261. See Index, vol. 12.

YOUNG, RICHARD M., Senator from Illinois, 2, 280; on prospective pre-emption, 240; on land distribution, 281; on the Oregon Territory, 632. See Index, vol. 12.

The Best Dictionaries of Foreign Languages.

I.

SPIERS AND SURENNE'S FRENCH & ENGLISH AND ENGLISH & FRENCH PRONOUNCING DICTIONARY.

NEWLY COMPOSED FROM THE FRENCH DICTIONARIES OF THE FRENCH ACADEMY, LAVEAUX, BOISTE, BESCHERELLE, LANDAIS, ETC.

AND FROM THE ENGLISH DICTIONARIES OF

JOHNSON, WEBSTER, WORCESTER, RICHARDSON, ETC

Containing a great number of Words not found in other Dictionaries, followed by

A Complete Vocabulary of the Names of Places and Persons, Mythological and Classical, Ancient and Modern.

By A. SPIERS,

PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH AT THE NATIONAL COLLEGE OF BONAPARTE (PARIS), AND THE NATIONAL SCHOOL OF ENGINEERS, &c.

Carefully Revised, Corrected, and Enlarged

By G. P. QUACKENBOS, A. M.

One large volume 8vo., pp. 1342, well printed and strongly bound, $5. An abridgment of the above, by SURENNE, 1 vol., neatly bound, $2.

II.

A DICTIONARY OF THE GERMAN AND ENGLISH LANGUAGES,

Indicating the accentuation of every German Word, containing several hundred German Synonyms, together with a Classification and Alphabetical List of the Irregular Verbs, and a Dictionary of German Abbreviations. Compiled from the Works of HILPERT, FLUGEL, GRIEB, HEYSE, AND OTHERS.

In two parts: I. German and English.—II. English and German.

By G. J. ADLER, A. M.,

PROFESSOR OF THE GERMAN LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE IN THE UNIVERSITY OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

One large vol. 8vo., pp. 1390, well printed and strongly bound, $5. An abridgment of the above, one vol., strongly bound, $1 75.

III.

A PRONOUNCING DICTIONARY OF THE SPANISH AND ENGLISH LANGUAGES,

COMPOSED FROM THE

SPANISH DICTIONARY OF THE SPANISH ACADEMY, TERREROS, AND SALVA, UPON THE BASIS OF

SEOANE'S EDITION OF NEUMAN AND BARETTI;

AND FROM THE

ENGLISH DICTIONARIES OF WEBSTER, WORCESTER, AND WALKER,

With the addition of more than Eight Thousand Words, Idioms, and Familiar Phrases, the Irregularities of all the Verbs, and a Grammatical Synopsis of both Languages.

By MARIANO VELAZQUEZ DE LA CADENA,

PROFESSOR OF THE SPANISH LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE IN COLUMBIA COLLEGE, NEW YORK.

One large vol. 8vo., well printed, and strongly bound, $5. An abridgment of the above, 1 vol. $1 75.

Useful Household Works.

I.

THE MODERN HOUSEWIFE,

COMPRISING NEARLY ONE THOUSAND RECEIPTS FOR THE ECONOMIC AND JUDICIOUS

PREPARATION OF EVERY MEAL OF THE DAY, AND MINUTE DIRECTIONS FOR FAMILY MANAGEMENT IN ALL ITS BRANCHES.

By ALEXIS SOYER.

1 volume, 12mo, neatly bound. Price, $1.

II.

THE INVALID'S OWN BOOK,

A COLLECTION OF RECIPES FROM VARIOUS BOOKS AND VARIOUS COUNTRIES

By THE HONORABLE LADY CUST.

1 vol. 12mo. Cloth, 50 cents.

III.

BOOK OF USEFUL KNOWLEDGE

A CYCLOPEDIA,

OF SIX THOUSAND PRACTICAL RECEIPTS, AND COLLATERAL INFORMATION IN THE

ARTS, MANUFACTURES, AND TRADES, INCLUDING MEDICINE, PHARMACY, AND DOMESTIC ECONOMY

By A. J. COOLEY.

1 volume, 8vo. pp. 576, neatly bound, $1 50.

IV.

THE CHEMISTRY OF COMMON LIFE.

By JAMES F. W. JOHNSTON, M. A., F. R. S., F. G. S.

COMPRISING

The Air we Breathe, the Water we Drink, The Soil we Cultivate, and the Plants we Reap. The Bread we Eat, The Beef we Cook, and the Beverages we Infuse. The Sweets we Extract, The Liquors we Ferment, and the Narcotics we Indulge in. The Odors we Enjoy, The Smells we Dislike. What we Breathe and Breathe for, And what, how, and why we Digest. The Body we Cherish, and the Circulation of Matter. A Recapitulation.

WITH NUMEROUS WOOD-CUT ILLUSTRATIONS.

Complete in 5 Nos. Paper covers, 75 cts. Cloth, $1. (Nearly ready.)

Important Philosophical Works.

I.

PHILOSOPHY OF SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON, BART.,

PROFESSOR OF LOGIC AND METAPHYSICS IN EDINBURGH UNIVERSITY.

Arranged and Edited by

O. W. WIGHT,

Translator of Cousin's "History of Modern Philosophy."

One vol. 8vo., pp. 580, well printed. $1 50.

"Sir William Hamilton has attained to the very highest distinction as a philosopher, and in some respects he is decidedly superior to any of his illustrious predecessors—Bald, Stuart or Brown. With a remarkable power of analysis and discrimination, he combines great decision and elegance of style, and a degree of erudition that is almost without a parallel."—Edinburgh Review.

II.

COURSE OF THE HISTORY OF MODERN PHILOSOPHY.

By M. VICTOR COUSIN.

Translated by O. W. WIGHT.

Two volumes 8vo., well printed. Price, $3.

"M. Cousin is the greatest philosopher of France."—Sir William Hamilton.

"A writer, whose pointed periods have touched the chords of modern society, and thrilled through the minds of minds in almost every quarter of the civilized world."—Edinburgh Review.

III.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE BEAUTIFUL.

FROM THE FRENCH OF VICTOR COUSIN.

Translated, with notes, by J. O. DANIEL.

One neat vol. 12mo. Price, 63 cts.

IV.

THE POSITIVE PHILOSOPHY OF AUGUSTE COMTE.

FREELY TRANSLATED AND CONDENSED

By HARRIET MARTINEAU.

Two volumes 8vo., pp. 516, 577, well printed. Price, $4.

V.

LECTURES ON THE TRUE, THE BEAUTIFUL, AND THE GOOD.

By VICTOR COUSIN.

Translated by O. W. WIGHT.

One neat volume 8vo. (Nearly ready.)

Standard Historical Works.

I.
THE HISTORY OF ROME.

By THOMAS ARNOLD, D. D.,

LATE REGIUS PROFESSOR OF MODERN HISTORY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD, AND HEAD MASTER RUGBY SCHOOL.

1 large vol. 8vo. pp. 686. Price, $3.

II.
HISTORY OF FRANCE,

FROM THE EARLIEST PERIOD TO THE PRESENT TIME.

By M. MICHELET, PROFESSEUR A LA FACULTE DES LETTRES, PROFESSEUR A L'ECOLE NORMALE, &c.

Translated by G. H. SMITH, F. G. S.

2 vols. 8vo. pp., 480 and 400. Price, $3 50.

III.
HISTORY OF GERMANY,

FROM THE EARLIEST PERIOD TO THE PRESENT TIME.

By FREDERICK KOHLRAUSCH.

TRANSLATED FROM THE LAST GERMAN EDITION. By JAMES D. HAAS.

With a complete index prepared expressly for the American edition. 1 vol. 8vo., pp. 487. Price

$1 50; or, an Illustrated Edition, neatly bound, $2 50.

IV.
HISTORY OF ENGLAND,

FROM THE PEACE OF UTRECHT TO THE PEACE OF PARIS.

By LORD MAHON.

2 large vols. 8vo. pp., 590, 609, well printed, $4.

V.
A DIGEST OF THE LAWS, CUSTOMS, MANNERS, AND INSTITUTIONS OF THE ANCIENT AND MODERN NATIONS.

By THOMAS DEW, LATE PRESIDENT OF THE COLLEGE OF WILLIAM AND MARY.

1 vol. 8vo. pp. 670, well printed, price, $2.

VI.
A MANUAL OF ANCIENT AND MODERN HISTORY.

By W. C. TAYLOR, LL. D., &c.

1 large volume, 8vo., pp. 866. Price, $2 25.

VII
THE HISTORY OF CIVILIZATION, FROM THE FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE TO THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

By F. GUIZOT.

TRANSLATED BY W. HAZLITT.

4 vols. 12mo., $3 50.

